THE QUIVER

ANNUAL VOLUME, 1903

Principal Contributors

THE VEN. THE ARCHDEACON OF LONDON
THE LATE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.
THE REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.
AMY LE FEUVRE
MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD
ELIZABETH L. BANKS
KATHARINE TYNAN
THE REV. JOSEPH HOCKING
THE REV. MARK GUY PEARSE
C. E. C. WEIGALL
JOHN K. LEYS
F. M. HOLMES
THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A.
A. B. ROMNEY
THE REV. LYMAN ABBOTT, D.D.
IAN MACLAREN
THE REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A.
M. A. BALLIOL
THE REV. H. B. FREEMAN, M.A.
THE REV. S. BARING-GOULD, M.A.
THE LATE VERY REV. F. W. FARRAR, D.D.
SCOTT GRAHAM
D. L. WOOLMER
THE REV. C. SILVESTER HORNE, M.A.
SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, M.V.O., MUS.D.
RAYMOND BLATHWAYT
THE VEN. ARCHDEACON WYNNE, D.D.
ALAN ST. AUBYN
EDITH E. CUTHELL
MYRA HAMILTON
ETC. ETC.

CASSELL AND COMPANY, LIMITED
London, Paris, New York & Melbourne

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

XUM

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,

Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

CHAPTER I.

THE COMING OF THE CORNISHMAN.

UR country now, thank God! is in comparative peace again. The Great Armada, the very thought of which hung like a night pall upon our people for such a long time, has come, and — all that was left of it —returned to the shores from which it came. The proud boasts of Spain no longer trouble us. Not that they ever made us fear, for no sooner did Her Gracious Majesty ascend the throne than the whole nation began to feel the throbbings of a new life. In truth, as my father hath often said to me, our people seemed to be new-born during the first ten years of Elizabeth's reign. It is true we had lost Calais under Mary, but we did not fear the French; towards the Dutch we had only feelings of friendship, while we had tasted the quality of the Spaniards too often to fear them. That they were richer than we, we were well aware; that they could put more soldiers in the field we also knew; all the same, we had learned to laugh at their proud vauntings. We were told right often that the Pope excommunicated our Queen, and promised Spain and its King all manner of blessing—temporal and spiritual—if they would bend our necks, and bring us into submission, while terrible threats were made, if we did not throw off our allegiance to Elizabeth and yield to Papal authority. But, as I said, we did not fear. Freedom from Rome had made us strong, and God had so blessed the exploits of Drake, and Grenville, and Howard, and Hawkins, and Raleigh, besides a host of others, that, while we could not help realising the danger of the coming of the Spaniards, fear did not come into our hearts. Moreover, when they came, they found us ready. From Plymouth Sound to the Isle of Wight, from the Isle of Wight to Calais, and from Calais to Scotland, we drove them, until God took up our work, and then the Great Armada, concerning which the world had talked so long became so much driftwood, and the power of Spain was broken for ever.

But it was not of this I intended to write. For much as I love to think of these things, and although I have intimate knowledge of much that took place, I realise that my pen falls short of giving anything like a true description of scenes which stirred the pulses of all Europe and altered the history of the world. No; what I have to tell is concerning myself, for although my name is not worthy to be handed down to history, like the names of men I have mentioned, I have taken some little part in my country's weal, and I have encountered adventures which even now make my nerves tingle and my blood leap in my veins.

Whether I should have ever dared to record these things but for one fact, I do not know; for, unlike my brother, I am but a poor scribe, and have but little skill in placing my thoughts upon paper. But lately I have been reading what my beloved father, Sir Richard Hamstead, wrote about his life during those dark days when Mary was Queen, and this has led me to recall things which have happened to me.* For stirring as were the times of his young manhood, dangerous as were the scenes through which he passed in fighting Señor Toledo, thwarting Stephen Gardiner, and winning my dear mother as his wife, I think I can say with due modesty that I have passed through scenes not one whit less terrible, and faced difficulties which even he would say were great enough for a hero like Admiral Drake or Sir Richard Grenville, to say nothing of a nearly beardless youth as I was in those days.

Not that I had seen no active service. I had fought in Ireland, and I had sailed around the world with the great admiral, during which time I had not only seen the ways of the Spaniards, but I had learned something of their tongue. I received a wound, too, and it was this same wound which, I suspect, altered the whole course of my life's history, and caused me to have those experiences which I presently propose to relate.

For, be it borne in mind, I realised early in my life that I must win my own fortune. My brother Dick, being the eldest son, was naturally heir to my father's estates at Hamstead Manor, while my grandfather, Lord Godfrey Bedford, had all along willed it that my sister Faith should inherit Barcroft Hall and its estates. That being so, I saw that while my father might be able to give me a farm or two, together with a sum of money, I must make my own fortune, if I did not intend to live and die a poor man. Not that this troubled me. Dick had always been far more fitted for a squire than I, and I did not grudge him one acre of the lands. As for Faith, I rejoiced that my grandfather had chosen her to inherit his possessions. It is not given to women to go out into the world and fight their country's battles, neither, surely, did God intend them to bear hardships and dangers. Besides, I loved her so, that I would gladly have renounced Barcroft for her sake, even if my grandfather had left it to me. Like my father, I had the adventurous spirit, and I loved nothing more, or better, than to go out into the great world, and to take my share in the struggle to uphold our Queen and country.

Thus it came about that on my return from my adventures, of which it is my purpose to say nothing here, I fretted greatly. For although my wound healed quickly, my comrades had, during its healing, sailed to Virginia, and, as they did not expect to return for many months, I saw nothing before me but a period of enforced idleness in the quiet manor of Hamstead, which, although only fourteen miles from London town, three from the town of Barnet, and six from St. Albans, was but little to my taste. Especially did I feel this when my wound was fully healed and my health completely restored. Day followed day with monotonous weariness, until I felt I must go to London town and join one of the cruises which were constantly being taken by the young hot-bloods of that period. I did not do this, however, for something happened which, as I thought, promised fair sport. At first I feared there was but little in it; in this, however, as will presently be seen, I was in the wrong.

Seeing that it was the coming of the man from Cornwall which begun the business, I may as well speak of his first appearance, and of what my father said at the time. When he rode up to the house first of all, I was lying under a tree, dreaming of the fine times my companions were having in the New World, and was naturally wishing myself with them.

"Craving your forgiveness," said the man, "but could you wake up long enough to tell me if this is Hamstead Manor, the house of Sir Richard Hamstead?"

"That depends, my man," I said, rising and walking slowly towards him.

"Depends on what?" asked the fellow, looking shrewdly at me.

"On your reasons for wanting to know," I replied. For, as it must be remembered, there were so many Jesuit spies in those days that it behoved us to be for ever wary. Especially was this true when anything concerned my father. It is true few men underwent more danger than he in the time of Mary, and, as he has recorded in his memoirs, he snatched my dear mother from the stake on the day that Queen Mary died. Nevertheless, he never pronounced himself fully on the side of the Reformed faith. My grandfather had loyally supported the ancient faith all through the changing times of Henry, the boy Edward, and Mary, and although he must, perforce, loyally welcome our beloved Queen Elizabeth, he never disowned the Roman Church. This was also true of my father. If ever a man had reason to be a Protestant, it was he. He owned his promotion in life to the influences of the new and liberal ideas, while he had for years been under the ban of death because he was suspected of renouncing the old. Moreover, my dear mother was a Protestant from her childhood, and held that the Pope was the Antichrist spoken of in the Scriptures. Nevertheless, my father, while adopting liberal views concerning the Protestants, always called himself a Papist; and while he never hindered my dear mother from teaching us according to her belief, my father was still regarded as one of the Catholic gentlemen who stood by the old faith. As a consequence, he had often been regarded with suspicion. Again and again had the Jesuits claimed his assistance, and urged upon him that his first duty was to the Church, and to his country afterwards. But my father would have none of this. He might not be logical, he said (and, indeed, from this standpoint he could not answer the Jesuits satisfactorily; for, as they maintained, if the Pope represents Christ, he must be obeyed before aught else), but nothing should induce him to be false to the land of his birth. The Pope might excommunicate him, but he would never plot against his Queen. All the same, he was constantly harassed, and thus we, his children, who would have nothing to do with either the Pope or his pretensions, were led to regard the visits of strangers with much suspicion

* "Lest we Forget."

"You want to know who I am, and from whence I come?" said the stranger.

"You have hit the nail on the head," I replied.

He looked at me steadily for some moments; then he said, "And who are you, young master?"

The fellow had an honest face, and spoke, as I thought, with a true voice; so, wondering what he wanted, I said:

"I am Rupert Hamstead, my good fellow. If you are honest, I may help you to see Sir Richard my father; but if you are not, I will give you a beating with your own horsewhip.'

"God a' mercy, Master Rupert! talk not like that," said the man, with a great laugh, "for, if Sir Richard falls in with the plans of my master, it may be that you and I will be much together. Besides Master Killigrew would not believe me if I told him that John Trenoweth allowed himself to be horsewhipped, even by the son of Sir Richard Hamstead."

"Master Killigrew!" I cried; "what—Master Tom Killigrew of Falmouth?"

"Right the very first time," said John Trenoweth; "and all the way have I come from Cornwall, that I might take my master's letter to Sir Richard, and so, if he thinks well of it, to talk over the same with him. Not that I will not give you a chance to horsewhip me, if you will, Master Rupert; only, as your father can tell you, we Cornishmen have a rough way with us."

"Do you mean that I could not do it?" I cried, for I loved nothing better than a trial of strength, and, when it did not come to fighting with swords, the young braves of our time did not deem it beneath them to try their strength with those of a less degree.

"You will forgive me if I have my doubts," said the Cornishman, with a laugh, "and after I have seen Sir Richard I will e'en meet you in a quiet place, where I will first give you the chance to take the whip from me, and afterwards we will try which is the better man."

"You mean some of your Cornish wrestling?" I said

"That's as you please, Master Rupert I be noan particular. But I may not wait now. I have travelled fast from Falmouth—so fast that, much as I desired, I did not turn aside to visit London town, because, as my master said to me, 'Do not kill your horse, John, but at the same time let no grass grow under his feet, for Sir Richard ought to know without delay what is in my mind. Young Mawgan is ready, and if so be that Master Rupert is of the same mind and if his father is willing, no time should be wasted.'"

"What mean you?" I asked. "Do you mean to say that you know your master's plans?"

"Concerning that I shall tell Sir Richard," replied John Trenoweth, "so lead me to him without delay."

I must confess that I was not pleased with the way the fellow spoke, but his words so much stirred my curiosity that I forgot my anger and without more ado led the way to the house, and a few minutes after John Trenoweth was closeted with my father.

'What doth the fellow mean?" I asked myself as I took some of the tobacco I had brought home with me, and, having placed some in a pipe, began to smoke. "John Trenoweth seems somewhat of a mystery. He speaks not as an ordinary servant, neither is he a gentleman It appears he hath the confidence of Master Tom Killigrew, who, as all the world knows, is faithful to Queen and country, and it would seem that there is some plan afoot in which I may have something to say. If so, God bless the coming of John Trenoweth! for I am right weary of idling around Hamstead Manor."

I had not been long thinking of such things when I heard my father's voice.

"Hulloa, Rupert! Come here, lad. Here's something stirring."

I made my way with all quickness to the room in which John Trenoweth had gone, and saw that my father looked much excited, while John Trenoweth sat near, his face calm and placid, although his eyes gleamed with interest. There was a marked contrast in the two men. My father was tall, and of commanding stature. On his face were evidences of the fact that he had taken part in the weighty matters of our land, that he knew the secrets of important and far-reaching movements. He also had the appearance of a soldier, and while he had a seat in the English Parliament, and was much looked up to as a faithful and tried councillor, he had lost none of the youthful fire of which he wrote in his memoirs. Altogether, my father, Sir Richard Hamstead, was at this time a man of whom any son might be proud, and I had always looked upon him as my model of what an English gentleman should be. John Trenoweth was entirely different. He was by no means a tall man—rather he was under than above the ordinary stature—but he had enormous breadth of shoulders and depth of chest. I had not noticed this so particularly when I saw him first; but now, being divested of his riding attire, I felt less doubtful of being able to horsewhip him. It is true I stood at least six inches taller, for I could give even my father an inch in the matter of height, while I prided myself upon my prowess. Nevertheless as I saw his tremendous thews, and noted the depth of his great broad chest, I knew that John Trenoweth was a man of extraordinary strength. Moreover, he seemed less of a serving man as he stood there; rather he might have good blood in his veins, and claim some sort of equality with those who bore well-known names.

"Here, Rupert," said my father. "Master Trenoweth tells me that you have already met, and so I need not make you known to each other. But read this," and he placed a letter in my hand.

This is what I read:—

"Arwenack, near Falmouth,
"Cornwall.

"Written on the first day of September, in the year of our Lord 1587, and the twenty-ninth year of the reign of our most beloved Lady and Queen, Her Gracious Majesty Elizabeth.

"DEAR SIR RICHARD HAMSTEAD,—I write you this, first to convey to you my love, as my old friend and companion of more than thirty years ago. Dost remember, Dick, of that meeting of ours at the old house near Southend, and of those after days at the Red House at Rouen? But of that I must not speak now, or I should never get on to the matter in hand. But I hope to see you shortly, Dick. Either you must come to me, or I will come to thee, and together we will hold revels as we talk of the old times.

"And second I write, Sir Richard, to ask you to pay good heed to what John Trenoweth may say for he is an old and tried friend of our family. For while he calls himself our servant, he is more friend than servant, having good blood in his veins, knows something of letters, and carries as good a sword as can be found this side the Tamar.

"Concerning what he hath to say I will not write here, Sir Richard, but pay good heed to what he may tell thee, for we have talked over the matters many times; and as my son Mawgan and thy son Rupert be nearly the same age, and I trust thy son Rupert is a well-grown lad as my son Mawgan is, standing, by the grace of God, six feet two inches in his stockings, and can throw any man of his girth in the county. So after you and John Trenoweth have discussed this matter fully, and if thou be willing and thy son Rupert be willing, and of course he will be, or he is no son of thine (even now I would know the reason why, if Mawgan did not obey my bidding without a murmur), well, see to it that the business be taken in hand right quickly, so that in a few days from the time thou dost read this I shall see what kind of a lad Rupert is, and then, by the blessing of God, see him and Mawgan start on their holy mission.

"And that is all I can write, Sir Richard. First, because written messages are dangerous in these days; and second, because it would be impossible for me to tell thee all that is in my mind by means of pen and paper. Even as it is, this letter has, owing to my being a poor penman, cost me many hours of anxious labour.—Your obedient servant and faithful friend, "TOM KILLIGREW.

"Nota Bene.—Please convey to your dear lady, Dick, my sincere devotion; also that of my wife, although, as yet, they have not seen each other.—T. K."

This letter, now couched in formal terms, and again in those of friendship, I read carefully through, and, having done so, turned to John Trenoweth, in order to hear what he had to say. I saw, too, that my father was anxious to know what was in the Cornishman's mind.

"I pray you give good heed," said Trenoweth, "for my master's words are of no mean import."

CHAPTER II.

JOHN TRENOWETH'S STORY.

BUT the man did not speak freely. He seemed to have some difficulty in shaping his thoughts, also of finding fit words wherewith to convey them. So much was this the case that I presently began to get suspicious, but I judged afterwards that so anxious was he to do his master's bidding well, and without mistake, that fear got hold of him, and, as all the world knows, fear is not helpful in matters of this kind.

"My master admires not Sir Francis Drake," he said presently.

"Then your master must be a fool," I replied hastily, for I could brook no word that slighted

"Explain yourself more fully, Master John Trenoweth," he said, "and give us examples of your meaning."

"This, Sir Richard," said the Cornishman. "Let him meet the Spaniard in open sea, and the Spaniard becomes a child to him; but let him meet the Spaniard in counsel, and then Sir Francis becomes the child."

"Dreaming of the fine times my companions were having."—p. 2.

Sir Francis. "Why, man, think of the times he hath——"

"Steady, steady, young master," said John Trenoweth. "Master Killigrew admires him greatly as a rover, as a stout fighter, and as a prince among English sailors, but he doth not rate him highly as a clever, far-seeing man. He can meet blows with better blows, plans with better plans—that is, when all is fair and above board—but he knows not the mind of the Spaniard, he cannot understand the underground way in which he works. In short, Sir Francis is a great admiral, but he is not a far-seeing man where the Spaniard is concerned."

At this I was about to break out again into a warm defence of the hero of our day, but my father cut me short.

"Facts have not proved it," I cried hotly.

"They have proved it again and again," said Trenoweth. "Sir Francis sails against the Spaniard in open day, and fights him in open day, and when he has beaten him he thinks that all is over; but he doth not dream of the thousand schemes in the Spaniard's mind, he cannot tell us what the Jesuits are doing, he doth not know what underground plots are being made against our Queen and country. In truth, when we come to think of it, we do not know our danger; we do not know what force the Spaniard can bring to British shores; and as a consequence—God forgive her for being mistaken! but Her Gracious Majesty is stingy in money, stingy in meat, stingy in powder, stingy in men. In truth, I much doubt if she realises that the Spaniard is serious.'

At this I was silent; for, much as I loved Her Majesty, I could not but sigh at the way she had treated some of the bravest men whom God ever gave to a monarch.

"Master Killigrew hath thought much concerning this," said John Trenoweth, "and he greatly desires that all the Spaniard's plans may be discovered; that the amount of help he can get from Italy, Austria, and other countries be calculated to a nicety, together with such information as, when conveyed to Her Majesty, will make her consent to her Parliament being liberal to her servants."

"But how is this to be found out?" asked my father.

"Only by Englishmen going thither," said John Trenoweth.

"An Englishman's life would not be worth a silver groat in Spain," said my father. "Why, think of the men who have dared to set foot there. There was Biddicombe of Devon, son to old Sir John; he went to Spain, and what happened? God only knows, except that, under the pretence of saving his soul, he was placed on the rack, his flesh was torn with red-hot pincers, and afterwards he was burnt. And he was not the only one. There was young Walter Raleigh's cousin, and poor Ned Blount, besides many others. The man who goes to Spain is lost. If he goes as a Catholic, he is never allowed to rest until he promises to fight against his country, and if he goes as a Protestant, well—God a' mercy on him!"

"Nevertheless, for the sake of our beloved Queen and our country, we should not falter," said John Trenoweth. "Besides — well, God help me!—if no one will go with me, I will go alone, and willingly will I die if I can make two Spaniards less."

At this he swore a great oath, and his eyes blazed like coals of fire.

"What mean you?" said my father.

"Mean!" cried John Trenoweth, "this, Sir Richard. I am a sinful man, and a coward, for I have lived in quietness and ease while my own sweetheart is in Spain to-day, where she hath been for twenty years—that is, if she be alive. And what doth all this mean, Sir Richard? Forgive me if I make not my meaning plain, for when I think of these things my head feels like a great burning furnace; but if she is alive, it means that either she hath gone over to the abominations of Rome, which are worse than death, or she is at this time suffering all the torments which the hell hounds of the Inquisition can invent. And if she be dead, Sir Richard, the Spaniards have killed her—killed her, I tell you!—while I, her sweetheart, her promised husband, have stayed here in England, stayed in the fair county of Cornwall, and have allowed the Spaniards to work their will on her."

At this my father gave a start, and placed his left hand on his sword hilt, and stamped his foot like a man in anger, while I scorned the fellow for being a poltroon and a coward.

"A sweetheart of yours went to Spain, and you never tried to——"

"A moment, Sir Richard, and let me tell my story as I may, and, mark you, there is much more that will take long in telling, for what you have heard is not half—nay, nor a quarter of the whole. As for your scorn of me, I deserve it, and ten times more. I have been a coward—aye, and worse than a coward, and yet judge me not too soon, for one thing is mixed up with another so that an honest man can barely tell where he stands. But here is the fact: Long years ago I loved Esther Truscott as truly as a boy ever loved a maid. She loved me, too, I believe, but she would not consent to marry me, because she was the companion of Mistress Anne Tremayne, and promised to stay with her as long as she willed. As you know, Mistress Anne Tremayne is the sister of Mistress Killigrew, my master's wife, and therefore he had a special interest in her. Being older than Mistress Killigrew, the Tremayne estates came by right to her, but when she consented to marry the Spaniard, who came to Falmouth in the days when Esther and I were courting, her father, old Sir John Tremayne, swore by God, his Queen, and his country that not one acre should she have. By what means he did it I know not, but this same Don Basilio Fernandio de Valencia persuaded Mistress Anne to leave her father and her home, and accompany him to his home in Spain; and my Esther, so much did she love her mistress, went with her, leaving me alone. I know what I ought to have done: I ought to have followed her; but I did not. For one thing, Master Killigrew told me it was madness to think of it; for another, I heard again and again of the English being tortured and burnt as heretics; and while I never loved another woman, I tried to harden my heart against Esther, telling myself that she was a fickle jade, that she cared nothing for me, and was far happier with the accursed Spaniards. And thus the years passed on. Old Sir John Tremayne still lived at Tremayne, refusing to hear a word about his daughter who had gone away with the Spaniard, declaring she was no child of his, and repeating again and again that not one penny of his money, nor one acre of his land, should ever go either to her or—should she have any—her children. And so I, my heart aching all the time, kept quiet. Knowing something of learning, I became steward to Master Killigrew, but, being also somewhat of a fighter, I have accompanied my master in some of his cruises to the Mediterranean, and twice have I fought the Spaniard. But I have never landed on Spanish soil, and never have I seen Esther, much as I have longed to do both.

"Well, some time ago a friend of my master, Sir John Puddicombe, took a Spanish galleon, and in talking with one of the prisoners he found out that Don Basilio de Valencia was dead, and that since his death his widow hath fallen under the suspicion of the Inquisition, and that she is given a certain time to recant, during the which means will be used to bring her to repentance. Moreover, much discussion hath arisen about her marriage with Don Basilio de Valencia. It is held that, while she was wedded to him according to English law, she was not wedded according to the laws of Spain and the Church. Thus they argue that, while she is heir to the English estates, she hath no right, neither hath her offspring right, to her husband's estates in Spain. Concerning this I cannot say much, not being a match for Jesuit lies. But this is not all; it was told Sir John Puddicombe that an English companion of the Doña de Valencia was also suspected of heresy, and that, unless she recanted, she would be burnt with her mistress. Now, who can that woman be but Esther, Sir Richard? I try to think it is not, and I seek to engage in all sorts of foolish quarrels, and to fill my mind with wild and hare-brained thoughts, in order that I may not go mad, but I cannot. I believe it is she."

"Go on with your story," said my father sternly.

"When my master heard of it, Sir Richard (for I always call him my master, although he will have it that I am his good friend), he straightway told me, and then I got on my knees, and begged him to allow me to go to Spain. But he told me that for me to go alone would be pure craziness, and that he must think more about what he had heard. That night he went to see Sir John Tremayne, who is still alive, and told him what he had heard, whereupon Sir John forgot all the things he had said about his eldest daughter, and besought him to go to Spain and save his child. As you know, Sir John is now an old man, and is failing fast; and verily I believe that if his daughter be not saved he will die soon; and yet he told my master that, if he would not go, he would himself man a vessel and sail for Lisbon, and thence go to Spain to save his daughter."

"Well, and then?" said my father, as he saw John Trenoweth hesitate.

"Well, my master cannot leave Falmouth. He is the governor of Pendennis Castle; he is under command of the Queen to guard Falmouth harbour, and be ready to fight the Spaniards, should they come near. Nevertheless, he and I have talked many hours concerning this matter, until not long ago a vessel called at Falmouth harbour, and the captain of this same vessel, Vivian by name, told him that your son, Sir Richard, Master Rupert here, was come back from the wars, that his wound was nearly healed, and that he longed sorely to be fighting the Spaniards again. This set my master thinking, and Master Mawgan, being now a man grown, though he hath not seen service, is itching to be at those proud dons, seems not altogether unfitted to go to Spain. Still, as my master saith, young Mawgan knows not their lingo nor their ways, and, being only twenty-four on the fifteenth of July, may do foolish things. Then again, I, who am to go with him, while not altogether a fool, am also ignorant of their lingo, and should, so my master thinks, do more harm than good; that is, unless someone goes as a leader, who can talk to the Spaniard in his own tongue, and who knows his crookedness. This led Master Killigrew to think of Master Rupert here. For Captain Vivian hath it that, although young, Master Rupert is cunning beyond his years, and he also saith that on more than one occasion he hath proved more than a master for the Spaniard, both with tongue, and wits, and the sword. Besides, Master Killigrew remembers the time, Sir Richard, when you and he were friends together, and the promises you made to each other.

"This being so, he drew up the letter I have brought to you, and I have travelled with all haste for five days, and here I am, Sir Richard, having told my story badly; for, since I have heard the news about Esther, I am not my own man, nor never shall be until my fingers are round the throats of the Spaniards who have made my poor maid suffer."

"And this is all your story, John Trenoweth?" said my father presently.

"I think it is," replied the Cornishman, "and yet I am not sure, for when I think about Esther I forget many things which I ought to bear in mind."

"Then, as I understand it, my old friend Killigrew wishes Rupert here to return with you to Cornwall, and then to take young Mawgan and you to Spain to find out the truth concerning the fate of Sir John Tremayne's daughter?"

"Yes, Sir Richard, and also at the same time to discover what we can of the Spaniards' plans about England, and whether they purport coming to fight us, and with what force. God forgive me! but when I think of Esther I forget my duty to Queen and country; but this must not be forgotten, Sir Richard, for my master believes that if we can but put the truth before Her Majesty, neither Sir John Hawkins, nor Sir Francis Drake, nor Sir Richard Grenville will ever again have to grieve because the Queen is stingy both of men and money. Master Killigrew believes that Master Rupert could find out many things which would be of great value."

"But how are they to get to Spain?" said my father. "Every Spanish port is safely guarded. The King hath given command to attack every English vessel and to take the sailors to the Inquisitors, who may, for the glory of God—may Heaven forgive me for saying the words!—work their will upon them."

"This we know right well, Sir Richard, and concerning the means of getting there I do not know, for my master hath told me nothing. Moreover, Master Rupert will naturally have to be consulted. But this I know: Sir John Tremayne says that no money shall be wanting, and that whatever Master Rupert thinks we need shall be given."

"What do you think of it, Rupert?" asked my father.

"Think of it!" I cried. "I think God hath sent John Trenoweth hither, and that right gladly will I go with him to Falmouth town, when, after having taken counsel with Master Killigrew, I will go to Spain, and do all that is required of me."

"It is a perilous mission," said my father thoughtfully.

"And what then!" I cried. "God hath given us arms to fight, swords to carry, and brains to think!"

"Hath the Doña de Valencia children? said my father presently.

"Ah!" cried John Trenoweth, "I had forgotten that. Thank you for reminding me, Sir Richard, for otherwise I should have left out what you ought to know. Yes, she hath a daughter, who hath been brought up to hate both the English and our holy Reformed religion. She hath been brought up in one of those prison houses of Rome called a convent. Moreover, the Spaniards have it that, her mother being married according to English law, this daughter is the rightful owner of Sir John Tremayne's lands. It is also believed that she, being under the influence of the Church, will at the proper time be made to enter the religious life, and give these same Tremayne lands to the Jesuits. And this leads me to another thing, Sir Richard, and my master told me to be sure to make full report of this. A man who was once your enemy, and with whom you fought more than once, hath mixed himself up in the matter. He knows our laws, and our customs, and Sir John Puddicombe told my master that it is he who hath planned it all. It is he who will bring the daughter of Sir John Tremayne to the stake; it is he who will get hold of the Tremayne estates, and hand them over to the Jesuits; and it is he in particular that we shall have to fight."

"His name? his name?" said my father eagerly.

"Señor Toledo," said John Trenoweth, "and I am told that he is as deep as the Red Sea, in which King Pharaoh's armies were drowned, and as cruel as his master the devil."

"That he is!" cried my father. "Ah! and I might have killed him years ago. Twice did I have him at my mercy. Twice! Look! that is the sword which I took from him. Señor Toledo! John Trenoweth, I fear greatly—I fear greatly. If that man hath determined on the death of Sir John Temayne's daughter, she will die. If your old sweetheart be in his hands, hope not to see her again. Moreover, he will work his will on this daughter of the Doña de Valencia; he will poison her mind more and more against her mother and her mother's country."

Now these words angered me greatly, for they were not the true words of Sir Richard Hamstead. They told of a fear that was unworthy of him, and of a spirit which seemed to me almost craven.

"No, father," I said. "If he be the kind of man you say he is, all the more reason why he should be met by Englishmen who fear neither the devil nor his servants. It is well known that you outwitted him long years ago, and that, in spite of all he could do, you won my mother for your wife."

"God worked a miracle for us," said my father. "But for the coming of the messengers proclaiming the death of Queen Mary, she would have been burnt, and I also. But God doth not work miracles every day."

"God is not dead," I cried. "Time after time hath He saved Her Gracious Majesty from the snares of these devils. Time after time hath He helped His servants to overcome the Spaniards. Think of what Sir Francis hath done again and again, and shall we turn craven now? Shall we leave an English lady in the Spaniards' hands? Shall we allow them to work their will on them, and never lift hand to try——"

JOHN TRENOWETH'S STORY.

"Stop!" cried my father. "Who said we should never try to save them? In God's name, not I! No, my lad, you shall go to Falmouth town, and you shall hold counsel with my old friend Tom Killigrew, and afterwards you shall go to Spain, and do all that a man may to save them. If it is the will of God that you shall bring them back, then I shall have another proof that He doth still work miracles, but if not—well, you shall still go, Rupert. If it is His will that you suffer at the Spaniards' hands, well, still go. Better die that way, aye, a thousand times better die that way, than - knowing what John Trenoweth hath told us—remain here in ease."

"Spoken like the Sir Richard Hamstead I have heard of," said John Trenoweth, his eyes ablaze, and his hand grasping his sword-hilt. "Ah, Sir Richard, but you be a poor Papist!"

"Peace, man," said my father. "As to being a Papist, I follow my old father. What was good enough for him is good enough for me. I know but little, and trouble less, about the niceties of the doctrines concerning which Queen Elizabeth hath not made up her mind. But I hate burnings and cruelties · I hate the Spaniard and all his ways. Besides, I am an Englishman, and I will stand by my country and by my people, even if the Pope himself bids me fight against them. Poor Papist! Well, I may be, for I believe that my wife, although a Protestant, is the holiest woman that ever walked God's earth. All the same, I do not renounce the old faith. No, by the Mass, no!"

At this I laughed in high good humour, for I saw that my father believed in liberty of conscience as much as Hugh Latimer himself, and when I remembered that he had never interfered with my mother, who taught every one of us the Reformed faith, I felt sure that he held by the old faith rather because of sentiment than conviction.

"And when can Master Rupert start?" asked John Trenoweth eagerly.

"Start! Ah, yes," I saw a shadow come over his face, and then I felt sure that he believed he was consenting for me to go to my death. "Start! Ah, yes," he repeated; "but we must talk with your mother, my lad, we must talk with her, and—John Trenoweth, forgive me, you must be hungry and thirsty. I will order food and drink, man, and then we will call my lady in, and we will talk over the whole matter together."

CHAPTER III.

HOW I LEFT HAMSTEAD MANOR.

WHILE John Trenoweth was in the dining hall, I, as may be imagined, fell to thinking over what I had heard, and although I was rejoiced that my days of idleness were over, I knew that I was going upon an expedition from which I should probably never return alive. Not that I feared; thank God! it was not that; all the same, I could not help being thoughtful. For, as all the world knows, it was regarded as certain death at this time for an English Protestant to put his foot on Spanish soil. For Philip II. of Spain bore an ill name among those who loved our gracious Queen. For a long time, in the strength of his marriage with Mary, he had regarded himself as the rightful King of our country, or at least so he had made out to the world. Moreover, he had paid court to Elizabeth, only to be repulsed time after time, and this had increased his bitterness towards us. Added to all this, we had helped to oppose his will in Flanders, and had again and again flouted his ships in the Spanish Main. Taken altogether, therefore, leaving religion out of the question, he had a big bill against us, which he lost no opportunity of paying off. Time after time had news come to us that English sailors had been taken prisoners by the Spanish, and had afterwards been dragged before the Inquisitors, to be burned "for the glory of God."

It will be seen, therefore, that to go to Spain was no small matter; especially was this the case when the purpose of my going was borne in mind. Whether my mission was regarded from its political or from its domestic standpoint, the perils remained the same. If I were to try and learn anything of Spanish plans, I must, as it were, put my head in the lion's mouth; while, if I attempted the release of old Sir John Tremayne's daughter from the Inquisitors, my peril was just as great. Moreover, I reflected that I should have to match my wits against those of Señor Toledo, who, if my father had gauged him truly, was as cunning as the devil himself.

All this was staggering enough; nevertheless, I rejoiced in it. I had seen enough service to keep from fancying I could fulfil my mission without much difficulty; but, on the other hand, the blood of youth coursed through my veins, and made me long to be away.

By the time John Trenoweth had finished his meal I had gone far to map out my course of action—at least, up to a certain point, leaving further developments until I had seen Master Killigrew and young Mawgan.

When my father and the Cornishman returned to the room again, they were accompanied by my mother, who, much as we loved our father, held the warmest place in all our hearts. Why this was so, I cannot pretend to explain fully. But it was so. Each one of us loved and admired our father as much as any father in England was loved and admired. Nevertheless, it was to our mother that Dick and Faith and I always confided our secrets, and to whom we went for advice. Even in this case, although I had told my father I would go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, I should never have done so without her full consent and blessing, because what is a man worth if he acts against the will of the best mother that ever breathed?

I remember her now, as she sat by the window that September day in the year 1587, and, although she was nearer fifty than forty years old, she looked but a young woman. And she was but a young woman, and far more beautiful than ninety-nine out of every hundred of the young maidens of our time. And as I watched her face, and thought of her goodness, I did not wonder that my father was willing to go through fire and water to win her as his bride. I, who was twenty-four years old, and who had never been in love, knew that if I met a maid half so fair and half so good as she I would be ready to face death for a year of Sundays in order to win her smile. For that matter, I always regarded her as the pattern of what a woman should be, and I believe that the reason I had never fallen in love was because, when I began to compare the maidens I knew with my mother, they fell so miserably short both of her beauty and her goodness.

"Dost ever intend to wed?" said Sir Walter Raleigh to me one day.

"Aye," I replied.

"When?" said he.

"When I meet a woman as beautiful and as good as my mother," I replied.

"Never until then?" said he.

"Never," I replied.

"Then thou wilt never wed, Rupert, for there is but one woman in the world that can match her, and she is neither for thee nor any other man."

I said no more to him at the time, for I knew the woman of whom he was thinking, and knew, moreover, that it were sacrilege to think of her as anything but "The Virgin Queen."

But to my story. My mother sat by the window, with a somewhat anxious look on her face, for she had already heard an inkling of the reasons for which John Trenoweth had come to Hamstead Manor.

"You say that there is need for Rupert to go to Spain," said my mother. "What is the need, Sir Richard?" For thus she always addressed my father when others than our own family were present.

"Let John Trenoweth tell his story again," said my father, whereupon the Cornishman began to speak, even as he had spoken to us, of Spanish plots and of English ignorance thereof. He spoke of the Jesuits, who, in spite of all endeavours to put them down, were still in England, poisoning English Catholics against their Queen, and who were in constant communication with the King of Spain.

"But what is all this to us?" asked my mother. "Why should Rupert go into a country where there is neither kindness nor mercy, in order to know what the Queen hath a hundred other means of knowing, and by other men?"

For be it known that my mother, strong Protestant as she was, did not love our Queen as much as my father thought she should. As all the world knows, Elizabeth's religious views were very uncertain, and, while she granted a certain religious freedom, she was none too kind to those of her subjects who had made her great.

On hearing this, John Trenoweth went off on the other tack. He spoke of Mistress Anne Tremayne, and of the danger in which she stood; he told of old Sir John Tremayne's sorrow, and of his love for Esther Truscott, and then I saw a change come over my mother. For politics she cared but little, but her woman's heart went out to another woman's danger.

"Anne Tremayne!" she cried. "Why, I know her, Sir Richard! Her father brought her to Queen's Elizabeth's Court, and we became friendly It grieved me much when I heard that she married the Spaniard. And she is in the power of the Inquisition—she is in danger of being burnt! It must not be, it must not be! She must be saved. Why—oh, I remember—you remember, Dick—when—when ——Oh, God help her!" And, forgetting John Trenoweth, my mother went across the room to my father's side, as though the memory of that day when my father snatched her from the awful doom which happened to so many during Mary's reign were too much for her.

My father put his arm around her as a youth puts his arms around the maid of his heart, and held her to him for a moment; but only for a moment, for my mother lifted her head, and, turning to John Trenoweth, said, "Tell me more—tell me all, my man!"

When John Trenoweth had finished his story, my mother started up with flashing eyes.

"Rupert, my son," she said, "it is the call of God. For many days I have wondered why you should have been wounded, and then kept here in idleness; but now I know. It is the will of God! Go, my son, and may our Lord and Saviour be your safety and guide!"

"Aye, but when, mother?" I asked.

"When?" she cried. "Ask when, even while an English gentlewoman, and my old friend to boot, stands in danger of the faggot? There is only one time, and that is now! Get you gone—if not this night, then at dawn to-morrow. There is no time to lose when Señor Toledo hath aught to do with any matter. Aye, my son, and if thou canst only save her and her dear ones by fighting even to the death, then fight to the death. It is the call of God!"

And this my mother said while her lips trembled and a look of great apprehension was in her eyes.

"But oh, Rupert!" she continued, presently, "go in Christ's name, and in Christ's strength. Go to save a Christian Englishwoman from an awful doom. Never sully your mission by a base thought or a base deed, my son. If you have to fight, fight in Christ's name; if you have to try and outwit the Spaniard, pray for wisdom and guidance. . . . And you say she hath a child, too!" she went on, turning to John Trenoweth. "A daughter, very nearly the age of my Faith. What is her name?"

"Of the child I know but little," said Trenoweth. "But I fear she is an enemy of her mother's and her mother's faith. She is half a Spaniard, and hath been reared in a convent, and I am told that she consents to her mother's death."

"Put that down as a lie," said my mother. "Anne Tremayne's child could not do so. And yet—God only knows what teaching and training can do. But your duty is plain, Rupert. Save the mother, save the waiting woman, and may God give you grace to save the child. At this very hour I will see that your saddle-bags are filled with all things necessary, and take your father's sword, my son. It hath never been used in an unholy quarrel, and you, Sir Richard, you will see that Rupert lacks for nothing!"

"'Go, my son, in Christ's name.'"

With that my mother went away with all speed, while my father continued to talk with John Trenoweth concerning the well-being of his old friend Tom Killigrew, and of other matters relating to Cornwall.

As may be imagined, my mother's words had put nerve into my arm and warmth into my heart, and presently, when my brother Dick came into the room, I told him with much spirit of what had taken place, and of what I was about to do.

"I wish it were I, Rupert," said Dick, "and yet I know not. You have a quicker wit, and carry a better sword than I. So go my brother, and may God bring you safely home again!"

Of all the talk that took place that night it is needless that I should speak; for, although I love to think of the way that my sister Faith fondled me, and called me her own brave brother, and although I cannot help recalling with pride the words my father spoke to me, these things have but little part in the story I have to tell. Besides, I have much to write concerning matters of far more interest than what took place at Hamstead Manor, matters that will take long to tell. For I may as well make confession here that my journey to Spain was no stage play, neither were my adventures of the nature that may be seen at the Globe Theatre, where Will Shakespeare so pleases the gaping crowd who come to see him act and hear the fine words he hath written.

Early next morning, then, I was ready to start. John Trenoweth's nag had been exchanged for a stronger and fleeter animal, while the best horse in my father's stables had been given to me. I was dressed in all due finery, because, as my mother said, a son of hers who was in the service of Christ must not appear as a solemn hot gospeller, but as the son of Sir Richard Hamstead, the bravest fighter and the wariest councillor in Elizabeth's Court. This, as may be imagined, pleased me much, for youth loves gay clothing and a good horse. I also carried a good number of golden eagles in my purse, and so, fired by the thought of what lay before me, I laughed with great merriment as I bade them all good-morning. It was well, moreover, that I carried a brave heart; otherwise I should surely have broken down and cried like a baby before I took a last look at my home. It is true my father's lips trembled not, neither did his voice quiver, while Dick laughed gaily, and told me not to lose my head over any Spanish señorita; but when it came to mother and Faith, I was well nigh forgetting that I could call Francis Drake, Walter Raleigh, and Richard Grenville my friends, so soft did my heart become. In this was no wonder, for my sister Faith hung about me so, and kissed and caressed me so fondly, that I thought I should never be able to leave her, and when at last she ran indoors to hide her tears I had still my mother to part from. And this was the hardest of all. Not that she moaned or repined, for she was too proud and too brave a woman to do either. Nay, it was the fact that I saw her mother's love struggling against her sense of duty that made my heart bleed. I could see that her heart was breaking, and yet she spoke cheerily, and laughed: it was that which well-nigh unmanned me.

"Go, my son, in Christ's name!" she said as she embraced me for the last time.

"Yes, mother," I answered.

"And you will never do aught that you will be afraid to tell me about—will you, my son?"

"Never, mother."

"And if ever you are tempted to be cruel, or do a wrong deed, if ever you are tempted to crush one weaker than you out of a spirit of revenge (for God hath blessed you with great strength, Rupert), if ever you are tempted to sin, you will think of Christ—and—and your mother—won't you, Rupert?"

"Aye, mother, I promise."

"And—and Rupert——"

"Yes, mother, what is it?"

"It may be you'll be tempted in many ways, ways of which young men cannot speak even to their mothers; if you are, Rupert—if you are——"

"God help me, mother, I will think of you, and I will try to be worthy of you—then I shall do no wrong."

"Yes, think of me, my dear son—and think of the Lord Christ Who died for you. Be pure in thought, my son, and you will be pure in life."

"God helping me, I will, mother," I said, "and by His help I will never do aught that you would wish undone," and with that I rode away, feeling as if God had spoken to me as well as my mother.

I had not gone far, when I heard my name again, and, turning back, I saw my mother coming towards me.

"Rupert, she said as I dismounted, "you are going to Spain, the land of persecution and the Inquisition. It might be—God save you from it!—but you may be tried even as—as—as I——"

"Mother," I cried, "I will die before I prove false to my faith," and with that I kissed her again, and mounted my horse, while my mother gave me a smile which lives in my heart and memory even to this day.

Of how I kept my promises, my history must tell, for it is not fit that I should write it here, but as I rode by John Trenoweth's side I thanked God for my mother, and vowed again and again that I would never do aught of which I should be ashamed to speak to her in all fulness.

"And have ye any desire to try a fall with me, Master Rupert Hamstead?" said John Trenoweth after a few minutes' silence.

"What mean you?" I asked.

"Oh! the fall concerning which you were so keen when I rode up to you yesterday."

I looked at his face and saw that his grey eyes twinkled.

"We will both try a fall with the Spaniards instead," I replied.

"Amen to that with all my heart," he rejoined, "and yet methinks we shall have it before we reach Falmouth town. Four times did I pick a quarrel on my way hither, all for the purpose of forgetting—that—that——"

"Aye, but we will save her, John Trenoweth, and I will be at your wedding."

"No, no, Master Rupert, I fear that will never be. And it is when I have such fears that I feel I must do something in order to forget my trouble, and to forget the fact that I have neglected my Esther all these years. I tell you——"

"Think of how we are to get to her, John Trenoweth," I cried. "Picture to yourself how she will look when she sees you. Fancy yourself cutting down Spaniards in order that you may get to her."

"Aye, aye, that I will, but promise me this, Master Rupert: if I cannot drive evil, despairing thoughts out of my mind, will you fight with me, wrestle with me? It is the only thing that makes me forget—it is the only thing that gives me joy."

I laughed aloud at this, but nevertheless I promised him, even as he desired.

Of our first day's journey there is but little to record. We saw but few people, because we did not pass through London, and when as the second day passed away, and nothing of interest happened, I imagined that we should get to our journey's end without adventure of any sort.

Towards the evening of the second day, however, as we began to think of the place where we should spend our night, I saw, riding some little distance in front of me, two men. As far as I could judge, they were well mounted, and were attired as cavaliers; but, as we drew near, I could not help thinking that their attire was somewhat out of harmony with the way they sat their horses.

"This is a lonely spot," said John Trenoweth, and I could not help agreeing with him, for we were far from any habitation, and the country looked lonesome beyond words.

"I don't think we need fear yonder men," remarked John, after looking at them quietly for a few moments. "It is true they carry swords, and they ride good horses; but I know many a ploughboy who can sit a horse better."

"No; I should judge them to be drapers or something of that sort," I replied, "and they carry swords and wear gay apparel in order to try and appear as men of rank."

"Good-morrow, worthy sirs," they said, as we rode up, and it seemed to me that they had ridden slowly so that we might overtake them.

We returned their greeting and waited for them to proceed.

"Go you far?" they asked, presently.

I mentioned the town at which we had thought of spending the night.

"Ah! that is where we hope to stay. If it please you, we will ride together. We be anxious to fall in with good company, for we be dealing with important matters. In truth, our hope is to find the whereabouts of two noted Jesuits, who we suspect are being housed at Willacombe."

At this I pricked up my ears greatly, especially as I saw the two men exchange glances.

[END OF CHAPTER THREE.]

HEROES OF GOD

THE VOYAGE OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS

By the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D.

THREE books have been recently given to the public which contain official and authoritative records respecting the voyage and early colonial experience of the Pilgrim Fathers: Bradford's "History of Plimoth Plantation"; "The Mayflower and her Log"; and "The Story of the Pilgrim Fathers as Told by Themselves, Their Friends, and Their Enemies." This article is based principally on these three volumes, and largely has for its object to give some of the information contained in these volumes.

The history of the first of the volumes is itself full of significant interest. Governor Bradford, the first governor of the Plymouth colony, left behind him a history of that settlement, which was referred to as authoritative by the earliest historians of New England. From about the end of 1767 it mysteriously disappeared, and was supposed to have been destroyed by mischance during the American Revolution. In 1844 Samuel Wilberforce, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, writing a history of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, made certain extracts from a manuscript which he had discovered in the library of the Bishop of London; these extracts coming to the attention of a Mr. Barry of Massachusetts, who was writing a history of that State, he noted in them parallelisms to quotations from Bradford's history which he had found in the early New England chroniclers. The result was an investigation into the manuscript which the Bishop of Oxford had come across, and the discovery that it was undoubtedly the original manuscript written by Governor Bradford himself. How it got into the library of the Bishop of London no one knows.

As soon as this discovery was made, America, naturally, desired to possess the manuscript. Naturally, too, Englishmen were loth to part with so valuable a document, or to accede to the idea that it properly belonged to America. Several attempts were made by American scholars to secure its restoration to New England, but without success until 1895. Then, through the joint efforts of George F. Hoar, the venerable United States Senator from Massachusetts, and T. F. Bayard, the American Minister to England, and by the courteous consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, the manuscript was given to Mr. Bayard to be delivered to the Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is now carefully kept in the State archives of that Commonwealth, its original value greatly enhanced by reason of the fact that it is a perpetual witness to the goodwill which now exists between the Mother Country and her kin across the sea, and also to the goodwill which exists between the Church of England and the Pilgrim offshoot from that Church.

I do not know of anything which more strikingly illustrates the growth of catholicity in the Church of Christ than the contrast afforded by the contents of this book, written about the middle of the seventeenth century, and this incident in its history occurring at the close of the nineteenth. To get the full effect of the progress toward a better understanding between the different branches of Christ's Church in these two centuries and a half, one has but to compare with the incident here narrated the following extract from the first chapter of the volume itself, in which Governor Bradford describes, from his own point of view, the controversy between the Episcopal and the Pilgrim Church:

"But that I may come more near my intendment; when as by the travail and diligence of some godly and zealous preachers (in the Parish Churches), and God's blessing on their labours as in other places of the land (of England) so in the north parts, many became inlightened by the Word of God; and had their ignorance and sins discovered unto them; and began by His grace to reform their lives and make conscience of their ways: the work of God was no sooner manifest in them, but presently they were both scoffed and scorned by the profane multitude; and the Ministers urged with the yoke of Subscription (to the Thirty-nine Articles of 1562), or else must be silenced. And the poor people were so vexed with Apparitors and Pursuivants, and the Commissary Courts; as truly their affliction was not small: which notwithstanding they bore, sundry years, with much patience, till they were occasioned, by the continuance and increase of these troubles, and other means which the Lord raised up in those days, to see further into things, by the light of the Word of God. How not only these base and beggarly Ceremonies were unlawful (i.e., morally wrong), but also that the lordly and tyrannous power of the Prelates ought not to be submitted unto: which thus, contrary to the freedom of the Gospel, would load and burden men's consciences; and, by their compulsive power, make a profane mixture of persons and things in the worship of God. And that their Offices and Callings, Courts and and Canons, etc., were unlawful and antichristian: being such as have no warrant in the Word of God; but the same were used in Popery, and still retained."

The second volume, "The Mayflower and her Log," has been compiled from original sources by Azel Ames, M.D., of the United States. Its successive chapters are devoted to the Mayflower, her charter, crew, passengers, and her daily journal or log. It is thus something more and other than its title alone would indicate. It is written with critical care, and with a scholar's interest in minute detail.

The third volume is edited from original texts by Edward Arber, F.S.A., Fellow of King's College, London. It includes an account, from original sources, of Scrooby, Amsterdam, Leyden, the migration to America, and the beginnings and proceedings of the plantation at Plymouth. Mr. Arber is recognised on both sides of the Atlantic as an authority, and it is to be hoped that the partial promise of his preface, to carry on the story in the same way from 1623 to 1630, may yet be fulfilled. It furnishes much material necessary to a correction of the partial, and to some extent partisan, estimates of men and events furnished by Governor Bradford's history. Mr. Arber is rather an editor than an historian; but he is a discriminating editor, who gives us with careful selection the materials out of which history is made.

The material thus furnished by him enables us to form some picture of the conditions of society in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Belief in astrology was common, belief in witchcraft practically universal. The Copernican theory of astronomy had not won for itself as much of a place in human thought as the theory of evolution has done in our time. The law of gravitation was still undiscovered, the employment of machinery in industry was practically unknown, and no prophet had even imagined electricity as a natural force. These characteristics of the material civilisation of the time are, however, for our purpose less important than the intellectual and moral conditions: "It was a very wild time, an age of ceaseless conflict all round. The human mind, awakening from the sleep of Feudalism and the Dark Ages, fastened on all the problems that are inherent to human society; problems which, even at the present day, are not half solved. In England, during that seventeenth century, men were digging down to the very roots of things. They were asking, 'What is the ultimate authority in human affairs? Upon what does Government rest? and for what purpose does it exist?'"

"The ship sailed away leaving a part of the company on shore, mostly women and children."—p. 20.

Questionings of this sort, by men who have but little competence for original inquiry and investigation, are discouraged even in our time as intellectually and morally perilous. In that time they were condemned by the law as criminal, and were punished with severity. Absolutism was still the orthodox doctrine both in Church and State. On the continent of Europe, except in Holland, law was nothing but the expression of the king's will. The Roman Empire had been broken into fragments, but Roman Imperialism was still the recognised doctrine of all the European States, with two exceptions, Holland and Great Britain; and in Great Britain the doctrine of the divine right of kings was strenuously maintained by the Court and preached by the Court preachers. Mr. Arber illustrates this doctrine, as thus held and preached, by the following quotation from Dr. Humphrey Gower, the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, in an address delivered as late as 1681: "We still believe and maintain that our Kings derive not their Titles from the people; but from God. That to Him only they are accountable. That it belongs not to subjects, either to create or censure; but to honour and obey their Sovereign: who comes to be so by a fundamental hereditary Right of Succession; which no Religion, no Law, no Fault or Forfeiture, can alter or diminish."

English law, if not fashioned in accord with this doctrine, was certainly not seriously inimical to it. Freedom of worship was unknown; conformity to an Established creed and an Established ritual was required by law. Catholics and Protestants, Anglicans and Puritans, with few exceptions, agreed that such requirement was legitimate and necessary. Protestantism was as insistent upon the right and duty of Government to prevent and punish heresy as was the Roman Catholic Church; that it persecuted much less was due, not so much to lack of inclination, as to lack of power. What the Pilgrim Fathers thought of the Anglican Church and its ceremonies and services the quotation from Governor Bradford which I have given above sufficiently indicates. Considerably after the Pilgrim migration, in the Massachusetts colony, men were punished for declaring that the Roman Catholic Church was a Christian Church. Neither liberty of free assemblage nor liberty of the Press was allowed. Printing was permitted only in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, and at the University presses of Oxford and Cambridge. It was chiefly carried on in London, and in London no one was allowed to print unless he were a freeman of the Company of Stationers, and only an elect few of those freemen were permitted to print, and those were allowed to print only books which had been properly licensed by two censors, one ecclesiastical, the other secular.

England being in this condition in the latter part of the sixteenth century—the exact date is July, 1586—there came to the little parish of Babworth, in Nottinghamshire, a rector, the Rev. Richard Clyfton, who in modern phraseology would be called a progressive or liberal preacher, and, following him in successive years to adjoining parishes, three other rectors of somewhat similar spirit, all four being Cambridge men. To this Babworth parish William Bradford, a boy in his teens, used to walk across the fields, evidently finding the Rev. Richard Clyfton somehow a fascinating preacher. I believe that there is no record left of the preaching of these Cambridge men. It must be remembered that there were no newspapers to report them; had they desired to print their sermons, the censor would not have passed them; no stationer would have ventured to publish them; and finally, had they been printed and published, there were very few Englishmen able to read them. Nottinghamshire was a rural county, the population was small, and the congregations, though certainly not unintelligent, were probably illiterate, and certainly uncultivated and unscholarly.

We are obliged to conclude what was the preaching of these men from what grew out of it. We may assume that they told their hearers that the organisation of the Church, and the forms and ceremonies employed in it, were not the essence of religion: that the New Testament was the Magna Charta of the Church and, so to speak, its written constitution; that the Church had no right to go beyond the provisions of the New Testament; that Bishops had no right to inflict civil penalties as they were doing in Bishops' Courts; perhaps that there was no right or reason in Bishops, and that the Church could do very well without them; not impossibly that Bishops were an invention of the Papal Church, a relic which still clung to an imperfectly emancipated Protestantism. This, and much more to the same effect their congregations came later to maintain; but we must recognise that congregations sometimes run beyond their preachers. Certain it is that these four preachers and their radical congregations were looked upon by their neighbours as enthusiasts, if not as fanatics.

In all ages men have confounded religion with the instruments which it employs and the forms through which it is expressed; and though the subsequent life of this simple-minded people proved them to be alike conscientious in their daily conduct and devout worshippers of God, because they discarded the instruments and the forms employed by the religion of their time, they were looked upon by their neighbours as an irreligious people. The obloquy in which they were involved, and the prosecutions by which they were pursued, became at length so intolerable that they resolved to flee from their native land to Holland, then the only country in the civilised world hospitable to freedom of religion.

That it was so was due primarily to the influence of a man who seems to me to correspond more nearly to our ideal of Moses than any other man of mediæval or modern Europe; for William the Silent combined as no other man before or since in European history the qualities of statesman and prophet. The reader of this article who wishes to get in a small compass a trustworthy and exceedingly interesting biography of this great man, will find it in Frederic Harrison's "Life" of William the Silent. There is no room here to tell the tragic story of his life and martyrdom: of his long and finally successful struggle against the cruel Duke of Alva, fit representative of the despotism of Spain. It must suffice to note that in an age when every religionist thought that he alone possessed the truth and all his opponents were in vital error, when therefore every religionist thought it his duty to defend his faith and to extirpate his neighbour's heresy by law, William the Silent promulgated and maintained that doctrine of religious liberty which now the Anglo-Saxon race regards as an axiom, and which probably many readers of this periodical can hardly imagine was ever really denied. Himself in turn a Lutheran, a Catholic, and a Calvinist, it may be, as has been claimed, that his catholicity was partly due to indifferentism. Seeking to unite all his people in a struggle to defend the liberties of his land, it may be, as has been claimed, that his catholicity was partly a method of statecraft, that he was compelled to be catholic because only thus could he secure the union which statesmanship demanded. It is not impossible that both elements combined to give him a view of life wider and more just than any of his contemporaries. God often uses unexpected instruments in His work of education. The question is perhaps impossible to decide; at all events it is immaterial.

Out of the travail of war, and under the leadership of William the Silent, the doctrine of religious liberty was born and cradled in Holland, and to Holland, therefore, the first Pilgrims fled from the persecutions of the Stuarts, when they sought liberty to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Those prosecutions were based upon the doctrine already referred to, that it is the duty of the Government to determine the religious opinions of the community, and to require conformity thereto on the part of all its subjects. Mr. Arber gives a quotation from what he calls the "murderous Act to retain the Queen's subjects in obedience," passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, an Act which punished with imprisonment every person above the age of sixteen years who failed to attend Divine service in some church or chapel established by Her Majesty's laws, or who endeavoured to persuade anyone else from so doing, or who attended any unlawful assemblages, conventicles, or meetings under the pretence of any exercise of religion. And Mr. Bradford, who was one of those emigrants, gives, in his history, some account of the practical operation of this law as experienced by the Nonconformists in Nottinghamshire where he resided.

"But after these things they could not long continue in any peaceable condition, but were hunted and persecuted on every side, so as their former afflictions were but as flea-bitings in comparison of these which now came upon them. For some were taken and clapt up in prison, others had their houses besett and watcht night and day, and hardly escaped their hands; and ye most were fain to flie and leave their howses and habitations, and the means of their livelehood. . . . So affter they had continued togeither aboute a year, and kept their meetings every Saboth in one place or other, exercising the worship of God amongst them selves, notwithstanding all ye diligence and malice of their adversaries, they seeing they could no longer continue in y^t^ condition, they resolved to get over into Holläd as they could."

The resolution thus arrived at was more easily formed than executed, for they were not permitted to flee the country, which would neither permit them to worship within its boundaries according to the dictates of their own consciences nor to find liberty so to worship beyond its boundaries. Mr. Bradford gives a dramatic account of their endeavours; how they made agreement with a shipmaster to take them and their goods at a certain place and convey them to Holland; how when he had them and their goods aboard he betrayed them to the officers; how they were taken and carried back into the town and made a "spectackle and wonder to ye multitude"; how first they were imprisoned, but later the great part of them dismissed to their homes; how a second attempt resulted in a disaster almost as great; how before all the Pilgrims could get on board the ship which was to take them, a company of horse and foot came to prevent the embarkation. and the ship sailed away leaving a part of the company on shore, mostly women and children; and how, "notwithstanding all these stormes of opposition, they all gatt over at length, some at one time and some at another, and mette togeather againe according to their desires, with no small rejoycing."

That William Bradford was himself one of this company who sailed away leaving his companions to fall into the hands of the enemy on shore, is indicated by the graphic character of his narrative, which has all the marks of an eye-witness.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Christopher to the Rescue

A Story by E. S. Curry.

CHAPTER I.

MR. GEOFFREY BLUNDELL, in accordance with an agreement he had made with his wife, on the embarrassing arrival of the Twins, was supposed to consider himself responsible for his children—so far as their safety and entertainment were concerned—on Sunday afternoons. When Nora reminded him—as she had occasion to do now and then, in order to check an undue pride in his performance—that, after all, two hours' responsibility represented a very small share of the waking hours of the babies, he observed with some satisfaction—

"I can't think why you women make such a fuss about looking after children! I never have any bother; they are always good with me. The secret is, not to worry them. Let them look after themselves; they're a jolly sight better able to do it than you are, because they know what they want. You can't too early bring children up to be independent, especially when they are as intelligent as ours."

"I know you have endeavoured well," remarked Nora, with some laughter in her voice, "particularly that morning when I was ill, and you interfered about the nursery breakfast. I am always so sorry I did not hear the colloquy between you and Nurse, when you undertook to teach the Twins to feed themselves."

"That fiasco, my dear, was because of your foolish notion that under-boiled eggs on the top of bread and milk were suitable food for them."

"Somehow, they thrive on my foolish notions, don't they?" said Nora sweetly. "It would be very kind of you," she went on, after a moment's thought, "to let them be with you on Saturday afternoons, when you are doing nothing—I mean, gardening or fishing—as they are no trouble to you."

"They can always be with me when I am at home," said Geoffrey grandly.

Later, when the duet became a trio, and Christina's alert little person was added to his care, Geoffrey was now and then driven to ponder on the responsibilities of parentage.

One Saturday afternoon, Mr. Blundell was combining an intermittent attention to his garden, with fishing in the river which flowed through it. The Twins and two-year-old Christina were supposed to be under his guardianship. They were all lying quite flat on the river bank, Christina's interested attention being wholly given to a tin of fishing bait. Occasional movements of the lumpy mass were watched by her in awed fascination, or with a shriek of ecstasy, promptly subdued by Punch.

"Toby! lie flat," he exhorted in a compelling whisper.

Christina put down her uplifted head with a disagreeing grunt.

"What for? Toby s'ant!"

"You must! You'll frighten the fishes!" And Punch pressed down the little round body with a masterful hand.

Christina bore the pressure for a moment, and suddenly uplifted herself.

"Toby goin'," she announced. "Toby goin' a-fishin' with Daddy."

A hand of each of the Twins clasped the advancing legs, turned riverwards, and the baby fell prone on the soft turf. It was often her fate to be arrested in her intentions; those who dealt with her found deeds more available than words. Catching her father's glance now from the midst of the stream, she bore the arrest without a murmur. Her conduct was such as to cause him to smile in triumph to himself. Only that morning he had said:

"I can't see where your difficulty is, Nora. The children never dream of disobeying me."

"Oh! don't they?" and Nora laughed. "And whose training is it, then—that they obey you? You see, you never have to tell them to do anything disagreeable. You reap the results. I do the work."

"Nothing of the kind. I have them to myself on Saturdays and Sundays—in the afternoons, I mean—and I never have any trouble with them. I expect them to obey, and they do."

"Even Christina?"

Nora asked the question with a suspicion of reminiscent sarcasm in her tone which her husband resented.

"Of course Christina," he replied. "Surely a baby's will can be bent in any direction—that is, if you are judicious, and don't worry it. Of course, nagging——"

"Not that baby's!" interrupted his wife with knowledge, "She will of course obey in time, but she doesn't yet, and——"

"I call her very biddable," Christina's father remarked in a superior manner.

"And I should be very sorry," Nora went on in even tones, but with a light in her eye, "if she were a little meek, pawky bit of dough, with no character and no mind of her own. She is what I call," in a triumphant tone, "an experimental child. I should not be surprised if she became a discoverer, an inventor, or anything."

"She can invent and discover anything she likes," Mr. Blundell responded, "so long as she first does what she is told. Disobedient children are——"

And he walked away from the discussion with a shrug.

Nora looked after him, and her eyes smiled. In her mind were countless instances of her baby's evasions of its father's commands; but Nora's was a mind open to experience, and she had learnt, where a man was concerned, not always to say what she thought.

On this afternoon, when Geoffrey had informed the children, dancing round him, that they might help him garden, Nora had taken an opportunity to ask Christina, "If Toby go with Punch and Judy, Toby will do just what Daddy says?"

The blue eyes fixed themselves on Nora's impressive face, and the baby nodded her usual acquiescence to anything quite reasonable.

"Toby, remember, then," the mother emphasised. "Do what Daddy says, and don't get into the water. It isn't the sea, you know, darling."

A reminiscent look of delight flashed into the baby's eyes, as the alluring qualities of the element in which she had spent the greater part of the last month recurred to her memory. Nora, as she read the look, realised that her warning had been a mistake. She had suggested an idea to a fertile imagination. So she said again:

"Keep with Punch and Judy, and do just what Daddy tells you."

"Now I wonder," she thought, as she stood for a moment watching the children straggle across the wide lawn to the river in their father's wake, "what idea it was that came into Christina's mind? She has without doubt a very alert intelligence."

The alert intelligence at this moment was bent on nothing more exciting than sharing the delights of its elders; and for a short time Christina, dragged by her ankles back to the side of the bait tin, abode there.

"You've got to lie still, or they'll see you!" Punch exhorted.

Christina turned her head and fastened her blue eyes on her brother.

"Nobody not see Toby!" she asserted.

"The fishes will. They can see everywhere—all round about, and up and down!"

Christina lifted her eyes to the trees, and gazed around anxiously. The thought of these unseen omniscient eyes oppressed the baby with a vague sense of discomfort.

"Ain't no fishes!" she said.

"There is! See—see!" said Judy excitedly. "Father's got one!"

Mr. Blundell was now sitting on the bank a little higher up the river. He had caught a fish and he was calling to his children.

"Bring the bait, Punch! See; go along into the orchard, and wait there for me." And he strolled on under the trees on the opposite bank, past a curve in the river which took him out of his children's sight.

Punch scrambled to his feet, and seized the tin. Judy likewise scrambled to hers, and claimed a share in the handle. Together they ambled along the bank, the pail jogging between them, and the baby trotting after.

But on reaching the field, which was called the orchard, and finding that the programme there presented nothing more exciting than lying on her stomach without speech or movement, Christina allowed the alert intelligence animating her little restless body to revolt. With many grunts, she forsook the observation of the bait, and with wriggles and rolls, and grunts of disapprobation of the restraining hands of the Twins, she at last sidled down the bank, and straggled away unremarked.

CHAPTER II.

THE baby had numerous friends in the big garden where most of her life was spent. In addition to the stable cats, and a dog which guarded any nursery expedition outside the gates, birds and insects were intimate acquaintances. Christina went so far as to interest herself practically in their home and nursery arrangements.

The three had one day presented themselves to their mother in a state of the wildest agitation.

"Mother! Do come quick!" Punch had rushed in to implore. "We've found a bird's nest, and Toby's going to make it bigger 'cos its tail sticks out!"

"Oh! but she mustn't!" said Nora, jumping up.

Straggling across the lawn she beheld Judy, with the mutinous baby in tow, declaiming wrathfully against the iniquity of interference with her benevolent designs.

"Mother!" exclaimed Judy, in breathless eagerness. "We've found a little bird's home, and he's got such beautiful bright eyes. An' he's made a dreffful mistake, an' it ain't quite big enough for him. An' Toby wants to make it bigger; but she mustn't, must she?"

"Toby must!" said the struggling baby, hitting vainly at the enclasping hand. Judy had learnt by experience the need of a tenacious hand. "Toby will! Ain't big anuff, mummie! lickle bird fall out—ain't no room for his tail!" she confided.

"Darling!" said Nora, "the little bird knows best; but mother will come and see."

The bright eyes of the little mother gazed unwinkingly at the observers, and her mate scolded and sang to them from the branches above. Nora's story was so moving about this little family that the fascinated children were able, as the days went on, to watch the feeding and final launch into the world of the nestlings.

During this time Geoffrey found his task of "minding" a very easy one. The ants in the path, the fish in the river, as well as the birds on the lawn, were a source of unending interest. Everything in her little life was very real to the baby. Inanimate, as well as animate, was something to love, something to play with, something to help, and nothing to be afraid of. If now and then she was worsted in her encounters with beast or insect, she accepted her overthrow in the most matter-of-fact spirit; much in the same temper in which she accepted her elders' restriction of her desires.

"Toby wants to," she would say, with a gleam in her blue eyes, which her father now and then prophesied would give trouble to someone some day.

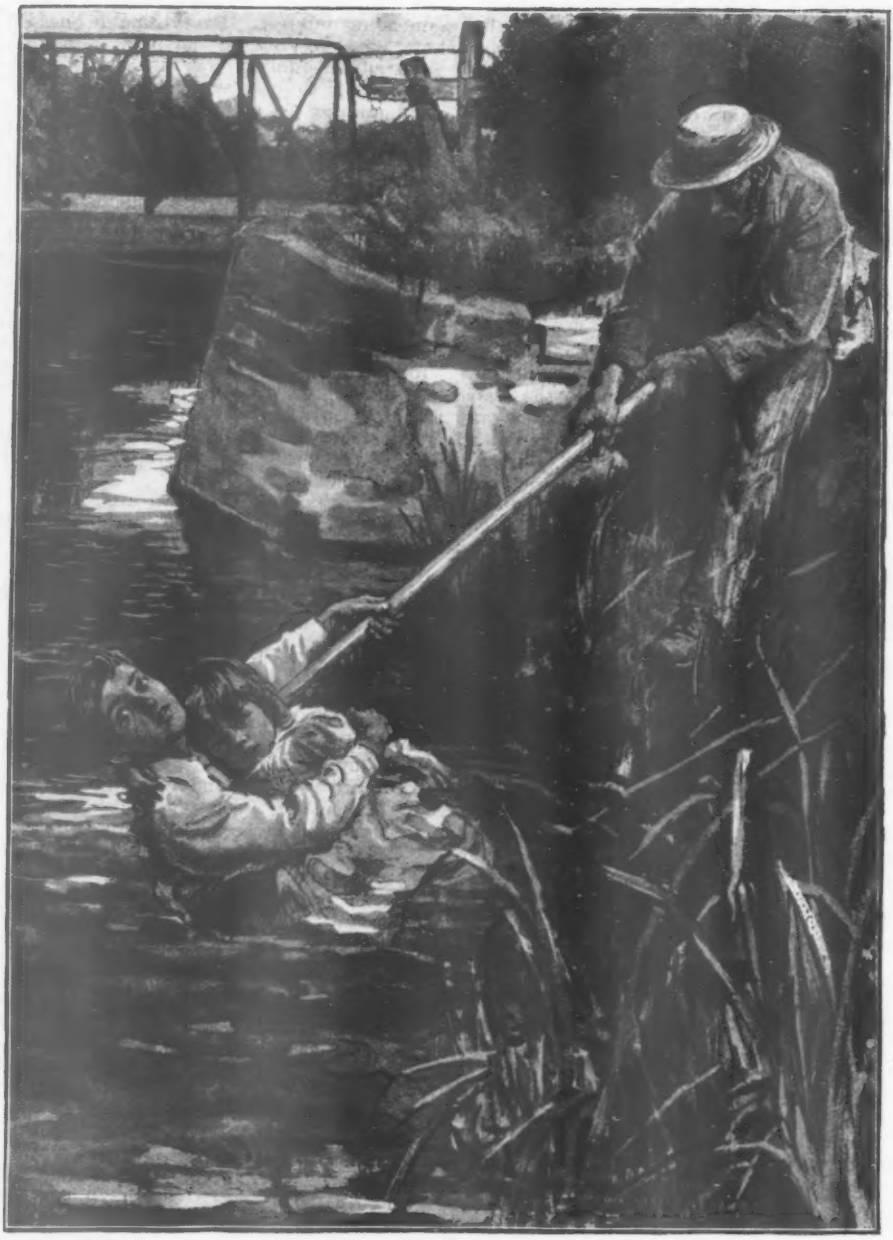
"Toby can't," Nora would respond gravely.

And the baby, after pensively pondering for a minute on the meaning of "can't," as illustrated by the steady look in her mother's eyes, would either acquiesce with a nod and a cheerfully echoed "Toby can't," or go off, equally cheerfully, and attempt the forbidden.

Straggling over the lawn after leaving the Twins, she stopped to talk as a friend to a bee in a flower, and a bird on a twig, and then moved on to a lower bend of the river, with more or less of purpose flitting through her mind.

"Toby get a lickle fish for mummie!" she promised herself, trotting to the edge, and looking down at the softly flowing water.

She was arrested by the sight of herself—hatless and smiling—gazing up from the smooth water.



"Toby in water!" she exclaimed delightedly, bending and reaching out a hand to the smiling image. "Funny Toby!" she murmured, and became thoughtful.

If Toby could thus stand on her head harmless in the water, why couldn't this other Toby on the bank do the same on her firm little feet? As a preliminary, Christina sat down promptly, and stretched out her legs in front of her, regarding them.

Firm and rosy and strong—yes, surely they would be able to stand in the river very well. Reminiscences of the sea and its sometimes turbulent waves, of the clean sands, and of her amphibious life upon them, came vaguely into the baby's mind.

She was so still as she pondered, and the water was so clear, that she could see a little swimming thing come near and look at her, and dart upward at some insect. Christina gave a little cry, and held out her hands persuasively. Then, suddenly there flashed by a green and blue and gold creature with gauzy, shining wings, which passed quickly to the lawn behind her.

In a moment Christina clambered to her feet, and was after it.

"Clinging to it with one hand, whilst with the other he tightly clasped the baby, was Christopher."

"Catch er fairy!" she promised herself, as she bustled off.

Across the lawn, in and out amongst the flowers, the dragon-fly doubled and darted, the baby after it with outstretched hands, and no doubt at all in her mind as to its desirability.

Punch and Judy, suddenly remorsefully reminiscent, looking over their shoulders from their prone positions on the bank, saw in the distance the little, flitting white figure.

"Thinks she's catching a bird," Judy remarked, in the sibilant whisper the situation demanded. "There is Daddy catched another fish!"

And the Twins' absorbed attention was immediately given to the business in hand.

The darting dragon-fly pursued its uneven way, Christina after it, now and then a little horrified at the murderous instincts it manifested towards other of her insect friends. But a fairy like this was not a very frequent visitor, and must be captured at all costs, however bad its character. Backwards and forwards the two went, gradually nearing again the water whence the dragon-fly had come. Possibly he was seeking communication with those he had left in that lower world, as his glittering wings hovered near the face of the river. Finally he flew to the opposite bank, and began to play amongst the branches of a flowering shrub.

Christina's intent eyes were following every movement, and her bright face was set with energy.

"Catch er fairy," she whispered again to herself, and sat down on the edge of the water. Dipping her rosy feet in the river, for a second she felt its cold, soft, flowing movement in delighted remembrance. Again in memory she was on the sea-shore, paddling unhurt in the rippling edges of the waves; again she was out at sea, floating on her back with her mother's or father's hand about her. She slid slowly down the bank, and with the front of her little white gown lifted in one dimpled hand, she stood triumphant in the river.

The dragon-fly, hovering about the yellow flowers, darted nearer to behold its playfellow; Christina dropped her skirt to hold out a persuasive hand.

"Come along, then!" he seemed to her to say, darting back to the flowers. And the baby followed.

CHAPTER III.

JUDY lifted her head and looked behind her. Away across the lawn by the long rose bed, Christina's little white figure, flitting hither and thither, had only a minute or so ago been visible. Now it was not there.

"Don't see Toby," she whispered, sinking down again, and fixing her eyes on a ripple in the river at the end of her father's line.

"Hush! Judy! he's got another, I believe," Punch reminded eagerly.

The two again lay motionless side by side, and the stillness of the summer air was only broken by the soft rustlings of the trees. Then, there was a little sudden sound. A faint, amazed cry smote the children's ears.

Christopher, mindful instantly of a neglected attention, wriggled backwards down the raised bank which here confined the river, and stood up, a flash of uneasiness in his mind.

Where was Christina? His eyes commanded the wide lawn, the gravel walks bounding the field, the approach to the bridge near the house. She was not there. He ran along a few steps, past the beeches bounding his wider vision, and mounted breathlessly the slight rise near the bend of the river. Then he saw something white floating in the water, disappearing, even as his horrified eyes fixed themselves upon it in acute recognition, under the low arch of the bridge.

With a shout for his father, the boy bounded off, his little legs twinkling across the lawn. No thought of impossibility came into his mind, nothing but that Toby was in the water; he must get her out.

Mr. Blundell, warned by a long scream from Judy, caught sight through the trees, of his little son's flying figure. In a moment he had waded the river, and was after him.

"What is it, Judy woman?" he called, as he climbed the bank, but he got no answer. The anguished terror on the little face spoke its sufficient message.

Christopher had disappeared. As he gained the little bridge, the father saw that the big gate was open, and through it a hurrying figure in the road. Then he too sped through, and turned in the same direction.

A little way down by the river's bank, a man stood—a road-mender—with his rake held over the river. Clinging to it with one hand, whilst with the other he tightly clasped the limp baby, was Christopher. The boy was well-nigh spent, and the look with which he turned his eyes on his father, brought a spasm into Geoffrey's throat.

"My brave boy!" he murmured, as he lifted the children into his arms.

His little son's fair head fell against his cheek with a faint sob of relief, and again the father murmured tenderly, "My brave boy! See, Kit! baby is looking at you!" he added.

The alert blue eyes of the baby were fixed in curious observation of her brother's figure.

"Bofe of us is wet froo!" she remarked in satisfied tones. "Bofe of us 'll be put to bed to get dry!"

How Deaf Children are Taught.

THE STORY OF AN EDUCATIONAL TRIUMPH.

By Hugh B. Philpott.

THE deaf man's world: what is it like? We can shut our eyes or grope in the dark, and imagine what it must be to be blind. But to realise with any degree of intensity the condition of one who has lived from the day of his birth in a world of unbroken silence is a feat of imagination of which few, probably, are capable. That a deaf child never hears his mother's voice, that he can never know the meaning of the word "music," that for him there is no singing of birds, no whisper of wind among the trees, nor roar of breakers on the shore, is all sad and pathetic enough. But that is not the whole, nor the chief part, of his disability. The deaf child has no language; that is the great fact which isolates him from his fellows. Until he has received careful and special training, he is almost as a creature of another world, unable to communicate with the dwellers on the earth.

Is there anywhere a more strangely pathetic figure than that of the congenital deaf-mute who has grown to manhood or womanhood entirely without education? There are such people. They do not know the names of the commonest objects, and can only communicate with others by the most primitive and imperfect sign-language. How terribly stunted must be their mental and moral nature, and how small their share in the higher pleasures of life! What their mental processes are it is almost impossible to conceive, so entirely does thought seem to depend upon language. Yet it is probable that these unfortunate creatures, so sadly handicapped in the race of life, so strangely out of sympathy with their environment, might pass us in the street without our ever remarking that they were other than normal, healthy human beings. Much of the pathos of the deaf-mute's lot lies in the fact that his appearance is so entirely normal, though he may be more really cut off from the common life of men than the blind or crippled, whose condition at once awakens sympathy and pity.

LEARNING TO SPEAK.

The results of this isolation have sometimes been terribly tragic. Shut off from all means of communication with their fellows, the so-called "deaf and dumb" are apt to be regarded as weak-minded or imbecile, and may, in fact, become so, if long denied the stimulating influences that produce mental activity—the essential condition of mental health. It would be interesting to know, though impossible to find out, how many perfectly sane people—especially children—have been confined in lunatic asylums because no one knew how to hold communication with them. In a recent Government report* on schools for the deaf and blind instances are mentioned in which deaf children have been removed from an institution for idiots to a school for the deaf, and have proved to be bright and intelligent and quite equal in mental capacity to other children.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

A SCRIPTURE LESSON AT THE HUGH MYDDELTON BOARD SCHOOL (DEAF CHILDREN DEPARTMENT).

To lessen as much as possible the gulf that separates the deaf from the hearing is the aim of every intelligent system of educating the deaf. The oral method, which is now adopted in most of the best institutions in this country and on the Continent, goes further in this direction than any other. It opens up to the deaf a wide field into which no other system would enable them to enter. Briefly, it teaches the child to speak, and to understand what is said to him by reading the lips of the speaker. It recognises that the child will not have to live all his life in a community of deaf-mutes, and aims at fitting him to take his place in ordinary society and communicate easily with his hearing neighbours.

* "General Report on Schools for the Deaf and Blind." By T. King. (Cd. 600.)

This is the method adopted by the London School Board, who are devoting considerable attention to their "special" schools for the training of deaf, blind, or otherwise defective children. The largest of the schools for the deaf is at Clerkenwell, where about 150 children are educated. The method adopted is practically the same throughout the Board's schools; but here, on account of the greater number of scholars, the classification is better, and one can more easily follow the various steps by which the child is first supplied with an instrument of communication, and then taught to use it in the acquisition of knowledge. The children remain at school till they are sixteen, by which time they generally reach a standard of education equal to the sixth or seventh standard in an ordinary elementary school. When it is remembered that deaf children have to learn during their school life almost everything that the little hearing child learns at home without any conscious effort during the first three or four years of its life, and that to them one of the doors to the understanding is permanently closed, such a result seems little short of marvellous.

Let us look into the classroom at the Clerkenwell school which is occupied by the lowest class, and watch the very first steps in a deaf child's education. Eight or ten little children—small classes are the invariable rule—are standing round a blackboard, and the teacher is trying to impart the rudiments of language; the ages of the children vary from five to eight years, but their powers of expression at present are about those of an eighteen months' baby. Obviously a method of communication must be established between teacher and scholar before any progress can be made. The aim of the teacher, therefore, in this class is to enable each child to pronounce all the vowel and consonant sounds in the English language, and to recognise them when spoken and when written.

The method relies on the natural imitativeness of children. It might be supposed that it would be almost impossible to get them to reproduce sounds they cannot hear. But in practice it is not found a matter of very great difficulty. The children move their lips as the teacher moves hers, and putting their hands under the teacher's chin they feel the movement of the vocal organs, and imitate it with their own. A mirror is used to enable them to compare the motion of their own lips with those of the teacher. As the sound is produced, the letters representing it are written on the blackboard. The day's work is varied by kindergarten exercises, which help to train the hand and eye, but that part of education which consists in the imparting of knowledge comes later. As in the case of the telephone, the receiving apparatus must be in order before messages can be transmitted or received.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

STRIP-WORK, A MANUAL EXERCISE SPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR DEAF SCHOOLS

In the next class the teaching of language proceeds a step further. Here we are in the stage of sentence-making. The teacher asks questions and the scholars reply, forming their answer into a simple sentence.

"Give me a book," says the teacher. A book is handed up; then, turning to the next pupil, she asks: "What did she do?"

"She—gave—you—a—book." The words are articulated slowly, and with evident effort.

"What is that?" (pointing to a slate).

"That is a slate."

"Stand on the form." (Child stands on the floor.)

"No. Stand on the form." (Child does so.)

"What is he doing?"

"He is sitting on the form."

"No." (To the next scholar) "What is he doing?"

"He is standing on the form."

And so the conversation proceeds. Mistakes are made and corrected, and gradually the vocabulary is enlarged, some sense of the grammatical form of sentences is acquired, and at the same time facility in lip-reading is gained and the stock of general information increased.

The ease and certainty with which the lips can be read, after even one or two years' training, is very remarkable. It is difficult to realise, and still more so in the higher classes, that the scholars really cannot hear at all. To make this quite evident, the teacher asks her questions without uttering a sound, only moving the lips. The visitor tries to follow the questions, but fails completely, though the little scholars answer without hesitation. To one accustomed to rely on the sense of hearing this lip-reading looks almost impossible. It is like watching a conjuring or thought-reading séance.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

LEARNING TO SPEAK: OBSERVING IN A MIRROR THE MOTION OF THE LIPS.

Another thing which the visitor at first finds somewhat difficult to realise—though a little thought shows that it must be so—is that these children, who are of quite average intelligence, should have at the age of ten or eleven but the most rudimentary knowledge of their mother tongue. They make just the same mistakes as might be made by a foreigner who is learning English. Of course, when the children have learned to read well, great strides are made, but it is probable that only a few of the most highly educated deaf-mutes ever learn to speak with the same freedom and breadth of idiom as those who have the sense of hearing.

Many of the children who live at a distance are boarded in the neighbourhood of the school. One can imagine the delight of the parents of a little child who has never spoken an intelligible word, when, on returning home for the holidays, he begins to talk and to understand to some extent words addressed to him. It is true that the expectations of the parents seem to vary considerably. "I should be so thankful," said one woman, "if you could only teach my child to say 'mother.'" On the other hand, another woman called at the school in a state of great indignation to complain that her son was not getting on at all well. She had sent him out to buy a bloater, and he did not know what a bloater was. The teacher did not reply, as a pedant might have done, that the characteristics of bloaters formed no part of the school curriculum. Being a sensible man, with a very just and sane conception of his duty, and a sense of humour withal, he recognised a certain measure of reasonableness in the complaint. The constant aim of the teachers is to help their pupils to live the ordinary life of hearing children of their own social class, and to acquire as much general knowledge. Where this mother failed to be quite fair was in not recognising that every piece of commonplace information which the hearing child picks up almost unconsciously, and entirely without effort, has to be acquired by the deaf with more or less labour and pains.

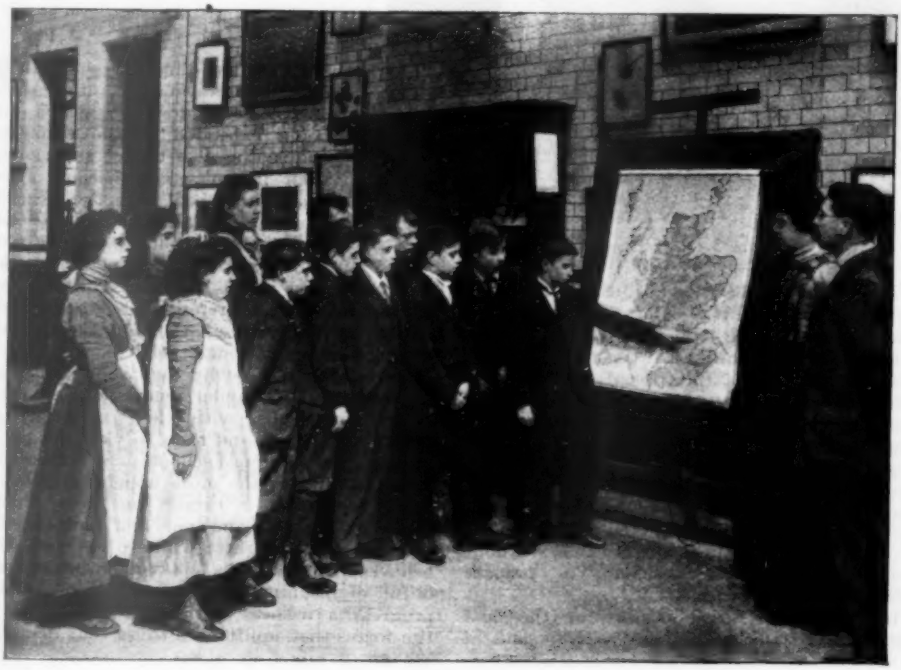
As one passes from class to class, moving up the school, it is interesting to note the progress that is being made in speech, lip-reading and general knowledge. In the hands of a skilful teacher every lesson, whatever its subject, is made to minister to the pupil's progress in these three directions. By the time the highest classes are reached it is evident that the gulf that must always separate the hearing from the deaf has been very considerably narrowed. The scholars read the lips with remarkable facility, speak fluently and correctly, and answer questions on any subject with which scholars in the upper classes of elementary schools might be expected to be familiar.

Many of these deaf children show a decided aptitude for artistic work. Drawing plays an important part in the school course. In the lower classes the children are taught to make rough sketches in their copybooks to impress upon their minds the meaning of the words they write, and in time drawing becomes quite a mode of expression with them. Lacking words to express themselves, they will often resort to sketching to explain their meaning to teachers or companions. Special efforts are made in deaf schools to cultivate manual skill; the strip-work shown in our illustration has lately been introduced with the object of providing a link between the exercises of the kindergarten and of the carpenters' shop. Many of the older scholars exhibit considerable skill in designing and wood carving.

Physical exercise, an important part of a deaf child's training, is not neglected, and in smartness and precision of movement there is not much to choose between these children and those in most other Board schools. A tendency to physical weakness is characteristic of deaf children; they are especially liable to throat and lung complaints, in consequence of these organs lacking the normal exercise involved in talking and singing, though the oral system of training tends, of course, to minimise that cause of weakness. It is noticed, too, that many of them are inclined to walk with a shambling gait. Exercises that promote bodily strength and grace are therefore specially valuable in the case of deaf children. Recognising this, the London School Board have furnished their Clerkenwell school with a well-equipped gymnasium.

There is a very interesting deaf school of a somewhat different character, which is held in a pleasantly situated private house at Ealing. The school is an annexe to the training college of the Society for Training Teachers of the Deaf, a society which has had a large share in the diffusion of the oral system of teaching in this country. The first Principal of the college, the late Mr. Arthur Kinsey, was one of the pioneers of the movement, and during the twenty-four years of its existence the college has trained a great number of expert teachers, who in public and private institutions throughout the country and in private families have throughly tested the efficacy of the system in bridging the chasm that divides the deaf from the hearing world. Our present concern is with the training of children rather than of teachers, but it may interest some of our readers to know that here is one of the professions that are by no means overcrowded, the demand for expert teachers of the deaf being, in fact, considerably in excess of the supply.

The raison d'être of the school at Ealing is that the students may have opportunities for practical as well as theoretical instruction in methods of teaching. It must not be supposed, however, that the children are made the victims of the crude experiments of budding educationalists. During the first term of her training the student does no teaching at all, though she has abundant opportunities for watching the lessons of others and making notes. And such teaching as she does during the remainder of her student course is under the direct supervision of the head mistress.



About twenty-five of the scholars—children of well-to-do parents—live at the house, and thus have the advantage of a more continuous training than is possible in a day-school. Naturally, the same principles are acted upon throughout the day, so that the child's lip-reading facility increases and his vocabulary is enlarged unconsciously and without effort at the dinner-table, in the garden and the playing-field, as well as in the classroom.

The success attending these methods of training has been strikingly shown in the case of some of the Ealing pupils, who have been able to leave the school and continue their education among hearing pupils in an ordinary school, or at the hands of a private tutor entirely unfamiliar with the special work of teaching the deaf.

There is another boarding establishment in the neighbourhood for girls of poorer parents, and this is supported by the local authorities. But the children attend the training college school daily, and it is pleasant to see the mingling of the poor and the comparatively well-to-do in the same classes, a common affliction obliterating all social distinctions. One feels when watching these classes, and equally those of the London School Board, that to these deaf children attendance at school is not by any means an irksome duty. Probably they get a good deal more real enjoyment out of their school life than do the majority of hearing children. I saw at Ealing a little group "listening" with breathless attention to the thrilling narrative of "The Three Bears." Not a word could they hear, but as they read the story on the teacher's lips, the sparkling eyes and eager faces spoke of the delight they experienced—not so much, perhaps, in the story itself as in the sense of ability to apprehend what was spoken. To many deaf children the school affords the only opportunity they have for gratifying a natural instinct that is as strong in the deaf as in the hearing—the desire for intercourse with their fellows. For unless parents or guardians are exceptionally patient and painstaking, the deaf child, especially in the earliest stages of his training, is not likely to have many opportunities for conversation at home. Nor is there any doubt that in many classes the natural kindliness of sympathetic teachers does very much to brighten the hours spent in school.

The moral and religious teaching of deaf children presents, as may be supposed, exceptional difficulties. The conveying of abstract ideas to a child who cannot hear and has but a very limited vocabulary is a task demanding much skill and almost infinite patience. But it need hardly be said that the task is not on that account neglected. Little by little the child's mind is stored with Bible narratives—told in the first instance with the utmost simplicity, and many times repeated—and ideas of God and of duty are imparted. Nor is this, the most important part of a child's education, deferred until much progress has been made in other directions. A little child of six or seven who goes to the Ealing school entirely untaught, and therefore entirely without language, from the first kneels down with folded hands every evening when the other children kneel in prayer. What thoughts pass through the little mind, or what to it is the significance of the silent, reverent act, it is, of course, impossible to know.

A GEOGRAPHY LESSON.

A LESSON IN COLOUR-NAMES.

But may it not be that in these moments the soul of the little child draws near to that divine world whence, a few short years before, it came, a "trailing cloud of glory," and that the formless and unspoken prayer of the tiny deaf-mute is not the least acceptable of the myriad supplications poured daily into the ear of the Most High? However that may be, the religious training in future years is so thoroughly carried on that the vicar of the parish, though not an expert in the education of the deaf, finds it quite practicable, without assistance from the teachers, to prepare candidates for confirmation.

In the School Board classes for the deaf Scripture lessons are regularly given, and at Clerkenwell some of the teachers, in their zeal for the highest interests of the children, have organised a Sunday school at which they give their services quite voluntarily. Several of the neighbouring churches also include in their Sunday schools a class or classes for deaf children.

Altogether, when one realises the heavy disability which total deafness imposes on a child, it is difficult to withhold one's admiration for the skill, energy, and devotion which are being expended in the effort to enable the deaf to rise superior to their infirmity and become eventually absorbed into the hearing world. Of all the educational movements of our time few are so beneficent in their objects or so fruitful in good results as this. The Clerkenwell school to which reference has been made stands on the site of the old Clerkenwell prison, the underground cells of which still remain, being utilised by the School Board as storerooms. To wander amongst these dark and gloomy cells, with their memories of misery and crime, and then to visit the light, cheerful, well-equipped schoolrooms built above them, and watch the most hopeful and beneficent work that is carried on there, would surely inspire even the cynic and the pessimist with cheerful thoughts; while to the man who believes in God and his fellow-men the contrast is full of meaning: it is a parable of human progress, a witness to the coming triumph of the forces that uplift over those that degrade.

CURRENT IRRELIGION.

NEGLECT OF PARENTS TOWARDS CHILDREN.

By the Venerable W. M. Sinclair, D.D., Archdeacon of London.

IT is most distinctly one of the complaints of the present day that a very large number of parents, both in the upper and the lower classes, do not attend to the moral training of their families.

In fashionable life it is quite common for children to be handed over to nurses and governesses, and to see little of their fathers and mothers. The fathers and mothers are often so taken up with their pleasures and social engagements that they remain strangers to their own offspring; and their acquaintance with them becomes superficial. The old custom of reading the Bible every morning with the souls whom God has given them is, in such circles, extinct; the very idea would be received with derision. Nor are characters watched, faults checked, ideas trained. The old and wholesome habit of all attending church together has disappeared: in a large number of cases it is from their parents that children learn the habit of never going to church at all. When boys from such surroundings go to school, the masters are often astounded to find how totally ignorant they are of the Bible and the facts and teachings of the Christian religion; and it is frequently the case with the girls as well. The parents, having no high principles to guide them, or good examples to show, launch out into the world a new generation — lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, selfish, careless, indifferent. Lord Beaconsfield once remarked that the lower classes were as ignorant of the doctrines of Christianity as the upper were of its practice: it is to be feared that in both sets there are now large tracts where both kinds of ignorance prevail.

At the other end of the social scale the same features show themselves. The times in which we live are unfortunately marked by a general impatience of every kind of authority, and a widespread sense of independence from all restraint. Conceit of our own opinions, however ignorant, reliance on our own judgment, however rash and ill-formed, this is the usual condition of young people as soon as they have learnt anything at all, or have in any way begun to earn wages for themselves. And as in our working families parents are very much away from home, are tired and exhausted when they return, do not care to keep up a perpetual struggle with their children, and are probably not very sure of their own principles, examples and conduct, they fall in too easily with this spirit of rebelliousness and self-will, give up their duties, and lose all sense of the responsibilities which are laid upon them by God.

And this neglect is helped by certain necessary steps which the law has taken for the protection of children in so vast and complicated a social system as ours. Our law-givers, in their anxiety that children should be well brought up, and should have a fair start in life, have rather helped to form an unconscious sort of impression that the duties of the father have been in a large degree undertaken by the State. Compulsory attendance at school, for example, and free education may be very necessary amongst an overwhelming population and unparalleled masses of streets and poverty, but they do help to make the father think that the duty of education lies rather with the State than with himself. It is, of course, necessary to protect children by law from working too early in mines and factories, from living in immoral houses, from engaging in immoral occupations, from the cruelty of such of their elders as are savage and brutal; but one side result of this is that amongst the ignorant the direct sense of responsibility is weakened. So with the charitable feeding and clothing of children on any large scale. All these things should make us all the more anxious to increase the acknowledgment of individual duties, and to strengthen the sacredness of individual ties and obligations.

Coleridge the philosopher saw this tendency, and he warned us against it. "I have no faith," he said, "in Act of Parliament reform. All the great things, the permanently great things, that have been achieved in this world have been so achieved by individuals working from the instinct of genius or of goodness. The rage nowadays is all the other way. The individual is supposed capable of nothing; there must be organisation, classification, machinery; as if the capital of national morality could be increased by making a joint stock of it. . . . Are domestic charities on the increase under this system? . . . It may be the choice of the lesser evil, but as for destroying the cottage home education, I think it one of the most miserable mistakes which the well-intentioned people of this day have yet made."

It is the duty and privilege of the Christian Church to notice any harmful tendencies of the time, and by earnest setting forth of the true way, to persuade to a better course. Many of these careless people of whom we speak are at any rate Christians in name. They would not like to be told that they were heathens or infidels. So there may be some chance of not appealing to them in vain.

"What will parents be able to say to God on the Day of Judgment for all their neglect of their children in matter of instruction, and example, and restraint from evil?" So wrote the great Archbishop Tillotson in the seventeenth century; and we cannot help feeling that such a question brings with it in these days even an increased sense of shame and regret. "I suppose it never occurs to parents," writes a great essayist (J. Foster), "that to throw vilely educated young people upon the world is, independently of the injury to the young people themselves, a positive crime, and of very great magnitude; as great, for instance, as burning their neighbour's house, or poisoning the water in his well." There was a habit among Scythian mothers of tossing their infants into the sea, to find out which was strong enough to survive; and many mothers in the present day seem equally indifferent. Would that we could make them realise that as Christians they are meant to be members of the Kingdom of Christ; that sometimes they must have thoughtful and serious moments, and that in such moments they cannot help acknowledging that to bring immortal souls into the world is a privilege of the very highest order, and of the weightiest importance! They are yours, we would say, with your instincts implanted in them by nature, copies of your character and habits. But for you, they would never have been here at all. You are answerable for them before God. With you they ought to be associated day and night during those years when impressions for good or bad are most easily formed and when they are most deep and durable. "The hand of our parents traces on our feeble hearts those first characters to which example and time give firmness, and which perhaps God alone can efface." "In most cases," wrote an ancient Jewish rabbi, "bad parents beget bad children; if parents, for instance, have no scruple about false coin and false weights, their sons are apt to commit the same crimes. "The parents are the first patterns which a child copies often. If they are lazy and worthless, the children are poor and destitute: if careless, they are slovenly; if ignorant, they are so likewise; if windy and pompous, they are conceited and vain."

The mother has, indeed, a natural power over her children, if she will only exercise it, which can be wielded by none else. Ruskin, in his "Præterita," writes touchingly of this, in a way that ought to go to every heart. "I have with deep gratitude," he says, "to chronicle what I owed to my mother for the resolutely consistent lessons which so exercised me in the Scriptures as to make every word of them familiar to my ear in habitual music; yet in that familiarity reverenced, as transcending all, and ordaining all conduct. This she effected, not by her own sayings or personal authority, but by simply compelling me to read the book thoroughly for myself."

"The mother in her office holds the key of the soul; and she it is who stamps the coin of character, and makes the being, who would be a savage but for her gentle cares, a Christian man."

There is no limit to what a mother can do for her children. Isaac Barrow, for instance, one of our greatest English preachers, was incorrigibly idle. He seemed to have an invincible aversion for books, and became so devoted to idle and quarrelsome companions that his father, in bitterness of spirit, exclaimed: "Should it please God to take away any of my children, I pray Him that it may be my son Isaac!" Fortunately, his mother had more patience. At length her care, and the influence of school, were rewarded, and greatly rewarded. Isaac began to make the most distinguished progress in character and learning, and filled with honour the mathematical chair which Newton afterwards held.

It was the same with another preacher, who had unlimited influence for good, Richard Cecil. "I was desperate," he said. "I was determined to go on board a privateer. But I had a good mother. She talked to me, and wept while she talked. There are soft moments even to desperadoes. No distressed woman ever hoped so much against hope. She lived long enough to hear her child preach that Gospel which he had once despised. And she said, 'Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace.'"

But the father's influence comes only next to the mother's.

"What is there like a father to a son [said Sheridan Knowles]
A father quick in love, wakeful in care,
Tenacious of his trust, proof in experience,
Severe in honour, perfect in example,
Stamped with authority!"

Oh, fathers, whether men of business, or men of leisure, or men of the working classes, remember that it is your duty in the truest sense of the word to educate your sons, to bring them up, to form their tastes and habits, to give them their principles; and from that duty you can by no means be absolved! It is your business to teach them obedience, reverence, purity, decency, prudence, caution, truthfulness, honesty, courage. It is your business to see that they fear God and know His will. It is your business to check their faults, to improve their tempera, to be on the watch against all signs of evil, to give them the priceless blessings of self-control and unselfishness, to provide them with an object in life. Few parents realise how much their children may be taught at home, by devoting a few minutes to their instruction every day. There should be a mutual understanding between father and son from the very first. Let a parent make a companion of his child, talk with him familiarly, put to him questions, answer his inquiries, communicate facts—the result of his own reading, observation, or experience—awaken his wholesome curiosity, explain difficulties, the meaning of things, the reason of things, and all this in an easy, playful manner, without seeming to impose a task, and he himself will be astonished at the progress made. William Wilberforce, the statesman, found time to read a chapter of the Bible daily with his son Samuel, afterwards the famous bishop. Charlotte Yonge tells of a busy lawyer who spent his breakfast time over the lessons of his little girls, and made their Sunday a time of training that has borne its fruit. Another had his children daily to his dressing-room. Hannah More, herself such a power for good in the godless days of the eighteenth century, had sat daily on her father's knee to be taught. The Emperor Constantine, as soon as his son could write, employed the boy's hand in signing pardons, and delighted that it should be through his mouth that all the favours that he granted should be conveyed, in order that he should grow up to supreme power through an atmosphere of charity and mercy. "The words that a father speaks to his children in the privacy of home," said Richter, "are not heard by the world; but, as in whispering-galleries, they are clearly heard at the end, and by posterity."

"To you [wrote Shakespeare] your father should be as a god;
One that composed your beauties; yea, and one
To whom you are as but a form in wax
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave the figure or disfigure it."

"Father," said a young man on his deathbed, "you have been very good to me. You have given me a fine education, and you have placed me in a fine social position; you have done everything for me in a worldly sense; but, father, you never told me how to die. Now I am dying, and I am lost!"

But the neglectful parents cannot have the slightest idea of what an incalculable pleasure they are depriving themselves by taking no interest in the development of the minds of their children. As soon as the intelligence begins to dawn, the art of guiding and impressing it becomes the most fascinating of delights. It is the earliest images and novelties which come upon us that we remember most vividly, not the more recent impressions. What a motive for wise and cautious action, and for doing the very best that we can! The child looks round with wonder in the world that is to it so strange and so interesting, so suggestive of exploration in all directions; nothing has as yet wearied or warped his curiosity; he drinks in all he is told with pathetic docility; his father and his mother are still to him the wisest and best of humankind; and the lessons which he then learns, whether he unlearns them afterwards or not, will certainly never be forgotten, but will remain with him for the rest of his life. His simple, warm-hearted affection has never been chilled or deceived, and he repays every act of sympathy, kindness, and attention with all the wealth of his love. They know little of the best joy of life who do not understand something of the poet's feeling, when he thus addresses a child:

"Thy mother's joy, thy father's hope—thou bright
Pure dwelling, where two fond hearts keep their gladness;
Thou little potentate of love, who comest
With solemn, sweet dominion to the old,
Who see thee in thy merry fancies charged
With the grave embassage of that dear past,
When they were young like thee—thou vindication
Of God, thou living witness against all men
Who have been babes, thou everlasting promise
Which no man keeps, thou portrait of our nature
Which in despair and pride we scorn and worship,
Thou household god, which no iconoclast
Hath broken!"

The man who pays no attention to his children loses some of the best of life's lessons. It was our Lord Himself Who made them our teachers: "Whosoever shall not humble himself as this little child shall in nowise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven." Their brightness, their freshness, their purity, their simplicity, their trustfulness all have a deep lesson for those whom the world has worn and wearied. And so Longfellow has said:

"Ah! what the world be to us
If the children were no more!
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.

"Come to me, O ye children!
And whisper in my ear
What the birds and the winds are singing
In your sunny atmosphere.

"For what are all our contrivings
And the wisdom of our books
When compared with your caresses,
And the gladness of your looks?

"Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said,
For ye are living poems,
And all the rest are dead."

"He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them." That is our ideal; and it would indeed be a disgrace and a disaster to our age if, with such a picture before it, and such accumulated treasures of realisation stored up on that foundation, it were to present as one of its main characteristics the loosening of the tie between parents and children. It must not be. We will all unite in bringing an influence of faith and seriousness to bear on those who, in the heedlessness of either high or low life, are refusing to acknowledge the priceless inheritance of parental affection and influence. We will ask the help of God in improving public opinion in this most pressing and critical matter. We will try to restore the ideal: father and mother living in community of ideas with their children, moulding their characters, teaching them by word and example all good and useful things, and leading them by love to the feet of Him Who is not only the Saviour, but the Teacher of the world.

XUM

An Australian Story.

"PUBLISH the banns of marriage between John Morell, bachelor, and Catherine Mary Stevens, spinster, both of this parish. If any of you know cause or just impediment why these two should not be joined together in holy matrimony, ye are to declare it. This is the third time of asking."

Many of the congregation turned to look at Jack, who sat with bronzed face glowing consciously in the corner of the high-backed pew. Some of the school children in the choir, more interested in their mistress, stared relentlessly at Miss Stevens at the organ, who sat with her pretty golden head bent, nervously turning over the leaves of her music. An audible titter brought her reproving glance upon them; they gazed earnestly at Mr. Carson, who had just commenced his sermon.

Kitty tried to listen, but all sight and sound were whirling to her, and she presently found herself counting the blue diamond panes in the east window, wondering why they had been placed in the curious no-meaning fashion, here and there among the panes of white ground glass. Some gaunt, bare limbs of a large gum-tree outside stretched their waving shadows across the window. She read the Easter text round the Gothic arch of the chancel which she had helped to form with the tiny white everlasting flowers they had gathered one day near Bridgewater.

"This is the day which the Lord hath made; let us rejoice and be glad in it."

This was enough for her: her thoughts went dreaming, dreaming, nor took shape again until she saw Mr. Carson's hands uplifted in benediction, and the people rising from their seats.

Kitty Stevens had lodged with Mrs. Morell since she had come to Nairne as second mistress in the State school there. A great friendship had sprung up between the two women. The elder had an only son, whom she had not seen for some years. He had started life as a boundary rider on a station, and had risen to be manager. The younger's only relative was the brother who had emigrated with her, and who was trying his luck as a gold-digger at Coolgardie.

When Jack came down for a holiday after six years' absence, he fell in love with the pretty English girl he found at home.

"You'll have to make a fortune before you marry her, Jack," said his mother; "my Kitty was not meant to be a rough bushman's wife," stroking the soft fair head that lay in her lap. Kitty kissed the caressing hand, while Jack, looking at them, said laconically—

"I shall have to mend my manners, mother."

Without regard to Kitty's fitness or unfitness for a lonely life in the bush, he went off next day to Adelaide, and sunk a great part of his savings in the preliminary payment for a Government selection of a thousand-acre block of land. He knew the place well, having often crossed it when travelling sheep, and had long had an idea he would like to possess it. When he brought back the deeds with the stated conditions for improvement and terms of purchase, his mother looked at him aghast.

"What are you going to do, Jack? Surely not give up the management of Woolmarnia and turn farmer?"

"Why not? I prefer to take my wife to my own place."

"Yes, naturally; but have you thought what a new selection means in these days?"

"I expect I have, mother; and I expect I know as well as anyone that there will be plenty of hard work to do."

During the two years since this had happened Jack had worked alone. He had himself built the little four-roomed house; the stables and stock-yards were up; the harvest reaped; he felt the time had come to bring Kitty to the home he had prepared for her.

He waited by the church door as the concluding notes of the voluntary were played and the congregation moved slowly down the hill, until Kitty joined him outside. Over the red gravelled path they went, crunching underfoot the lately fallen bark of the gum-trees. The little parsley fern was already putting up its crooks; some of the heavy autumn rains had fallen a week or two before.

Presently Kitty lingered by a marble cross around which a Gloire rose-bush clung.

"Jack, isn't this lovely?" she murmured, "and just look at the vicarage garden! The fruit-trees are simply blazing to-day, red and gold—where the wind stirs the leaves they seem to flicker like tongues of flame. See that crimson vine which has flung its branches over the quince-tree still laden with the yellow luscious globes of fruit. I never saw the autumn so vivid at home, Jack. There it steals over the woods, and lasts for weeks: here in a few days it burns out its soul. Will it be like this on the selection?" at last asking a question to which he could reply.

"All in good time, dear. Of course you know these are old gardens now."

"And we shall make our own, shan't we, and watch the trees and bushes grow? Shall I really have a dairy of my own?"

"Yes, dear; it's there already waiting for you."

"How delightful! I shall stand skimming the cream, with the cool half-light glimmering in through the barred window. You've read 'Adam Bede' of course, Jack. Hetty skimmed the milk, you remember, and looked so sweet with her dimpled elbows bare. It sounds awfully nice, doesn't it."

"Yes," said Jack: "and you will look well at it too."

"I hope we shall get lots of books to read,' she went on gaily. "I always longed to have time to sit under the trees and read and read."

"The weekly paper is enough for me," said Jack, "and even in that I don't get far beyond the market prices."

"That horrid dull column printed very small, about pigs, poultry, and fat cattle, with figures of the prices?"

"Yes, that's it. I have to study how to buy cheap and sell dear. Life in the bush means plenty to do, Kitty. It's serious when you are there, and often enough I've wondered how I should pull through. But here we are, and there's mother at the gate waiting for us."

As they went indoors Kitty continued to chatter of her dairy and the garden they were to make.

"Ah, Jack," said his mother, with an anxious tone, "she doesn't understand that this new life means work—work from morning to night for you, and longer, wearier work for her. It takes years for a poor man to make a comfortable home."

"We'll manage, mother, don't you fear," said he confidently.

"Of course we shall," cried Kitty. "Why, I'm going to sit on the stock-yard rails and tally the sheep, like that girl you were in love with, Jack."

"Tally the sheep, will you, Kit? Your colonial experience ambitions are growing. Why, we can't keep more than two hundred sheep on that bit of selection."

"All the same," sighed Mrs. Morell, "there's a lot of hard work for slender hands to do."

The wedding passed off happily. Kitty was surrounded by her friends and pupils. Soon the bride and bridegroom set forth for their new home.

Their journey lay for a time through picturesque country, with green sloping hills and winding creeks. In the sunset hour they crossed the great bridge that spans the Murray. Broad and beautiful the river flowed beneath the arches, the peaceful pink and golden sky reflected on its breast. Kitty's joyous spirit drank in the scene, which brought to her mind glowing pictures of her future home and life.

Beyond the river the train passed into the ow, sandy wilderness of the ninety-mile desert. Each time Kitty looked into the moonlight she saw the unchanging sameness of sombre shrubs. Now and then a spectre mile-post fled backwards from the noisy engine as it rushed on its iron road.

"Is all the south-east like this, Jack?" she asked after a long time.

"More or less, perhaps. Better wheat country where the selection is you may rest satisfied, or I shouldn't have taken it out."

"It seems so far away, so lonely!" she sighed to herself. "If it were not for Jack, I am sure I could not live in the bush: it would drive me out of my mind without his love and sympathy."

However, next morning found her again full of excited anticipation, and when Jack drove up to the door of the inn they had stayed at, in a high buckboard with a sturdy pair of black horses, she climbed up beside him in gay spirits for their final start for home.

The landlady stood at the door watching them drive down the smooth white road from the township.

"Not quite the girl for a cockatoo farmer to choose," she said meditatively. "Pleasant enough, but not suited for the struggles before her."

During the early part of the journey Kitty rattled on with quaint remarks, interested in all they passed. By-and-by, the road grew rough, and they met fewer people. Jack thought anxiously of the farm, while the horses plodded on with even trot.

"'Dinner! Oh, dear! I had forgotten it.'"—p. 40.

The rains had been unusually heavy, and much of the land on either side of the road lay under water. As far as the eye could reach, the shallows stretched round the trunks of the great ring-barked trees, left standing like grim skeletons where the ruthless axe had killed them, their grey leafless limbs lifted towards the sky.

"Jack," said Kitty, shivering, "do talk to me. Is it all dead trees and flats, all gloomy like this?"

"Well, Kitty, to tell the truth, what with the fencing, and keeping down the rabbits, and keeping up the Government conditions, I never think much about it. I'll be bound you'll soon forget the country too, when you've got plenty to do. We shall have to do with as little hired labour as possible, till the farm is paid for. If you could keep us in groceries from the dairy, it would be a great thing."

"I will, dear. I will do my very best to help."

They were now driving across country, threading through the trees, one moment over rugged hillocks, the next through mud and slush, in some of the worst of the Bay of Biscay country—bump, bump, bump.

"Jack," gasped Kitty, "when I get home I shall never want to leave again. I'm weary with bruises," laying her head on his arm.

"Cheer up," he said, "we shall find the sand we are coming to easier going."

Half an hour or more passed. She had closed her eyes, and presently he urged the horses into a trot, saying loudly, "Here we are, Kitty, at the flat—see, there's the house."

About half a mile ahead stood the little pine-log hut, solitary on the treeless plain. Their road lay through thick scrub, a belt of which fringed on all sides the low hills around, producing the sunk appearance of a lake bed. In shape the flat was oblong, stretching away into distance at either end. A few merino sheep cropping the short rushes turned their white faces at the sound of the wheels, and, standing for a moment, scampered off as they drew near.

Two curtainless windows stared at them in a knowing fashion. One had been fixed about a foot higher than the other.

"Oh, dear! is this indeed our home, Jack?" hysterically laughing.

"Yes, love. But why do you laugh like that?"

"Nothing, nothing. Unless, perhaps, it's the horrid squint of the windows."

In silence he lifted her down, and when he had unlocked the door he drove off to the stables, a little hurt at her remark. She went into the house alone, and, stretching her arms across the table, burst into tears.

A few weeks passed, and Kitty, though busy learning how to do and manage her new work in life, had found time to make the little sitting-room brighter with curtains and her books and prints.

"Love is enough, to be sure, but I should like a table-cloth and a carpet; and as for you three miserable chairs"—shaking her fist at the respectable, highly polished seats that stood primly against the walls, "I simply loathe you."

"Love is enough," she argued again, "with the morsel and quietness therewith. But a scrap of matting to hide the concrete floor would bring peace to my soul. What can I do to get all these things? Anyhow, I mustn't ask Jack for money"; and she hurried off to the dairy to make up the butter, so that it should be ready to send to the store.

She went down two steep steps and pushed open the door.

"Oh! my beloved dairy with the barred window which is perforated zinc! How silly I was to expect a dairy like Hetty had!"

Sighing, she looked at the pile of wheat-sacks in one corner and the heap of ploughshares beside them, then at the full bags of seed wheat and barley leaning against the wall. At the other end, beneath the zinc window, some rough, blue gum planks had been placed: and there stood the milk-pans and churn.

"Oh, I know now what I shall do for a carpet," she cried, seizing an empty wheat-sack and, her butter forgotten, rushing off indoors with it.

Jack came in at twelve o'clock for dinner. He found her in the sitting-room surrounded by bright patches, some of which she had already cut into tiny strips, and these she was busily sewing on to the sack as a foundation for the carpet.

"Isn't dinner ready?" he asked.

"Dinner! Oh dear! I had forgotten it. I do so long to get a bit of carpet on that dreadful floor."

"The floor is all right, Kitty," he said impatiently. "I have to go off to the township in ten minutes."

"Oh, Jack, dear, how stupid of me! I am so sorry; and all the bread——" She rushed past him into the kitchen, and threw open the door of the huge brick oven. The fumes of the charred bread sent her flying back to a stool by the table.

"Jack, help me—do," she wailed.

He had followed her, and, looking gloomily at the bread, said—

"It ought to have been taken out two hours ago."

He strode outside, got on his horse, and rode off to the township, bad-tempered and dinnerless.

"Oh, poor, poor Jack! What a miserable wife you've got!" she moaned. "I'm not fit for a farm. He'll never love me again."

She went to the door, and looked up the long flat. Its dead-levelness depressed yet fascinated her, particularly when, as now, the curious mirage appeared at the far end. Eight or nine small cloudlike masses lay about a foot above the ground, while the heat waves quivered before them: in the atmosphere above floated strange shapes, a dim city outlined "The pictures," she breathed, "the pictures

'Are melted into air, into thin air,'
And like the baseless fabric . . . .

Presently she realised the trend of her thought, and smiled with pleasure. Yet, as rapidly, the recollection of her troubles rushed into her mind, the mirage dancing wickedly meanwhile. She dashed her hands passionately across her tear-blurred gaze, then stretched them up in protest towards the illusion.

"Jack, Jack!" she sighed aloud:

'Sir, I am vex'd:
Bear with my weakness: my brain is troubled.'"

She wept piteously for herself.

"Yet I love my husband," she reasoned, and again in thought she stood at the altar of the little church, the sunlight streaming through the diamond-paned window, and the restless branch swaying to and fro behind it. Jack, beside her, had replied his solemn "I will." Mr. Carson was continuing, "Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health?"

Then for the first time the weight, the meaning of her own "I will" sank heavily upon her heart.

The ploughing season was at its height, and Jack, though full of his farm business, noticed the care and exactitude with which Kitty now performed her daily routine.

"Mother would be surprised to see how well she manages, and how she has settled into farm life," he thought.

Unfortunately for Kitty, he kept his appreciation to himself. Men who have led solitary lives fall out of the habit of expressing themselves to any extent; and he had no idea what ardour he stifled by withholding a word of love or praise: it would have made just the difference to her life. The happy spontaneity which had always been her charm disappeared, and the power of repression grew upon her daily.

Yet Jack loved her tenderly: and while he trod the newly turned furrows, mechanically scattering handfuls of golden corn right and left from a heavy seed-bag slung across his shoulder, he was building castles in the air for Kitty.

"In two or three years, when the farm is paid for, it will be all right. By that time we shall get the new house built, and she shall have a piano, and I will buy her a quiet hack to ride."

They rarely sat together in the evenings, there was so much housework to do. When sometimes she brought her mending into the sitting-room, she would find Jack at his accounts, or tired out, lying asleep with his head on the table. Then her slow tears would fall upon her stitches.

Time went on. It was harvest with a temperature of 101° in the shade. A blazing sun above sent the mirage pictures dancing up the flat more vividly than ever, and seemed to concentrate its hottest rays on the roof of the little pine log-house. Each morning Kitty got up with tired and aching limbs, but she allowed herself no respite. The milk-pans day by day grew heavier to lift. One morning, Bill, the boy who had been engaged to look after the horses, took from her arms a pile which she was carrying from the dairy to scald.

"'I don't understand it.'"—p. 42.

"Let me do 'em for you, missus. I've often done 'em for mother."

She looked up gratefully, touched by his kindly thought.

"I ain't got nothin' else to do till the men's tea is ready to carry down. Might as well do this. . . . But she do look so white," he muttered apologetically to himself. "She ain't fit for this place."

From that time he waited on her whenever he could get a chance. One morning he had been kept longer than usual at the reaping. Kitty had kneaded the bread, and had made the harvest cakes ready for the men. As she surveyed them she said to herself:

"I'll have to clear the fire out of the oven myself, if Bill doesn't come soon."

She sighed wearily. "Can I live through it? Oh, if Jack would only be as he used to be!"

The booming of the reaping machine rent the hot air. She felt she could scream with anger at it, at the farm which must be paid for, at the weary sameness of toil to the hands, to the minds of those who wrested their living from the earth. She glanced up the flat, where the mirage shivered its restless images. To-day it was like a nightmare to her.

She caught up the long scraper, threw open the oven door, and impatiently raked out the embers and burning sticks. The heat met her like a blast. After two or three feeble attempts the handle fell from her nerveless fingers.

"Kitty, darling Kitty! what has happened to you?" cried Jack, who had been hurriedly fetched from the reaping by Bill.

"I am tired," she muttered restlessly. "I can't work."

"You shall not, love—you shall not."

But his passionate reproach of himself and loving reassurance to her fell upon deaf ears.

For many days she lay in fever, her body worn out by hard and unaccustomed work, her nervous tension unstrung to its utmost. Jack shared the watching with his mother, who had been hastily summoned from Nairne. But Kitty knew not of the love and care which were showered upon her.

In delirium sometimes little inconsequent sketches were given of her difficulties.

"Mother," she cried one evening, taking her husband's hands as he sat beside her bed, "Jack doesn't love me. He never says one word. And I am lonely—oh, so lonely!"

"Hush, hush, child!"

"Hush? It's always 'Hush!'" She traced the fingers of both hands across her forehead.

Jack groaned.

"I'm not talking nonsense, dear, am I?"

"No, no. Don't talk at all, darling."

"I must talk. . . . Jack, have you come, are you really here in Nairne?" she cried joyously. "Come to take me home, to our own home—the place where we shall be together always? Jack, are there examination papers to correct at home? Because they'd make my head ache."

Soon she sank into restless slumber, and he passed from the room on tiptoe.

"Mother, I don't understand it. The things that seem to trouble her are things in every-day life that have to be done. If I'd known, or thought she cared to hear me say anything about it, I could have said what I felt and thought every time I came into the house, every time I saw her at work, but it's too late now—too late."

"Don't say that, Jack. To-day the doctor is more hopeful. She may recover."

"If she does, I shall take her away from the flat. The selection must go. I shall surrender it, if I cannot sell."

Mrs. Morell agreed. "Of course, it is a pity, when you think of the time and money you have spent upon it; but I always felt the drudgery would be too much for her after a life of teaching."

About five months later, when Kitty was convalescent, she walked with her husband one evening down the flat. From the wattle lands on the hills, the clustered blossoms filled the air with the scented breath of spring. Amongst the fresh green herbage red sundew plants glistened, and raised fragile flowers to the day. Kitty pulled one from the earth, plant and root.

"'You call it sundew: how it grows,
If with its colour it hath breath,
If life taste sweet to it, if death
Pain its soft petal, no man knows:
Man has no sight or sense that saith.'"

"What a romantic Kitty it is!" said her husband, laughing, as she apostrophised the plant.

"It's you, Jack!" she returned, "who are romantic, when you talk of giving up the farm for me. That must not be. Just think of all the time and money to be wasted by my silly weakness! I will go on; it shall be a success. We can make it so together."

"But you are not suited for the life, Kitty. It is too hard for you. It is better for me to take the managership of a station, or——"

"No, no," she exclaimed. "Before I broke down I felt lonely. Now you are with me so much more, and if mother lives with us I could never be so foolish again."

As she talked the mirage was pictured in purple light upon the evening landscape before them.

"Isn't it curious and beautiful, dear? Often when it is most vivid I feel it is in strange sympathy for weal or woe with us."

"You are very fanciful, Kitty."

She went on gaily. "Now it foretells we shall stay here, that we shall make the farm pay in a very few years, and that I shall be a model farmer's wife."

"You are already a wife for any man to be proud of."

"Well, we are going to make our home all I've said. Oh, do not take me away, Jack! Do let us realise our hope of happiness here! Let us make our home beautiful, let us plant our gardens around it. Now I know you are not disappointed in me, that you still love me, I am more than content."

GOD'S BEAUTIFUL CREATURES.

THE DOG.

By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

(Photo: E. Lander, Ealing, W.)

COLLIE.

ANIMALS are placed beside us in the world as interpreters of the mysteries of our own nature. They prefigure and foretell our characters and actions. We should be much more incomprehensible to ourselves; it is questionable if we could live at all without them. To Adam in Eden the animals were brought that he might give them names, and so associate his own nature with theirs, and thus have a deeper sympathy with them. Upon the help of the horse we are greatly dependent for our elevation above the animal state; and who shall say what man owes to the companionship of the dog? In a wild state, the dog is a social or gregarious animal. It forms a large community under the leadership of the strongest and most capable member. The welfare of each individual depends upon the harmonious action of the whole pack. Trained by the instinct of submission when acting in concert with his fellows, the dog has acquired the germ from which have been developed those qualities which have made him capable of domestication, and attaching himself to a human master. In this relation man stands to him in place of the pack, and he transfers to him all the obedience that he owed to it. He has the confidence, the courage under the protection of a higher nature than his own, which do not belong to him individually, but which are his because he has behind him the support of the whole community. We have a survival of this original instinct of the pack in the curious circumstance that a strange dog will follow one during a country walk, for the sake of the sense of companionship and protection, keeping shyly at a certain distance all the way, and finally disappearing and going to his own home, when the walk is over. Though longing ever so much to wander over the hill, he would never venture to do this alone.

Wonderful was the first step in the transformation of the ravenous wolf into the gentle creature which forsakes the fellowship of its own kind and makes man its god. We know not who it was that first tamed the dog, and taught him those habits which are a dim image and gleam of those of humanity. But as far back as we can trace, even in the prehistoric ages, we find the dog associated with man, and there is hardly any race but has made some variety or other of the species useful in bearing human burdens or sharing human loneliness. Having to hunt without the dog, diverted the nervous energy of the old American Indians to the eye and the nose, and correspondingly lessened the force of their intellect. And in the East, where the dog has separated himself from man, and formed communities of his own, going back in this manner to the original wild state, man has suffered the loss of those moral qualities which the companionship of the dog has helped to form and educate. It is difficult for us to understand why that sacred Book which gives us so many lessons about God's tender mercies being over all His works, and tells us of His care of the fowls of the air, and makes us merciful and gentle in our treatment of all sentient existence, should yet invariably speak of the dog with contempt, and regard it as the symbol of all baseness and impurity. Of course the estimate was formed from the outcast condition of the dog in Bible lands, where he is the scavenger of the cities, but never the associate of man, and where he roams fiercely in packs, each individual reverting to the original type, and having the same lean, yellow, wolfish look. And yet even in these countries he has come to a large extent under man's influence, and though retaining the original uniformity of his appearance—exhibiting none of the variations which he undergoes in Western lands, resulting from his close association there with man—he still shows interesting traits of individual character. I remember in Damascus, where the dog is kindly treated as a rule, but neglected and ownerless, being struck with the wistful look of one special street dog, to which I showed some kindness in feeding it, how it gazed up into my face as if it missed something out of its life, and longed to have some sort of companionship with me.

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

SPANIEL AND TERRIER.

Those who have that kind of knowledge of dogs which arises from great love of and intimacy with them know how far removed they are from being what some in their ignorance have imagined them to be, irrational and governed solely by invariable instinct. They can bring forward innumerable instances which prove that dogs possess some kind of intellectual principle, that they have a capacity for progressive advancement and a wonderful power of adapting themselves to circumstances, as well as an individuality of temper and character that almost amount to personality. No two dogs, even though their forms are the same, are actually the same in nature and temperament. They have tastes, and ways, and dispositions that mark them out from each other, almost as distinctly as one human being from another. One will make friends at once with any stranger who caresses it; another will take no notice of any advance from a stranger, but cleaves faithfully to is owner only. One is cross-grained and ever ready to snarl, while another is gentle and loving, and fond of being petted. No one looking at Landseer's portraits of dogs will fail to see how deeply the great painter has penetrated into the specialities of dog-nature, and brought out those personal traits which differentiate one dog from another. You see in the face of one a look of shrewdness and wisdom; on the face of another is portrayed unmistakable dignity; while the eye of another has an expression of lofty disdain or calm indifference.

There is abundance of good reason for believing that dogs have a kind of moral sense. That they have gratitude, friendship, affection, jealousy and resentment of injury, has always been known, but they have in addition an undoubted sense of right and wrong, which is often wonderful. I used to hear the late well-known poet-preacher, Dr. Robertson, of Irvine, telling about his favourite dog Bear, how he became jealous of the hens at the manse because they were fed before him, and in revenge killed every one of them and buried them in the garden, where their legs were left sticking out of the ground. His master exhumed one of the hens and took it and showed it to the dog. He did not beat him for his wickedness, or upbraid him for his cruelty, but merely said in a grieved voice, "Just look at that." The poor dog slunk away in sore compunction and distress. The shame was too much for him. From that moment he refused all food, and starved himself to death. If the master had only beaten him, the punishment might have enabled him to get over his trouble and revive his self-respect. But in the absence of any power of making atonement for his transgression, he died of a broken heart.

(Photo: Brun, Brandesbury.)

CHARLIE, CHRISTMAS, 1900.

(Aged 18 months. Died April 13*th*, 1901.)

Dogs will often combine their powers, and by a kind of collective sagacity accomplish what they could not do individually. A Skye-terrier and a greyhound have not unfrequently had a mutual understanding whereby they could hunt together on their own account; the terrier having the advantage of keen smell and the greyhound of great fleetness. These qualities they concentrated towards the accomplishment of one purpose; the terrier finding out the game, and driving it from its cover, while the fleet-footed companion waited for it outside, and speedily ran it down. I knew of a singular case of cunning in which the culprits were a small Scotch terrier and a large Newfoundland. They had been seen together by a shepherd worrying his sheep on the moor. The owner of both dogs denied the possibility of the accusation being true, for the Newfoundland was always chained to his kennel, and the terrier never went from home except in company with its master. But as the offence was soon after repeated, and the identification of the dogs was vehemently asserted by the shepherd, a watch was kept, when it was seen that the terrier stole out in the quietest manner at daybreak to the kennel where the Newfoundland was chained, which immediately slipped its collar, and the two made straight for the sheep on the hill. Arriving at the fold, the Newfoundland concealed himself behind a hedge, while the terrier drove the sheep to the ambush, and then one of them was seized and despatched. After the meal was finished, the dogs returned home, and the Newfoundland thrust his head into his collar and lay down in his kennel as if nothing had happened, while the terrier at once found its way to the house, where it assumed an innocent appearance as if newly risen from sleep. Our own little pug, Chang, showed an extraordinary craftiness in going after sheep, and pursuing them as fast as he could run over the moor. On one occasion he was out with me, and, noticing some sheep in the distance, he watched his opportunity, when I was not looking, and stole away under cover of a bank, hiding himself until he got too far off to be brought back; and then, heedless of my shouts after him, he ran with the utmost swiftness till he came up where the sheep were, and, collecting them together, he drove them helter-skelter across the moor, until he was fairly exhausted. Meantime I had gone far away from the spot, and wandered backwards and forwards in search of mosses, till I came to a piece of rising ground, whence I could see far below, a moving white speck, following all the deviations of my track with his nose to the ground, smelling out where my footsteps had been with unerring certainty, until at last he came up where I was, and wagged his tail and looked up at me, as if priding himself upon his achievement. We could not break off this bad habit, which must have been an hereditary instinct in him. He would fly after sheep whenever he saw them, but he took all the precautions he could to escape observation, for he was perfectly conscious that he was doing a thing that was strictly forbidden.

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

HIS HONOUR.

Dogs, like children, are admirable judges of character. They know by the very simplicity of their nature those who love them. They are attracted at once by some natures and repelled by others. No amount of petting or bribing will induce them to tolerate the presence of some people; while they will show their appreciation of others without any such attentions. There is an utter unselfishness, too, in the love of dogs. They have, in a marked degree, what is such a beautiful trait in children—a complete unconsciousness of the inequalities of fortune. They take no account of the external circumstances of those they love. The dog of the blind beggar is as faithful and devoted as the dog of the rich man; the dog that inhabits a rude hut cares as much for its master as the dog that dwells in a palace; it is the person himself, and not his surroundings, that draws out the attachment of his dog. And yet some dogs evince an extraordinary appreciation of their aristocratic condition, and look down upon other dogs not so favourably situated. A dog brought up in a grand mansion will show its disdain of a poorly clad person endeavouring to cross the threshold, and growls and shows its teeth when a beggar appears. Every variety of dog has an interest of its own. It would seem as if with the changes in its form it had acquired new qualities. Each dog has a special gift; some kinds being much more sagacious than others.

(Photo: T. Fall, Baker Street, W.)

"JOCK," BELONGING TO H. PANMURE GORDON, ESQ.

Perhaps upon the whole the shepherd's dog is the most intelligent. From the very nature of his master's occupation he is brought into closest communion with him. Together on the misty hill, the dog and the shepherd are shut out from all the world, and shut in with one another; and this intimate association has sharpened the dog's intelligence in the most remarkable degree. I have heard rude shepherds expressing in their blunt but graphic way what their dogs have been to them: how they entered into their very thoughts, and had but one object in life, to fulfil their master's wishes. At the end of last August, when our gracious King was on a cruise in the royal yacht, he landed in Arran, and drove in a waggonette twelve miles across the hills to Doughrie, on the western side of the island, to see that most characteristic of Arran sights—a sheep-dog trial. This fête takes place every year in the month of August, and is looked forward to with much expectation. Crowds composed of natives and visitors, from all parts of the island, gather to the rendezvous: and the spot, surrounded by grand peaks, with the broad blue sea stretching beyond to the horizon, affords ideal surroundings for a day's enjoyment. It is altogether a picturesque spectacle, and admirably adapted to bring out in an astonishing degree the intelligence of the collie dog. The trial begins at ten o'clock. A large number of shepherds enter into the contest, whose duty it is to guide their dogs in driving each a small flock of sheep out of a fold and back again, over a rough and winding track, about a mile in length, made more difficult by heights and hollows strewn with boulders. To increase the difficulty the sheep are gathered from different hill-pastures, and are generally unknown to the dogs. The shepherds stand on a piece of rising ground within the pens, and direct their own dogs by their crooks and by voluble explanations in Gaelic, which the dogs seem to thoroughly understand. Some of the collies are especially expert in driving the flock of which they are in charge, keeping all the sheep together, preventing any from straying, and bringing them all back again safely to the fold from which they started. And the prizes are awarded according to the celerity and smartness with which this operation is accomplished. It is often a matter of extreme difficulty to decide the order of merit, when all the competitors evince an almost equal degree of talent. The King and Queen spent a considerable time in witnessing the trial; and His Majesty showed much interest in the marvellous performances of the dogs. He is a keen sportsman; but it is questionable if he had ever seen or taken part in any sport more novel and entertaining.

(Photo: T. Fall, Baker Street, W.)

H.M. QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S FOREIGN DOG "JOCKO."

To Sir Walter Scott his dogs were his comrades. They had closer fellowship with him than even his own kith and kin. How much their mute sympathy helped him during the great tragedy of his life, when his great schemes ended in misfortune and all his hopes were crushed, and his very reputation was threatened with dishonour! In that lonely study at Abbotsford, when, like one of his own heroic knights, he buckled himself with fresh resolution, to make the best of the gigantic ruin, the dog lying at his feet and ever and anon looking up to his face with a straitened but touching comprehension, must have cheered and sustained him, as perhaps the all-knowing sympathy of a human friend could not have done.

Who does not know the story of the faithful Gelert, that protected the child of his master in the cradle from the wolf, and was slain by his master under suspicion from the stains of blood around, and the disappearance of the child, that he had been its murderer? Though a myth with many variants, appearing first in the Indian Hatapodesa, representing the sentiment of regret at the slaying of the innocent, when he was bravely and nobly risking his life in behalf of the child, there must have been underneath it a strong foundation of reality. Hardly any dog-story has made such a tender impression as that of "Rab and his Friends," told by the touching pen of that prince of dog-fanciers, Dr. Brown. Mrs. Browning in her pathetic verses on her little dog Flush, tells us how the little creature watched by her side night and day during her long illness, and would not be coaxed away.

"Mock I thee in wishing weal?—
Tears are in my eyes to feel
Thou art made so straitly,
Blessing needs must straighten too—
Little can'st thou joy or do,
Thou who lovest greatly.

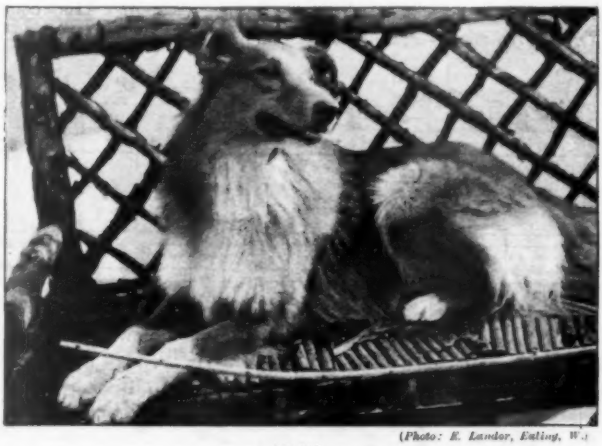
Yet be blessed to the height,
Of all good and all delight,
Pervious to thy nature;
Only loved beyond that line,
With a love that answe·s thine,
Loving fellow-creature!"

Everyone has heard of the famous marons, or St. Bernard dogs, which have rescued hundreds of travellers in the snow-storms on the Swiss Alps. In the museum at Berne I saw the stuffed body of the well-known dog "Barry," which is said to have saved the lives of no less than forty persons. During my visit to the hospice the huge creatures loved to be caressed, and once they ran after my companion, as he was going up the hill-side by a wrong path, and pulled him back by the coat-tails.



The ancients had much of our feeling towards the dog. In a Columbarium on the Appian Way at Rome, I saw the ashes of a favourite dog contained in a little urn, with an inscription on the wall above, telling about its good qualities, and the great grief of its mistress at its loss. At Mitylene, one of the Isles of Greece, there was a fragment of classic art, which I greatly coveted, a little basrelief, which originally stood over a dog's grave, with a poetical tribute to the virtues of the dead pet. It is now carefully preserved in the museum at Athens. Even in prehistoric times sincere mourning for the death of a much valued dog was not unknown. In the huge tumulus of that half-mythical hero Daghda, not far from the wonderful chambered cairns of Dowth and New Grange in the Valley of the Boyne in Ireland, besides Eta, the bardess who handled the harp of Tara to such effect that the echoes of it have come down to our own times, there was laid to rest Boiner, the wife of Neshtan, of whom it is touchingly recorded that "she took with her to the tomb her small dog Totilla." The shadowy personages have left no trace of their presence for more than two thousand years, but the very name of this dog has been preserved.

(Photo: T. Fall, Baker Street, W.)

MR. PANMURE GORDON'S "WISHAW MAID."

Some people cannot understand why so much fuss should be made on the death of a mere animal. But no one who has sustained such a bereavement will ever regard it in that light. It touches one like the death of a dear friend. In some respects, indeed, it comes closer to the heart. The very helplessness and dependence of the faithful creature, the oneness of its devotion—the concentration of its whole nature in loving its owner—appeal to one in a most affecting way. In a world so full of selfishness, where one is apt to be made cynical by experiences of human treachery and neglect, the tender look in its eye, its quiet licking of the hand, have often softened the heart, and kept the well-spring of affection from being frozen over. Its dear companionship has educated our very conscience and imagination, and played no insignificant part in the formation of our character and the discipline of our life. We have become more and not less human through our attachment to it. We recall with tears its little ways, its peculiar traits and disposition, its artful artlessness, its dumb but eloquent modes of expressing its feelings. We miss it in a thousand ways. It is difficult to convey to others the idea how it has made itself a part of our very life, so that we feel maimed without it. So keenly do we feel the loss, that when we have carried the stiff little body that can never more wag its tail, or look up lovingly at us, wrapped round in its winding-sheet, and laid it reverently with blinding tears in the grave we have dug in the garden, we feel as if we could never again bear to go through a similar sorrow. No other dog, we feel, can take the place of the lost one. I have known persons so devoted to a dog that, when he died, they could not bear the associations of their home, and removed to a new dwelling, to get away from the ever poignant regret which the old place kept alive. Every heart can sympathise most thoroughly with the most tender poem in which Matthew Arnold expressed his profound grief for the death of his dachshund Geist, who had lived with him for four years—a poem which no one can read without a lump rising in his throat :

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

COLLIE.

"That loving heart, that patient soul
Had they indeed no longer span,
To run their course, and reach their goal
And read their homily to man,
That liquid, melancholy eye,
From whose pathetic soul-fed springs,
Seemed surging the Virgilian cry,
The sense of tears, in mortal things.

"Yes, only four! but not the course
Of all the centuries yet to come,
And not the infinite resource
Of Nature, with her countless sum
Of figures, with her fulness vast
Of new creation evermore,
Can ever quite repeat the past,
Or just thy little self restore."

Praise the Lord, His Glories Show.

Words by the REV. H. F. LYTE. Music by the REV. F. PEEL, B.Mus.
(Vicar of Heslington, York.)

THE BOX ON THE PLANK.

A Sketch by F. H. Sweet.

ONE morning, as the ebb tide was slipping and gurgling from rock to rock, a woman emerged from the dunes and went slowly along the beach, stooping here and there to pick up bits of wreckage which had been washed up by the waves. When she had gathered all she could carry, she took some rope from her pocket, and made the pieces into a strong bundle. With this slung across her shoulders she moved back toward the dunes.

Suddenly she paused and gazed earnestly at the water. It was only a plank she saw, rising and falling with the waves; but it was fuel, and, dropping her bundle, she waded out until she could reach and draw it ashore. Only then did she discover that there was a small metal box, twelve or fourteen inches in length, securely lashed to the plank.

The strong ocean currents which set toward the north shores of France bring in many strange bits of wreckage, and the woman had had her share in finding them. But none the less eagerly did her fingers work at the fastenings which secured the box. So much precaution was not without its meaning. The box was valuable, and if no owner was found—well, perhaps it would help her towards the three hundred francs she had been longing for so many months.

But when the box was released she found that it was securely locked, and that all her efforts to open it were unavailing. On the cover were strange little marks. She peered at them eagerly, and shook her head. Well, she would take it home to little Jean. He could read and would explain the marks to her.

Over behind the dunes, and hidden from the sea by the mimic mountains of sand, were several small storm-battered houses. They were built of rough slabs and wreckage, and had neither doors nor windows on the exposed sides. Behind them were drying-benches and other apparatus for curing fish.

The woman passed around one of the houses, and threw her bundle down near the door. A man was seated on the ground, mending a net. He looked up as she approached.

"Bien!" he growled. "you have come at last! I must have my breakfast, so that I may catch the low tide. Mais, Elise, what have you there?"

He took the box and examined it carefully. Then he tried to open it, but without success. When he picked up a hammer she snatched the box from his grasp.

"Non, non, Jacques!" she protested, "you shall not break it. The box is not ours yet. We may find the owner."

He laughed jeeringly.

"We will not look very hard," he sneered. "But, truly, Elise, you must not think of giving it up. The sea gives to those who find. You should remember your husband and children, ma chère. The box may contain jewels or money. Bien! who knows but it would buy me a new boat and a keg of wine?"

"I shall let Monsieur le Curé have it to-morrow, when I go to town," she said firmly. "Perhaps he will find the owner. If he does not, I suppose the box will be mine. But it will not go for a boat and a keg of wine, I can tell you that, mon ami. I have other use for it."

"Bah! the miserable three hundred francs you are for ever dinning into one's ears!" he grumbled sullenly, as he picked up the seine and resumed work. "How much have you got of it, Elise, and what is it for?"

"I have twenty francs," she answered placidly. "But never you mind what it is for, Jacques. Better mend your seine so that you will be ready for the low tide."

He muttered something under his breath which she passed unnoticed. In the wine-shop of M. Lecoux, and among the fishermen on the beach, he was a great man; but at home it was Elise who arranged things.

After a time the children began to straggle in from the parish school at St.-Valéry, two miles away. First, there was Guillaume, of the strong limbs, who loved the sea and hated books. Then there were François and Henri, who could race along the beach like the wind; and Sophie and Hélène, whose hair was the colour of the waves when the storm-clouds are shadowed in them, and whose faces were tanned and roughened by the wind and sea, and, like Guillaume, all of them abhorred the little schoolroom at St.-Valéry. And then there was little Jean.

But, curiously enough, Jean was not so small as one would think. Indeed, he was of the same age and almost as large as Guillaume himself. And he loved the sea, and the open air, and the games; but far, far above all the rest, he loved his books. So the neighbours lowered their voices and spoke of him compassionately as "Pauvre garçon," and Jacques shook his head and growled, "Mauvais, mauvais!" And it was not so very long before that even Elise herself had shared their opinion and thought of her precocious boy with misgiving.

But one day Monsieur le Curé had called on her, and he had spoken so warmly of little Jean and the possible honour in store for him that she felt almost oppressed by the sudden rush of affection and pride which had overwhelmed her.

After the good man left, she had gone out on the beach and given herself up to meditation until she was aroused by the children coming home from school. And after that she always mentioned Jean first instead of last. But as the days went by an unspoken dread began to trouble her. At the end of the year Jean and Guillaume would be too old to attend the parish school; then there would be nothing for them but to come home and help their father with the fishing. It was all right and proper for Guillaume; but Jean?

In the evening she called Jean from his books and told him to explain the marks. The boy gazed at them for some time, then spelled out: "Honoré Perregaux, Rue St.-Martin, Paris."

Jacques raised his head angrily.

"You will be a fool if you give it up," he said sharply.

Elise did not answer, but the next day she wrapped the box carefully in her shawl and carried it to Monsieur le Curé, at St.-Valéry.

And now the days and weeks went smoothly by. Jacques recovered his good humour, and smoked, and sang, and told stories, and now and then sauntered down to the beach and caught a few fish, or made himself the centre of a group of admiring friends.

One day, as they sat down to dinner, the Curé entered.

"Bien! I am just in time," he said gaily, as they placed a chair for him at the table. "I have good news for you. The box is with its owner."

Jacques looked anything but pleased, and even Elise seemed a little embarrassed. But the Curé did not appear to notice.

"I had a letter from the owner this morning," he continued, as he took a roll of notes from his pocket. "He writes that the box is very valuable, and that the finder must accept this as a slight compensation," handing the notes to Elise. "I congratulate you, Madame Jacques. Four hundred francs is a good day's work."

Jacques caught his breath sharply and half rose to his feet; then he sank back and tried to turn off his elation in a laugh. But after the Curé's departure he allowed his enthusiasm to again break forth.

"Four hundred francs!" he cried joyously. "Four—hundred—francs! Bien! bien! It will buy me a new boat, and a seine, and two kegs of wine; and—and you can get a new dress, Elise, ma chère. Four hundred francs! Indeed, we are rich!"

"I found the box, Jacques," said Elise, quietly.

"Oui, oui! You must have a dress and—and what else, ma chère?"

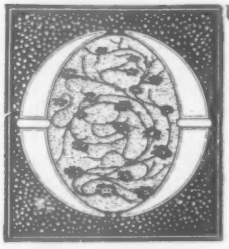
"Let me see," said Elise, counting on her fingers, "I shall use one hundred francs to buy new clothes and sabots for the children, and a dress for myself, and some hens for the hen-yard."

"Yes!" impatiently, "but the three hundred francs?"

"They are to buy a scholarship for little Jean at Beauvais. I have spoken to Monsieur le Curé about it. Three hundred francs will pay for his education at the good Home. He will have to leave us, of course; but he will come back a man. Surely, Jacques, we must do that for him."



"When the box was released she found that it was securely locked."—p. 51

THE GIFT OF THE SPIRIT

By the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., Brighton.

"If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"—St. Luke xi. 13.

OUR Lord never hesitated to employ the anthropomorphic argument in His teaching; that is, He was accustomed to lead men to a higher belief in the goodness of God by drawing attention to the best in man. This is a right and proper use of the great truth that human nobleness is a ray of the divine righteousness. A witty Frenchman once said: "In the beginning God created man in His own image; and man has ever since been returning the compliment by making God in his."

There is some truth in this caustic description of the way in which men shape the divinities to which they give their homage, but it does not, and cannot, assail the spiritual principle that the highest of which man is capable has immediate relation to, and is a demonstration of, that which is of the essence of the nature of God. The great Teacher Who spake as never man spake proceeded upon this assumption. He appealed to all the beautiful and hopeful things in human nature whenever He wished to demonstrate the love, tenderness, sympathy and compassion of our Heavenly Father, and, probably, there is no instance in the New Testament in which this peerless teaching is presented with greater effect than in the passage before us. Jesus here appeals to the idea of fatherhood; that relationship which means so much to us all—fatherhood at its best—and asks with emphasis the question to which the closing words of the sentence provide the answer: "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"

Another record of this teaching is to be found in Matthew vii. 11, but with the variation that for "Holy Spirit" we read "good things." Probably the Master used both phrases, and on the same occasion. The first evangelist has preserved the more obvious meaning, while the third, with, perhaps, a truer insight into the saying, has recorded the more spiritual declaration. The gift of the Spirit includes all other gifts. To have the gift of the Spirit is to be in possession of the heavenly wisdom which should guide all search for blessing. It is assurance of the love of God, of acceptance with God, of the presence of Christ, of the power of His salvation, and of the reality of that eternal life which begins now. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law." To have the gift of the Spirit is to be sure of God, to find Him revealed in our consciousness, and to realise Him as the nearest of all realities. To discover this is to be able to say "All things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

The means to the attainment of this rich experience is simplicity itself, if we accept our Lord's teaching: "they that ask Him." "Religion," said the author of "The Soul of a People," "is the music of the Infinite echoed from the hearts of men." It is the soul's anticipation of Heaven; it is to commune with God. Prayer is man's response. If religion is God's speech with man, prayer is man's speech with God. If you lay on the table a tuned violin and then proceed to make music with another, you will hear the same air faintly reproduced from the silent strings of the passive instrument. True prayer on earth is but the faint echo of desires that are made in Heaven. It has more of God than man in it, and there is something in every faithful petition which cannot be expressed in words. Why does a father listen with sympathy to a simple request from his child? Is it not because he is like him? Are not their hearts in union? Does he not love him? Were not their souls made for each other? We would give our hearts' best for our dear ones, and we like to be inquired of, and yet the greatest gift we can bestow upon our children is the gift of ourselves. Let them have that when fatherhood and sonship are mutually at their best and all "good things" will follow. God does just like that. Jesus said so, and it is reasonable to suppose it. One great gift of the Holy Spirit, given in response to a petition which God delights to hear, is the gift of Himself, and in that one gift is included all things else for which men ought to pray.

Some people doubt whether there is a place for prayer at all. It is a curious fact that some of those who believe most strongly in inexorable law, and some of those who believe no less strongly in Divine love, are at one in their doubt as to the value of prayer. The former will say: "All is order; there is no place for prodigy. You may pray as much as you like, but you can no more expect to affect the universal order than you can expect to alter the tides or the phases of the moon." And the latter might say—"God is love and God is wisdom. We may trust His wisdom for the action of His love. What our Father does is well. We need not pray; we need to rest."

But neither of these objections will meet the case of the ordinary, hoping, struggling, earnest-minded man who seeks for help in the things of every-day life. To the man of law he would say: "Behind your order stands my Father. Law is but the expression of the consistency of God, and He Who guides the planets in their course has, in His vast scheme of things, a place for me. These are the works of His hands, but I am the child of His heart. "I appeal from the law to the Lawgiver." To the Quietist he would also say: "The Father of Spirits has placed me here to work and aspire and love. If there be a place for service, there is a place for prayer. My God needs neither, but He will have both. Amid the problems of earth it is a solace to turn to Him in the confidence that 'no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly.'"

Prayer in and for the Holy Ghost is the prayer of safety. It is illuminative, tranquillising, comprehensive. It is the earnest of every answer to definite petition for particular things. There is an immediate as well as a deferred response to every heartfelt prayer, and that immediate response is a breath of the Holy Spirit. How often have we knelt perturbed and anxious at the mercy seat and poured forth our souls to our listening Father! Perhaps we entered upon the exercise full of sorrow and perplexity, anxiety and care, yet somehow as we have knelt we have felt a heavenly peace stealing into our souls. We have been soothed and quieted in the very act of prayer; we have risen strong and calm, although our circumstances were just what they had been before. Things were not changed in the least, but we ourselves were changed. What had taken place? Had there been any answer to that prayer which closed with "Thy will be done"? Yea, verily, and the answer was immediate; it was the gift of the Holy Spirit. To feel the presence of the Comforter was itself the earnest of the "good things" yet to be. I affirm that no true prayer has ever gone without its answer, and the answer is always larger than the prayer.

"The supplication of a righteous man availeth much" in its working. "The prayer of faith" can do mighty things. When we pray for power to serve, such power comes in the baptism of the Spirit, without which all work for Christ avails but little.

Some time ago, during the Free Church Federation Meetings in Bradford, I had the privilege of listening to an impressive address by Dr. Horton, in which we were urged to definite and earnest prayer for power in dealing with one great national vice. At the conclusion of the address, a friend turned to me and remarked, "Is there a place for such a prayer? Is not God as much in earnest about this matter as we can be—indeed more so? Why then do we pray?" The answer to the difficulty did not occur to me just at the moment, but I see it now, and we all felt it, though we could not state it then. Prayer for power in service is bound up with our experience of spiritual stewardship. We know there is such a thing; we are largely in one another's keeping. You and I have a power to affect other lives than our own; we can influence another man's character for good or for evil; we can give him pain or joy; we can lift him up or thrust him down. At the bidding of love we can do great things for those who are near and dear; our children grow up under the shadow of our personality; we are ever giving to them in some way or other, and we feel it to be right and fitting that thus it should be. I say we feel it to be right and fitting that thus it should be, but we cannot give a completely satisfying reason why it should be so; all we know is that spiritual stewardship is a fact, potent, beautiful, all-pervading. We cannot see why God should give us the charge of each others' destinies, yet so it is. This is not speculation, but simple every-day experience. We are trustees one of another and "know how to give good gifts unto our children."

Now if this be the way in which life is ordered, it is abundantly evident that where the stewardship is taken seriously love compels us to prayer. Power soon gives out; we long to do more than we can; and the higher we ourselves grow in spiritual stature, the more do we long to give ourselves in our stewardship, and the more we feel our insufficiency. Then it is that prayer comes in; when we reach the borderland of our natural power we stretch forth supplicating hands for spiritual power. "Laborare est orare," says an old proverb; we might invert it, and say with equal truth, "To pray is to labour." Praying is drawing upon the Unseen for the sake of our spiritual stewardship; it is an enlargement of our powers with the enlargement of our ideal. The mere desire to give good gifts awakens the desire to pray for that higher gift which increases ours—the gift of the Holy Ghost. When with the naked eye we survey the vast expanse of the vault of heaven, there are many worlds hidden from us which become visible when we employ the aid of a telescope. A railway train will take us from Brighton to London in a little over an hour, whereas to walk the same distance would take many hours. In olden times, even monarchs deemed themselves fortunate if, at a heavy outlay, they could obtain fabrics which to-day are at the disposal of every man who can spare a few pence. The difference has been made by the invention of machinery. All these things are but extensions of our own natural powers—the telescope is a bigger eye; the railway train swifter feet; the complex machine a stronger and more cunning hand. They are not substitutes for our own natural powers—to use them, we must still have eye and foot and hand; nor are they adaptations of something not present in the world before. They are simply demand notes upon the Invisible, and, having learned the secret of issuing these demand notes, the area of our material activity is immeasurably increased.

Here, then, is a demonstration of the place of prayer in the life of the soul. Spiritual stewardship is a fact, whether we rise to the height of it or not; and if we do rise nobly to the work, prayer becomes our demand note upon the Unseen. It is not only for our own soul's good that we pray, we pray because we love to serve. As said the dying Arthur in "The Idylls of the King":

> "More things are wrought by prayer
> Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
> Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
> For what are men better than sheep or goats
> That nourish a blind life within the brain,
> If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
> Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
> For so the whole round earth is every way
> Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

This is simple and literal truth; it is not only Scripture, but experience. Some of the best workers in the world to-day are those who know best how to pray. Mr. Moody used to tell an anecdote of his visit to this country in 1874. During his mission at Dundee, he was asked to visit a bed-ridden Christian. He went, and received a greater blessing than he gave. "I guess," he remarked, in his quaint, blunt fashion, "that when the angels pass over Dundee, they stop at that house for refreshment." Many a bed of pain, many a seemingly limited and ineffective life, has been the scene of a glorious activity for God by the willing and faithful employment of prayer. A near-sighted man can see through a telescope, a cripple can ride in a railway train, and a child can work a mighty engine. If we only knew how much good is done by those who can do little but pray! Oh, sad and discouraged hearts, pray on! Oh, servants of God, children of Divine love, who know what it is to agonise like the Master for the sake of some for whom we can do little but pray, never falter, never fear! "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"

Nor is this all. The Holy Spirit is indeed given to him who prays; given, not only for service, but for life and joy. If you are a Christian, you ought to be glad in the Lord, and as a child of the All-Father you have a right to your joy. In praying for others you do something for yourself; spiritual power is a real thing and so is spiritual comfort.

We need much for daily life—guidance in perplexity, healing in sorrow, stillness amid the frets and anxieties of the world, assurance of our nearness to our Divine Master; all these things are included in the gift of the Spirit. Be Spirit-filled and Spirit-guided and Spirit-blest. Here is your promise—take it to the ever-faithful One: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"

CHAPTER I.

IN A PARVISE CHAMBER.*

"TOLERANCE is a virtue——" began Claude Winwood; but he was promptly interrupted by his companion, Basil Pierpoint, curate, at present in sole charge of the parish.

"Tolerance—a virtue?"

"Yes," continued the other, "a virtue."

He paused, for here the sunset occupied his attention.

"I cannot think how you can name such a negative quality as tolerance a virtue. It generally means the absence of all endeavour to improve things, laxity of view, dispiritedness—in short, want of all moral backbone."

They had reached the churchyard stile, and Pierpoint lightly vaulted it. Winwood seemed in no hurry to follow or take up the argument.

"That old fellow," he remarked, nodding to the west, "is eternally setting and rising. Every second of time he has been at it since the beginning, and yet, I suppose, always manages a fresh effect."

The effect on this evening, and in the corner of Devonshire which held the parish of Lynton St. Maurice, was very splendid. It was as if a veil of golden gossamer had fallen over everything, tor and stream, village and church tower.

"Better come in and see the church before the glow fades," urged Pierpoint. "The effect through the west window is very fine."

"You don't want to reform the sunset, do you?" asked his friend, turning round lazily. He was a large-limbed man with a slight stoop and moved slowly.

"No, I am content to let that be. But I do hope to reform a few individuals, or, rather, a few customs here. Just think what I found old Mrs. Hill, the butt-woman, doing, when I arrived here! Knitting in the church-porch! 'He was cooler like, they porch,' she replied to my remonstrance."

"Truly terrible," responded Winwood gravely, "and in winter?"

"Well, I have only been here a month, you know, but that occurred to me, and I have found out her custom. The Rector keeps his surplus books in the parvise chamber."

"I see." Winwood narrowed his short-sighted eyes, looking up at the building. "You have a parvise chamber, and—is that a second one?"

"Yes; ours is the only church in the region

* "Now a parvise chamber is a room builded over the porch, the which is reached by a winding stairway from within the church. And the name thereof cometh from Paradise, seeing that the parvise chamber looketh out on the paradise or garden surrounding the church."

round that has a double one. The lower of the two is lined with the Rector's books, as I said; and he keeps a fire there all the winter. He says it is for the books. Mrs. Hill, however, is convinced it is for her use, and, I really believe, even boils her tea-kettle on it."

"Be thankful she doesn't fry herrings. Always look out for the blessings, my dear fellow," observed Winwood, turning towards the church porch.

"Not that way," cried Pierpoint, pulling out a key. "We must go in by the vestry now."

"Why! The church is open."

"Open?" exclaimed Pierpoint. "Well, this is too bad. Mrs. Hill has strict orders to lock up the church every day after service. I really must do something drastic!" He strode into the church with knitted brows. "That old woman has no sense of responsibility!"

Winwood, fascinated by a boss, lingered a moment in the porch.

"We have no end of tramps here," pursued the angry voice.

"Perhaps Mrs. Hill has a friend in the second-hand book line," suggested the calmer tones from the porch. "Hadn't we better examine the parvise chamber library first?"

"I shouldn't be a bit surprised to find some books gone," exclaimed the curate-in-charge. "Take care; it's dark here."

He hastily mounted the winding stairs, Winwood following him.

The stone steps were narrow, and so dark the eyes had to get accustomed to the gloom. At a turn of the spiral they reached a small lobby and a door, while the stairs wound on above.

"Now we'll see!" exclaimed the curate, and threw open the door.

An abrupt silence followed his words, and he himself stood stock-still.

Winwood looked over his shoulder, catching sight of the startled face of a girl. She sat at the square oaken table in the middle of the room, directly facing the door—young, and of decided beauty of colouring. What Winwood specially remembered afterwards was the mass of her loosened burnished hair.

At sight of the two men she half-started from her seat, with one backward turn of her arm sweeping together all the volume of her rippled russet locks.

Basil Pierpoint pulled himself together after that second's surprise, then advanced into the room.

"May I ask—are you—are you studying here?"

For the table was strewn with papers covered with writing. These the girl now gathered hastily together. She glanced up at the young clergyman.

"Studying? Yes."

"May I again ask, how does that come about?"

"That I should study?" with a haughty glance. "Really, sir——"

"No, no; not that of course, but that you should study here?"

The papers were all gathered together now, and the girl put her hand on them. It had taken a few moments, as she had but one hand to do it; her left arm was closely pressed to her side, keeping guard over the great roll of rebellious hair.

Winwood, from the background, perceived that the unbound hair was a cause of embarrassment to her. A second's silence, then she demanded in her turn:

"And may I ask by what right you set me these questions?"

"My name is Basil Pierpoint. I am curate of this parish, and in sole charge at present. You will therefore excuse my asking who gave permission to use this church or any part of it for unauthorised purposes. Has the Rector granted——"

"No; Mrs. Hill gave me leave."

"Mrs. Hill? The butt-woman! Allow me to assure you that Mrs. Hill has no jurisdiction in this church."

By this time the girl's cheeks were crimson with indignation. Winwood could not forbear breaking in:

"I am sure you do not mean to disturb this lady now. Had we not better see the second parvise chamber?"

The girl turned on him her smouldering glance. The angry spark quenched at sight of his kindly look.

"Thank you," she said quickly; "I should like to be left alone."

She was horribly conscious that she had kicked off her shoes, and they were somewhere under the table.

"I am certainly sorry to disturb you," Pierpoint said, with lofty politeness, "especially if you are a friend of Mrs. Hill's; but discipline must be maintained. I wish you a good evening." And, head erect, he followed Winwood out of the room and up the winding stair. "This is the second parvise chamber," he began; "very unusual to have two, you know. A most unusual and irregular proceeding to keep the church open after hours, and to leave it in irresponsible hands like that girl. This window is admired for its lintels."

"She is very pretty," remarked Winwood, his back to the window; "such fresh colouring."

"But she has got no right to be here. There is one scrap of old glass here. The Rector had the plain put in to keep out the rain. What was she studying? This mantelpiece is interesting."

"How old do you think?"

Winwood's eyes were on the floor.

"Mantelpiece? Fourteenth century, I believe."

"No——"

"Oh—girl? I have no idea—looked like a school-girl. Have you observed the roof?"

"Yes," replied Winwood, still gazing fixedly at the floor. "She looks too grown up for a school-girl. A stranger to these parts, I suppose, as you don't know her?"

"Mrs. Hill has a niece, who is a pupil teacher in a Board school somewhere. Very likely it is she."

"Nonsense, my dear fellow! That girl is a lady. Did you not hear her speak?"

"I didn't notice much. She seemed to have lost her temper."

"Tempers were lying around," Winwood said drily.

"Have you seen all here? Shall we go down?"

"Yes! I have seen everything here."

As they passed the door of the lower room, it was seen to stand ostentatiously open. Pierpoint stepped in. Winwood peered round the corner.

"Clean vanished!" he said, "and taken her hair with her too. Can't you find a glass slipper or something?"

Pierpoint was examining the closely packed shelves of leather-bound volumes. But the place was in perfect order and the appearance of the dishevelled student might have been taken for an unreal vision.

"I thought I recognised the binding of Butler on the table. But he's there all right," muttered the curate.

"Ha! I knew she would leave something!" cried the other triumphantly, emerging from under the table, whence he fished up an envelope. "The plot thickens." Pierpoint turned round quickly. "'To Miss E. Retallack, care of Mrs. Hill, Fore Street, Lynton St. Maurice, South Devon,'" read Winwood from the envelope.

"There! did I not tell you she was Mrs. Hill's niece? Let me see."

Winwood handed him the envelope.

"There's a letter in it," he remarked. "It may be from an accomplice, relative to the secularisation of all church-property in England. Don't you think it our duty to read it?"

"I'll take it to her, to-morrow," Pierpoint replied, paying no heed to his friend's banter.

"Well, don't rouse her, though her eyes do flash a fine fire; come home unsinged, I entreat."

CHAPTER II.

FOUND: A VILLAIN.

THE same sun, at his setting, shone obliquely into the small sitting-room of Mrs. Hill's cottage at the foot of Fore Street. There were two occupants of the room—one, a fragile-looking girl, reclined in an armchair, the most comfortable the room possessed, which, however, is not saying much. Her soft smooth brown hair, her quiet grey dress, with touches of lavender here and there, gave her the air of a half-emancipated Quaker. Her gaze was directed to the distant tors framed by the window pane. Opposite to her—Alice Kenyon—sat her friend, Judith Kyle, a contrast to her in every particular, in her short-cropped, stiff black hair, her upright and unbending attitude, her garments made to clothe and not to dress her.

"Judith!" cried her friend suddenly, "you are actually doing nothing!"

"No," was the reply in a short, decisive voice.

"Positively nothing! Confess, you are for once really unmitigatedly idle!"

"No; I am thinking."

"And your thoughts?"

"They are not fit for publication yet. Are you tired?"

"Not at all. The walk did me good. I shall soon be in condition to tire you both out."

Judith got up abruptly, and looked out of the window.

"I wonder where Evelyn is, and what mischief she is at?"

"The holidays are only four days old. She cannot be at anything desperate so soon."

"Perhaps not; it is only when they begin to pall that she seeks for new sensations."

Not long afterwards, a moral whirlwind, in the person of the lady in question, swept into the room, flinging down a satchel and pile of books on a side table. Her cheeks were a bright red, and her whole being, from shoes to sailor hat, quivered with defiance.

"Well," cried her friends in a breath, "what is it?"

"I've found him," she cried, throwing her hat on one chair and her gloves on another.

"Him? Whom?"

"Villain for my story. Perfect. A whited sepulchre."

Judith, who had picked up the hat and gloves to put them away, sat down again, and Alice turned a smiling sympathy to the new-comer.

"Where, and when, and who?"

"Just now—in church—curate."

"In church?" from Judith. "What took you there?"

"Beside the point, my dear Judy. Events first—in the historic present—then causes, lastly results. No wonder you always plough, my girls. Now I know Alice's question before she puts it. Yes, Alice, he is clean-shaven and quite irreproachable in attire, besides being nice-looking (I think), and looks like a gentleman. But inwardly! Well, were it not for Magna Charta, I should be in chains by now."

"Begin at the beginning," Alice entreated.

"Had you any right to be there?"

"Judith! Go to! A man is innocent in English law until you prove him guilty."

"That is no answer to my question."

"Oh, Judy!" laughed Alice. "Do let her get on. No wonder she is always published in three volumes, if her novels are as prolix as her descriptions."

Evelyn beamed.

"Catching sight of the startled face of a girl."—p. 59.

What mischief were you at? Rubbing the brasses?

"Rubbing brasses? No, indeed, though I make no doubt I shall soon have to waste some valuable time at that. I was only writing my story in the little room over the church porch. You haven't been in that little room yet. It has bookshelves all round, and a most delicious steady table in the middle of the room, lattice-windows, and such a comfortable chair. I reconnoitred it yesterday and resolved to occupy it to-day."

"How sweet of you to say 'always'! The word is not usually applied to a unique event. I suppose you use it proleptically. Now, children," with a sudden change of manner, stretching her feet straight out before her as she spoke. "Now I will tell you the whole tale as straight as a die and as concise as Whitaker. I was reading in said room, shoes off, hair down, hairpins all in a row on the mantelpiece, everything just as usual—much interested in heroine's doings—when suddenly door bursts open, and two men dart in! 'What are you at?' cries first (whom you will instantly recognise as afore-mentioned curate, hereinafter named 'Villain of Piece'). 'And why are you here without my leave?' Free-born Briton (I) rises to her feet, expostulates mildly, names Mrs. Hill as reference. Villain of Piece is pleased to know I am friend of Mrs. Hill, all the same desires my instant departure. Whereupon nice man in background urges that conquered party (me) be allowed to march out with honours of war. 'All right,' cries Villain, 'only you must go!' Door closes—no, slams—on their retreating figures. I, all the time, presenting a calm exterior. And, if only my hair had been up," she cried, starting suddenly to her feet, "wouldn't I have spoken my mind to that young man! But to be caught with shoes off and hair down robbed me of a dignified exit. So I had to be cold and merely quiet."

"I should like to hear the curate's account," put in Judith, drily.

"I have related all the circumstances exactly as they took place," cried Evelyn emphatically.

Which throws some light on the value of evidence.

A further light might be thrown by the conversation which took place in the library at the Rectory that same evening after dinner.

Winwood, making a tour of inspection of the book-shelves, turned to remark:

"Your Rector knows how to buy books, I see."

"Yes. It seems characteristic of the parish. There is a good library at Lyntonstowe."

"Who lives there?"

"The Retallacks, the Squire's people."

"Retallack? Why, that is the name of our student of this afternoon."

"So it is." Pierpoint got up as he spoke, and took the letter from the mantelpiece. "Strange it should be the same name. But she will hardly be a relation, if she is staying with Mrs. Hill."

"She is a very pretty girl anyhow."

"Do you know," pursued Pierpoint, his head on one side. "I haven't the least recollection of her features. I remember she was very angry and got very red. That is all."

"Ah! that is a pity. I had time to observe, you see, feeling no stern call to reprove her."

"Well, you will allow she had no right to be in the church at that time, not to speak of making a schoolroom of it."

Silence for a space, Winwood burying his short-sighted face in a book.

Pierpoint turned the envelope over again, then pushed it behind an ornament on the mantelpiece. Soon Winwood returned to his seat, bringing his book with him. Pierpoint glanced at it.

"I believe there are some old French books at Lyntonstowe."

Winwood looked up quickly.

"Trouvère or Troubadour?"

"Oh, that I don't know. I am absolutely ignorant on the subject. But if you would care to go, I would take you. Mr. Burton took me, and, although I have not yet met the Retallacks, I have a right of way there, so to speak."

"Are they not at home?"

"No. There is only a mother and daughter now, I understand, and they are almost always away. There is an old man there, however, who seems to live in the library. I believe he was secretary or man-of-business to old Colonel Retallack. He knows every book in the place, and is entertaining at times. But he is a bit off his head, I fancy. He knows all the family history, too, and needs but little inducement to enlarge upon it."

"Perhaps he will tell us who Miss E. Retallack is."

"Perhaps. I am going to take that letter to her to-morrow. Shall I ask her who she is?" smiled Pierpoint.

"Well, it would be the directest way; but unfortunately civilised peoples have abandoned it."

"Mrs. Hill," began Evelyn Retallack abruptly, as that lady cleared away the supper of her three lodgers. "Mrs. Hill, who is the young clergyman you keep in this village?"

Mrs. Hill paused, crumb-tray and brush in hand.

"Ah now, well now, miss, Mr. Pierpoint 'e's the curate, Mr. Burton, 'e's the Rector, 'e is. But 'e's furrin, this-a-way, 'e is."

"Then Mr. Pierpoint is the clergyman I met this evening. He came and turned me out of that little room in the church, where you said I might write."

"Ah now, miss, well now, did 'e? He do take on about they things. Tubbe sure." Mrs. Hill paused to make a dash at the crumbs on the cloth. "Well now, miss, 'e's young, you see, jest young, an' 'e can't 'elp bein' a bit foolish-like. They soart always is, tubbe sure."

"I wish he heard her," Evelyn said under her breath to Judith. Aloud: "And has he been here long?"

"Oh, now, miss, well no, 'e jest come when the Rector 'e 'ad to gō away furrin, for 'is 'ealth, miss, yes. And 'e's young, but 'e's good, oh yes, 'e's good, only a bit too perticler-like, not meanin' it, you see, and lives away to Lunnon." Here a fresh attack on the crumbs. "But now, Mr. Burton, 'e's only perticler 'bout 'is books, 'e is. There now."

As the door shut on Mrs. Hill, Evelyn asked, "How would you translate 'now' as used by Mrs. Hill? Nunc or jam?"

CHAPTER III

WITH HONOURS OF WAR.

THERE is a little strip of garden at the back of Mrs. Hill's house, and at the extreme end of it is a kind of summer-house, then a gate leading into Windy Lane. In this arbour sat Evelyn Retallack, her hair, as usual, all about her and her papers before her.

Judith remonstrated in vain on this untidy habit. Young women of one-and-twenty had no business to let their hair down, she maintained.

"But if you couldn't think, Judy, when your hair was up?"

"To beg'n with, it is nonsense to say you cannot think as well with it up as down——"

"Judy," raising a warning forefinger, "away from the point, as usual. I said if you couldn't think, and I used the indicative mood."

Judith shook her head.

"I have no time to waste arguing with you. I must see about Alice's beef-tea. All I know is, you are disgracefully untidy. Here—at least, take your hairpins with you!"

"Such nonsense!" Judith exclaimed afterward to Alice. "She says all her imagination goes unless her hair is loose and hanging about her."

"It is only a fad," Alice urged gently. "Don't mind her. She's young, like Mr. —— the curate."

In the summer-house, then, sat Evelyn and wrote rapidly, all engrossed in her subject.

A click at the gate and a step inside, a shadow on her page.

She looked up, then sprang to her feet, annoyance visible in every feature.

There was "that curate," hat in hand, bidding her "good-morning," naming her "Miss Retallack." How did he know? But that was speedily answered, for he held out the lost letter in his hand.

"I found this in—in the church——"

"Oh, thank you."

This time she did not trouble to gather up her hair, and now he took time to notice it, and to observe her appearance altogether—bright dark eyes, straight brows, small straight nose and curved red lips: decidedly a very pretty girl. But he had to say something:

"I am sorry that I had to ask you to leave the parvise chamber yesterday, but——"

"Pray do not mention it. I understand you have the cure of souls in this parish, and that, no doubt, includes my expulsion from church."

She dipped her pen in the ink, as if to indicate that the interview was at an end. But, though he flushed quickly, he controlled himself. He had to show her reason, to bend her consent to his will.

"Not from church, please. Certainly not from the church services. But," in a final manner, "well—it is a matter of conscience. You are studying?"

"Yes."

"Can I help you in any way? I have all the Rectory library at my disposal. I live there while the Rector is away. And, if I could be of any assistance to you, I should be very glad." She looked at him. He saw he had scored a point. "It is really a very good collection of books on the whole. I do not know, of course, what examination you are going in for," glancing at her papers, "but I think you might find something useful for most branches of study."

His tone was most conciliatory, and his voice (she had to confess it) very pleasant and well-bred. A wee smile came to the corners of her mouth.

"Thank you. Yes; I think you might be useful to me in my studies."

"I shall be most happy," he replied eagerly. "I have coached my cousin for an examination."

"It's not—one isn't exactly examined in my study, but it is kind of you to offer to lend me books. I have read all Mrs. Hill's by now, and I did not bring any with me."

"Ah, yes, Mrs. Hill," with a hardly visible stiffening of manner, "she is a friend of yours. She has mentioned her niece to me."

"Niece?" with a freezing stare. "Mrs. Hill is—our landlady."

The man was insufferable. She began to gather up her papers with a quick gesture of anger.

Now, the Fates who had watched over Basil Pierpoint's lot had liberally bestowed on him many good things: a goodly person, a well-furnished mind, a fair competency; but one little gift had been withholden. He saw his tactlessness on this occasion, however, and hastened to atone.

"I beg your pardon—of course I did not mean—your name alone, Miss Retallack. I have not yet met Mrs. Retallack of Lyntonstowe, but——"

She interrupted again.

"Neither am I——" then stopped. "Allow me to wish you good-morning, Mr. Pierpoint." And, head in the air, she went up the garden towards the house.

He was thus left apparently master of the field, yet Pierpoint knew he had suffered defeat. It must seem so like impertinent curiosity, and it was not that at all; only the feeling so strong within him that he was responsible for everyone in his parish, and should know sufficient about every soul therein to put each in the right place in his mental horizon.

The Reverend Basil's course next led him to a parishioner who specially interested him—a hopeless case, a young man dying of an injured spine. The pleased smile which greeted the curate's entrance, the gratitude with which his ministrations were received, those priestly offices themselves, raising his thoughts to highest things, soothed his spirit. He forgot his rebuff of the morning.

But he had not done with his new parishioners yet.

Going up the village street, he met Miss Alicia Baird, a lady whom one might in no wise pass by. All the fifty years of her life Miss Alicia had had plenty of time to do all she wanted to do; hence to consider time as a thing of marketable value never entered her head. Basil Pierpoint had several more visits on his list for that morning, but when Miss Alicia moved her basket and umbrella from her right hand to her already laden left he knew he was in for it.

"How do you do, Miss Baird?"

"Oh, very well—very well, Mr. Pierpoint. A touch of rheumatism in my left foot, a slight earache and—I think—the remains of a cold, cold in the head, you know. But we must be patient, yes."

The only way to be free of Miss Baird was to see her safe into some house. Therefore:

"May I carry your basket for you?"

"Thank you, yes; I am just going to see Mary Benning. I fear, poor girl! she is not long for this world. You, too, have been paying visits, I suppose, this morning?"

"Yes; I have been to see James Blake."

"Ah, yes. And have you yet been to see those ladies lodging at Mrs. Hill's? To-day is Friday, you know, and if they are not looked up in time they may not come to church on Sunday."

"Who—what lodgers has Mrs. Hill?" he asked in a level voice.

"Three very nice girls—governesses, I should think—quiet, nice girls. One seems very delicate. I mean to take some beef-tea or jelly for her soon. I could leave it without any name, you know."

"Do you know the names of these ladies, Miss Baird?"

"Well, I did hear it, but I fear I have forgotten. Stay, will you be so kind as to hold this and this. Perhaps I shall find it."

And, somewhat to his dismay, she handed Pierpoint an umbrella, a shawl, an embroidered work-bag, a Bible, and a paper bag of cakes. Where these things had been concealed about her person until now, the young man could not conceive.

"It must be in my pocket-book, in my pocket, my inside pocket, you know. But wait one minute." And Miss Alicia skipped into the little grocer's shop they were passing at the moment.

Pierpoint, thus burthened and a bit bewildered, stood still a moment, then glanced up, just in time to see Miss Retallack and a slight girl pass by together. Miss Retallack at once averted her head, but not before he had seen her laughter-brimming eyes. Even if she had condescended to notice him, he thought, with vexation, it would not have been possible to take off his hat with hands thus occupied. The other girl turned a grave and kindly glance on him.

Miss Baird reappeared.

"I am so sorry, Mr. Pierpoint, but I keep my note-book in my petticoat pocket, you see, and I can never get at it in the street, naturally, which is very awkward at times. And, indeed, I often say to Selina that I shall move it, but she is so deaf, you see, she cannot hear. Thank you, now the reticule; thank you"—and she proceeded to stow her property in unexplained corners of her person under her cloak. "So we have never come to any conclusion about that pocket. No, thank you, I can really manage them all quite well. The basket is quite enough for you to carry, especially as you must keep it quite straight for there is broth in it." Pierpoint waited with a set smile. He was not anxious now to know the name of Mrs. Hill's lodgers. "I couldn't find that notebook after all, wherever it is. Do you keep note-books, Mr. Pierpoint?"

And so on, until they reached the house which was Miss Baird's destination and Pierpoint was set free.

He certainly was not going, just yet at least, to call on the Misses Retallack! Later, however, he came to a better mind. The sweet face of the elder girl came back on his memory, and, it was his duty. Yes, he would go and would very particularly inquire for Miss Retallack, and he fervently hoped, he told himself, that her younger sister wouldn't be at home.

CHAPTER IV.

AN OLIVE-BRANCH.

THE library at Lyntonstowe is a long and lofty room, lighted by windows north and south, lined throughout with books. It is a room of cold and forbidding aspect. Not even its south window and a flood of noontide sunshine can make anything other than gloomy and oppressive its dark shelves, dark floor, dark massive furniture. To-day the south sun peeped in but faintly. The only thing he could find to shine back at him in any satisfactory manner was the bald top of an old man's head. The little hair he had was grey, his clothes were grey, his face was grey. He stooped over a large book which lay open on the table before him. He turned each leaf slowly, passing his hand over the open page. But he read nothing, merely turned leaf after leaf. The sound of an opening door made him look up, then he slowly straightened himself as Pierpoint advanced with outstretched hand. After greeting him, Pierpoint turned to present Winwood.

"He held out the lost letter."—p. 63.

"A friend of mine," he added, "who has a fancy for old French literature. Perhaps you will have something to show him, Mr. Snell."

"We may, Mr. Pierpoint, we may." His voice was low and toneless. He took up a piece of worn black ribbon which lay on the table and carefully laid it in his book to mark the place. "French books? Yes, there are French books." He closed the large volume on the table. "I looked through one shelf last spring; but it is slow work."

Winwood was soon scanning the shelves where the French books lived. He noticed, to his surprise, that on one shelf all the books were put in upside down. He drew Mr. Snell's attention to this, and, as he put back the volume he had drawn out, placed it in its normal position.

"No, no," cried the old man; "oh dear! how could I ever remember if I did not turn them upside down! I have tried every way; I am always trying to remember what books I have searched, and I think this is the very best plan."

"Searched?" broke in Pierpoint. "Are you looking for something, Mr. Snell?"

"Of course—always—ever since he left me and—but I must not tell you any more, for it is a secret, and not my own secret, the secret of a dead man."

Thereupon he seemed to fall into a brown study. Winwood, looking at the quaint form was irresistibly reminded of the White Knight in "Alice." The contrast between the bowed old man and the alert young figure at his side, the fresh, clear countenance of Pierpoint, and the slack, withered features of Mr. Snell, struck the onlooker as almost painful. When we are young, it is so hard to believe we shall ever become old.

After a little, when Winwood and the librarian were deep in the catalogue, Pierpoint said he would leave them now, as he had much to do, and Winwood could find his way home alone, could he not?

Yes; he had a great deal to do, he reflected as he went quickly down the drive. There was old Mrs. Harrison to be visited, a truant chorister to be reproved, the finishing touches to be put to his sermon, and—he had to call on Miss Retallack. This was undoubtedly the least palatable duty, therefore the one he would perform first.

A steady half-hour's walk brought him through the park and over the bridge to the end of the village street where dwelt Mrs. Hill.

In Mrs. Hill's front sitting-room reigned peace and silence. Alice was knitting as she lay on the sofa; Judith reading the newspaper, very upright, beside her; Evelyn, seated on the fender-stool, scribbling diligently. A second more, and a bolt fell on this serenity. The door creaked, opened, and Mrs. Hill's indecisive voice remarked, "Miss Retallack, Mr. Pierpoint as would like to see you—yes—now."

Evelyn started to her feet, and her papers fell in a shower. Could she never escape that man? But the man was already in the room, and, without a glance at her, went straight up to Alice with outstretched hand and smile of welcome.

"I have not long learnt of your arrival, Miss Retallack," he was saying. "Perhaps I ought to apologise for not having called before."

Alice had risen, and was greeting him with her kindliest smile. Then she turned and introduced "Miss Kyle."

Pierpoint made a mental note of this, the third lady—a cousin, no doubt, perhaps a maiden aunt. (This young man was extremely stupid in computation of age.)

Evelyn had gathered up her papers and laid them on the fender-stool. Now Mr. Pierpoint turned to her, a slight hesitation in his manner.

"I—think I have seen this Miss Retallack before——" he adventured.

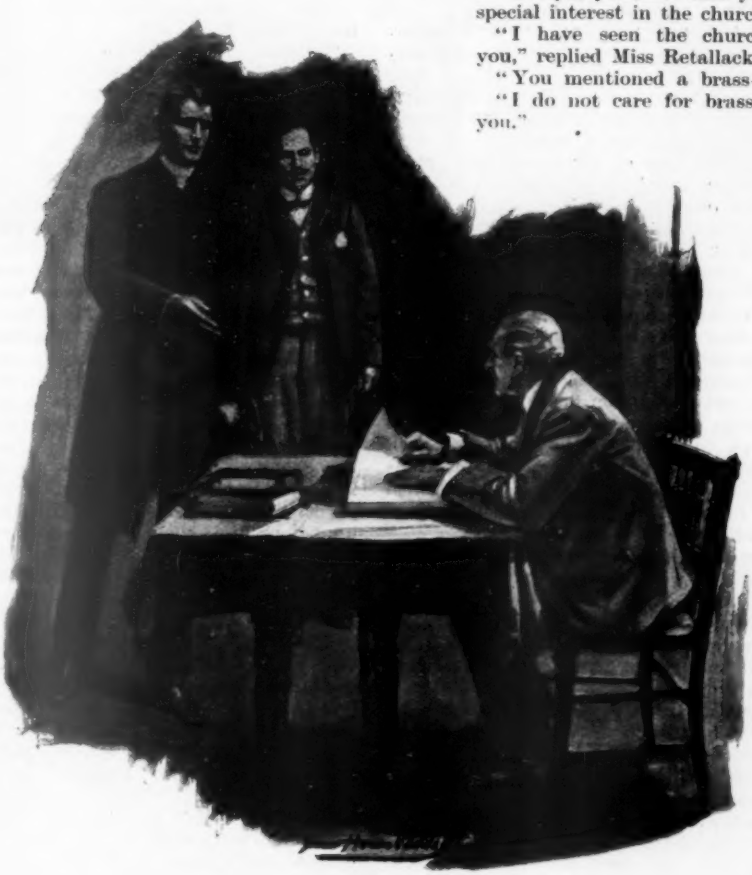
Miss Retallack bowed, and resumed her seat on the fender-stool.

His hand fell to his side.

Alice threw a small, reproachful glance at the girl. She threw back her head a little haughtily.

"There is only one Miss Retallack here," Alice's pleasant voice came in. "Miss Kyle and I—Alice Kenyon—are her friends."

"I am so sorry. I thought you and Miss Retallack were sisters."



"Oh, no; only friends. We are here for our holidays."

"Holidays?"

Evelyn's back grew stiffer. Now this detestable curate would begin his stream of questions! But Alice's kindly nature came to his assistance. She felt instinctively that a strict sense of duty had caused this visit. She would save him any interrogations.

"We are high school mistresses," she said, "and we have come to spend our holidays here this summer. We like it so much. It is so restful after the turmoil of London."

"Pierpoint advanced with outstretched hand."

"Is it not?" he responded eagerly. "I have been here only a month myself, but I quite love the place already. And the church——" A slight pause.

"The church is very beautiful, is it not? I have not explored it yet."

"I hope you will let me take you over it. I assure you I shall make an excellent guide! I have learnt it all off by heart."

They smiled at each other, and his smile was a revelation to Evelyn, looking on. Her mental vision had always brought him up with a scowl on his brow. Here he was beaming at Alice, and she at him, as if they were the oldest friends in the world.

"Thank you; that will be delightful. We should love to have it all explained to us. Should we not, Judith?"

"Yes." Judith never wasted words.

"Evelyn, you said once you took a special interest in the church——"

"I have seen the church, thank you," replied Miss Retallack coldly.

"You mentioned a brass——"

"I do not care for brasses, thank you."

Pierpoint was looking at the girl. He would make another effort.

"There are some rather interesting brasses, Miss Retallack, of your own name——"

"Thank you; I do not find the church of Lynton St. Maurice in any way interesting."

He coloured quickly.

"Have you a good Sunday school, Mr. Pierpoint?" interposed Alice.

"No; I grieve to say it is not very flourishing. There are not many here to work it up. Miss—the lady of the Manor is away from home. She, I understand, is its mainstay. You are interested in teaching, Miss Kenyon?"

"It is my profession," she smiled. "Would you care for a little help for the next few weeks? I am not up to much work, but——"

"Mr. Pierpoint, please say no," cried Judith, with a rasp in her voice.

"Judith! I am ever so much stronger. And I like it so much. Do let me, Mr. Pierpoint!"

The young man looked at her critically. No, he could not say she looked very robust; but she would be such a help.

"May I send her a few girls some week evening, Miss Kyle? Miss Retallack used to teach them on Thursdays."

"Miss Retallack?" "Evelyn?" from both the others in astonishment.

"Oh, I mean Miss Elinor Retallack. All this parish and property belongs to her."

"How strange that it should be the same name as yours, Evelyn! Are they——"

"One cannot help one's name," interrupted Evelyn, with irritation in her voice. "Retallack is not uncommon here in the West."

Alice again came to the rescue, bringing the visitor back to details of the Sunday school. When he rose to go, very cordial farewells passed between him and Alice; with Judith he sank to cooler zones, then he turned to Miss Retallack.

"Excuse me," he cried, and darted into the hall, returning with three books in his hand, "I hope you will not have read all these," and proffered his peace-offering to Evelyn.

A sudden smile lit that lady's face.

"Oh, thank you! How good of you to remember!"

"I hope I have not chosen too much amiss, and there are plenty more."

The pressure of the hand she gave him was warm and firm.

When he was safely gone, she announced triumphantly:

"Stevenson, Stanley Weyman, and oh—Anthony! An Anthony Hope I have never read. There, my children, there's a book apiece for you. Anthony I keep for myself."

"Did he offer you these books before? How kind of him!"

"Is it not? Only—it's a little disconcerting. You see, I have been making a particularly close study of him as he and you, Alice, were exchanging vows of eternal friendship, and I became more than ever convinced that he is just the person I want for my story, having changed his brown hair and eyes to coal-black locks and fiery orbs—and now how can I go on portraying in deepest dye a man who lends me nice books?"

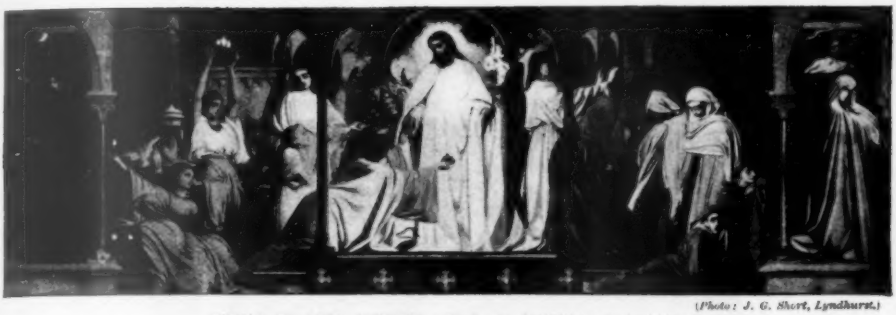
"I don't know how you can square it with your conscience to put the poor man in a story at all. Only, fortunately, the resemblance will be so slight that nobody will recognise it."

"Slight! Wait till you read it, Judy!"

Head bent forward, and at a great pace, strode home the Reverend Basil. Miss Kenyon was a very nice girl. He was very fortunate to have secured her aid in the parish. She was evidently very thorough and very good. (Winwood was right: Miss Retallack was very pretty. What a difference a smile made in a face, and what a very frank shake-hands!) But he had got to think of that class and Miss Kenyon. Yes, he was quite sure she was just the person to take it. Bessie Carew must be informed, and Annie Matthews; and——(What beautiful hair the girl had! How glad she was to get the books! He had evidently chosen well. Perhaps she would come over and see the Rectory library herself one day, and——) He shook himself together. Well, there was Bessie and Annie, as aforesaid, and the cobbler's daughter, whose name he had forgotten. He took a rapid survey of his parish and the faces of the girls therein rose up before him—some plain, some pretty, but all vacuous or unfinished. How different!—Yes, there was no help for it. Some thoughts must think themselves out, or one's head aches. Evelyn Retallack had certainly a fascinating little face, and most expressive. He had seen it surprised, indignant, angry, freezing, observant, interested, mischievous—yes, that was a very mischievous glance once, whatever she meant by it—all the gamut over again, and then such a frank and friendly glance at the end. He hoped that would prove the key-note.

"Halloo! Don't run into me, man!"

"Why—Winwood—oh, you are back." Together they turned in at the Rectory gates. "Well, did you get much information out of old Snell?"



"Regarding the Languedoc, not much; regarding the Retallack family and their curious history, a good deal."

"Really," coming to a dead stop, "and this Miss Retallack—Evelyn—is she one of them?"

"Come into the house, and I'll tell you all about it." [END OF CHAPTER FOUR.]

PICTURES OF THE PARABLES.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

(Photo: J. G. Short, Lyndhurst.)

FRESCO BY LORD LEIGHTON, P.R.A., IN LYNDHURST CHURCH.

THE narrative of the Gospels has, without doubt, inspired more pictorial subjects than any other that was ever written. The story of our Lord, from His birth at Bethlehem to His ascension, with almost every intervening recorded incident, has provided the painter, from the earliest days of Christian art down to the present, with themes for his brush. The greatest masterpieces which the world possesses, the works of the early Italian and Flemish painters, of the giants of the Renaissance, of the painters of Germany and Spain, and many of the finest productions of modern art are those dealing with New Testament subjects. Methods of painting have changed, the scope of art has widened and extended to such a degree that it now embraces everything that is even faintly suggestive of beauty; but far above all else in the force of their appeal to the eye and sentiment the great religious works of the old masters stand supreme in the art history of the world. Their sincere simplicity and their austere beauty reveal the devotion and earnestness of the artists by whom they were painted. The effect on the minds of the ordinary people of these noble works—or at least of the earliest of them—is recorded in the story of the triumphal procession in which Cimabue's great picture figured in Florence. Amid the tumult of art sensationalism of to-day these works afford the thinking student a relief both to mind and eye: their restfulness of composition and colour are refreshing and invigorating. We can experience when looking at them the peace of soul which is typified in them.

(By permission of Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd.)

"THEY ALL SLUMBERED AND SLEPT."

(By J. J. Tissot.)

The subjects of the parables did not appeal to these early artists: the art of illustration was one of development. The facts of Christ's life appealed to them first of all, and their efforts to represent them absorbed all their attention. Later on, when the technical side of the painter's art had widened, and knowledge had deepened, artists began to supplement the poets' and writers'

(By permission of the Manchester City Art Gallery.)

AT THE GOLDEN GATE.

(From the Picture by Val C. Prinsep, R.A., in the City of Manchester Art Gallery.)

work with pictorial interpretations of it. The beautiful stories recorded in the Gospels in turn came in for artistic attention, and they have afforded opportunity for the exercise of the best skill of painters of all countries.

It is always a matter of interest to see how a particular subject appeals to the minds of various artists, and the interest is heightened when, for the sake of comparison, the different results are brought together. In this paper we have collected some of the best and most notable illustrations of the parable of the Ten Virgins by modern painters. It is, probably, the one of the series that affords the artist the greatest opportunity for picturesque treatment, and it will be seen how widely divergent are the several representations which we reproduce. The artists have taken what appears to each to be the salient point of the story for illustration, and the result is that we have the whole parable pictorially treated.

Taking the pictures in the order of date of execution, the drawing by Sir John Millais calls for first attention. It was made about 1863, when the art of illustration in England was at its zenith. Millais, then thirty-five years of age, was one of the celebrated company of artists who made the illustrative work of the 'sixties the finest ever produced in our country; work that has enhanced the value of the publications in which it was published to an extraordinary degree. Some of the most noteworthy of this was issued through the enterprise of the Brothers Dalziel, the celebrated engravers. It was they who commissioned Millais to execute a series of nineteen illustrations of the parables, which was published in 1864 in a volume entitled "The Parables of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Of the parable of the Ten Virgins two illustrations were given. The first represents the virgins at the moment when the cry is raised, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh!" Millais chose to present them in the dress of the day—a curious choice, for the remainder of the subjects are dealt with as Eastern characters. Another curious point is that the scene is depicted in the light of day, when the lamps would be unnecessary. The wise virgins have sprung alertly to their feet, while the others lie inert upon the ground. The second illustration, which we reproduce here, represents the five foolish virgins appealing for admittance to the bridal feast. It is full of dramatic force and character, and shows the artist at his best. These drawings are of great interest, in that they stand as the precursors of the pictures of Von Uhde and other Continental artists who represent New Testament subjects in modern environments and accessories.

The picture by Lord Leighton is not so much of an illustration as a decoration. It was painted in fresco as an altarpiece for Lyndhurst Church, and forms an interesting record of the work of one of the most versatile and accomplished artists England has ever possessed. It was executed in 1866, when Leighton was thirty-six years of age, and but an Associate of the Royal Academy. The figures are full of beauty of that pure, stately nature which even then was so characteristic of the artist. The work was executed under great difficulty, at a time when Leighton was overwhelmed with other work, but, with the great frescoes of "The Arts of Peace and War" in the Victoria and Albert Museum, bears eloquent testimony to his skill as a decorative artist. The whole story of the parable is suggested—the joyful reception of the wise and the dismissal of the foolish virgins.

Mr. Val C. Prinsep, R.A., chose to make a charming picture rather than an illustration pure and simple of the parable. "At the Golden Gate" is a magnificent example of his work as a colourist. It was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1882, and since 1883 the picture has formed one of the chief glories of the Manchester City Art Gallery.

Far different in treatment is the picture by Mr. J. M. Strudwick, which, by the courtesy of its owner, Mr. Imrie, of Liverpool, we are permitted to reproduce. Mr. Strudwick is a living artist, who, while carrying on the traditions of the Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood, in so far as attention to minute detail is concerned, follows closely in the footsteps of the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones. His picture is a beautiful work, full of exquisite passages, delicate and refined. If not an actual representation of the story, it emphasises its teaching, and is entirely satisfactory as an artistic interpretation of it.

The late M. Tissot, on the other hand,

(By permission of William Imrie, Esq., the Owner of the Picture.)

THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS

(From the Picture by J. M. Strudwick.)

gave us a pictorial record of the scene as it probably presented itself to the audience who heard the story narrated. His maidens are in the garb of Palestine, and their surroundings are correct transcripts of a scene in the Holy Land. "They all slumbered and slept"—the words and picture are identical in their actuality. It is a group such as would have been seen in the days of our Lord, and as an illustration of the story it is, without question, the most complete and correct. It forms one of the series of three hundred and fifty water-colour drawings made by the artist for his "Life of Jesus Christ." For many years he made his home in Palestine, painting the incidents of the "Great Life" as near as possible on the actual site of their occurrence. It was a stupendous undertaking, but accomplished with such force and loving enthusiasm that its success was assured. Those who visited the gallery in Bond Street when the collection was on view in London will not need reminding of the wondrous care and patient diligence revealed in these altogether remarkable drawings. Each was a work of art in itself, but at the same time a faithful illustration of the incident dealt with.

It is but recently that M. Tissot passed away at the age of sixty-six, just as he had put the finishing touches to another series of three hundred and fifty drawings of Old Testament events and stories—a series upon which he had devoted as much care and patience as the other. He looked upon it as the completion of his life-work, and thus enjoyed at the last the feeling that he had accomplished that to which he had set his hand.

THE FOOLISH VIRGINS.
(From the Drawing by Sir J. E. Millais, P.R.A.)

Mr. James Clark's interpretation of the same passage was painted before he went to Palestine to study in the same manner as Tissot had done, and, probably, he would render it differently now. But the picture serves as an example of the diverse views of artists in the treatment of special subjects.

ARTHUR FISH.

"THEY ALL SLUMBERED AND SLEPT."
(From the Picture by James Clark.)

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

NOVEMBER 16TH.—The Time of the Judges.

Passage for reading—Judges ii. 7–19.

POINTS. 1. The blessedness of serving God.
2. The folly of worshipping idols.
3. The mercy of Almighty God.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Reward of Obedience. David, in the Hundred and Nineteenth Psalm, says that the Divine statutes had become his songs, and adds, "This I had because I kept Thy precepts." The Rabbis have an analogous saying: "The reward of a precept is a precept"; or "A precept draws a precept"; the meaning of which is, that he who keeps one precept, to him God grants, as if by way of reward, the ability to keep another and more difficult precept. The contrary of this is that other saying of the Rabbis, that "The reward of a sin is a sin"; or "Transgression draws transgression."—Spurgeon's "Treasury of David."

The Folly of Idolatry. Two missionaries were walking round the Temple of Siva, or Great Pagoda of Tanjore, India, when they noticed the people carrying out one of the brass idols in procession. It being a warm, sunny day, the idol became heated. Someone happened to touch it, and, perceiving that it was very warm, concluded it must have a fever! The rajah, being present, sent for a physician. He came, and told them they need not be troubled, for the god was well enough. But the rajah called him a fool and sent him home, and ordered that another physician should be fetched. When he came, he told them that the god was very sick, had a high fever, and remedies must be applied immediately or he would die. So he directed them to put the god in a shady place, and washed him with some cool liquid, and when he was well cooled the doctor pronounced him cured, and the rajah gave the physician three thousand rupees (£300) for saving the life of his god!—Life Scenes from Mission Fields.

Mercy in Judgment. When the Roman magistrates in olden days gave sentence for anyone to be scourged, they had a bundle of rods, tied hard with many knots, laid before them. The reason for this was that while the appointed officer was untying the knots the magistrates might see the behaviour of the prisoner, whether he was sorry for his fault and showed any desire to amend, that in that case the sentence might be recalled or part of his punishment be remitted. Is not this like God in the punishment of sinners? How patient He is! How unwilling to strike! How slow to wrath!

NOVEMBER 23RD.—World's Temperance Lesson.

Passage for reading—Isaiah xxviii. 1–13.

POINTS. 1. The woes of a drunkard.
2. The punishment of the drunkard.
3. Children to be taught temperance.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Effects of Drink. A young man entered the bar-room of a village tavern and asked for a drink. "No," said the landlord, "you had delirium tremens once, and I cannot sell you any more drink." He stepped aside to make room for two young men, upon whom the landlord waited very politely. The other stood by silent, and when they had finished said to the landlord, "Six years ago, at their age, I stood where these young men are now. I had fair prospects then, but now at the age of twenty-eight I am a wreck in body and mind. In this room I formed the habit which has been my ruin. You led me to drink. Now sell me a few glasses more and your work will be done. There is no hope for me, but these young men can be saved. Sell it to me and let me die, and the world will be rid of me, but for Heaven's sake sell no more to them." The landlord listened, pale and trembling. Then, putting down the bottle, he exclaimed, "So help me, God, this is the last drop I will ever sell to anyone!" And he kept his word.—Christian Age.

No Hope. Some men were walking on the bank of the river above the Falls of Niagara one cold winter's day. They saw a large eagle hover in the air and then quickly swoop down upon something in the water. It was the carcase of a dead sheep. The eagle fiercely pecked at the body, and, sitting upon it, was borne down to the Falls. But its talons had struck deep into the half-frozen flesh, and the icy water coming round its feet made them grip to the body like a vice, so that when it tried to rise into the air it found itself immovably fixed to its prey. Nearer and nearer came the Falls; swifter and swifter the eagle was borne along; struggling and shrieking, it was at last dashed over the terrible cataract into death. So is the drunkard caught and chained till the miserable end comes.

Care for Children. An Englishman visiting Sweden, noticing their care in educating children who are taken from the streets and highways and placed in special schools, inquired if it was not costly. He received the suggestive answer, "Yes, it is costly, but not dear. We Swedes are not rich enough to let a child grow up in ignorance, misery, and crime, to become a scourge to society as well as a disgrace to himself. So we teach him to be honest, sober, temperate, and industrious."

NOVEMBER 30TH.—Gideon and the Three Hundred.

Passage for reading—Judges vii. 1–8, 16–21.

POINTS. THE BATTLE OF THE LORD:
1. To be fought by the brave.
2. To be won by the few.
3. To be the Lord's victory.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Fight to the Death. Before the Highlanders charged at Alma, our Guards were almost cut to pieces, and one officer exclaimed, "The Brigade of Guards will be destroyed! Ought it not to fall back?" "Better that every man of Her Majesty's Guards should lie dead upon the field than turn their backs upon the enemy!" was the stern remark of Colin Campbell as he put himself at the head of his Highlanders.

XUM

A Brave Leader. A Dutch fleet once drew near to Chatham. Fearing it might effect a landing, the Duke of Albemarle determined to prevent it, and endeavoured to inspire his men with his own dauntless spirit. Calmly he took his position in the front, thus exposing himself to the hottest fire from the hostile ships. An affectionate but over-cautious friend, seeing him in such danger, darted forward, seized him by the arm, and exclaimed, "Retire, I beseech you, from this fierce shower of bullets, or you will be a dead man!" The Duke, releasing himself from his grasp, turned coldly on the man who would tempt him to cowardice in the hour of his country's need, and replied, "Sir, if I had been afraid of bullets, I should have given up the profession of a soldier long ago."

Christ's Ways Different from Ours. Lambert was a holy bishop who lived eleven hundred years ago. His one prayer was that he might be the means of converting all the idolaters in his province to the faith of Christ. Nothing less would satisfy him. But he was driven for seven years into banishment, and when he returned was cruelly slain by a nobleman whom he had rebuked for his sins. Thus it seemed as if his prayer had not been heard. He asked to spread the knowledge of Christ, and God so ordered his life that he never could. But God did better for him than he could have done for himself. He asked to be useful to one province; God made him an example to the whole Church. He sought to be a missionary; God willed that he should be a martyr. His weapons of war against sin and unbelief were faith and prayer and trust, as were Gideon's, and the work was done by God in His way, not by might, but by His Spirit.

DECEMBER 7TH.—Ruth and Naomi.

Passage for reading—Ruth i. 16–22.

POINTS. 1. A much-tried widow receives sympathy.
2. A loving daughter-in-law gives help.
3. A faithful God adds His blessing.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Mutual Sympathy. At St. Helena the Emperor Napoleon found a negro slave, a gardener, in whose history he became deeply interested. He was a Malay Indian, of prepossessing appearance, who had been stolen from his native land and taken there in an English vessel. The captive Emperor's sympathies were deeply moved by the old man's story, while poor Toby on his part, a stranger in a strange land, became much attached to the Emperor. Both had lost, like Naomi and Ruth, their friends and their home; so they wept together.

Begin at Home. A person once resolved to seek and find the beautiful. He thought of the mountains of Switzerland, and the sunny plains of Italy, and the forests of America, and many other wonders of the world. But before he started on his search a little bird whispered, "Begin at home." The bird was wiser than the man. The beautiful is always with us. Make the place where God has put you beautiful. If it be but a cottage in a village, or a room in a crowded city, make it beautiful—beautiful with love and smiles and kindness, beautiful with tender words and kindly thoughts and unselfish deeds. And the sadder, the darker, the poorer the place or person about you is, be the more eager to make them bright and beautiful. This was what Ruth did to her mother-in-law, and you know how she was blessed.

God is Faithful. Luther, the reformer, though generally cheerful and happy in his God, had occasional times of sorrow and depression. He would then cry, "All Thy waves and storms are gone over me!" Once, when in this mood, he was persuaded to leave home for a few days that he might recover his cheerfulness, but he returned as he had gone, full of sadness. Great was his surprise, on entering the house, to find his wife sitting in black clothes with a mourning cloak thrown over her, while she pressed a handkerchief to her eyes as if weeping bitterly. He eagerly asked for whom she was in mourning, and she answered, "Only think, dear Martin, our Father in heaven must be dead! Have I not cause for my grief?" Luther at once understood her meaning, and with a smile he answered, "You are right, dear wife; I am acting as if there were no God in heaven"; and it is said that from that hour his melancholy left him. Like Naomi, though he had bitterness at times, yet he put his trust in God, and was not confounded.

DECEMBER 14TH.—The Boy Samuel.

Passage for reading—1 Samuel iii. 1–14.

POINTS. 1. The Lord's voice calls.
2. The boy Samuel answers.
3. The High Priest Eli submits to reproof.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Call of God. And how does the voice of God call to us now? Sometimes in the silent hours of the night, when we lie awake, unable to sleep, and think over our lives—what mistakes we have made and sins we have done—then some word from God's Book comes to our mind and is His voice to our heart. Or we hear His voice on the day of rest, in the house of prayer, when the world is shut out, and He speaks to us by His minister, pleading with us to turn our thoughts more towards heaven. Again and again has His call come to us from an open grave, reminding us that life is short and death is near. And often in the midst of our daily work a Stranger has beckoned us, as He did to the Apostles at the lake, and lo! it was the Lord. God is always calling us. Oh! that we might be more eager to catch His voice and answer, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

Christ Entering the Heart. Suppose you were in a dark room in the morning, the shutters closed and fastened, and only as much light coming through the chinks as made you aware it was day outside. And suppose you should say to a companion with you, "Let us open the windows and let in the light," what would you think if he replied, "No, no; you must first put the darkness out, or the light will not enter"? You would laugh at his absurdity. Just so, we cannot put sin out of our hearts to prepare for Christ's entering; we must open, and take Him in, and sin will flee.

Submission to the Will of God. A man was asked, when under great bodily affliction, if he could see any particular reason for his trial. "No," replied he, "but I am as well satisfied as if I could see ten thousand reasons. God's will is the very perfection of all reasons."—Spurgeon.

A Complete Story by Charles Edwardes.

I.

MISS FRITH, the white-haired Gretton postmistress, told William, the letter carrier, that she would herself deliver Miss Chuckley's mail.

"Why put yourself about to do that, ma'am?" asked William, in natural surprise.

"Oh, I have my reasons, and—there is nothing to detain you. Already you are eight minutes late."

Miss Frith was now and again rather "uppish," as William expressed it. Now and again, too, he did not care a carpenter's shaving for her uppishness, and would argue her out of her boots, to borrow more of his expressions. But to-day he did not dare play a man's part with her, for it was undeniable that he had dallied considerably at three farmhouses while collecting the letters in his circuit the previous day (a hot one), and he had seen Miss Frith make a trembling note in her private diary to this effect: "William slightly unpunc. again!" She had several such entries in her diaries of the past five years, and though nothing had ever yet come of them, there they were, staring his conscience and daily bread in the face, when she might choose to use them.

But Miss Frith was a woman whose mere bark was inoffensive, and who had never yet been known to bite.

"Very well, ma'am; very well, ma'am," said William.

He carried his red face and very light bag from the little post office, and in two minutes was hard at work gossiping with the wheelwright under the sycamore by the stone slit of a stile which led across to the new milk farm.

As for Miss Frith, she put on her famous wide straw hat, which had seen more summers in Gretton-on-the-Moor than William himself, and left by the back door, with Miss Chuckley's mail.

This consisted of a grocer's circular from the town and a letter. The letter had one of its ends slit open and an unsightly blob of red wax on part of the name to its address.

Miss Frith passed the village pump and the Jubilee oak-tree on the green with bowed head and that meek shuffle which was one of her characteristics. Some people, seeing her thus for the first time, would have assumed that she had lived a life full of suffering—"had had all the nonsense knocked out of her," in fact. But it was not so at all. She had never lacked butter to her bread, and had been the Gretton postmistress for twenty years. One comfort, however, she had been short of, and that was a lover. She had hitherto believed that she shared this mysterious dispensation of Providence with Miss Betsy Chuckley, of the Blakeway Cottage, a lone lady of her own age. This was a sort of solace to her, though of no very ardent kind. But the letter with the red wax on it had this morning deprived her even of this rather sombre and perhaps not very Christian satisfaction.

Now she understood Miss Chuckley's extraordinary reticence on private social occasions when she (Miss Frith) had slyly, yet not with malice, turned the conversation upon that great and interesting topic, mankind.

The most she could get from Miss Chuckley was tart little phrases about men in general. She had never opened her mouth with a personal confidence.

Miss Chuckley had stiff hairs on her chin, a nose like a dromedary's back, and cold blue eyes. Like the postmistress, she was sixty.

But she was much more robust than Miss Frith, and as the postmistress approached her garden gate she stood erect, rake in hand, and saluted the visitor hoarsely.

"Good-morning, my dear!" she said. "What in the world brings you my way this time o' day?"

The postmistress stammered and blushed.

"Oh, Miss Chuckley," she said with nervous haste, "I am so ashamed of myself. I determined to come and tell you about it. This letter! It had partly burst in transit; and — and — wicked curiosity led me to — to read it."

Miss Chuckley stared at the slit and then at the red wax.

"Yes," continued the other, "that was an accident. I was sealing the Squire's parcel at the time, and little Mabel Butterton made me start, ringing the bell. I—want you to forgive me."

"It's a man's writing, isn't it?"

"Er—yes—I presume so," replied Miss Frith, timidly.

"You couldn't believe your own eyes, I suppose?" suggested Miss Chuckley, with a sour little laugh.

"Please don't say that. If you knew how ashamed I feel! I ought not to have done it, and with my experience of His Majesty's regulations, and those of our dear late gracious Queen herself, I—I cannot understand how I could do it."

"Satan, no doubt!" said Miss Chuckley.

She seemed in no hurry to read the letter.

"Addison and Green," she added, mouthing at the circular, "know very well I will not buy the rubbish they call tea, and their sugar is full of bits o' bagging. They must be fond of wasting ha'penny stamps. Do they get a reduction by taking a quantity?"

"Oh dear, no, nothing of the kind. Didn't you know that, Miss Chuckley? If a customer were to put down five pounds and request penny stamps for it, he would receive five times two hundred and forty, and not one more."

Miss Frith spoke with animation. It was a relief to her to be purely official.

"But you haven't forgiven me?" she whispered.

Then Miss Chuckley put her finger in the slit of the envelope and tore this open. She had not aged up to spectacles. The letter she read was as follows:

"Dere Betsy,—It's a long long time since I've sene your dere face, Betsy, my old dere, and I write this to say as I'm coming to Gretton on a supprise visit to see you on my bike, which I 'ave lately took to. It wood be like the dere old times if you wood meat me on Tuesday next, which I reckon you will 'ave this in the morning. Dere Betsy, being abroad may make a deference to sum, but not to you know who "X.

"P.S.—I've got a hepe of grey hairs with work and trubble, but am now doing pretty well, and so hope it won't make a deference to your love."

The postmistress quite expected to see an electrical change in Miss Chuckley during and after her perusal of this letter.

No such thing.

Miss Chuckley merely rubbed her eyes twice, then rubbed her nose, and, looking up, asked casually:

"You read the whole of it, my dear?"

"I am truly and thoroughly ashamed to confess to you that I did, Miss Chuckley," was the humble reply.

"Well," said Miss Chuckley, "and I don't blame you. I'd have done the same, every bit. Come in, my dear; I want to show you summat."

"But you do forgive me?"

"Bless your heart alive, yes! I quite thought he'd been dead these twenty years. Mind you, my dear, I'm not saying I'll have him, even now. What's he been doing all these years? And—there's a deal of comfort in being an independent woman, with no one to think of except yourself. My feelings towards men have changed, my dear. There was a time, not long since, when I'd have jumped to say 'Yes' to him. But now——"

She shook her head and smiled wisely at the tulips under her parlour window.

"But he seems to love you still," Miss Frith ventured to say: "though he ends—don't you think, dear Miss Chuckley?—with rather peculiar abruptness."

Miss Chuckley paused in the hall to consider this.

"Yes," she said. "You're right, Eleanor Frith. There's a suddenness about it I don't like. His name's Cross, Jamie Cross; I'll tell you that. He used to write himself Jamie, but that mark does, I suppose, either for his name or a what-d'ye-call-it."

She emitted a cluttering little laugh.

"He went for a sailor," she proceeded, with much more geniality. "They're queer fellows, sailors. I suppose one must make allowances. He says Tuesday. Bless us all, that's to-day! Well, he can't sleep here. I'll go and engage a bed for him at the Harrow. Come in, my dear, come in."

XUM

Miss Frith murmured about the shop. "I must be getting back," she said.

"Not till you've seen him, my dear. Come up into my bedroom. The bed's made. He's over the mantelpiece, poor fellow!"

Miss Chuckley almost ran up the stairs.

In the bedroom she offered the post-mistress her hand, and, with a face that now beamed with wintry sunshine, made her own little confession as a kind of parallel to Miss Frith's.

"There he is, my dear, as he was six-and-twenty years ago," she said effusively. "I didn't encourage him very much, poor lad, but I told him he might hope to the top of the tongue in his throat. That contents 'em, my dear, and it does us no harm. Especially sailors. You can always reckon as they're drownded when you don't hear from 'em after twelve months, maybe. It's not a bad plan to have 'em prayed for, though I never could bear to let all the world know my private affairs like that, and it looks as if you'd only one string to your bow, too. But how I am chattering! What do you think of him?"

Miss Frith sighed.

"He looks very nice, dear Miss Chuckley," she whispered almost reverently. "Not that I'm much of a judge. But I must be going."

The photograph was of a hairy man with a pronounced and somewhat imbecile stare. No one except Miss Frith would have passed such civil judgment upon him offhand. And yet there was something masterful about his mouth.

"His riding a bicycle—that gives me the staggers," said Miss Chuckley reflectively, as she thrust forward her under-lip. "But I'll be thankful if he does nothing worse."

"Yes, indeed. And will you meet him?"

Miss Chuckley became as arch as her years and physical disabilities would permit.

"You may go, my dear," she said, smiling, "and I'll tell you more about that to-morrow."

When she had obligingly helped the post-mistress to go, Miss Chuckley returned to her bedroom and set herself sternly to consider the situation. Chin in hand, she stood for many minutes contemplating the yellowed photograph of Jamie Cross.

"'This letter was not for me.'"—p. 80.

Eventually she seemed to have banished all doubts, for she turned to her wardrobe, and one by one spread its more attractive items on the patchwork quilt of the bed.

The rest of the day passed, as usual in Gretton-on-the-Moor, without large incident. Miss Frith busied herself with her little affairs—an ounce of sweets one minute, a penny stamp a quarter of an hour later, and a voluble farm servant on the heels of the penny stamp to inquire if he could with the new century write to his sister-in-law in Australia at the cost of another (and only one) penny stamp.

William reappeared in the evening with the collected mails. He was excited, but, in the opinion of Miss Frith, excited only. She could detect no more positive failing in him. Besides, he partially explained the cause of his excitement.

"I met one of them himps on their red wheels, bringing a telegraph into the village," he said.

"Well," said Miss Frith, "and where is it?"

"It happened to be for my own darter, ma'am," was his triumphant reply; after which he screwed up his cunning red face, and seemed to challenge the postmistress to find any fault in the fact worth entering in that hateful current diary of hers.

"You are certain, William?"

"Sartin sure, for I've read it, same as she've done," said William.

He followed his words with a laugh, which he quite hoped would exasperate Miss Frith into a condition of piercing curiosity. But the postmistress was not likely to fall into a second such temptation in twenty-four hours.

"Very well," she said. "You may go to your tea."

Yet, being human, she could not do otherwise than marvel what that pert young woman, William's offspring, the Vicar's parlourmaid (and discontented at that), could want with a sixpenny message all to herself along His Majesty's cable. And, being very human indeed, she secretly wished the long-talked-about telegraph office were open at Gretton to add to the interests of her life, even though it also increased her work.

II.

MISS CHUCKLEY lived by herself. She had therefore no one to consult in the matter of going out into the highway at the lonesome hour of 9 p.m. of a May evening—a rainy May evening, too.

She wore her loftiest black bonnet, the one with a profusion of jet ornaments which had in their long day shaken appropriately at the gravesides of quite twenty of her kinsfolk and acquaintances. She also wore her flowered black silk gown and black gloves.

More festive than this, even for Jamie, she could not become, at such short notice.

To tell the truth, she was in a turmoil. You would have seen something of this in her face, had there been a moon, even while at a quarter to nine she stood hesitating at her garden gate.

It was not the indelicacy of her conduct in such prompt acquiescence with the plan proposed in that startling letter—it was not this which fidgeted her. It was the outrageous risk of it all. How could she believe the Jamie of to-day had much in common with the Jamie she now half-believed she had once loved? Besides, to do justice to her good sense, she quite understood that she was no longer a beauty, to charm the foolish masculine fancy. To be sure, she had her independence, £70 a year and her cottage; but she was not at all positive that Jamie would be welcome to one half of that. She knew enough of men, by experience and repute, to know, moreover, that he might have acquired expensive habits and ways which would make her property look a very small thing indeed if she allowed him any matrimonial claim to her person and estate.

On the other hand, there was undeniable rapture in the thought of being a bride at her time of life.

"I'll see what he's like, at any rate," she said; "his bed being ordered and all."

It was not only the expense she had incurred in this matter—beds were a shilling apiece at the Harrow—there was also the supper which she had prepared in her own parlour. Certainly, it would be a weak proceeding to cry off with the enterprise after spending the best part of the morning making custard and cakes for Jamie, and actually carolling in a cracked voice over the joyous labour. There was a cold ham besides. Sundry harmless bottles stood like watch towers at the corner of this appetising spread. She quite believed he would not care for tea; but if his tastes had altered so profoundly, was not the kettle singing quietly in the kitchen ready even for that agreeable change in him?

It was a very nasty night for a bicycle. The roads up to Gretton were inevitably steep. She pitied the poor fellow, yet marvelled that he should be such a fool at his time of life. A bicycle might argue him tolerably well-to-do; but, on a night like this, it went no farther.

Miss Chuckley tarried five minutes at her gate. Her umbrella dripped heartily.

Then she set out for the Blakeway Dip, which on the Gretton side began a few paces from her own elderberry bushes. She descended slowly, with skirts held high.

She was not fifty yards down the slope when she distinguished another female shape ahead of her. This did not annoy her at first. She gave it time. However, it not only went slowly, but even at length turned and began to ascend the road. Then Miss Chuckley was annoyed. She secretly dratted the woman, whoever it was, and on her part also turned. She hurried, indeed, and was only relieved when she reached her garden gate.

Here she waited about five minutes, after which she again started for the Dip. The rain was abominable. It made her wroth with Jamie. Why could he not have come to her in a sensible way? But the irritation passed, as she remembered that he might not—indeed, probably did not—know that she resided in the cottage.

A yellow lamplight, with the glow travelling ahead of it now, in deed and in truth, met her gaze.

Though such a strong, sensible woman, the hand which did not hold her umbrella jumped to her heart. Her black silk gown trailed in the mud: she heedless.

It could not be other than Jamie!

She stood and watched the light ascend.

So for one of the most emotional minutes of her life.

Then, suddenly, she lifted her hand to her left ear.

"He's never picked up with that other creature?" she muttered.

But she had to admit that it was possible, for the sound of talking was plain. Not only talking, either: actually laughter! And the lamp had gone to the side, where a gate led into a field, and there it rested.

"Well, of all——"

Miss Chuckley did not finish her sentence. She lowered her umbrella and gathered her skirts together instead, and then, on tiptoe, passed—with difficulty, being large—through a stile into that same field, higher up.

Mud and soaked grass gave her new trouble; but she did not mind them as she crept nearer and nearer to that lower gate, hugging the stone wall as she went.

Within easy hearing of the talkers, she paused. Here she soon got her handful. It was as a furious, cheated woman of sixty, with mired skirts and wet feet, that she groped back to her cottage and the parlour wherein she had spread the feast for the man who might have become her bridegroom.

Very soon she was in her work-a-day clothes and pattering up to the post office.

Miss Frith invited her in eagerly.

"Has he——" she began. But she did not finish, for her visitor's face was uncompromisingly severe.

"My dear," said Miss Chuckley, "you're a goose! This letter" (she cast it upon the table), "was not for me, but for that hussy of a Critchley, the postman's girl. I've nothing more to say. Good-night."

The postmistress was half-stunned.

"You don't mean that!" she gasped. "How do you know?"

"Never mind how I know. You just take to spectacles—that's my advice."

"But I was never in the least doubt. That is—could it have been the wax?" the poor woman murmured.

"That and your kind simpleton of a heart, my dear," said Miss Chuckley, breaking into a smile. "But, bless you, I don't mind—now! I'd not have known what to do with him. Perhaps you'll send to the Harrow."

"Oh, my dear Miss Chuckley! my dear Miss Chuckley! If it had been anyone but William's daughter!"

"Well, my dear, you must sup your own broth," said Miss Chuckley. "Good-night."

She left the postmistress to her own reflections.

These were broken at a quarter to ten by a knock, the knocker being none other than the postman.

"You, William!" Miss Frith stammered.

The postman leaned against the little drawbridge which parted the unofficial from the business side of the counter.

"Yes, ma'am. I've come about a letter as my darter ought to have received this mornin'. Them town sorters want a lesson given 'em, that they do."

Miss Frith hesitated—and fell.

"How do you know there is such a letter?" she asked faintly.

"How do I know?"

The postman grinned.

"Well, ma'am, I'll tell you, not bein' a secret man myself," he said. "Betsy's bein' courted, she is. Her young man's no scholar, but a good 'un with his hands. He's with them Leeds engineers. I forget their names—there's three of 'em. Anyway, he's just back from a job in France, with a good rise in the shops and three days off, and he's spendin' the holiday fixin' things up with Betsy. He wrote last night, he says. It was him what wired to her this arternoon, tellin' her not to trouble to meet him in Blakeway Dip at nine, because he might be late. But you can bet whether she met him or not, ma'am, bein' a woman yourself, Miss Frith."

"William!" said the postmistress.

"Axin' your pardon, ma'am, for I've had a tirin' an' wet evenin' myself," said the postman, with the sound of satire in his voice.

"William," said the postmistress, in a changed tone, "step this way, please."

He seemed loth, the occasions when he had been thus buttonholed in Miss Frith's parlour not being sweet to his memory.

"I have something to tell you, William."

"Oh, indeed, ma'am!"

He resisted no longer. But the scruples, and even anxieties, which he took into that little room were soon smothered and replaced by pride so huge that it transfigured him. He heard Miss Frith to the bitter end without interruption. Even when she mentioned the entries in her diary, he did not speak, but only swelled.

"I shall expunge them all, William," said the humiliated woman. "Every one. But it is only on the condition that you study your watch more closely, and that you and your daughter do not breathe a word about the mistake—for Miss Chuckley's sake."

Then William nodded and smiled. He did more. Having pocketed his daughter's letter, he held out his hand to Miss Frith.

"Good-night, ma'am," he said. "It's friends all, same as at Christmas time."

It was only on Christmas Day each year that Miss Frith was accustomed to give her carrier her hand to shake.

"Thank you, William," said Miss Frith, feebly, passing him her hand.

"I'll not tell a soul—no, not even the Postmaster-General in London himself, ma'am," said William, with generous smiles.

It rested at that.

Nothing could have been more truly creditable in her than the way in which Miss Chuckley controlled her tongue when she passed the postman's daughter and her affectionate young engineer on her return to her lonely cottage. The young man had one arm round the girl's waist, and with the other hand he trundled his bicycle rather loosely—so loosely, indeed, that Miss Chuckley had to skip to one side to avoid the mire and antics of its front wheel in the dark.

"It's of no consequence," said Miss Chuckley hoarsely, when the young man apologised with a casual "Sorry, mother!" and "Good-night, Betsy," she added.

Betsy replied, "Good-night, Miss Chuckley," respectfully enough. The girl giggled afterwards, but the old lady paid no heed to that. She remembered the time when, in the like circumstances, she, too, would have giggled, and then nestled afresh towards the manly arm that held an umbrella between her and life's showers.

"'I have something to tell you, William.'"

By A. Wallis Myers.

THOUGH it is a rule that clergymen shall not become members of the House of Commons, no veto is placed upon peers in Holy Orders, who are not Bishops, taking their seats in the House of Lords. There are at the present time seven noblemen thus exercising this right—a marquess, four earls, and two barons; and though their calling is a spiritual one, they yet sit in the Upper Chamber, like the mass of their brethren, as temporal peers. This designation even applies to Bishops who though peers, are not entitled to a place on the Right Reverend Bench. The late Lord Auckland, for example, when holding the see of Sodor and Man, to which a vote in the House of Lords is not attached, sat as a peer among the Barons. He then wore no episcopal robes; and it was not until his translation to the see of Bath and Wells that this peer-prelate took his place with the Bishops. A similar case was that of Lord Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, after the disestablishment of the Irish Church; he, too, sat as a lord temporal among the Barons.

(Photo: Mason and Basebe, Cambridge.)
EARL OF STRAFFORD.

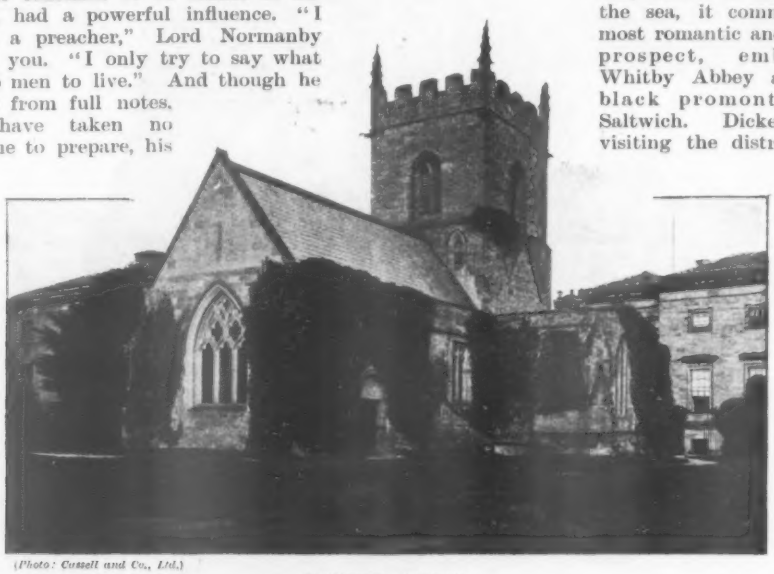
Though for years, as the Rev. Francis Edmund Cecil Byng, the Earl of Strafford read the prayers in the House of Commons, his lordship is not entitled to perform a similar function in the House of Lords, because he is not a Bishop. Yet Lord Strafford has been in Holy Orders for over forty years. He is now sixty-seven, and has led a strenuous, unselfish life as a son of the Church. A man of great ability and learning, he gave early promise of a brilliant career. When he was at school at Eton, he won the special prize awarded by Prince Albert for modern languages, and later at Oxford he distinguished himself in law and modern history. When he decided to enter the Church, being the third son, there was small prospect of his succession to the earldom, to which there can be little doubt the young clergyman, who became rector of a Rutlandshire village, did not aspire. He was deeply interested in Church work, and quickly displayed a powerful capacity in the pulpit, in which his manner was always earnest and his teaching sound.

About this time the late Queen took an interest in Mr. Byng, as he then was, and possibly it was due to her influence that he was appointed to the vicarage of Holy Trinity, Twickenham, when he was brought into close relations with the residents in Hampton Court Palace, at which he became Chaplain. His sermons, carefully prepared, showed an evangelical spirit, and they were always permeated with a strong literary flavour, which never failed to appeal to persons of keen intelligence. Both as private Chaplain and as Chaplain-in-

Ordinary, Lord Strafford frequently preached before her late Majesty, who held him in high esteem. For twenty years he was the Vicar of St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens, and during the larger portion of this period he combined with this office the chaplaincy of the House of Commons, in which he was always popular.

THE REV. THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY IN ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.



One of the last offices which Lord Strafford held before he retired from the pulpit was that which endeared him to the Freemasons of England, of which body he was Grand Chaplain in 1880; and the craft had no warmer friend.

The Marquess of Normanby is another peer-preacher who is held in favour at Court. The ancestors of this high-minded Canon of Windsor have served their respective sovereigns on the battlefield, as well as in the Church. During the early part of the sixteenth century the Phipps family resided upon landed property in the county of Lincoln, in which Colonel William Phipps raised a regiment of horse for the service of King Charles during the Civil Wars. The colonel's grandson, Sir Constantine, became Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1710, while his cousin was Sir William Phipps, inventor of the diving bell, with which he recovered a large quantity of treasure from a sunken vessel. The second Baron Mulgrave, also a Phipps, was a captain in the Royal Navy, and made a bold and memorable attempt to discover the North-East Passage. Another relative, the Hon. Harriet Phipps, was for many years the devoted attendant and friend of Queen Victoria, who appointed Lord Normanby to a stall in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, near which, in the venerable cloisters, he resides.

Before he succeeded to the title, the Marquess was the vicar of a Manchester parish, where his earnest discourses to men, whom he confesses to be fonder of addressing, had a powerful influence. "I am not a preacher," Lord Normanby will tell you. "I only try to say what will help men to live." And though he preaches from full notes, which have taken no little time to prepare, his lordship's sermons are always understandable of the multitude. He has no "favourite" subjects, but takes the Word of God for his inspiration.

Though Lord Normanby, who is a bachelor, has his Canon's quarters at Windsor, there is always the ancient Mulgrave Castle at Lythe, near Whitby, to which, as its owner, he may repair in his advancing age. Curious fables are current in the neighbourhood of Whitby relating to the origin of the once magnificent structure. It is said to have been built by a Saxon Duke of abnormal stature, named Wada, who died from remorse following a defeat in battle, and whose body was buried in a hill between two solid rocks, each seven feet high. Wada is also said to have been one of the conspirators who murdered Ethelred, King of Northumbria, and by way of defending himself strengthened his fortress at Mulgrave. Much of the work he did himself with the the aid of his wife. There is a local tradition that Bella, Wada's wife, brought the stones to construct a causeway in her apron, and, having only one hammer between them, this was thrown backwards and forwards across the country every time it was required. The present castellated mansion was built about the middle of the eighteenth century by the wife of John, Earl of Mulgrave; and many fine additions, including a lofty tower, have since been made. Occupying the crown of a hill, about a mile from the sea, it commands a most romantic and varied prospect, embracing Whitby Abbey and the black promontory of Saltwich. Dickens, on visiting the district, was so delighted with the scene that he "danced on the green of the velvety lawn," and the legends of a neighbourhood, particularly rich in such lore, equally pleased him.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

KEDLESTON CHURCH.

The Earl of Devon is the doyen of the clerical peers. He is in his ninety-second year, and has held the living of Powderham, Devon, which is his own gift, since 1877, though the rectory itself only has a net value of £259, including ninety-eight acres of glebe. Too old now to occupy the pulpit, though still maintaining a great interest in the welfare of his parishioners, who are also his tenants, Lord Devon delegates practically all of the Church work to his grandson, the curate of Powderham.

The veteran rector makes Powderham Castle, the family seat of the Courtenays, the rectory, where he spends most of his time. Standing on the western bank of estuary of the Exe, Powderham Castle was erected by Sir Philip

(Photo: Scott and Sons, Exeter.)

THE REV. THE EARL OF DEVON.

Courtenay, Lieutenant of Ireland, in the fourteenth century, and, though the fabric has of late years been considerably modernised, the ancient battlements and windows which have survived the alterations indicate the original character of the whole. The interior has very spacious rooms, containing many fine family portraits, and a collection of paintings by the old masters; and the adjoining park, of which the Earl is naturally proud, is well wooded and stocked with deer. On an eminence in this park is a structure called The Belvedere, erected in 1777, and consisting of three hexagonal towers, seventy feet in height, commanding magnificent views of the surrounding country, the Exe, and the English Channel.

The Courtenays, of which the Rector of Powderham is now the head, are one of the most illustrious races amongst the English nobility, and have had a brilliant historian in Gibbon. It is not surprising, then, to find in the ancient church of St. Clement many monuments to their memory. For so small a parish—there are only 160 sittings—a tower with six bells must almost be considered a luxury. A fine oak pulpit, presented as a thank-offering twenty years ago, in which Lord Devon was wont to discourse to the villagers before he succeeded to the peerage, is another noteworthy feature. Under a low arch at the end of the south aisle is a tomb with a recumbent effigy of a lady in tight-fitting dress, and wearing a plaited head-dress, which is traditionally said to represent Isabella de Fortibus, Countess of Devon, who died in 1292; but it appears more probable that the figure was intended for the Princess Elizabeth, fifth daughter of Edward I., and the wife of Humphrey de Bohun. The church was thoroughly restored forty years ago, chiefly at the cost of the present rector's brother, the eleventh earl.

Another peer, whose position is analogous to that of Lord Devon's in many respects, is Lord Scarsdale, better known, perhaps, as the father of the Indian Viceroy, Lord Curzon of Kedleston. Lord Scarsdale, who is over seventy, is the rector of a parish in Derbyshire, which is also his entire property. Except reading the lessons, Baron Scarsdale takes no part in the services, which are conducted by a curate, and he lives a retired life at Kedleston Rectory, receiving few visitors, if we except those very welcome sojourns in Derbyshire which his grandchildren occasionally make.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

POWDERHAM CASTLE.

Kedleston Church is perhaps the smallest cruciform church having a central tower in the country. The only remnant of the first Norman church that was built on the site consists of the semicircular south door of the nave, which is ornamented with the zig-zag moulding at the top and with the brick-head moulding on the jambs. The tympanum has at one time been covered with incised figures, but these have been worn away by the weather, and nothing can now be seen but the indistinct outline of a man on horseback blowing a horn. The old seat of the Curzons at Kedleston was rebuilt about the year 1700, and it was probably at that period the flat plaster ceilings were first inserted in the church, in addition to the finely carved oak pews in the chancel, and the nondescript font in the south transept. Then, too, the east end of the chancel was thoroughly paganised, with arms, skulls and crossbones, and other heathenish devices, a sundial being placed in the centre of the parapet, with the words above it, "We shall ——" leaving the reader to supply dial, i.e. "Die all." It may be noted that Bassano, the heraldic painter, who visited the church in 1710, describes it as a "thoroughly well-seated and beautiful church, and built cathedral-wise."

Kedleston Church abounds in interesting memorials of the Curzons, extending from the thirteenth century to the present time. The earliest one is of exceptional interest, and consists of two heads sculptured within quartrefoils and sunk about a foot below the pavement. Nearly a hundred years ago, when the paving stones were removed, it was found that these heads were cut in one large grave-stone, four feet wide and ten inches thick, without any inscription or lower aperture for the feet, as is usual with monuments of this description. It is generally assumed that they represent a Curzon, Lord of Kedleston, and his lady, though the early pedigree is too obscure to reveal their identity. Among the church possessions is a fine black-letter Prayer-book of 1687, in an excellent state of preservation, which, together with a Bible, was given by Lady Sarah Curzon nearly two hundred years ago.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

AUDLEY END

Perhaps the Ponsonbys are better known at Court and in the cricket field than in the Church, but one of this distinguished family, the veteran Earl of Bessborough, can look back on a long and useful life in Holy Orders. Like the Marquess of Normanby, Lord Bessborough's relations have been brought into close contact with the late Queen. Sir Spencer Ponsonby Fane was a faithful servant as well as a friend of her Majesty's. Lord Raglan, a son-in-law of the present peer, was until recently Under-Secretary at the War Office, and is now Governor of the Isle of Man. The Earl's predecessor in the title was one of the best cricketers that ever played for Harrow or the M.C.C., and, like his brother, was widely known as a man of strong and resolute opinions.

Lord Bessborough is an Irish peer, but sits in the House of Lords under his other title of Baron Ponsonby. He now never appears in the Upper Chamber, except on the rarest occasions. Since the middle of last century he has held three charges, and when occupying his last living of Stutton, Suffolk, he was for years conjointly Rural Dean of Samford, and took an especial interest in the farmers and labourers of the county, who respected his broad opinions. Now he is over eighty-one and never preaches, living principally at his Irish homes at Kilkenny and Carlow. One of his sons is the Chief of Police in St. Lucia, West Indies, while his eldest son and heir, Lord Duncannon, has served in the Royal Navy.

There now only remains to briefly mention the two latest recruits to the small group of clerical peers. The Rev. L. Latimer Neville, Master of Magdalene College, Cambridge, and Rector of Heyden, succeeded to the title of Lord Braybrooke a few months ago on the death of his brother; while the Rev. Francis G. Pelham also came into his brother's estate and title, and became Earl of Chichester about the same time.

The late Lord Braybrooke was nearly eighty, while the new one is seventy-six. Audley End,

(Photo: Messrs. Barraud, Old Bond Street, W.)
LORD BRAYBROOKE.

(Photo: A. H. Poole, Waterford.)
LORD BESSBOROUGH.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)
THE EARL OF CHICHESTER

the family residence, which he exchanges for a small Hertfordshire rectory, is situated in a narrow valley adjacent to Saffron Walden, and was intended by its original owner, the Earl of Suffolk, to surpass in size and magnificence all the private residences of the kingdom, to carry out which design a model was procured from Italy, executed in wood. The house was begun in 1603, and took thirteen years to complete. Suffolk, it is recorded, told his Majesty that from first to last, inside and out, the seat had cost him £200,000. Since then lavish sums have been spent in alterations and improvements, and the Master of Magdalene will have the privilege of using his private chapel, which is situated at the north-west corner of the building, and is emblazoned with the arms of the Audleys, Howards, and Griffins. Lord Braybrooke's trees are rapidly going to decay, and feel the effect of every storm. Indeed, during a tremendous gale seventy years ago, upwards of five hundred trees were blown down on the estate.

The present Earl of Chichester possesses, it may be noted, several valuable Cromwell relics at his residence, Stanmer, Lewes, among which mention should made of the Protector's pocket Bible in four volumes, with the motto "Qui cessat esse melior cessat esse bonus" in Oliver Cromwell's own handwriting on the fly-leaf.

A Children's Story by Myra Hamilton.

A GREAT many years ago there dwelt in a distant land a young man who was dreadfully discontented. He was the only son of a very wealthy monarch, who, knowing the riches that would one day belong to his child, had brought him up to do nothing. Most of his time, indeed, he spent idling about out of doors, for he possessed a free, untrained nature that could not exist confined between the walls of the palace, surrounded by the attendants who formed part of his suite. But one day such a feeling of restlessness came over him that he seized his cap, and, rushing into an adjacent wood, threw himself down to rest by the waters of the lake. And as he lay and pondered over many unfathomable things a dark frown appeared upon his face, for he could not help realising how little good he was in the world; but, just before he began to wish he had never been born, he was surprised to see an old woman gazing down upon him with an expression of pity upon her wrinkled features.

The Prince was rather annoyed at having his meditations disturbed, and he jumped to his feet with a frown. "Don't you understand that this wood belongs to the Crown, and is therefore private property?" he demanded, but the old woman nodded her head placidly.

"Nothing is private to me," she replied. "My knowledge and years are sufficient to allow me to pass anywhere. Besides, I have purposely sought you out to have a little chat. Let us sit down together."

Still feeling somewhat amazed, the young man reseated himself by his companion, who, by a few carefully chosen questions, soon caused him to open his heart and pour out his grumbles.

"Dear, dear!" she exclaimed sympathetically, "it is indeed sad. Here you are, a rich, good-looking young fellow, with nothing to trouble you and nothing to vex you. And yet you tell me you long to wander across this world in search of you know not what."

"I yearn to see life," he urged; "the monotonous routine of the palace is so irksome to me that I long to throw it aside. I do not desire that people should know me as a Prince of noble blood or son of a rich King. I want to leave that all behind me and have it forgotten; so I must go far, far beyond the palace grounds, and I am determined to do so, even if I die in the attempt."

"As your mind is made up," replied the old woman, "I will say naught to check your enthusiasm; nay, rather, I will help you. See this little white blossom? I will bind it round your brow, and wherever you go—even among evil-doers—they will not harm you while that sign is visible. It will win respect from everybody, though never love. And remember that while you carry such an emblem with you there is only one maiden in the world you may make your bride."

"But I do not want to wed anybody," objected the Prince.

"Not yet," said his companion, "but when the time comes seek your bride on the mountain top. Farewell!"

The Prince remained very still after the old woman's departure, until, having arranged his plans for setting forth upon his wanderings, he quietly stole into the palace when it was dark, and reached his apartments without meeting anybody. When he had written a long note of farewell to the King, he put a few necessary things into a bundle, and, after strapping it on his back, crept out of his home while everybody was sleeping and started gaily along the high road.

For several days he toiled on over the dusty roads, but never once did his heart fail him, nor did he regret all he had left. In time he sold the contents of his little bundle to supply himself with food, and his clothes were so worn and stained that he looked like a weary tramp. As he went along he occasionally raised his hand to ascertain if the little flower was safe, but soon he grew so accustomed to feeling it pressing upon his forehead that he almost ceased to think of it.

One pouring wet night, however, a band of robbers sprang out from behind the hedge to demand his purse, and, as it was not forthcoming immediately, they began to search for it, when suddenly one of them, by the flickering light of the lantern, discovered the flower the young fellow possessed. With an exclamation of surprise, he drew his companions' attention to it. "See," they cried, "he wears the white flower. Not a hair of his head shall be harmed." And this, indeed, proved to be the case.

Owing to the inclement weather, these wicked men entreated the Prince to share their humble lodging with them, and when he arose in the morning they accompanied him part of the journey. When they separated, and the robbers had returned to their vile hovel, they all so missed the white gleam of the stainless flower that, with an undefined feeling of purity in their hearts, they tried to live in a more honest, upright way, hoping that some day their visitor would return.

In the meantime the young man reached a village, but while there he found to his dismay that all the inhabitants of it, though showing him the utmost respect, shrank back from him with a strange repugnance. Women in trouble, although they recognised his right to be with them, turned their tear-stained faces away and drove him from their sides; grief-crushed men would sigh at his presence and yet remain uncomforted, while only the aged or very young sought his society willingly.

But at last this treatment made the wearer of the white flower so sad that in his loneliness he recollected the words of the old woman, and after much thought he decided to climb the heights in search of the bride she had mentioned. He toiled upwards for a weary period of time, until, when his feet were cut and bleeding, and the heat had tried him so terribly that every nerve of his body was strained and aching, he reached the summit

Overcome by fatigue, he lay on the ground and rested, until he was aroused by the sound of a pitiful sigh, and then he opened his eyes cautiously and peered about him. Bending over his prostrate form was a most beautiful maiden, who, as she looked upon his cut and bleeding feet, and noted the marks of privation stamped upon him, felt her heart so wrung in sympathy that she cried aloud. Without speaking, she fetched a bowl of water and some healing oils, and carefully attended to his needs, while, as the young fellow felt the touch of her gentle fingers and read the sorrow in her eyes, he knew he had found his bride. Therefore, when she had accomplished her kind deed, he gently raised her hand and laid it against the white flower on his brow; then, drawing her towards him, he pointed to the distant village and whispered "Come!"

Without a moment's hesitation, she started down the hill by his side, and together they reached the little cluster of cottages he had so recently left. But now everything was changed. The villagers gathered round them, fighting with each other to approach and to be the first to speak of their sorrows. The Prince remained with his bride, noting with joy how already she had won their hearts—the cold, hard hearts he alone had been powerless to touch—when suddenly the old woman again appeared at his side.

"Are you wearied of carrying Truth before the world?" she said, but he shook his head with a smile.

"I am happy now," he told her. "The people do not turn from me any longer. What is the meaning of it?"

"Your bride is Pity," explained his companion, "and Pity and Truth together mean Love, and that is what the poor require. Your teaching alone was too hard for their daily life of struggle, but now you are united to Pity all mankind will seek you out for comfort. Remember my words, and give to the world Truth and Pity, and all will be well with you. Farewell!"

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A POPULAR SPEAKER.

IN the ranks of Temperance speakers few men are rendering greater voluntary service as an honorary deputation than Mr. William Bingham, of London. As a director of the Sceptre Life Association, his duties take him to all parts of the country, and consequently he is known and beloved far beyond the metropolitan area. He is always ready and willing to give of his best to any Temperance Society in the locality which he happens to be visiting, and, as he has the rare capacity of being able to adapt himself to his audience, it will be at once recognised that the movement generally is greatly indebted to this enthusiastic worker. Born at Kingsworth, Kent, on November 5th, 1851, he signed the pledge of total abstinence as a lad of fifteen. He is an ardent Good Templar, and has been connected with the Order for upwards of thirty years. In the councils of this active organisation his ripe experience and excellent judgment are greatly valued; so, too, with the United Kingdom Alliance. In his early manhood he joined the staff of this well-known institution, and upheld its distinctive principles with great effect in many stormy meetings. He has now for some years been a member of the Executive Committee of the Alliance, and is a welcome speaker at its great gatherings. Prior to the last general election he was invited to stand for a Parliamentary division in the Midlands, and there can be little doubt that if he is sent up to St. Stephen's the ranks of the Temperance party in the House will be considerably strengthened, inasmuch as he is conversant with the whole movement from the top to the bottom. Mr. Bingham successfully keeps abreast of the trend of current opinion in Temperance circles, and at the same time has such a firm grip of the basis of the Temperance reformation that worthless opinions and notions receive short shrift under his keen criticism.

(Photo: A. H. De 'Ath, Ashford.)
MR. WILLIAM BINGHAM.

A WELL-KNOWN WORKER.

Mrs. H. J. Osborn, of Southend-on-Sea, is a typical example of a worker who is quite content to help the cause in the quiet, unobserved paths of service so often neglected by others, and yet of such vital moment to the general progress of the work. She has been an abstainer for thirty years and a Good Templar twenty-nine years. She joined the British Women's Temperance Association during "Mother Stewart's" crusade in 1876, and formed a branch of it in Bristol, of which she was president in 1878-79. Mrs. Osborn became a member of the National Executive in 1893, and has been Honorary Assistant Recording Secretary for the past five years. She takes a keen interest in the circulation of literature as an important part of the Temperance propaganda, and was one of the founders and joint editor of the White Ribbon for some years. To the World's Temperance Congress held in London in 1900 she contributed an excellent paper giving the story of the British Women's Temperance Association. She is now a resident of Southend-on-Sea, and is president of the local branch of the B.W.T.A. As a member of the School Board she has secured the introduction into the schools of Temperance lesson books and of scientific Temperance lectures. Mrs. Osborn, it will be seen, has an excellent record of steady, effective work to her credit, and her example shows how much one woman sincerely in earnest may accomplish for a cause in which she thoroughly believes.

(Photo: Fred Parsons, Southend-on-Sea.)
MRS. OSBORN.

AN INDIAN WORKER.

Metropolitan friends have given a cordial welcome to Miss Olive Christian Malvery, a highly cultured and gifted young Indian lady who is addressing meetings this season as a special deputation of the National Temperance League. She is a native of Lahore, and came to London primarily to obtain a musical training at the Royal College of Music. She has written several short stories and poems embodying the folk-lore of her native land, and selections from her own compositions give a freshness to her programmes which popular audiences much appreciate. Miss Malvery has already made several appearances in London and its suburbs, and the National Temperance League has arranged for many meetings in the leading provincial centres.

(Photo: A. H. Salmon, Lordship Lane, S.E.)

MISS OLIVE CHRISTIAN MALVERY.

"A CLOUD OF WITNESSES."

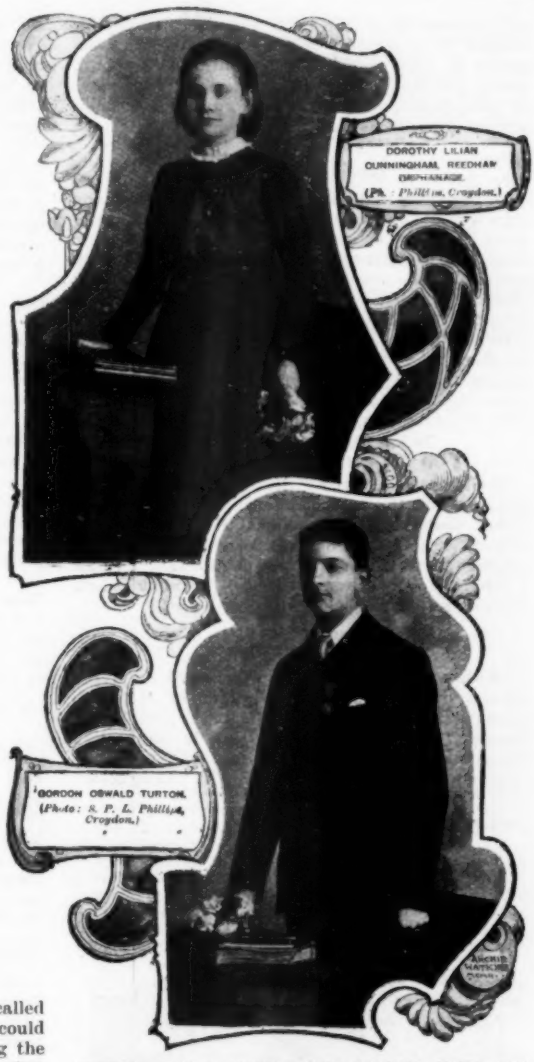
It is the glory of the Temperance movement that all along its chequered history its claims to recognition have been acknowledged by distinguished men and women in all walks of life. During the next few months we propose to bring before our readers a varied selection of opinions gathered from different sources, and representing a variety of professions and interests. We make a beginning with the doctors, because the medical testimony in favour of Temperance is so powerful and convincing that when once a person gives due weight to the argument which can be built up on a scientific basis, he almost of necessity becomes an extremely abstemious man, if not an out-and-out total abstainer. It is of special interest to recall that, in the early days of the Temperance movement, the importance of enlisting the help of the faculty was keenly recognised, and it is delightful to be able to record that even from the beginning there were a few disinterested medical men who rendered grand help to the cause. Frederic Richard Lees, although not a medical man, devoted his mind to a thorough study of the scientific aspect of the question, and by his speeches and writings rendered a service which stands absolutely alone. Dr. Ralph Barnes Grindrod, in his masterly prize treatise "Bacchus," which was published in 1839, devotes several sections of his brilliant work to the medical aspect of the question. Dr. Grindrod rendered yeoman service in addressing public meetings, and not a few of our foremost workers in those early days were recruited by his speeches. In Scotland the movement had the benefit of the powerful advocacy of Professor James Miller, whose "Alcohol, its Place and Power," published nearly fifty years ago, will still repay careful perusal. Nor can one forget that mine of scholarship and wide reading, Burne's "Teetotallers' Companion," published so far back as 1846, with its beautiful diagrams showing the action of alcohol on the stomach. A tribute must also be paid to the memory of that noble pioneer, Dr. John Higginbottom, of Nottingham, who in addressing a meeting in that city in 1835, announced that he had already been a personal abstainer for a quarter of a century. Think, too, of that sturdy Cornishman, Dr. Henry Mudge, of Bodmin. His voice, his pen, and his purse were freely at the disposal of the Temperance cause, and his lamented death was an irreparable loss. In London the movement was grandly helped in the early days by Dr. James Edmunds, who is happily still spared amongst us. And in more recent years great services have been given by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, Dr. Norman Kerr, Dr. James J. Ridge, Sir Thomas Barlow, Sir W. J. Collins, Sir Victor Horsley, and many more. The modern growth of Temperance opinion amongst the profession is largely due to the sagacity and foresight of the late Robert Rae. He it was who originated that remarkable Declaration which was published in The Times on New Year's Day, 1872, signed by two hundred and sixty-nine leading members of the medical profession.

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

"THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES.

ONCE again it is our pleasant duty to reproduce in our pages portraits of the winners of THE QUIVER Good Conduct Prizes for another year. At the Reedham Orphanage our prize is divided between the girls' and boys' schools. Dorothy Lilian Cunningham, to whom the prize was awarded on the girls' side, has an excellent report from her mistress, who is able to say that Dorothy has lost no marks during the year. In a very nice letter to the Editor, Dorothy, who is only eleven, says she has chosen a writing desk for her prize. On the boys' side at Reedham the medallist is Gordon Oswald Turton, who is just leaving, having nearly completed his fifteenth year. Mr. Carter, the headmaster, speaks of him as a very quiet, steady, reliable lad, and adds an interesting piece of news about Gifkins, who was our medallist last year at Reedham, and who only just missed this year's QUIVER prize, while he actually carried off his class prize for conduct. At the Gordon Boys' Home our medallist for 1902 is Sergeant George Brown, whose conduct has been so good since he joined the Home in 1900 that he has had no entry against him in the defaulters' book, and his instructor reports that he is the best working boy in the engineers' shop at the Home. By the unanimous vote of the 150 boys in the Shaftesbury School of the National Refuges, Bisley, David Eudaf Bowen was awarded our prize. He has been trained in the school as a tailor, is also a band boy, and is fourteen years of age.



WINNERS OF "THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES, 1902.

"THE QUIVER" HEROES' FUND.

NOT since the institution of this Fund have we had to record the presentation of so many medals in one month as it is our pleasant task to do in these pages. The wet summer of 1902 was a remarkable one in many ways, and not least in the number of distressing accidents which occurred. Happily, in many cases, these accidents did not lead to fatal results, and this was largely due to the fact that the need was the mother of the gallantry by which many lives were saved. Everyone must have read with sorrow of the distressing accident at Reighton Gap, near Filey, on August 22nd last, when five children, varying in age from three years to twelve, were surrounded on the sands by the rapidly rising tide. The cries of the little ones attracted the attention of their mothers, but already an impassable channel had been formed between the children and the shore. Drawn to the spot by the cries of the parents, Miss E. M. Fenwick, whose sister had already cycled towards Filey for aid, rushed into the water, followed by Mr. Cass, of Scarborough, and these two, as well as Miss E. Harper, of Reighton, made desperate but unavailing efforts to reach the little ones before they were swept away. No one of the three would-be rescuers could swim, yet they were in the water almost, if not quite, up to the neck, and Miss Harper who is slightly lame, entered the water three or four times before she abandoned her efforts to save the children. The case was gone into at an inquest before Mr. Luke White, M.P., His Majesty's Coroner for the East Riding of Yorkshire, and to this gentleman the Editor would express his thanks for the great trouble he took in verifying the facts upon which the award of a silver medal to each of the gallant three was made. The Editor has also to thank Mr. Luke White for receiving the medals and presenting them to their recipients. To Mr. White we are also indebted for the full particulars of a gallant rescue at Driffield on August 23rd, when a boy who was learning to swim was enticed by an older lad to attempt to swim across a bathing-place in the Driffield Canal. His strength failed when he was in the centre of the stream, and he would certainly have been drowned had not Samuel Lamplough, a boy of fifteen, jumped in to the rescue. This is the second time that Lamplough has shown his courage in saving life from drowning, and we had pleasure in presenting the bronze medal of THE QUIVER Heroes' Fund. Another bronze medal has been awarded to Donald MacCrea, who, also on August 23rd, rescued two little children from the canal at Lancaster. The little ones had been playing with some others on an empty barge on the canal, and these two, aged five and six, fell into the water. Without a moment's hesitation, MacCrea, who was engaged with some other men in pulling an empty barge at the time, dived in, and got one child out, not knowing that there was still another in the water. She had sunk to the bottom of the canal, and when her elder sister called out, "Oh! save my little sister!" MacCrea could only tell where the little one was by seeing the air bubbles rising to the surface of the water. Judging that the child was there, he took off his boots, dived in again, and brought the child to the surface quite unconscious, and it was only after artificial respiration had been tried for fifteen minutes that the little one began to show signs of life. In this case the Editor has to acknowledge the courtesy of his Worship the Mayor and the Chief Constable of Lancaster, the former in making the public presentation of the medal, and the latter in verifying the facts when the case was put before the Editor.

WINNERS OF "THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES, 1902.

The Magnet under the Binnacle.

A STORY is told of a criminal ship-master who carried his passengers to the West Coast of Africa to slavery and death instead of to America. The crime was rendered possible by the presence of a small magnet which had been secretly fixed under the compass, and which caused the needle to point wrong. The great magnet of the earth was neutralised by the small magnet close to the needle. How often one is disappointed to find the best influence powerless! Here is a man with excellent education and opportunity, yet he does nothing and is nothing. Here is a young fellow whose friends and surroundings are all of the best, and yet he chooses the most foolish courses. What is the reason? The magnet under the binnacle. There is some secret idol worshipped, some secret sin or evil habit practised, whose influence is so strongly felt by the soul that the power of God and good is neutralised. What power has God, or the things that are lovely and of good report, on a man whose mind is habitually full of impure images?

Looking unto Jesus.

IT has been well said that it is not "in our own wounds, but in the wounds of Jesus, that we must put our hands." We shall never recover from the wounds of sin if we are continually pulling off the bandages upon them to see how they are going on. Rather, it is by looking unto the Good Physician and away from ourselves. "Herein is love, not that we loved God," writes St. John, "but that He loved us." We are saved, not by the love we feel, but by the love we trust—

"Let me no more my comfort draw
From my frail hold of Thee;
In this alone rejoice with awe,
Thy mighty grasp of me."

"Shall we seek," wrote Cromwell in one of his letters, "for the root of our comforts within us? What God hath done, what He is to us in Christ, is the root of our comfort." "I think," he murmured as he lay on his deathbed, "I think I am the poorest wretch that lives; but I love God, or rather am beloved of God."

The Smallest Church.

SUSSEX claims to hold the record in three things. According to the author of "Bygone Sussex," it boasts of "the smallest church, the largest 'man,' and the oldest inn in the United Kingdom." These three wonders of Sussex lie within a few miles of each other. The "Long Man" or "Giant" of Wilmington keeps vigil on the downs overlooking that village. Little more than two miles south-west lies picturesque Alfriston, with its quaint old inn where the pilgrims to the shrine of Chichester were wont to rest. On the opposite side of the Cuckmere, separated by little more than the "silver streak" of that stream, is the pretty hamlet of Lullington, with its diminutive church claiming to be the smallest in the Kingdom. The fragment of external wall, against which the bicycle is resting, and the uneven state of the churchyard indicate that it was once larger.

THE SMALLEST CHURCH.

He Got his Degree.

WESTERN learning is gradually finding its way into China, and it is said that at a recent examination for a degree one candidate quoted in his essay the Ten Commandments. He got his degree by doing so, for the examiners considered that the commandments were an excellent summary of ethics.

Old, Good, and New News.

IN a published letter of the poet Tennyson there is this bit of autobiography. He was once lodged, he tells us, in a little village on the Lincolnshire coast "with two perfectly honest Methodists." When he arrived he asked his hostess after news. "Why, Mr. Tennyson," said she, "there's only one piece of news that I know—that Christ died for all men." "Well," answered Tennyson, "that is old news, and good news, and new news."

Rowland Hill's Chapel.

AT the close of this year 1902 old Surrey Chapel will probably be demolished. About a hundred years ago it was one of the most famous places of worship in London. Rowland Hill preached here, and was, indeed, the minister of the chapel for about fifty years. It was, however, built on leasehold property belonging to an old trust, called Brown's estate, and when the first lease of ninety-nine years was approaching completion the congregation, led by their then pastor, Dr. Newman Hall, built the handsome Christ Church in Westminster Bridge Road, a structure which is known as "the perpetuation of Surrey Chapel." Primitive Methodists then occupied the old building until the actual expiry of the lease, and they now have another edifice, called New Surrey Chapel, not far distant and also in Blackfriars Road. The original lease of old Surrey Chapel, which was built in 1782-83 for Rowland Hill's ministry, came to an end in 1881, and the premises were then let to a firm of engineers on a twenty-one years' lease, which expires on December 31st, 1902. During this period very little change has been made in the structure. The fine walls measure some thirty inches thick and seem as strong as ever. The old diamond-shaped window panes have, however, been taken out and larger lights substituted, while some parts of the building have been strengthened. The porch in the forecourt, facing Blackfriars Road, has also been removed, and a showroom erected in its place, while offices stand in the interior where the pulpit was placed. But, in the main, the characteristics of the structure have remained the same. The north and south porches have remained and have been used respectively as a lift-well, and for purposes of storage. The building is of octagonal shape, and the gallery may be seen circling the building with the light and not ungraceful arches springing upwards to the roof; the lantern in the circular ceiling still throws a flood of light on the space below; the organ loft, with the little narrow stairway leading to it, as also the vestry, the lecture hall, in which Rowland Hill gathered the first Sunday school held in London, and his parsonage house, all remain. The whole of the buildings, however, appear to be doomed, for the site—an area of some 18,800 feet superficial—has been offered for sale on building lease.

From her Point of View.

A GOOD-NATURED looking London barmaid recently gave a clergyman a singular reason for her disapprobation of the excellent new Licensing Act which forbids the sale of intoxicating liquors to children. "It used to make the place quite lively to see the little things coming in with their taking ways and their bright faces, and they so often had something pretty to say. Now we only get their stupid old fathers and mothers, and uncles and aunts!" The speaker meant kindly—too kindly for her particular way of livelihood, perhaps—but did she reflect how few of those childish faces might have remained "bright," how many of those treble voices might have become the reverse of "pretty," if this merciful piece of legislation had not been passed, which at least provides that the young shall not be positively thrust into the temptations of strong drink and into the contaminating atmosphere of the tap-room?

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from August 29th up to and including September 30th, 1902. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "An Irish Girl," £3, £3, £2 12s. 6d., 8s. 6d. The following amounts have been sent direct: Guy, 10s.; Gracedieu, 5s.; Eunice, 2s. 6d.; A. W., 2s. 6d.

For the Children's Country Holidays Fund: V. H., 10s.; M. N. R., 5s.; M. A. H., 5s.; M. P., 5s.; E. C., 4s.

 Christmas gifts are invited for THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund, and should be addressed to the Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

1. Why was it the children of Israel had so much difficulty in settling in the land of Canaan?
2. What nations did God not allow the Israelites to conquer because of their idolatry?
3. In what way did God show His compassion towards Israel in spite of their idolatry?
4. Which of the tribes is especially mentioned by Isaiah as the victim of intemperance?
5. What punishment was threatened because of their sin?
6. What command was given by God to Gideon to show that He would give him victory over the Midianites?
7. In what way did Gideon seek to gain confidence in fighting against the Midianites?
8. What present was given by the people to Gideon after his great victory over the Midianites?
9. In what way did Ruth show her sympathy with the widow Naomi?
10. How did God reward Ruth for her faithfulness to Naomi?
11. What was the first prophecy delivered by Samuel?
12. Had Eli any previous warning of God's displeasure against him and his sons?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 1227.

133. The fame of Joshua spread throughout the whole country, and the people were filled with fear, because Jericho was one of the most strongly fortified cities (Josh. vi. 27).

134. The priests led the procession round the city of Jericho to teach the Israelites that the destruction thereof was to be the work of God (Josh. vi. 8).

135. The Babylonish garment stolen by Achan was very costly, and the spoil must have been very great to enable him to take the garment and a wedge of gold without being seen (Josh. vii. 21).

136. The hill of Hebron, which was the chief settlement of the Anakims, who were giants (Josh. xiv. 12, 13).

137. The chieftain's name was Arba, after whom the city was called Kirjath-arba (Josh. xiv. 15, and xv. 13).

138. The hill of Zion or Jerusalem, where the Jebusites dwelt until David conquered them (Josh. xv. 63; 2 Sam. v. 7).

139. Six cities, three on each side of the river Jordan, to which a man might flee who had unintentionally killed another, and so be safe from the "avenger of blood" (Josh. xx. 2, 7-8; Num. xxxv. 6, etc.).

140. According to the old Patriarchal law, the nearest of kin had the right to avenge the death of his relative by slaying the murderer, and thus he was called the "avenger of blood" (Josh. xx. 3; Gen. ix. 6).

141. No. Everyone who escaped to a city of refuge was tried before the congregation, and he who was found guilty of murder was handed over to the "avenger of blood" (Josh. xx. 9; Deut. xix. 11, 12).

142. After the Israelites had been settled in the Promised Land Joshua exhorted the people to put away the false gods which they worshipped (Josh. xxiv. 14, 23).

143. The gods of their fathers on the other side of the flood (who were probably fire worshippers), the gods of Egypt, and the gods of the Canaanites, so that idolatry appeared to be very general (Josh. xxiv. 14, 15).

145. Having induced the people to put away all public idolatry and to serve God only, Joshua set up a stone as a memorial of the covenant which the people had made with him (Josh. xxiv. 25-27).

XUM

CHRISTMAS, 1902.

To the Readers of "The Quiver."

THE next Number of THE QUIVER, our December Issue, will, as in 1900 and 1901, take the form of a Christmas Double Number, and with each copy of THE QUIVER for December will be presented a large Plate, beautifully reproduced in Rembrandt Photogravure from the painting by MRS. SEYMOUR LUCAS, entitled admirably adapted for framing, and in itself worth many times the price of the whole Number. The frontispiece of the Number is another Rembrandt Photogravure, from the painting by MR. JAMES CLARK, "The Christmas Pudding," which was so popular in this year's exhibition of the Royal Academy. But to many, if not all of our readers, the chief attraction among the Plates of this year's Christmas Number will be the set of Eight Pictures entitled reproduced in colours from the original drawings specially made by MR. W. S. STACEY to illustrate the principal scenes in the child-life of our Lord. From their beauty and their fidelity to the unchanging life of the East, these Plates will prove of the greatest value to all parents and teachers, and of interest to every reader, for they are accompanied by a seasonable and sympathetic series of reflections by the VERY REV. F. W. FARRAR, D.D., Dean of Canterbury.

"WE ARE BUT LITTLE CHILDREN WEAK,"

THE CHILD WONDERFUL,

Other specially seasonable items among the contents of this Number are the following:—

"MESSAGES." A group of stories by AMY LE FEUVRE.

A NEW YORK CHRISTMAS BANQUET (for Poor Ladies). ELIZABETH L. BANKS.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL. Words and music by the REV. S. BARING-GOULD, Author of "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

A CHRISTMAS NOVEL, complete, and fully illustrated by PERCY TARRANT, entitled

A FAVOURITE OF FORTUNE. By Katharine Tynan.

And Three other Complete Stories by SCOTT GRAHAM, HARRY DAVIES, and HOWARD ANGUS KENNEDY.

MR. JOSEPH HOCKING'S stirring serial,

A FLAME OF FIRE,

will be found to gather interest as the reader becomes even better acquainted with it, and the further chapters amply bear out the promise of the opening instalment. And this is true also of our second serial, MISS M. A. BALLIOL'S

THE MISTRESS OF THE SECOND FORM.

Lack of space will not allow us to give further details of the contents of this Number, but among contributors who have not yet been mentioned are MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD, the REV. DR. LYMAN ABBOTT, and the REV. J. W. GEDGE, while all the standing attractions of THE QUIVER will be continued.

* As it will be difficult, if not impracticable, to reprint this unique Number when once the first edition is exhausted, we advise our friends to bespeak their copies without delay. Only in this way can they be sure of receiving the magazine upon the day of publication.

READY NOVEMBER 26, 1902. PRICE ONE SHILLING.

UNIV. OF MICH.

From the Painting by James Clark, Exhibited at the Royal Academy, 1900.

THE CHRISTMAS PUDDING.

A FLAME OF FIRE

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,

Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—III.

In the year 1587, the year before the coming of the Great Armada to English shores, Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, near Barnet town, having returned wounded from the wars, and having spent some time at his father's house, hears, through John Trenoweth, of Cornwall, that an old friend of his mother's is in the power of the Inquisitors of Spain. Being also desirous of finding out the Spanish plots concerning England, he determines to go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, of Cornwall, and John Trenoweth, in order to rescue the unfortunate lady, and to discover Spanish secrets. He therefore starts for Cornwall with John Trenoweth, and on his journey falls into the hands of Jesuit spies.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HAPPENING AT "THE VIRGIN QUEEN."

"THE inn is a safe inn—that I can vouch for," continued one of them presently. "It is true some may be led to think the innkeeper, Thomas Toadsby by name, is somewhat of a turncoat, seeing he hath changed the name of his house three times since he hath lived there. First he called it 'King Edward's Arms,' then when Mary came to the throne he called it 'Queen Mary's Head,' while now 'The Virgin Queen' is on the signpost."

"He is like many others in that matter," I replied. "There be not only innkeepers but priests who have altered with the altering times."

"Aye, I suppose so, but Thomas Toadsby is safe now. The last time I stayed at the inn I found that he not only kept good sack, but also kept a keen eye for heretics. I tell you he will not serve a customer who shows any leanings towards the abominations of Mary's time."

"Think you the Jesuits make any headway in England?" I asked.

"Difficult to say," replied the man who had taken the part of spokesman. "Campion's death hath made them very wary, and since Father Parsons thought it best to leave the country for safety's sake they have greatly lacked a leading mind."

"Have you ever met Father Parsons?" I inquired.

"I believe I saw him once," said the man.

"What was he like?" I asked, little thinking that before many months were over this man's features would be engraved on my mind and memory in such a way that to the day of my death I shall never be able to forget them. For, as all the world knows, Father Parsons was at this time the main instrument used by the Pope for seeking to win England back to the Romish faith. He was the topic of conversation among many thousands of people, and many there were who thought they would get a safe entrance into heaven by bringing him to justice. Pictures of his face had been scattered all over the land, warrants for his arrest had been issued again and again, while all sorts of inducements had been offered to effect his capture. But Father Parsons proved too clever for his pursuers. He got a new name far more often than he got a new coat, and he had a strange way of ingratiating himself into the confidence of those who hated all Jesuits right heartily. It is said that Queen Elizabeth herself feared him, because he was ever in communication with Philip of Spain, and was also used as a medium of communication between the Pope and the King. It was believed, moreover, that he had more influence with the Jesuits than even the General of the order, and that he had secretly succeeded in persuading English Catholics to be ready to take up arms against Queen Elizabeth when the time should come for Philip to invade England.

FROM THE PAINTING BY JAMES CLARK, EXHIBITED AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY, 1900

XUM

In truth, so great was the mystery of this man that he was believed by some to possess more than human power. Some held that his power came direct from the devil, while others were of the opinion that the Pope had invested him with some of his own authority. Be that as it may, nearly everyone believed that, should Philip be able to land his soldiers on our shores, and to succeed in conquering our people, it would be because Father Parsons had caused the English Catholics to fight against their own country.

This being so, it was no wonder that I somewhat forgot my caution, and eagerly asked the man by my side questions concerning this notorious Jesuit.

"Strange as it may seem," he said, "I believe I saw him at the inn to which we are going to-night at Willacombe. I was empowered to arrest him, and I had caused to be placed at 'The Virgin Queen' and other hostels and taverns the picture of this notorious man. I fear me it was not an over-good picture, but still it did in some degree suggest his face. Well, I was sitting in the inn where several men were sitting over their sack and talking with one another about this picture.

"'Marry,' said one, 'but if Father Parsons appears, I will get him dragged to London straightway. I will get a hundred angels to put in my pouch, and our gracious Queen will remember me for ever.'

"'Would you know him, think you?' said another.

"'Know him!' said the first. 'I would know him in the dark.'

"While they were talking a man came up on horseback, and shouted for the ostler.

"'And whose picture is that, ostler?' he said, as the man took his horse.

"'That,' said the ostler, 'is the most famous tool the devil ever forged. It is no less than Father Parsons the Jesuit!'

"'What!' cried the traveller, 'Parsons the Jesuit, that son of Belial! How dare you, sirrah, insult faithful servants of the Queen by flaunting the picture of such a man in their faces! Down with it, I say!' and before the ostler could stop him he tore it down from the wall, and stamped it underfoot.

"'How dare you,' he cried to Toadsby as he came in, 'how dare you pollute my eyes by hanging the picture of such a child of hell so near your stepping-block?'*

"'I only did it in the hope of catching him,' said Toadsby.

"'Ah! well, on that count I will forgive you,' he said, 'but let us drive such a wretch from our minds. Father Parsons will not come this way, you may depend. But since I find so many loyal friends to our Queen and the Reformed religion here, I will pay for a pint of sack to each and all.'

"At this, you may depend, all greeted the newcomer right heartily, and we spent some hours drinking with him. But know you who it was?"

"Father Parsons," I replied.

"Aye, that I believe it was. For afterwards, when I learnt more about him, I discovered that that same night he left the inn and stayed at the house of Sir Richard Carnforth, who was a bigoted Papist, and when I came to reflect on matters I remembered that his face was mightily like the one in the picture. Besides, afterwards, when Parsons had escaped to Spain, Master John Peacock, Sir Richard Carnforth's steward, told me that the man whom we took to be such a friend of the Reformed religion was not less than this terrible Jesuit. What think you of the story, young master?"

"I think I would like to have had the chance you had," I replied. "I warrant me the Jesuit would not have got off so easily."

"Think you so? Ha! ha! Well, perchance not, for you look a shrewd young gallant. But you will not have the chance, my young master, for he is in Spain now, and an English Protestant dare not put his foot on Spanish soil in these days."

"That's as may be," I said, with a meaning look towards John Trenoweth, who, however, was looking sourly towards his horse's head.

"I fear me not. I would to heaven that I knew of someone who did dare, for I have a cousin there, concerning whose fate I fear greatly."

"A Protestant?" I asked.

"Aye, a right loyal Protestant. He went in

* This story about Father Parsons is perfectly true in all particulars.

great zeal to Toledo. For what purpose I may not say."

"And why not say, my master?" I asked.

"Because no man knows who's who in these days," he replied. "Why, think! here am I holding the Queen's warrant to arrest Jesuits; look at it, young master" (and he produced a piece of parchment), "yet was I in danger not long ago of being arrested as a Jesuit myself!"

I looked at the parchment, and saw that Master Nicholas Seyton and Master Francis Belmont, being tried and proved servants of the Queen, and having shown their devotion on many occasions by bringing traitors to justice, were authorised to arrest Jesuits and to command the help of all loyal men to assist them in their undertakings.

"I am Nicholas Seyton," said the man, "and my friend here is Master Francis Belmont, yet in spite of this warrant both of us have been suspected of being Jesuits!"

"Not after you had shown this?" I said questioningly.

"No, but that is not all. There is another side to this story. Not so many months ago, while doing our work, we fell in with some men who purported to be men of standing and loyal subjects. We got to talking, and, believing in the truth of what they said, we told them of the work we had in hand, and how we hoped to bring two notorious Jesuits to justice. We even went so far, under the influence of a quart of good sack, to tell them some of our plans. Well—would you believe it?—they were themselves friends of the Jesuits, and gave warning to the very men we hoped to drag to London town! What think you of that, young master?"

"I think you must have been easily taken in," I replied.

"Aye, perchance we were; but this kind of thing doth not happen again, young master. 'Once bitten, twice shy,' as the old proverb hath it, and so for the future we tell none of our plans until we be sure to whom we speak."

I was about to parley further with these men, for the warmth of their speech and the mission upon which they were engaged pleased me much; but at this moment John Trenoweth's horse stumbled, and he dismounted, and looked at the horse's hoofs as though somewhat was the matter.

"What is it, Master Trenoweth?" I asked.

"Come and help me, if it please you," replied the Cornishman; "we can soon overtake these good masters again, and enjoy more of their pleasant society."

I therefore dismounted, and came close to John Trenoweth, who was examining the horse's hoofs carefully, but with which I could not for the life of me see that aught ailed.

"The hoofs are all right," I said.

"Aye, and the horse is all right," he said in a low voice; "but I trust not those men, Master Rupert. They speak too freely, and give too many confidences on so short acquaintance. A still tongue makes a wise head, young master. Let us hear all, and say nothing. And, for my own part, I be right vexed that you did speak my name aloud in their hearing, for Master Killigrew is well known, and John Trenoweth hath been spoken of as one who shares his confidences. Take my advice, Master Rupert—mention no man's name, and tell no one whither we be bound."

And with these words John Trenoweth, after having made a great ado about his horse's hoofs, and using his knife as if to prise a stone which might have been jammed between the shoe and the hoof, he presently mounted again, upon which we rode on and overtook our companions.

But little was said during the remainder of our journey to Willacombe, although Master Nicholas Seyton and Master Francis Belmont continued to regard us with a friendly air, and spoke of our enjoying our good sack together in "The Virgin Queen."

No sooner did we arrive at the inn than I saw at a glance that Toadsby, the innkeeper, was on good terms with my companions. He received them with great respect, and assured both them and us that a good meal should be presently forthcoming. In this he kept his promise, for in a very short time a smoking haunch of beef was on the table, the which, being hungry, we fell to right heartily. After the meal we were joined by several of the villagers, whose tongues were speedily unloosed by the sack and ale which they consumed.

I may here say that, although at the time I little liked John Trenoweth's caution, fancying myself more capable than he of knowing how much to say to one's fellow-travellers, I nevertheless took his advice to heart, so that no word did I let fall concerning who I was or for what purpose we were travelling westward. As a consequence I was but little prepared for what followed; for we had been but a little time over our wine, when the innkeeper, Thomas Toadsby, came in and spoke to Master Nicholas Seyton in a low voice. Immediately Toadsby had spoken, Seyton fastened his eyes upon me, and directly after rose up as if in great anger.

"Aye, my masters," he cried aloud, "I thought not, when these men overtook us to-day, that I was speaking to an enemy of our Queen and country."

"What mean you?" cried several.

"This," replied Seyton. "I have my suspicions that these two men here are Jesuits in disguise, and that they are bent upon a mission which means danger to our country. Such a thought came into my head when they stopped on the road in order to have converse together, but I quickly drove it away, as being insulting to men of honour, as I hoped they were. But I have received information that this is one Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, who is well known to be a Catholic and a secret enemy of our Queen."

"It is a lie," I said, angrily, placing my hand on my sword-hilt.

"As to that we shall see right quickly," said Master Seyton. "Meanwhile, be assured that we will not be bullied out of our duty. Besides, what is a lie? Be you, or be you not, the son of Sir Richard Hamstead?"

"I am," I cried hotly, "and he who says Sir Richard Hamstead is not a loyal gentleman is a liar, and I will drive his lies down his throat with my sword-hilt!"

"Ah, my masters!" said the man Seyton in a tone of triumph, "he confesses that he is the son of Sir Richard Hamstead, and Sir Richard is a Catholic."

"But no Jesuit!" I cried. "He hates them."

"Of that after, of that after!" said Seyton, repeating his words twice, as though he wanted to impress them upon the minds of the villagers, who by this time were all agog. "He admits that his father is a Catholic. And now another question, worthy gentlemen. Can Master Rupert Hamstead prove to us, the trusted servants of the Queen, and possessing a warrant to arrest all Jesuits, can he prove to us that the journey he is now taking is not to carry out some plot of the Catholics?"

"Aye, I can," I replied, "but I will give no answers to such as you!"

"Hear him, my masters!" said Seyton; "hear him! He will give me no answer. Can he deny that he projects a journey to Spain?"

At this I was silent, wondering greatly why they should be led to ask such a question, until I remembered that I thought I saw them smile when I partly combated their statement that no English Protestant dared to put his foot on Spanish soil.

"He doth not speak, my masters, he doth not speak, and this augurs badly for him. And yet I would be just. I am not a harsh man, neither would I drag a man before the justices without sufficient reason. All the same, I must do my duty. If this young man, Master Rupert Hamstead, and his fellow-traveller will give good account of themselves, I will let them go. If not, then, my masters, I call upon you to stand by me while I arrest these men in the Queen's name."

In truth, the affair began to look serious, and I began to reflect as to the course I should take.

"Answer this first," said Seyton. "Is it your purpose to go to Spain?"

I was angry at the man's persistence, and, without heeding my words, I cried out hotly, "And what if it is? It is no affair of yours."

"This augurs badly," said the man Seyton, "very badly. And for this reason: no English Protestant's life is safe in Spain, and no Englishman goes thither unless in league with the Jesuits. Moreover, his father is a Catholic. Doubtless, moreover, this fellow here is also associated with a Catholic. His name is Trenoweth—that I know. Trenoweth is a Cornish name, and although the county is right loyal as a whole, yet there be many traitors there."

"I will tell you who I be," said Trenoweth. "I be the steward of Master Killigrew, a trusted councillor of our Queen. Aye, and more: Master Killigrew was called a rebel in Mary's time, because he would not fall in with her Papist devices, and for that reason he had to fly to France, where he remained until Mary's death. What think you of that, you treason hunters! I am a Protestant, and I hate all Popery. 'Down with it!' I say."

At this Thomas Toadsby's ostler came into the room, and whispered something in Seyton's ear, who exchanged a meaning glance with his friend. Whereupon both of them rose, Seyton saying, "This seems better, but keep them both safe for a few minutes. We are called away now, but we will return presently, and go into this matter more fully."

With this they left the room, while the villagers looked at each other, as if to question what they should do next.

"This be mighty strange behaviour, my masters," said a stout yeoman presently. "These two men have accused these travellers of being Jesuits, they have given it out that they mean to arrest them, and then they have both left as though they were afraid of something themselves."

"Aye, but they be afraid of nothing," said another, "for they be in favour at Court, and hold Her Majesty's commission."

"So they say, but I would like their warrants to be examined by some learned clerk. I would, in truth."

"Aye, but Master Thomas Toadsby hath seen their warrant."

"Then let us speak with Thomas Toadsby.

True he keeps good sack, but I love not his ways. Anything under Henry, Protestant under Edward, Catholic under Mary, and Protestant again under Her Gracious Majesty. Such turncoats please me not. But what say you, my masters? Be you Jesuits?"

"Jesuits!" I cried hotly. "I have sailed with Sir Francis Drake and Sir Richard Grenville.

"What seek you, my masters?" asked Toadsby, tremulously, I thought.

"Seek!" replied one of the newcomers, "we seek two Jesuits who be masquerading as servants of the Queen. They have been long going around saying they have a warrant to arrest all those who be plotting against Her Majesty, and all the time they be plotting

"'It is a lie,' I said, angrily, placing my hand on my sword-hilt.'

I am a friend of Sir Walter Raleigh, and have been trusted by Lord Howard. See, I have a letter in my pouch written by Sir Walter Raleigh himself. Look at it yourself." The stout yeoman gazed at it steadily, although I doubt much if he could read a single word.

"Aye, it is written by Sir Walter Raleigh himself," he said admiringly. "Another cup of sack to our noble travellers, and may the foul fiend take those marplots!"

At this my heart sunk, strange as it may seem, for a thought came into my mind which troubled me sorely. And this thought was immediately confirmed, for at that very moment there was the sound of horses' hoofs, and three men came into the room.

Jesuits in disguise. They be working under orders from Father Parsons, yet in the guise of the Queen's trusted servants they be working against her, and they be seeking to find out the plans of loyal Englishmen by parading their false pretences."

"Their names?" I cried eagerly.

"They do call themselves Master Nicholas Seyton and Master Francis Belmont," he replied; "but I tell you that in reality they be two Jesuit priests. Hast seen them, young master?"

"They left less than half an hour ago," I cried, "after charging me with treason."

"Ah! say you so? Tell us more, young master."

CHAPTER V.

HOW I FIRST MET MAWGAN KILLIGREW.

AS may be easily comprehended, I was not long in telling my story, and no sooner did I finish than the newcomers started for the stable with great haste, but found both men and horses gone.

"Where is Toadsby?" cried the leader of the party, who afterwards told us he was called Henry Blount.

"Here," said the innkeeper tremulously,

"Where be these men gone?" cried Blount.

"Nay, I know not, my masters, except that they had wind of an affair of importance which they must presently see into. I told them they had already an affair with these worthy masters here; but they heeded me not, but rode away as though the furies were at their heels."

"Have a care, Thomas Toadsby," said Blount, "have a care. For a long time thou hast been suspected of foul play."

"But, my masters, I swear by the Mass—by that I mean the holy Gospel, and may I be forgiven for using such a Papist heathen term!—that I am a true man."

"Thou art a false, lying varlet," cried Blount, "and unless thou dost mend thy ways thou shalt lie in Fleet prison, and in the same dirty cells to which thy old friend Stephen Gardiner committed honest men in Mary's time. Thy account is getting longer and longer, and proofs of thy falseness are coming in apace."

"Nay, Master Blount, I am an honest innkeeper. It is true I turned Catholic in Mary's time, because I was not fully instructed in the true faith; but since our Gracious Virgin Queen ascended the throne, through the sermons of the Reverend Josiah Moggram, I have seen the error of my ways. And, in truth, I believe you do judge those worthy gentlemen harshly. They have been here before, and I know them to be good Protestants, hating all things Popish right heartily."

At this one of Blount's companions entered the stable, carrying a package which had been fastened to the saddle-bags of Master Belmont.

"What have you there?" asked Blount, "and where got you it?"

"As to where I got it," replied the other, "I can tell right easily. I got it from the room where these Jesuits arranged to spend the night. I discovered Toadsby's wife in the act of hiding it. As to what it contained, I know not, for I brought it to you straightway."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Blount a minute later, "here is another whip for your back, Thomas Toadsby. Look! here is no less than the robes of a Jesuit priest! These be your loyal gentlemen—eh, Thomas Toadsby? Here be the Papist things that your wife was trying to hide—and she a listener to the Reverend Josiah Moggram!"

"Nay, my masters, I grieve to say it; but my wife sees not with me in this matter. I much fear me she is still afraid of the hell fires which the priests try and frighten women with. And it may be they have persuaded her, or commanded her, to do that which I should condemn most heartily."

"I believe that thou art a liar, Thomas Toadsby," said Blount, "but while we parley they escape. Tipston and Shepstone, do you ride after them. There is but one road that they can have gone, and it may be you can catch them. As for me, I will make further inquiries here, especially of these two worshipful gentlemen who have suffered at their hands."

At this Blount led the way back to the inn, evidently anxious to get to his sack, and glad to have an excuse for sending his two companions on what seemed to me a hopeless task. For, as all the world knows, although the feeling was becoming stronger and stronger against the Catholics, largely because the Pope had encouraged Philip of Spain to come to England and drive the Queen from her throne, there were many Catholics throughout the country. At this time, moreover, it was difficult to tell who was who. Many there were who, while professing the Reformed faith outwardly, were Catholics at heart, and needed only the visit of a priest to lead them to plan for the reconversion of England to the old faith. Many there were, especially among women, who dared not disobey the priest's command, and as a consequence men like Campion, and Throgmorton, and Bentley had again and again been hidden in houses that were supposed to be owned by believers in the Reformed faith. In truth, it often happened that, while the husbands and brothers had given up all connection with Rome, their wives and sisters were still in league with the Jesuits.

This being so, I knew that Seyton and Belmont would have no difficulty in finding hiding-places, and I felt sure that Tipston and Shepstone would presently return saying they could find no track of them anywhere. In this, moreover, my surmises were correct, at the which Blount seemed by no means surprised, and, if the truth must be told, not over-much concerned.

"But we will find them, Master Hamstead," he said again and again, "and we will bring Thomas Toadsby to book in the bargain."

We sat up late that night, Master Blount asking me many questions, to which I answered warily, telling him nothing that I did not wish the world to know, yet enough to satisfy his curiosity. He, on the other hand, gave me much news. He told me that three Jesuits had been put to torture, with the result that they had confessed to a plot to murder the Queen, having been led to believe that they would thereby be serving God and saving the country. Others there were, however, who declared that they made these confessions, not because they were true, but because they hoped to escape punishment. He told me, moreover, that many believed the great Armada had already sailed, and might be expected on English seas any day; while some had it that the moment the Spaniards put their feet on our shores half the nation would fight under Philip's banner. But that, he said, he did not believe, because everywhere the best families in England—some of them Catholics—were not only providing men, but vessels, in order to be ready to fight the Spaniards on sea, and so prevent them from landing.

"Ah, but we shall have hard times soon, Master Hamstead!" he said.

"Why think you so?" I asked.

"Because our Gracious Queen will not believe the danger. She will grant neither men nor money, and so Lord Howard and Sir Richard Grenville, although they be loyal Englishmen, feel sore at heart at being so cramped. And it is hard for such men as they, not only to have to provide men, but to victual them. Aye, and it is harder to think that, should the Armada come, we have neither powder nor cannon balls to fight them!"

"And what think you can be done, Master Blount?"

"This, Master Hamstead. Our Queen ought to have laid before her the strength of the fleet the King of Spain proposes sending. And more: absolute proofs will have to be laid before her that he is really coming."

At this I thought of the mission upon which I was engaged; but I said nothing to Blount, because I did not judge him to be wise of head, and because my experiences that day had made me wary.

The following morning we were early in the saddle, and so we did not see Master Blount again. In truth, as I passed his chamber door, I heard him snoring with great vigour, like a man who had yet hours of sleep before him.

"You seem thoughtful, Master Rupert," said John Trenoweth after we had travelled some while.

"That am I," I replied, and more than thoughtful: I am sad at heart."

"And why, if I make so bold as to ask?"

"I fear me much, John Trenoweth, that yesterday's doings augur ill for us."

"And why?"

"Because I believe Seyton and Belmont planned our meeting. I believe they had suspicion of our designs, and so used means to find them out."

"But how could they?"

"Nay, I know not how their suspicions came. Perchance you dropped some idle word while on your way to my father's house. Perchance Master Killigrew's plans have been spoken about in Falmouth; but of this I know not. This we know: these two men are now aware of our plans."

"But we told them nothing."

"Aye, but we did. They have now a shrewd idea that we are bound for Spain, and they will warn such of their friends as they desire of our purpose in going thither."

"I do not believe it," said John Trenoweth stoutly, "for, in truth, we told them nothing worth the telling."

"We told them much, I tell you. I, like a fool, admitted that I was bound for Spain, while thou didst openly parade the fact that thou wert the dependent of Master Killigrew. Think you that these men do not know how to put two and two together? Why, man, they spend their lives in finding out secrets, and thus will have means of information unknown to us. But it cannot be helped now. What is spoken is spoken. Aye, but they be clever fellows!"

"Not so clever but that they will be dragged to justice," replied John Trenoweth.

"Nay, I know not. It was a bold game they played, worthy of Father Parsons himself. Why, think you, man, they laid their plans so carefully that we could scarce do other than divulge what was in our minds."

"I pray God we may meet them again," said John Trenoweth fervently.

"I fear me, if we meet them again, it will not be on English soil," I replied. "If we meet them again, it will be in a country where honest men have to hide their heads, and where English Protestants are burned like dry fuel."

As may be imagined, we kept a sharp look out for enemies all the rest of our journey; but naught happened to us worth the mentioning, and presently, after we had been towed across the Tamar, and rode through the town of Saltash, I felt that I must soon be able to place a plan before Master Killigrew and Sir John Tremayne that should show them that I was worthy of the confidence they placed in me.

I also fell to wondering what kind of a man

Mawgan Killigrew might be, and how he might regard the idea of accepting me as the leader of our expedition; but this did not trouble me much, for although John Trenoweth did not speak freely about the young master, I gathered that he was good-natured and lovable. Not, perhaps, over-quick of brain, but kind and faithful, never having been known to go back upon his word.

"And he is not likely to fail at a pinch?" I asked.

"A Killigrew fail at a pinch!" he replied. "Such a thing was never known—that is, with the Killigrews of Arwenack. They have ever been a wild race, sea-rovers, fighters, hard drinkers, and the like; but not one has ever been known to play false to a brother in arms. Aye, but thou wilt never have to regret having a Killigrew as a comrade. Faithless with women I much fear me some of them have been, but with men, never!"

"Faithless with women!" I said.

"Aye, some of them have been sad dogs; not in the way you think, but—well, I will not speak of them more."

"And hath Mawgan a good name among the Falmouth people?"

"Aye, that he hath. Neither man nor maid hath an evil word for him. From stable-boy to lord, and from serving-maid to high-born lady, all love Master Mawgan."

"And hath he had love affairs, Master Trenoweth?" I asked, curiously, for I much desired to be acquainted of his ways.

"Nay," replied the Cornishman. "I never knew Master Mawgan heave a sigh for any woman. Dogs he loves, horses he loves, and a good fight he delighteth in; but love for women doth not seem to come into his heart. In that matter you and he be alike, Master Rupert."

"As to that," I replied, "I have many times vowed that, until I meet a maid as fair and as good as my mother, love for women cannot enter my heart; and my friend Walter Raleigh hath it that, if I abide by my vow, I shall remain loveless all my days."

"For me," said John Trenoweth, "there is only one woman. Esther Truscott is the maid I loved twenty years agone, and she is still the only maid in the world to me. I wonder where she is now? God grant that——But let us hurry on, Master Hamstead. There is no time to waste!"

At these words a fierce look came into his eyes, his teeth became set, while he dashed his heels into his horse's sides in a way that made me think he had taken leave of his senses.

I well remember the time we drew near to Truro town. We had been in our saddles all day, and both men and horses were as dead tired as hard riding could make them.

"Is there a good inn here, John Trenoweth?" I asked.

"A good inn? Aye, there be good inns in plenty," said the Cornishman. "Think you, in coming to my native county, you be coming to a heathen land? But we have naught to do with inns."

"Naught to do with inns?" I repeated.

"Nay," he replied. "Why, man, we be only fourteen miles from Falmouth town, and but fifteen from Arwenack House."

"Aye, but it is seven o'clock at night," I replied, "and we have been in the saddle since early morn, and our horses be dead tired."

"And what of that? The horses can rest a week—a month. I tell you, Master Rupert, we go straight on, save to give the horses a drink of barley and water and take a mug of ale ourselves."

"But I am dead tired, man, and feel as though I can sleep in the saddle!"

"Then sleep in thy saddle, most worthy friend of Walter Raleigh," said John Trenoweth, "and methinks the men you profess to have served, and boast so much about, were well rid of you. The man who is but fifteen miles from his journey's end, and yet will break that journey at an inn, is but poor stuff."

"Much more of that, and I will lay my riding switch across your back, John Trenoweth," I said, angrily.

"Lay it on," said the Cornishman, with a laugh, "lay it on; but I doubt me if I could feel it. The man who is too tired to ride from Truro to Falmouth has but little strength to spare; while he who whines like a sick baby because he hath been in his saddle for twelve hours will be but a poor leader to——"

I did not let him finish his sentence, for, angered by his taunt, I drew my horse close to his, and struck him a cuff in the head with my fist.

"That for the strength of my arm, John Trenoweth," I said, "and if you dare speak in such a manner again I will thrash you like a stable-boy."

At this he jumped from his horse, and before I knew what he thought of doing he had dragged me to my feet, and then fell to trying to shake me, as a terrier might shake a rat.

At this we fell to wrestling, and soon I found that in point of strength John Trenoweth was my equal, if not my master. And while he could not throw me, I, on the other hand, could no more move him than if he had been an oak-tree.

We were, as I have said, near to Truro town—about two miles away, in truth, close by the village of Tresillian, and at the very gates of Tregothnan, the famous home of the Boscawens. The evening was perfectly still and clear, and just before my harangue with John Trenoweth I had noticed the beauty of wooded hill and flowery dell, together with the broad stretch of water that nestled between the hills.

"Strike me, wud 'ee!" said John Trenoweth, lapsing into the Cornish vernacular. "Oh, you be but a droozle head you be, a poor, soft-armed boobah that bean't vit to provide mait for a dree-days-ould yaw kitten," and then he fell to, heaving at me madly. "Where sh'll I put 'ee?" he continued to grunt. "In the revver! No, I wa'ant dirty the watter by that. Shall I taake 'ee to Fammuth town? Oh, that the Loard shud 'a made such baisly traade!" And again he tried to drag me around the road, until I felt sure he must be mad.

At this I began to devise means whereby I might break free from his grasp (for I could do nothing while he held me fast), after which I felt sure I could bring him to his senses. In this, however, I was unsuccessful. He held me with a grip of iron, and continued to try and drag me around the road, grunting and talking all the time.

"Holloa! what's up here?" said a loud, cheery voice.

"Doan't 'ee interfere for a minit or two more, Maaster Mawgan," said Trenoweth; "'tes nearly gone now. There, tha's yer soarts," and then suddenly he gave me a great heave which sent me staggering across the road, after which he quietly walked towards his horse.

"What! John Trenoweth, again!" said the newcomer.

"Yes, Master Mawgan," said Trenoweth in a perfectly quiet and calm tone. "For four days I have travelled with Master Rupert Hamstead, and up to now have found it impossible to quarrel with him. As a consequence I was nearly mad with my thoughts and my memories. But tis over now. All the same, I did not expect to see you here, Master Mawgan."

"Aye, but I could not stay at home another hour. For three days I have fretted and fumed, and this afternoon I could bear it no longer. I fancied you must be drawing near, so I determined to start out to meet you. Is this Master Rupert Hamstead?"

"He held me in a grip of iron."

"Aye, that it is, and this, Master Rupert, is my young master, Mawgan Killigrew."

I had by this time been able to have a good look at my future companion, and, without knowing why, my heart went out towards him with a great love. The ring of his voice was so true, and the look on his face so pleasant (for this I was able to see by the evening light), that I wanted nothing more to tell me that he and I would stand true to each other.

"Ah, Master Hamstead," he said, "I little wot I should meet you in this fashion. And yet I be not surprised. In truth, I wonder he hath held up so long without seeking a quarrel, but of that more later. You have had a long day, so perchance we had better stay at Truro to-night."

"I am tired no longer," I replied, "for my quarrel with John Trenoweth hath been to me as good as a night in bed. Therefore let us haste with all speed."

"Right willingly," said Mawgan Killigrew, "for, truth to tell, I believe neither my father nor Sir John Tremayne will go to bed until you come. Much hath happened since John Trenoweth left us, so much that it will be necessary for us to use all speed. But enough of that now. This is neither the time nor place to talk of such things. So let us mount, and away."

Suiting the action to the word, he sprang on his horse, while John Trenoweth and I followed his example, and a little later were climbing the hill which lay between us and Truro town.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF A SPANISH PROVERB.

MY father had more than once spoken to me of the beauties of Cornwall, and as I rode through Truro and afterwards along the road towards Falmouth I did not wonder at it. Often as I had boasted of the lovely country which surrounded my home, I had to admit without parley that nothing in the county of Hertford could compare with the valley of the Fal. In truth, as once on our journey we stood on a hill which commanded a view of the river and of the wooded slopes around, I fairly heaved a sigh of wonder, so lovely was the scene. As we rode along, moreover, a party of boatmen rowed towards Malpas, and as they rowed they sang one of those simple airs for which Cornwall is so famous, and which to me sounded beautiful beyond words.

"No wonder you Cornish people are proud of your county, Master Killigrew," I said to the young fellow who rode by my side. "The very air seems to breathe romance and beauty."

"Aye, but wait until you have seen Falmouth harbour," laughed Mawgan Killigrew. "All the same, I shall be glad to get away from it; for, as true as I am a living man, I would rather be in Spain with a price set upon my head than here in Cornwall."

"And why?" I asked.

"Why? Because I long for action. I am almost as bad as John Trenoweth here, in my desire for a fight. Besides, I have been sorely vexed."

I looked at him questioningly.

"I may as well tell you at once," said Mawgan, "for you will be sure to know sooner or later. In truth, I believe you will be as vexed as I when you know everything."

"Why, what has happened?" I asked.

"It seems as though we shall not have to go to Spain at all."

"What!" I said aghast.

"Aye, I fear me it is true, and that is why I am so vexed. Both my father and Sir John Tremayne seem to be convinced about the matter, and in spite of all my protests I cannot alter them."

"But why have they changed?"

"Oh! it is this Spanish Protestant who hath changed them. He comes from Toledo, and has gained the confidence of everyone."

"A Spanish Protestant from Toledo!" I repeated.

"Aye, so he claims to be."

"His name?" I cried, thinking of my father's arch-enemy.

"Señor Gomez," he replied. "He hath also brought with him his daughter, who hath turned the head of everyone. Moreover, he tells my father that Señora Valencia and Esther Truscott have embraced the Catholic faith."

I must confess that for the moment the news struck me dumb. If this were the case, a great part of our reason for going to Spain was, indeed, taken away, and all the plans I had made would be useless. But although I spoke no word, John Trenoweth, who had been riding silently, acted not so tamely.

"What say you, Master Mawgan?" he cried. "My Esther turned Papist!"

"So saith Señor Gomez," replied Killigrew.

"Then Señor Gomez is a liar!" he cried. "I tell you I know Esther better than that. I know that for years I doubted her, and in my heart I cursed her, for the which God hath punished me. But that is over now. For months I have been thinking it all over, and I tell you, whatever may have have happened to Señora Valencia, as she is called now, my Esther could no more become a Papist than she could become a Jew!"

"But he hath papers which he brought from Toledo proving the thing," cried Mawgan Killigrew.

"Then the papers lie!" cried John Trenoweth. "And I tell you this: if you will not go with me, I will go alone. If Señor Gomez hath befooled you, he shall not befool me! My Esther a Papist! Nay, she may be burned—that I can believe; but a Papist, no! Don't you believe it, Master Mawgan."

"Wait until you've seen Señor Gomez," said Mawgan Killigrew. "At first I felt as you do, but I feel he hath told the truth. It is not as though he doth not hate the Catholics; he doth, and that right heartily. You should see the marks on his body, John—marks of the way the Papists have tortured him! It was this that drew my father and Sir John Tremayne to him. I tell you the man hath suffered agonies. Besides, he was at Toledo when Señora Valencia and Esther Truscott were brought before the judges."

"And do you mean to tell me that he heard my Esther renounce her faith in the Reformed doctrines? I tell you it is a lie, Master Mawgan!"

"As to that, John, he saith that Señora Valencia's daughter, Isabella, so pleaded with her mother that she could not resist her, and when her mistress had recanted Esther declared that she could not go against her mistress. She said she had left her home and her sweetheart for her mistress, she had lived more than twenty years in Spain for her, and that, although she knew nothing about Popish belief, she would follow her mistress in this also."

This seemed to strike terror into the heart of John Trenoweth, for he reeled in his saddle like a drunken man. But he quickly mastered himself.

"I tell you this Spaniard is a liar!" he cried.

"He hath letters from a man of God in Spain," said Mawgan Killigrew; "one who, in spite of persecution, holds to the true faith, and who, in secret, instructs many in sound doctrine."

"A lie, I tell you!" said John, and then he stopped his horse in the road, while we, wondering also, stopped ours and looked at him.

We had now reached the top of a hill, and, the road there being hedgeless, the full moon shone upon his upturned face.

"I call heaven and earth to witness that all this is a lie!" he said, solemnly. "Ask me to prove it, and I cannot; ask me to give reasons, and I cannot; but it is a lie. If I saw a confession written by Esther herself, I would say it is a lie; if good Dr. Ridley were to rise from the dead, and say it was true, I would tell him he had been instructed by the devil. How do I know this? I cannot say, except that God hath spoken to me! Esther is alive! Look, man, look! I see her now. She is beckoning to me, she is telling me to come to her aid! I am coming, Esther! I am coming!"

And these words he spoke as though he were an inspired prophet. He did not talk like a demented man, neither was his visage fierce. It was calm and dignified, and so solemn was his voice that neither Mawgan Killigrew nor myself could speak a word.

"Listen, young masters," he went on; "this is a trick of the devil. Señor Gomez I have not seen, but he is an enemy of the true faith. His daughter may appear as an angel of light, but she is a child of darkness. When you listen to them, bear this in mind. Go to Spain we must, for God hath need of us there. I can see Esther now, beckoning to me. Others are around her pleading for deliverance. It is the call of God!"

We stood watching him, his face lit up by the rays of the moon, and his eyes gleaming with a strange light. For a time he seemed communing with things unseen; then slowly his form unbent, the light went out of his eyes, and his face assumed the mild, good-humoured expression which characterised him.

"Let us ride on," he said quietly.

"Saw you him ever like this before?" I asked Mawgan Killigrew in a whisper.

"Never."

"Think you—that—that——"

"His mother was supposed to see visions years ago," interrupted Mawgan, as though he knew what was in my mind.

"Saw you anything suspicious in this Señor Gomez?"

"Nothing. He convinced me in spite of myself; while his daughter, the señorita, looks as beautiful as a goddess, and as pure as an angel."

"Hath she moved your heart?" I asked.

Mawgan Killigrew was silent for a time; then he said slowly, "I do not know; but when she speaks I forget everything save her goodness and her beauty."

"What is she like?" I asked.

"She is not tall, but very comely. Her hair and eyes are as black as a raven's wing; her skin is dark, but clear and beautiful, as if Nature determined to be prodigal in her gifts. Her lips are full and red, her voice is like music. Besides, while her eyes seem to flash fire, they shine with the light of tenderness and purity. She comes of an old Spanish family, and—and——"

"You have fallen in love with her?"

"No, no, and yet I would kill the man who sought to win her for his wife!"

"Look, Master Mawgan Killigrew," I said. "I have seen neither Señor Gomez nor his daughter. I have heard of them to-night for the first time. John Trenoweth came to my father's house less than a week ago, and told the story that you know of, and so much did he move all our hearts with his story that I am come here to do his bidding. On my way hither I have been made aware that the Jesuits have got wind of our plans. Proof of that I will give you presently. Señor Gomez may be all he pretends to be, while his daughter may be as pure as the mother of Christ; but it doth seem strange that they should visit your father's house at such a moment, and to persuade you all that to go to Spain is useless and dangerous. However, I urge nothing now, save this: let us be watchful. Let us be harmless as doves, but let us be wise as serpents. Let us listen to all they say, but let us keep our heads. I have met the Spaniards before, and know something of their ways, and this I have always found wise: let us hear all they say, but tell them nothing. For me, I go to your father's house bearing in mind what John Trenoweth hath just said."

To this Mawgan Killigrew said not a word, and we rode on for some minutes in silence.

"I suppose I shall see this Señor Gomez to-morrow?" I remarked, presently.

"Possibly to-night," replied Mawgan Killigrew.

"To-night?" I repeated.

"Aye, to-night, for both he and the señorita are supping at Arwenack. Sir John Tremayne hath also promised to join the party."

"Strange that you could have left them, especially as the señorita is to be one of the guests."

"I was strongly tempted to remain at home," replied Mawgan quietly, "but something urged me to come and meet you. I felt sure you would be drawing near, for John Trenoweth had arranged exactly what he meant to do before he went away. He told us that, whether you consented to come with him or no, he meant to be at Arwenack to-night, and so I, my mind all filled with conflicting thoughts, felt myself unable to resist the temptation to come and meet you. I wanted to see what kind of a man you were, and, although I could not explain why, to tell you of this Protestant Spaniard and his daughter."

"Hath your father or Sir John Tremayne told them aught of me?" I asked.

"No, nothing. It was at my request he refrained. Why I asked him to say nothing about you I cannot tell, save that, in spite of the fact that I have become convinced that they are what they profess to be, I have been filled with many forebodings."

"What kind of forebodings?"

"Even that I cannot tell. They are vague, and in a sense unreal, and yet, while I cannot think of doubting either Señor Gomez or his daughter, I longed for your coming. Look, yonder is Arwenack; we shall be there in a few minutes."

We had no sooner arrived at the home of the Killigrews than Master Killigrew asked that I should be admitted into his presence without delay. As a consequence I found myself in a room full of people before I had time to remove my dusty, travel-stained clothes for the finer apparel I had brought with me. But this fact I soon forgot in the warmth of Master Killigrew's greeting.

"Right welcome, Rupert!" he cried. "Welcome, for thine own sake, as well as thy father's. Ah! Dick Hamstead and I had many a strange experience at Rouen before thou wert born; aye, and thy grandfather, Godfrey Bedford, hath fought by my side, hard and long, in the old dark days. Thou art like thy father, Rupert. Dick Hamstead lives in thee, and, for that matter, so doth Godfrey Bedford. Good blood, my boy, good blood! A mixture of the Hamstead and the Bedford, and there is none better in England—no, none better."

This he said while shaking hands and looking at me from head to foot.

"Thou art as big as thy father, too," he went on. "Saints alive! what arms and legs thou hast! Well, our beloved Queen will need them, for although that for which——" Here he stopped, and paused awkwardly, and then I noticed that Mawgan Killigrew had put his foot on his father's. "That is," he continued presently, "the Spaniards will soon be coming, and, as I mean to provide a ship out of my own purse and likewise man her, well, there be great need for a strapping lad like thee, Rupert. But I am forgetting myself. Here is my old friend Sir John Tremayne, of whom you have doubtless heard; and here is Master Roger Carew, as true a Cornishman as ever lived south of the Tamar and north of Land's End; and here is Sir Humphrey Bolitho, who is renowned for many things; aye, and here is Señor Gomez, a man of God, if ever there was one, who hath brought sad news from Spain. As for the women folk, thou shalt see them presently, when thou hast had time to make thyself clean, and to rig thyself out in fine attire."

During the time Master Killigrew had continued speaking, I had spoken to each of the persons he had mentioned. Sir John Tremayne looked old and worn and sad. Still he carried himself with that air of dignity and reserve power which is peculiar to old men who can boast of noble blood. Master Roger Carew and Sir Humphrey Bolitho did not interest me so much, but perhaps that was because I was eager to give my best attention to Señor Gomez. And this, as may be imagined, I did right speedily, but with little result. He was a tall, stately man of from, perhaps, forty-five to fifty years of age. On his face were marks of suffering—at least, so I thought—and in his eyes was an expression which haunted me.

"Looking at me from head to foot."

"Señor Rupert Hamstead," he said slowly. "Ah! I too have heard of your father. A brave man, and a strong, who lived in a troublous time. Ah! I grieve to say it, men never go to Spain for liberty, although Spaniards like myself come to England. Your father went to France for safety, but never to Spain—never to Spain!"

For my own part, I could hardly see what he was driving at; but, true to my resolution, I said naught, hoping that by being a careful listener, and keeping a ready wit, I might hear something that might advantage me.

Perhaps Señor Gomez saw this, for I presently heard him say, "Your company gives me great joy, Master Killigrew, but mine host at the 'Queen's Head' will not thank me for keeping him so late from his bed. I will therefore acquaint my daughter that it is time for us to depart."

"I will walk with you, señor," said Mawgan Killigrew, looking towards me.

"And I also, if I may," I said.

"Your kindness overwhelms me," said the Spaniard. "Nevertheless, I am scarcely surprised. For is not the English heart always generous? Is not the Englishman's hand ever ready to bestow help?"

These words came glibly enough, and, but for what John Trenoweth had said, I should have paid no particular heed to them, but, remembering the Spaniards I had met, and calling to mind their great ignorance of our language, I could not help asking myself how he had learnt to speak so fluently. This thought had scarcely passed through my mind, however, than it became as nothing to me, for I stood face to face with Señorita Gomez.

As I have said before, I had been in the habit of comparing every woman with my mother, and that in every case all had fallen so far short of her in beauty and goodness that I had always been led to regard them as of little importance. But here was a woman who, at first sight, seemed to me as beautiful as my own mother. Not that she in any way reminded me of her. For my mother's was purely an English face, and had no suggestion of aught foreign, while Señorita Gomez was a pure Spaniard. Perhaps it was owing to the fact that she presented such a complete contrast to my mother that I was willing to admit her beauty. Not that she was tall or stately. Rather she was not above the average height of an Englishwoman, while the very fulness of her figure suggested that in a few years she might have that floridness so common to Spanish women after they are thirty years of age. At present, however, not even a Greek sculptor could have found fault with her. Her complexion, while dark, was clear and brilliant; her features were, I thought, perfectly moulded; while her eyes possessed a fascination and a power which I had never before thought possible. When she spoke, moreover, her voice was honeyed and persuasive, and, for what reason I knew not, she suggested in flattering terms that she had heard of my deeds of bravery.

I noticed that Mawgan Killigrew hung his head as I walked by her side towards the inn, and as the maid smiled sweetly upon me I could not help remembering that he said he would kill the man who sought her for his bride.

Still, little was said that could arouse him to anger, for after we had passed outside Arwenack gates we spoke only of the sufferings of the few who in Spain believed in the Reformed faith, and of her grief that Señora Valencia should have yielded to the threats of the Inquisitors.

"And you—have you suffered, señorita?" I asked, after she had spoken of these doings.

"Ah! you little know, señor," she made answer.

"And what was said to you when you made confession that the Mass was only idolatry?" I asked, for there was something in her conversation which made me ask the question, although at the time I could not explain it.

At this she gave a start, and looked earnestly towards her father, who was walking silently by her left side.

"'En casa del moro no hables algaravia,'" said Señor Gomez, like a man musing.

"What is that you are saying?" said the señorita, like one who felt it her duty to attend to her father rather than to a stranger.

He gave a start, like a man aroused from a dream.

"Ah! my child, my mind was far away," he said. "What were you saying?"

And then some other subject seemed naturally to claim her attention, for the persecution of those who believed in the Reformed faith was not mentioned again during our walk to the inn where they were staying. Nevertheless, the look in her eyes, and the words her father had spoken, set me wondering greatly. Evidently he did not think that I knew aught of the Spanish tongue, or, even if he did, would fancy that I should see no meaning in the words he had uttered. And yet I thought I saw his meaning, for what he said was an old Spanish proverb, which, being rendered into English, simply meant this: "Do not speak Arabic in a Moor's house."

[END OF CHAPTER SIX.]

The Child
"Wonderful"

THE CHILD "WONDERFUL"

Pictured by W. S. Stacey.

Written by the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D., Dean of Canterbury.

IT is not my object in the present paper to describe or criticise the pictures which are here presented to the reader; but it is rather my purpose to speak of the subjects which the pictures portray.

I.

THE first picture represents the appearance of the Angel to the shepherds. Of all the angelic appearances in Scripture this is in many respects the most instructive and the most remarkable. There are not many narratives in Scripture of angelic appearances. The mere fact that the existence of cherubim and seraphim and hosts of heavenly beings is revealed to us is in itself a blessed revelation. It is a still greater blessing to have it made known to us that the Angels feel a love for, and an interest in, beings like ourselves who are so far beneath them in dignity and in gifts. Almost every angelic appearance narrated in the Bible is a manifestation of mercy and lovingkindness. Many seem to imagine that the Angels are exclusively occupied in circling the Throne of God with unending "Hallelujahs." This is a misconception. The poet says rightly:

"How oft do they their silver bowers leave,
To come to succour us who succour want;
How oft do they on silver pinions cleave
The golden skies like flying pursuivant!
They on us wait, they for us watch and ward,
Oh! why did Heavenly God for man have such regard?'

And another poet, an Italian, writes:

"Oh, for a deeper insight into Heaven,
More knowledge of the glory and the joy
Which there unto the happy souls is given!
For it is past belief that Christ hath died
Only that we eternal psalms may sing.
That all the gain Heaven's awful curtains hide
Is this Eternity of Antheming,
And this praised rest."

The very name "Angels" means "messengers," and they are constantly engaged in works of love and service. This fact is brought out in some mediæval legends; that, for instance, of Theocrite, which has been so beautifully versified by Robert Browning.

"Morning, evening, noon and night,
'Praise God!' sang Theocrite.
Then to his poor trade he turned Whereby the daily meal was earned.

"Hard he laboured, long and well;
O'er his work the boy's curls fell."

Then he hears of the Pope in Rome, and of the magnificent services at St. Peter's.

"Said Theocrite, 'Would God that I Might praise Him that great way and die.'"

Immediately the Angel Gabriel descends, transfers the boy to Rome, and takes his place at the humble trade.

"He did God's work; to him all one
If on the earth or in the sun."

The boy, transferred to Rome, grows up to be elected Pope, and is about to take part in the magnificent ceremonial.

Then God says:

"Clearer loves sound other ways;
I miss My little human praise."

The Angel Gabriel, perceiving that God preferred the voice of Theocrite, flies to Rome, then reveals to the new Pope the will of God, assumes his form, and takes back Theocrite to his humble cell.

"Theocrite grew old at home;
A new Pope dwelt in Peter's dome.
One vanished as the other died:
They sought God side by side."

Another mediæval legend, which has been set to verse by Sir Edwin Arnold, shows still more remarkable insight. The Angel Gabriel is sent forth by God on a two-fold mission. One is to prevent King Solomon from the sin of forgetting his evening orisons; the other is to help a little struggling ant which has lost its way to its nest. The Archangel is equally proud to fulfil either mission, for both are works of mercy and both are the will of God.

But of all the angelic manifestations not one has so thrilled the imagination of mankind as that of the Angel, afterwards joined by a multitude of the heavenly host, who revealed to the poor shepherds the greatest event in the whole history of the world. For two thousand years the thoughts of millions of mankind have dwelt with love and gratitude on that most memorable scene.

The appearance of the Angels to the shepherds has been represented by many of the greatest painters, but by no one of them with such tenderness and fulness as by Sandro Botticelli in his exquisite little picture of the Nativity in our National Gallery.

In the heavens above there is a circle of Angels, some of whom turn upward their illuminated faces as they sing "Glory to God in the highest!" while others turn earthwards their looks of love and sing, "Peace on earth, good will toward men." Beneath them is the dark wood—the selva oscura—of human life, in front of which rises the manger-stable which shelters Mary and Joseph and the Heavenly Babe. On one side of this manger the Angels are eagerly conducting the shepherds, and on the other side are guiding the Magi to the holy cradle. The Magi and the shepherds are each three in number, representing the ages of youth, manhood and old age. Underneath is the world beyond death in which Angels are embracing human beings in their arms, while defeated demons rush to hide themselves in the clefts and the holes of the ragged rocks.

II.

THE CRADLE IN THE MANGER.

NOTHING is more remarkable in the records of Christ's Nativity than the simple truthfulness with which every event is narrated by the Evangelists. In this respect the sacred writers present a marked contrast to the authors of the Apocryphal Gospels. In those spurious legends we find an accumulation of marvels and miracles; but in the Gospels all is narrated with the profoundest simplicity and no extraneous circumstances are invented to add any supposed grandeur to the most memorable event in the world's history.

Though Joseph and Mary were both of them of "the house and lineage of David," no attempt is made to conceal the fact that they were in the most humble circumstances. They made their way to Bethlehem to record their names in obedience to the decree of the Emperor Augustus, and when they arrived at the humble village of Bethlehem they found that the khan or caravanserai was so full that the only place of refuge for them was the stable where the cattle were herded together. In many village inns of Palestine to this day the cattle are stabled in limestone caves, and, according to very early tradition, it was in such a cave that Mary brought forth her first-born Child and laid Him in a manger.

Is there not a stamp of irresistible truth in this record of the infinitely humble birth of Him, Who, though He was the Saviour of the world had, for man's sake, laid aside His glory as King of kings and Lord of lords. This was in itself a proof that

"Not to the rich He came, nor to the ruling,
Men full of meat, whom most His heart abhors,
Not to the fools, grown insolent in fooling
Most when the poor are dying at their doors."

But that He came to save the countless multitudes of the meek and lowly upon earth.

She laid HIM in a manger

They came with haste and found the Babe lying in a manger

They fell down and worshipped HIM

They brought HIM to Jerusalem to present HIM to the LORD

III.

THE SHEPHERDS IN THE MANGER.

THE story of the shepherds is marked by inimitable simplicity. For one night they flash into eternal remembrance. The office of shepherd is often spoken of with sympathy in Scripture. David as a lad kept his few poor sheep in the wilderness before he visited the camp of Saul and slew Goliath. Centuries before his day Moses for many years had kept the flocks of Jethro, and it was while thus employed that he saw the vision of the Burning Bush. But these poor shepherds, although for well nigh two thousand years the story of this one night in their lives has been dwelt upon with interest and admiration, remain absolutely unknown. Their names are unrevealed to us. We know nothing of their antecedents. Not a word is told us of what happened to them in their after lives. And yet it was to those poor unknown men that the supreme privilege was accorded of seeing in His manger-cradle the Divine Saviour of the world.

"In the field, with their flocks abiding,
They lay on the dewy ground,
And glimmering under the starlight
Their sheep lay white around;
When the light of the Lord gleamed o'er them,
And lo! from the heavens above,
An Angel leaned from the glory,
And sang his song of love.
Oh! he sang that first sweet Christmas
The song that shall never cease:
Glory to God in the Highest,
On earth good will and peace.'"

IV.

THE VISIT OF THE MAGI.

THE visit of the Magi is the only incident among those narrated in the Gospels about the birth of Christ, in which Joseph and Mary, and the infant Saviour are brought into contact with any but the humble and the poor.

"Lo! star-led chiefs Assyrian odours bring,
And bending Magi seek their infant King."

But all individual particulars about the Magi are left unrecorded, as in the case of the shepherds. We know nothing of their names, for the legendary names of Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar are only late and unauthorised inventions. We do not even know the country from which they came. Some suppose that they came from India, others from Persia, but nothing authentic is recorded, nor have we the least hint of what happened to them when they left Herod uninformed of what they had seen and returned to their own country. Their visit had excited keen interest in Jerusalem, and had kindled the vindictive suspicion of the cruel old tyrant; and this is the only incident in which the Nativity—infinitely the greatest event in human history—attracted the smallest notice from the world in general. We are told that they were guided by a star, and the genius of Kepler discovered that there was shortly before the Nativity a remarkable conjunction of the three planets Mars, Jupiter and Saturn, in the constellation Pisces, which astrologers connected with Jewish history. As there was an evanescent star when the same three planets were conjoined in the year 1088, there may well have been such a star also at the epoch of the birth of Christ. When the Magi had been guided by the star to the manger, they brought forth their princely gifts for the infant Christ. As the Latin poet says:

"Oria nascenti fuderunt munera Regi,
Thura dedere Deo myrrham tribuere sepulcro."
("They poured forth golden gifts to the infant King,
They gave frankincense to the Divinity,
And contributed myrrh for the sepulchre.")

After this they vanish into the unknown, but we may hope that their record of what they had seen had prepared the way for the spread of Christianity among their countrymen in the days to come.

V.

THE PRESENTATION IN THE TEMPLE.

JOSEPH and Mary, like all pious Jews, were faithful observers of the Law. They therefore visited the Temple, where Mary took for her purification the offering of the poor, a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons. She also took her infant Son to the Temple to pay the money which was always required to redeem the first-born. We are told nothing of what passed between these poor peasants of Galilee and the lordly priests and functionaries of the Temple, but it was on the occasion of this visit that Christ was prophetically recognised and welcomed by the aged

Anna, of the tribe of Asher, and by the aged Simeon, who had long been waiting for the Salvation of Israel, and who broke into that burst of song, the "Nunc Dimittis," which is chanted to this day in tens of thousands of Christian churches all over the world.

VI.

THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

MAN is born to sorrow as the sparks fly upwards, and He Who came to be the Saviour of mankind had some experience even from infancy of the troubles of life. The deadly machinations of the tyrant Herod made it necessary for Joseph and Mary to take the young Child with them and to fly into Egypt. Here, again, no details or particulars are recorded; but we are quite sure that there must have been for such poor fugitives many trials and difficulties during their flight through the desert into a strange land. Not a word, however, is told us of any incident in the journey, nor of the hardships which they must have encountered in their two years' sojourn in an alien and distant country. It was not until they received the news that Herod was dead that they ventured to return to Palestine, and even then, hearing that the tyrant Archelaus had succeeded his father, they did not feel secure until they had taken refuge in the lonely obscurity of their native Nazareth.

VII.

CHRIST AMONG THE DOCTORS.

JOSEPH and Mary conformed with pious strictness to the rules of the Mosaic dispensation. They went up every year from Nazareth to Jerusalem to be present at the Feast of the Passover. The journey was a long one, and they did not take Jesus with them till He was twelve years old. At the age of twelve a Jewish boy was regarded as having attained to years of discretion; for the development of youth in the East is much more rapid than in our Northern climates. The incidents of the attendance of the youthful Christ at this His first Passover are not recorded; but we are told that when His parents returned to Nazareth He was not with them. During the first day's journey they felt no anxiety about Him, for they thought that He was among the other Galilean pilgrims who had accompanied them from Nazareth. When, however, they failed to find Him they returned on the day's journey to Jerusalem in deep anguish of heart. It was not till the third morning that they found Jesus in the Temple, sitting among the Doctors, "both hearing them, and asking them questions." No doubt He had been under the care of kind friends at Jerusalem, but His mother addressed to Him the agonised question, "Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? Behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing."

There is a surprise of simplicity in our Lord's answer: "How was it that ye sought Me? Wist ye not that I must be in My Father's House?"

His Father's House was infinitely dear and sacred to Him. The days were still far distant when He should learn how utterly it had been desecrated into a den of robbers and a scene of hypocritical formalism, and should prophesy that coming destruction which would fall upon it before that generation had passed away.

The incident is often entirely misunderstood and misrepresented. Many writers seem to suppose that our Lord treated the assembled Rabbis with supercilious superiority, addressing to them questions which they could not answer, and delighting in showing the limitations of their knowledge and the errors of their theology. This is an utter mistake.

Among those Doctors were probably some of the most venerated teachers of the nation. The aged Hillel, one of the profoundest of the Jewish writers, was probably among them, and his son, Rabban Simeon and his grandson, the wise Gamaliel, with many other eminent Jewish theologians. Nothing would have been more unseemly or more unlike the humble modesty of Christ, nor would anything have more entirely shocked and disgusted these venerable teachers than that a boy of twelve should have assumed among them the airs of superiority.

It was His desire to be taught by their wisdom, and He sat humbly in the midst of them, "hearing them, and asking them questions"; while they on their part "were astonished at His understanding Flight into Egypt.

Jesus in the Temple sitting in the midst of the Doctors

Jesus working in the carpenter's shop.

and answers. Long years afterwards He said to His disciples, "The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat. All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not."

We may be quite sure that the boy Christ, in the sweet humility of His early years, followed that rule which long afterwards He laid down for His disciples: "Learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." It was in accordance with this rule that He went back with His parents to Nazareth, "and was subject unto them."

VIII.

IN THE CARPENTER'S SHOP.

IT is an astonishing and little noticed fact that after the incidents of the Nativity, and the single anecdote of Christ's boyhood, there is only one single word which gives us any information about His life until He attained the age of thirty years. That one word is found in the incidental question, "Is not this the carpenter?"

This question of the Nazarenes throws a flood of light on the Lord's life until He began His ministry. It shows that He was not only subject to His parents, but that He worked for long years at the humble trade of His supposed father. We may well be amazed at such a flash of revelation. It might seem to us almost inconceivable that the only Son of the Most High God should not only have taken our nature upon Him, but that for so many years He should have occupied so despised a position in a most obscure village of a most despised province of a conquered land.

But there are lessons of infinite depth in this silence of the sacred records, and in this obscurity and humility of the earthly lot of Christ. In coming to take our nature upon Him, He came also to live the common lot of the vast majority of mankind. The few only are rich: the few only occupy splendid positions in life; and the Lord of glory designed to show that the most blessed and perfect service can be offered to the Almighty Father as much in the lowest and obscurest of earthly lots as upon the gorgeous thrones of Emperors.

He designed to teach the lesson that mere earthly grandeur is absolutely nothing in the eyes of God, and that He cares more for the lowliest peasant who offers to Him true and acceptable service than for the most splendid potentates who live for themselves and are not obedient to His laws. There could be no greater, no deeper, no diviner, no more necessary, no more encouraging lesson for mankind than that which Jesus was thus teaching during those homely and unrecorded years.

A Christmas Sketch by Amy Le Feuvre.

CHAPTER I.

CHRISTMAS CARDS.

IT was a few days before Christmas. Rain had been falling persistently, and not all the blaze and glory of the London shops could cheer the outlook. The streets were coated with thick black mud, fog fell and lifted at intervals, and towards dusk the air grew piercingly cold, and hail mingled with the steady downpour.

It was a day to spend over one's fireside, and Mrs. Dacombe congratulated herself that her shopping was over, and that she could now indulge in a few moments' well-earned rest.

She turned from her writing-desk, and seated herself in an easy-chair by the fire.

"Maurice, what are you doing?"

She put the question in a tired voice, but there was a stir in a dark corner of the shabby little room, and then a small, eager figure sprang up, and a little boy, with tumbled golden hair and great questioning eyes, flung himself on her lap.

"I've been keeping so quiet, mummie. You told me I was to, and I've been watching it get darker and darker. I don't like Christmas; it's dark, and cold and rainy—I wish the summer would come back."

"Oh, don't say that, my boy. All children like Christmas: it is only we older folks who sometimes wish it over. I wish you had seen a Christmas as I did when I was a little girl. Shall I tell you about it?"

Maurice nodded, and wound one of his arms round his mother's neck, whilst he wriggled his little body into a more comfortable attitude.

Mrs. Dacombe looked round her room with a sigh.

It was on the third floor of a lodging-house. Her writing table and typewriter took up one entire side of it; the window looked out upon the rain-sodden street and a row of like houses on the other side. A small round table, a couple of horse-hair chairs, and a chiffonnier completed her furniture. The chair she was in was the only article that looked made for comfort and not hard work. There was a cupboard in the wall, the lower half of which contained Maurice's few treasured books and toys. The walls were dark and dingy, and the framed pictures thereon were chiefly the photographs of some of the landlady's deceased relatives.

"Such a different world from this Maurice, so clean and bright and cheerful! I have often told you of my home."

"I know," broke in the boy eagerly. "A little grey house standing by itself. I haven't seen many houses like that in London. The churches don't touch—at least some of them don't, and Buckingham Palace, and a few other very big houses, but little houses are always joined to others, always—and it had creepers over it, and a stable and fowlhouse, and a large garden with trees and flowers. But how did it look at Christmas, when it was raining, and foggy, and dark, and so very cold to get up in the morning?"

"It was never foggy, and I remember bright sun and white snow, and ice that we skated upon. We were close to grandpapa's church, and the bells were always ringing at Christmas time. We used to go into the woods and get some holly and evergreens, and the boys would bring it home in our little cart, and then we helped to decorate the church. There was a lot to be done at Christmas time, but we loved it all. The village children practised carols, and we had a big Christmas tree for the Sunday school in the schoolroom, and we used to make toffee and put into match-boxes covered with pictures. That was my work, I remember. And then there were our own presents. We were a large family, Maurice. Nine boys and girls, and your Grandmamma made a rule that the presents we gave each other must be of our own making. They were not very costly presents, but we had such fun making them, and keeping it secret from each other was very difficult sometimes. I remember stealing into your Uncle Bob's room one night to measure his head for a woollen tam-o'-shanter I was knitting for him. He was fast asleep, but woke up dreaming of burglars, and fancied I was one. He nearly smothered me with his pillows, and had tied my hands and feet together with his stockings before he realised who I was. How we laughed over it afterwards!"

Mrs. Dacombe's pale cheeks flushed as she talked, and the tired lines in her face disappeared.

Maurice chuckled with delight as he listened to her.

"Tell me more, mummie. It sounds like a story-book."

"What shall I tell you? About the crisp snow on Christmas Day under our feet, as we all tramped into church and lifted up our voices to sing the old Christmas hymns; the robins that would fly in to pick at the holly wreaths round the church pillars; the greetings we got from the villagers; the long Christmas dinner afterwards, with the merry chatter, and the games we played, when the curtains were drawn, and the cold and dark shut out? Oh, Maurice! I seem to feel it all again, but it's nothing, nothing but a memory!"

Mrs. Dacombe put him off her lap, and rose to her feet with another heavy sigh.

Maurice sat down on the rug and looked into the glowing coals of the fire before him.

"I love hearing it, mummie. I wonder if I could make some Christmas presents for someone? Even Jennie sends Christmas cards to some of her friends, and her father is a dustman! Oh, mummie, do you think I could make some Christmas cards myself?"

Mrs. Dacombe was looking drearily out of the window. She was reproaching herself for letting the toilsome drudgery of her daily life, the ceaseless struggle to make both ends meet, so absorb her thoughts and energies that her child was denied any share in Christmas cheer or joy. She had given up trying to make Christmas bright when her artist husband, after eight years of unsuccessful toil, gave up the struggle, and succumbed to that present-day scourge, influenza. He had died eighteen months ago, and since then she had bravely maintained herself and her boy by typewriting, but, though her courage was dauntless, her bright cheerfulness was dimmed, and Maurice dwelt in a home of shadows and care.

As she turned and looked at him, she resolved not to quench the light that was sparkling in his eyes.

"Yes, darling, you shall. I will turn out some odd bits of cardboard I have in one of my drawers. You are so fond of your pencil and paints that I am sure you will do them prettily. Christmas is a time for giving and receiving; if we cannot receive, we will try to give. Now we must ring the bell for the lamp and for tea."

Tea was brought by a stout, smiling little maid—the Jennie who sent her friends Christmas cards—and mother and son sat down to drink weak tea, and to eat a small supply of bread and butter.

Maurice was full of fuss and importance over his intention.

"And as I don't know many friends, mummie, do you think I might send one to each of the other lodgers? There's that nice Scotch gentleman up above us, who comes up and downstairs so softly; and old Captain Brewster, who always says "Tuts!" to me when I wish him good-morning. And the fat lady who has just taken the drawing-room with her maid. And Miss Cray, who is always losing her specs and tumbling upstairs. I think they would like to get a Christmas card, and if you could give me some envelopes, mummie—very, very cheap ones will do—I could write their names on them, and push them under the doors very softly on Christmas Day!"

Mrs. Dacombe assented to all this, and, child-like, Maurice would begin work at once, the very minute the tea was removed. His mother found some coloured bits of cardboard, and gave him scissors to cut and shape them.

"He stooped and picked it up."

Seven cards were the result.

"I thought I would give Jennie one, and Mrs. Trelawney one, if she's not too grand, and there's one over for somebody else, but you mustn't ask who!"

There was silence after this. Mrs. Dacombe was at her typewriter again, but, though as a rule Maurice was not allowed to disturb her, he was too excited to be silent now.

"Please, mummie, may I speak to you?"

"I will give you five minutes, and then you must promise not to interrupt me."

"What shall I write on them? I must have words, and then I will paint a picture."

"Put Christmas words; though I can't help thinking it is rather a mockery to be wishing anyone in this house a happy Christmas. They wouldn't be here if they really wanted to enjoy themselves. I think you might write a Christmas text on them, dear. God's words bring comfort, when ours are no good at all. Put that verse, 'For unto you is born this day . . . a Saviour. It was the angels' message at Christmas time. I remember I had a very pretty card sent to me one year with those words upon it. And it also put the four things the angels mentioned besides—"Fear not. Great joy. Peace. Good will"—four blessings that Christmas brings us. I will write it down, and then you can take what you like from it. Then you must not disturb me again."

"Thank you, mummie. I will do all the words to-night, and leave my painting till to-morrow, when it's daylight."

There was quiet in the room after that.

The small golden head was bowed in eagerness over pencil and paper, and not even the swift click of the typewriter moved with more rapidity than did the busy childish brain over some of the greatest truths of Christmastide.

An hour later the boy was lying back on his pillow, clasping his mother round the neck for a good-night kiss.

"Mummie, does God send down the angels every Christmas with the same words to tell people? Is it always just the same?"

His mother paused, then a light came into her face.

"Yes, darling, thank God! it's always just the same."

"They must be very busy," said the child reflectively. "Do they go to everybody, or is it only people who are out of doors that hear them?"

His mother did not answer. Her thoughts were taken out of her sordid, narrow surroundings, and wandered to the world at large. The rich, the careless, the poor neglected ones, as well, would soon be all within sound of Christmas bells and Christmas cheer. How many would distinguish, through generations of habit and custom, the soft strain of heavenly music? Would earth's gay clamour drown it? Would heavy care cloud and crush it?

Maurice's little voice roused her out of her musings.

"If they have to go to everybody," he observed thoughtfully, "they needn't come to our four lodgers, so I shall have saved them that. For reading a message is quite as good as hearing it, mummie, isn't it?"

Mrs. Dacombe bent over and kissed him with tears in her eyes.

Tired in body and spirit, that evening she bowed her head over her Bible before retiring to rest. She had been neglecting it lately, and it seemed a long time since she had heard any heavenly message.

But the voice of her little boy was ringing in her ears. "For reading a message is quite as good as hearing it." And her soul received food and comfort from the Word of Life that night.

CHAPTER II.

HECTOR MCDERMOT'S CHRISTMAS.

A LITTLE grey house on a hill, with a belt of Scotch firs on one side, and a green slope on the other, with a glorious view of a dashing river through a cleft in the blue hills, winding down to a fertile valley below. It is early morning, but there is bustle and confusion inside. The little front hall is crowded with luggage; a merry-looking, dark-eyed girl is bustling to and fro, joking and laughing and dashing suspicious-looking drops from her quivering eyelashes.

"Christine, how many loaves are you cutting up into sandwiches? You are supplying him with enough for a year. No, Phœbe, I can't pack another egg, the hamper is bursting already. It is to be hoped his landlady won't object to all this country fare. I expect she will turn up her London nose at it! Allan, you monkey! come out of that hat! You have no respect for your big brother's property. Now, here is Sandy for the luggage! Hector, time is up!'

Hector dashes down the narrow stairs, a strong, broad-shouldered young fellow, with a frank, guileless look in his clear grey eyes, and a smile that usually brings warmth and sunshine to those who see it, but which now is a trifle forced and set.

"I'm ready. Go ahead Sandy! I'll catch you up."

He turns into a small room where a gentle sweet-faced girl is hastily finishing her packets of sandwiches. She looks up and drops her parcels.

"Is it good-bye, Hector? Oh! how shall we get on without you?"

She links her arm in his and draws him to the window. "Tell me," she says earnestly. "Are we doing right in staying on here? Is it right to tax you so? Ought we not to break up our home and go out to earn our living?"

A proud, passionate light comes into the young fellow's eyes. "I will never let one of my sisters go out into the world and rough it. You are earning money here, Christine. Ever since our father's death, your poultry and dairy have kept us going—that and the legacy——"

"But," interrupts his sister, "the legacy is gone, and unless you can send us the rent regularly out of your salary we must give up our little farm."

"I have promised that, and a McDermot never breaks his word!"

"But it may be difficult for you. Is it right for us to take it?"

The lad bends down and kisses his sister.

"Good-bye, Christine. I shall never fail you, and you will see me back one day with my fortune made. I shan't forget you. And I mean to be the master of this house even when I am away from it. You will hear from me every month."

Christine bears herself bravely. She is very young, and realises with a pang that, when her brother goes, she will have to stand alone.

Then her younger sister dashes in.

"Good-bye, old fellow! We will all work hard, and, perhaps, one day, if you can't come to us, Christine and I will come up to London and see you. Will you be ashamed to see us, I wonder? I will write and give you all the news once a week."

He kisses her, then tosses into the air the baby and pet of the house—little six-year-old Allan.

With a little choke in his throat he grips the hand of old Phœbe, who has been in the family for twenty years, and then he goes.

Out from his pure, wholesome home life into the strange, bewildering sphere of City life in London, as a banker's clerk. His Scotch home, with its fragrant memories, stood between him more than once when black temptation assailed him; but as time went on his feet began to trip, and Hector McDermot bitterly confessed to himself that London life was difficult.

He was sitting in his bedroom on Christmas Eve. The bells from some neighbouring church were chiming out, but he hardly heard them.

His bright, frank, guileless look had long ago departed. Lines of care and dissipation were stamped upon his face. How had it happened, he asked himself to-night, that all had turned out so differently from what he had expected? For ruin now stared him in the face. An acquaintance had been his evil star; he had taught him to drink and to gamble. For months he had been in money difficulties, and the day previously had been tempted to appropriate some money that had been entrusted to his care. He had it now in a little canvas bag in his room. A debt of honour had to be paid within twenty-four hours. This bag made it possible to discharge it, but Hector knew that such a theft would bring its own penalty.

"I shall pay my debts with it, and go off to America, and make a fresh start. They will not find me out for a few weeks, as my chief is out of town. Christine and Effie must be pretty sick of me by this time. For the last six months they have not had a penny towards the rent. I can't go back. It's too late. Must make an end of Hector McDermot, who once thought—poor young fool!—that he was a worthy representative of his gallant forefathers! To-morrow night will see me sailing as plain 'Sandy Brown'—a criminal in disguise. Bother those bells! how I hate Christmas! Mother would have us keep it at home. She was English to the core. But what a farce it is in London! Don't let me begin to think. I must act. What! letters? Oh, dash it! More bills I suppose. No—from—from home. What's the good of reading them? I daren't! I'll chuck them into the fire."

He suited the action to the word, but the embers in his small grate were nearly extinguished, and then he impulsively snatched them out, tore open the envelopes and read them.

"DEAR OLD HECTOR—Are you ill? Do send just one line, for we are so miserable not hearing from you. We quite understand your not being able to afford to send the rent money. I have always heard that money melts away in London, and you must have many expenses that we know nothing about. You will not mind very much, I hope, when I tell you that we are giving up the farm. It has been rather a struggle, for our landlord, as you know, is a man who will not wait for his money. So we are going into lodgings at Cray End, and Effie and I have been promised some employment. Don't be angry dear. 'Honour first' has always been our motto, and there is nothing degrading in the work that we mean to do. By-and-by, when better times come, we shall be able to make a little home together once more. But oh, Hector dear, if you love us, write us one line this Christmas time—just to say that you are alive and well.

"Your loving Sister, CHRISTINE."

Hector clenched this letter in his hand with strong emotion. Then he unfolded the other sheet.

"MY DEAR HECTOR.—A happy Christmas to you! Yes, I wish it to you with all my heart, and won't give you a fit of the blues by telling you any of our news.

"I will just say that Christine has been very ill of a nasty kind of low fever. I'm afraid she worried herself into it, but she's better now and out of danger, and I'm so thankful that I feel nothing else matters! We're moving out of this next week. We have been allowed to stay till then. I shall be glad when it's over, for Christine's sake. Perhaps I had better tell you, but we are both going as shop assistants to Mr. Glencarry at Cray End. Do you remember his shop—the large draper's at the corner? He has been very kind. Anything is better than going crazy over accounts, trying to make both ends meet, and being afraid to eat when you're hungry. Allan is thriving. Phœbe will still be able to take care of him, and Christine and I come back every day at five, so we shall spend our evenings together. We are hoping to hear from you by every post. But I'm sure you won't fail us at Christmas time.

"Your loving EFFIE."

Hector let this letter drop from his fingers to the floor. He closed his eyes, and a little scene came before him. A young lad bending over his father's dying bed, and receiving that father's blessing. Then, with his hand on the old man's frail one, the lad says in steadfast tones:

"I promise you, father, that, with God's help, I will take your place, and as long as I live my sisters and little brother shall not want. I will work for them as you have worked for us. I will provide and care for them."

A bitter groan broke from the young man.

"I have ruined them as well as myself. I can make no reparation. There is no forgiveness for such as me!"

The silent hours of the night drew on; but Hector McDermot, though he cast himself upon his bed, could not sleep. He saw himself branded as a thief. He pictured his sisters receiving the news of his crime and his flight, and he cried aloud in his wretchedness:

"I have no one to save me—to help me. I have gone too far to go back!"

The morning dawned, and still he lay there, remorse and shame steeping his soul in despair.

"Is there any way out of it? None. If I took the money back, I have not the courage to confess it. I should be dismissed instantly, and my debts would confront me. I do not know a soul in London that would help me. There is no way out of it. I have gone too far to go back."

He rose at last, and with trembling hands began to make his preparations for flight. Suddenly he was conscious of a small white envelope that had been slipped underneath his door. He stooped and picked it up. On the envelope was written, in red letters, 'The Christmas Angel's Message."

Mechanically he opened it, and a small card with the following words upon it arrested his attention:

"Fear not.
For unto you is born this day . . .
a Saviour."

The card was framed in a wonderful red-and-gold painted frame, with a great many quaint flourishes over it. But the details were unnoticed, only the words burnt into his heart and soul as no words had ever done before—

"Fear not . . . this day . . . a Saviour!"

They came to him with a strange, mysterious significance and power.

He had spent the night in owning and bewailing his own weakness and helplessness, his inability to recover himself from the quagmire into which he had fallen. He had longed for some strong hand to deliver him. Was it possible that this strange message had any meaning in it for him?

"Fear not!"

His whole being was in a tumult of fear and apprehension. Guilt had brought its fellow-companion with it. He sat down and gazed at the card in his hand with troubled eyes.

"This day . . a Saviour."

What day was this? Christmas Day! And then some other words flashed through his mind. "Thou shalt call His name Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins."

He forgot his preparations for flight, the need of haste. It seemed to him that One Who could save, and Who would save, was drawing near to him.

He cast himself on his knees.

"Oh, Lord, save me! From this crime I am contemplating—from the consequences of it—from all my debts and broken vows, and sins, good Lord, deliver me!"

Long he knelt. And through the slough of sin and despair he struggled upwards and gripped hold of the Cross.

The angels' message had been received. Hector McDermot feared the future no more, for unto him that Christmas morning had come—a Saviour!

CHAPTER III.

CAPTAIN BREWSTER'S CHRISTMAS.

IT was Christmas Eve. Captain Brewster walked back from his club to his lodgings when the streets were crowded with Christmas shoppers. He had found the club empty that afternoon. His old cronies were out of town, and he gave one of his impatient snorts as he recalled the pitying inflexion in the hall porter's tone: "You'll not be out of town this Christmas, then, sir?"

"Out of town." The words took him with a bound to an old manor house on the slope of a wooded hill in Worcestershire. The home of his childhood—the place that, when first he went to sea, visited him in his dreams and was ever in his waking thoughts. He saw himself there taking his first ride with his father, a little chubby urchin of six years. He pictured the manor hung and adorned with wreaths and flags on the occasion of his father's second marriage a year later; and he saw himself hiding away in many a nook and corner from the harsh presence and voice of his stepmother. Two years later, another small boy toddled in his steps, and his brother Rob became a source of interest and amusement to him. But the death of his father brought a black shadow over his young life. His stepmother no longer concealed her dislike to him, and at last, goaded by taunts and injustice, he ran away to sea, and went into the merchant service. After a time he was received home at intervals, but was plainly shown that it was no longer his home. Owing to a flaw in the will, the young wife and her son succeeded to it all, and the eldest boy, having chosen his profession, was told he must make his own way in life without any help from his relations.

For years the sea was his portion, but he was steadily saving money, and as promotion came in due time, and he was at length given command of a vessel, James Brewster began to long for a home. He had friends on shore who welcomed him, a young girl whose blushes and smiles were kept for him, and in due time they were betrothed, and a little home was often the subject of their talk. But whilst he was taking his last voyage the young girl was taken ill, and when he landed to claim her as his bride he was led to a newly cut grave that held all that was dearest in life to him. James Brewster went to sea again, a soured, miserable man. Years passed: he left the merchant service, and became a wanderer. Once he revisited the home of his youth. His stepmother was dead, and his younger brother reigned there. He had married, and was bringing up a large family of boys and girls, who were ready to welcome their uncle with much affection. But Captain Brewster never forgot that the old inheritance should have been his; his heart was bitter, and he refused their friendly overtures. He had now few interests in life. He lodged in the house of a former shipmate of his, and spent most of his time at his club. And before going to his club on Christmas Eve he had written to his brother declining his invitation to be his Christmas guest.

"They are nothing to me," he growled to himself. "Why should I make myself agreeable to them? Let them ask those who have no bitter recollections to spoil the harmony of a Christmas gathering."

So, walking home, he reached his rooms, and, with his pipe in his mouth and a newspaper in his hand, prepared to enjoy his Christmas Eve over his cheerful fire.

He did not read. Memory was too hard at work. He had passed a good many families in the streets that afternoon. The breathless excitement of the children; the bustling importance of their mothers; the amused content and pride in the eyes of their fathers —all struck him as strangely pathetic. He began to wonder what he would feel like if he were to be the head and centre of a happy family circle on the morrow, and as he pictured it a grim smile turned into a somewhat wistful expression.

"There is no one on earth that cares about me or wants me! What a farce this Christmastide is! A meaningless thing to lonely men like myself. I have nothing in common with it. Thank goodness, it will soon be over!"

But the church bells chimed on, and the carol singers sang their songs, and Captain Brewster felt his heart expanding, in spite of himself, in this Christmas atmosphere.

"I suppose," he mused, "it is a huge system of give and take. And givers and receivers are each made happy in their own way. It is quite certain I shall receive nothing from this day of festivity and good will, as they term it; but it's just possible that I could give, if I had a mind to, instead of take."

He smiled at the thought, and at the remembrance of the big balance at his bank. And he stirred his fire into a bright blaze, and leant back in his easy-chair, taking a deep whiff of his favourite tobacco, and seeing a vista of strange possibilities opening out from his narrow, self-centred life.

"But there isn't a soul I know that would care to accept my help, and I hate indiscriminate giving, such as stuffing bank-notes into church plates and bags! I like to know where my money goes and what it does."

He sat on until the midnight chimes had ceased, and then, with a strange restlessness in his heart, he retired to sleep, but it was long in coming.

Then a strange thing happened. He was lying awake, reasoning with himself why he should be tempted to act differently on this Christmas Day from what he had done on fifty-four previous ones, when he was startled by a cry in the next room to his.

The walls were thin, and he had been conscious of someone moving about in a jerky, spasmodic fashion, but now distinct words came to him, and they were these:

"I have no one to save me, to help me! I have gone too far to go back!"

It was a despairing cry, and it brought conviction to Captain Brewster that there was one under the same roof as himself whose case was more to be pitied than his own. He began to wonder who his neighbour was.

"That fresh-faced young Scotchman, I fancy, who used to annoy me so by his whistling. He came here some time ago. I remember his superabundance of health and spirits irritated me, but I have not caught sight of him for a long time. He keeps late hours. Wonder what he has been doing? Some foolish scrape, I expect. Why should I trouble my head about him? Hulloa! What on earth is that?"

A white envelope was being pushed underneath his door.

"Not a letter. It must be a bill from some impudent tradesman—extraordinary proceeding on Christmas Day!"

He strode across the room and picked it up. On the envelope was written in red letters, "The Christmas Angel's Message."

He stared at it grimly, then tore it open impatiently. A card came to view highly decorated with the same red paint, and with wonderful-looking birds with scarlet breasts. But the words confronted him, and made him stand looking at them in dim perplexity.

"Good will towards men.
For unto you is born this day. . . a Saviour."

The sweet words crept into his heart and stayed there. Here was the essence of Christmas—this was the centrepiece, the pivot of it all. It was not a meaningless season of jollification and merry-making. Something definite had happened once that had changed the whole world's history. What part had he in it? Was he not, could he not be, one to be benefited by it?

Captain Brewster sat down to consider the matter, and who shall say that unseen angels did not hover near him, and whisper the old Christmas message again and again, till his heart began to soften?

Be that as it may, as Hector McDermot opened his bedroom door Captain Brewster opened his, and they met in the passage.

"Good-morning," said the captain cheerily.

"Not out of town this Christmas? We are close neighbours, but we don't see much of each other. I wonder, if you have no other engagement, whether you would care to dine with me? I'm going to have a quiet meal in my rooms here at six o'clock this evening. Will you join me?"

Hector flushed and hesitated for a moment.

"Thank, you, sir. I—I shall be very pleased. I have no other engagement."

Captain Brewster noted his heavy eyes and haggard face, but there was a subdued softness in his tone that touched the old man.

"If I don't get his trouble out of him after a good dinner, my name is not Brewster! Why, what a boy he is! He wants a woman to look after him!"

With which just conclusion Captain Brewster went into his sitting-room and partook of a substantial breakfast, whilst Hector, dazed and bewildered, wandered out into the streets, and later on turned into an old church and joined in the Christmas service with a subdued and grateful heart.

The dinner was a success. The old and young man drew closer together after it, and almost instinctively Hector found himself confiding some of his past history to his host. Before he went to bed that night Captain Brewster knew the best and the worst of him. Hector had written a line to the Bank to which he had been told to take the sum of money entrusted to his charge, promising to deliver it at the earliest opportunity. He also wrote a letter to his sisters which gladdened their hearts, and when the old captain put into his hand a cheque for the amount of his debt that was due Hector broke down and sobbed like a child.

"Hector broke down and sobbed like a child."

"I will pay it back, sir, every penny of it. God helping me, I will! I'm making a fresh start, but I didn't think I should have been given such a chance!"

The sound of the Christmas bells that night fell sweetly on the ears of two lonely men, and when they laid their heads on their pillows the music rang through their hearts: "Unto you this day . . . is born a Saviour."

[END OF CHAPTER THREE.]

Stars are Shining.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

Words and music by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, MA.,
(Author of "Onward, Christian Soldiers," &c.)

2. See! amidst that blaze of glory
Stands a seraph, wings outspread,
Radiance as of summer morning
O'er the barren landscape shed.
Rouse, ye shepherds! shake off slumber,
Banished from each drowsy head!
Gloria in excelsis Deo!

3. "Lo! of tidings glad the bearer,
I am come, and news I bring;
Born on earth this day a Saviour,
Christ, to Jew and Gentile King.
Rouse ye, therefore, link your voices,
Then with angels carols sing:
Gloria in excelsis Deo!

4. "Peace on earth, to men good favour,
Token this—the Heavenly Child,
Lying now in Bethlehem's manger,
Born of Virgin undefiled.
Christ, Messiah, long expected—
Earth and Heaven reconciled:
Gloria in excelsis Deo!"

5. Then from thousand times ten thousand
Angels, in supernal light,
Burst a chorus: O ye people,
East and West, in one unite,
Praising God, the Lord Jehovah!
Sing with angels in the height
Gloria in excelsis Deo!

PREBENDARY WEBB PEPLOE AT HOME.

By A. Black.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE CHURCH.

ST. PAUL'S, Onslow Square, is one of the most unpretentious ecclesiastical buildings in the West End of London. Although no longer the simple 'preaching box" of forty years ago, having since those days been renovated, its "three-decker" having given place to a handsome pulpit, its organ enlarged, a chancel added, the electric light introduced, and sundry other improvements, it cannot lay claim to any architectural features of note. And its services are, with one or two very minor alterations, carried on just the same as they were at the foundation of the church in 1860. No surpliced choir leads (or, to speak more correctly, usurps) the singing of the congregation; no elaborate services or sensational deliverances disturb the worshippers in their simple devotion. The distinguishing characteristic of St. Paul's is, as it was in the days of Mr. Capel Molyneux, its first incumbent and of Mr. Marston, successor for about five years, its sturdy Protestantism and uncompromising Evangelicalism. Whatever may be the case elsewhere, the pulpit in Onslow Square emits no uncertain sound. Mr. Webb Peploe, the third and in many respects the greatest of the incumbents the church has hitherto had, offers a most determined opposition both to the Romanising and the Rationalising spirit in the Church of England. "I affirm," he says, when dissecting the claims of a section of the ministry to the priestly office, "that no man can, without terrible guilt before God, interfere between a soul and its Saviour, and that to declare the necessity of human action in order to make the union between God and His children perfect is to derogate from the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, to injure the growth of the soul, and to rob it of much of the liberty which God has provided for it in Christ Jesus." With equal resoluteness he denounces the "grievous heresies of the Higher Criticism" as destructive of the "purity of doctrine and that personal devotion to Christ which were bequeathed to us by our fathers as the outcome of the Reformation." For Mr. Webb Peploe, although not blind to some of the failings of the old Evangelicals—he instances their excessive irritability—is not ashamed of the time-, or shall I say God-, honoured name. A man of simple, firm convictions; a staunch believer in and upholder of the "truth as it is in Jesus," and of the doctrines of the Reformation; a great preacher, if you understand by the term a man living in the atmosphere of the Scriptures, delighting to expound their utterances, and possessed by the passion of saving and building up human souls in the faith; a man with a personal charm, courtly manners (ought not every Christian to be a gentleman?), and deep spirituality of tone and temper, making itself felt over everyone he comes in contact with; and lastly, the most indefatigable of workers, the incumbent of St. Paul's is the beau ideal of an Evangelical clergyman, and his church (with its affiliated districts, missions, and large staff of helpers) a centre of vast evangelistic and social work.

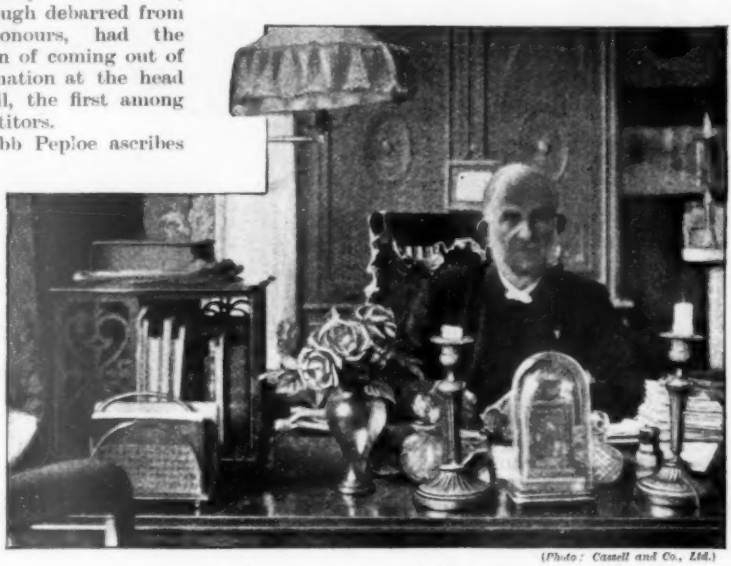
I shall have occasion later on to speak of Mr. Webb Peploe's varied and strenuous labours. For the present, although statistics as a spiritual barometer are not wholly to be relied upon, I content myself with Mr. Webb Peploe's summary of work and progress, given at the memorable meeting in November, 1901, when his people, in grateful recognition of his twenty-five years' ministry amongst them, presented him with a valuable testimonial. He then stated that the number of communicants averaged each year from 10,000 to 13,000; that there were four curates and sixty district visitors at work in the parish and the affiliated districts in Chelsea, that the number of Sunday school teachers amounted to 130, with a weekly attendance of 1,500 scholars, and that £180,000 (£160,000 of which had been given to foreign missions), had been collected in church during the twenty-five years, exclusive of pew rents and special donations. In addition, 110 young men, fifteen of whom are now engaged in mission work, had received practical training for the ministry, after having gone through their university career. Surely a noble and splendid record of work!



One or two characteristic anecdotes about the Peploes are of interest, because they throw a curious light on the erstwhile condition of affairs in the Church of England. One of Mr. Webb Peploe's ancestors was a Bishop. This is the way he got his bishopric. He was an ardent anti-Jacobite, and after his valiant defence of Manchester against Jacobite intrigues was introduced to George I. The King, who knew but little English, asked him his name, and, being told, remarked, "Peploe! He shall peep high; give him a bishopric!" Mr. Peploe's father, who from his loving and kindly disposition was called "The Peacemaker of Herefordshire," was Vicar of the parish of Weobly. The Peploes, a Herefordshire family of more than three hundred years' standing, had a castle in the county, and two or three livings in their gift. But Weobly invariably fell to a member of the family. On the death of the Vicar it was the custom of the then head of the Peploes to present the Bishop with a haunch of venison. Two days after the gift was followed by a letter to his lordship, in which the donor stated that he just happened to have a nephew in orders who would exactly suit the parish. This was invariably followed by the episcopal reply presenting the young man to the living. Mr. Peploe, who was ordained in 1863, succeeded in due time to his father's parish. He also held another country living before his transference to London. His father, as already indicated, was a genial, conscientious, hard-working country clergyman. But his mother was a woman not merely of saintly character, but of considerable mental power. Her religious stories, twenty-two in number, were very popular in their day, and many of them have even now a large circle of readers. The best known and most widely appreciated of her tales is probably "Naomi; or, The Last Days of Jerusalem," which has been translated in Eastern as well as Western tongues.

At Cambridge, as is well known, Mr. Peploe was noted as a famous athlete. The well-known story of his remarkable achievement in that capacity bears repeating, if only to dispel the popular illusion that an Evangelical must be a maudlin, flabby kind of creature, and also because it brings into striking relief the man's character. For the astounding pluck and energy evinced by him in physical feats of daring was shown equally in later years in his spiritual labours and pastoral work. A fall of fifteen feet from a ladder had so severely injured him that his life was despaired of. However, by dint of medical skill and careful nursing he recovered a fair amount of health and strength. One day, after having been confined to his bed for six months, he was told that the University Sports were fixed for the morrow, and that his college, being somewhat undermanned, stood greatly in need of assistance. He at once pluckily jumped out of bed, entered his name and succeeded in carrying off the prize. After which he went back to bed, and remained on his back for the next twelve months. Another remarkable exhibition of physical endurance, which secured for him the title of "Champion Jumper," was his leap from the pavement to the topmost step of Trinity Hall. Of course his illness, during which he suffered a good deal of pain—he still feels the effects of the injury to his spine—put an end to his athletic career. But the invalid, confined to his couch, did not waste the hours in idle repining. He took seriously to his studies, and, although debarred from taking honours, had the satisfaction of coming out of his examination at the head of the poll, the first among 450 competitors.

Mr. Webb Peploe ascribes his conversion, under God, to the influence of Henry Wright, for many years the secretary of the Church Missionary Society. When nineteen years old, about to enter college, he had a conversation with Mr. Wright about his spiritual condition, by which he felt deeply impressed. Mr. Wright subsequently gave him a Bible, asking him earnestly to read it. Some time later young Peploe had occasion to go to Derby, and, having missed his train, had to wait four hours for the next. The races happened to be on just then, and, time hanging heavily on his hands, he made up his mind to go and see them. On the racecourse, as he was standing looking on, someone gave him a tract with the heading "Would your Soul be in Hell if you died To-night?" He felt startled, and, do what he might, was unable to shake off the disquieting feeling (which had been growing upon him since the evening under Mr. Wright's roof), that he was in a parlous spiritual condition, and that it behoved him to examine himself and to arrive at a clear understanding as to his state before God. Then followed the terrible accident and the long days and weary nights on a sick bed, with a protracted period for meditation, reflection, reading, and prayer. And thus Peploe, like many a soul before and after him, was led from fear and awe through hope to confidence, trust, and love—that "perfect love" which "casteth out fear."

In 1876 Mr. Webb Peploe entered upon his ministry at St. Paul's, Onslow Square. The call was an unexpected one, for although, being related to the first incumbent, he had felt a more than passing interest in the church, and made it a subject of special prayer that the right man should be selected for the post, he had no idea that the choice would fall upon him. But having received the call, he unhesitatingly obeyed it, although fully conscious that it was no easy matter to succeed the men who had made St. Paul's a stronghold of living Evangelicalism, and

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. PREBENDARY WEBB PEPLOE IN HIS STUDY.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

IN THE DRAWING-ROOM.

that the position of a Vicar of a fashionable West End parish presents special difficulties. It is so much easier to be faithful in the slums of Southwark or the alleys of Whitechapel than in the drawing-rooms of Belgravia. The new Vicar, however, was not a man easily daunted, and at once threw himself into his work with his wonted energy and ardour. And, looking back on the twenty-five years of his London pastorate, he has ample reason to thank God for the success of his labours. The church, which holds 1,700 people, is filled from Sunday to Sunday by devout congregations drawn thither from the desire to hear the Gospel preached in its divine simplicity and pristine purity. For, like St. Paul, Mr. Webb Peploe is determined not to know anything among his people, "save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." His delight is to expound the Scriptures and to apply them, illustrated from the depths of that great fifth gospel, the gospel of Christian experience, to the hearts and lives of his hearers. And his desire to make his church a centre of Christian life and light in the neighbourhood has been fully realised. A number of excellent societies and agencies, the most interesting of which is probably "The Coachmen and Men Servants' Club," are engaged in spiritual and philanthropic work in the parish and the poorer parts of Chelsea. Mr. Webb Peploe has no room for drones and loafers in his church. A congregation, he says, should be a "Church Missionary Society." Each one should ask himself, "What is my particular branch of work for Jesus Christ in my parish?" and not rest until he has answered the question satisfactorily.

Mr. Webb Peploe himself is a tireless worker. He does not seem to know the meaning of the word fatigue, and the amount of work which he goes through from day to day would tax the strength of half a dozen ordinary men. He preaches and speaks on an average from eight to fifteen times every week. His services are requisitioned all over the country, and most days when at home he holds a Bible class or lectures somewhere in London. Thus he goes once a fortnight to one of the large business places, such as Barker's, Maple's, or Whiteley's, and addresses the employees. "I have spent many a delightful evening with our young people in business." Apart from his ecclesiastical labours, a great deal of work falls on his shoulders through his connection with various societies, such as the Barbican Mission to the Jews, of which he is the President, the National Protestant Church Union, of which he is Chairman, and other similar bodies. In addition, he has to carry on a most voluminous correspondence—letters, forty and more a day, reaching him from all parts of the country to ask his opinion and advice on spiritual matters, public as well as private. The evening—or rather, the available part of the evening, for there is always some call or other on Mr. Peploe's time—is taken up with answering these numerous letters. "The last thing at night," he tells me, "is to post our letters, which is generally done at midnight. When we were younger we invariably sat up till 1.30, but as we are getting older we find a day commencing at eight and finishing at the stroke of midnight sufficient for our strength.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE HOUSE.

Mr. Webb Peploe is a well-known figure at Mildmay, the Islington Clerical Meeting, where he has been a regular speaker for the last twenty-one years, and at the annual Church Congress. But nowhere is he more heartily welcomed than at the yearly gatherings in Keswick. What is the teaching of the Keswick Conference? "The Evangelicals put in the foreground justification by faith," but they did not sufficiently preach Christ as "a keeping Saviour." "My grace is sufficient for thee" is the motto of Keswick. "Kept by the power of God through faith." You have to realise that God's grace is there as a fact; you have to realise the Keeper. The Old Testament enjoins, "Keep the law"; the New Testament says, "Kept by the power of God." There is all the difference between the struggle to do your duty and the realisation of a power not your own enabling you to fulfil it. A moment-by-moment life resting in Christ is the ideal set before the Christian.

Of the many experiences of Keswick I can only find room for the following touching story, told me by Mr. Webb Peploe. He had been addressing a meeting of 400 clergy on God's call to Ezekiel to become His faithful messenger. In the course of his address he pointed out the trials through which the prophet had had to pass. He had to lie by for a time; he had to eat defiled bread; he had to shave his hair, and he had to remove his stuff from his house through the wall. Then after a spiritual application of these requirements, the speaker mentioned Ezekiel's crowning sorrow—the unwept death of his wife. "Do not say God requires that!" exclaimed a voice. "God does not require more than man can bear," was the answer. A short time after the questioner, Bishop Hill, went out with some faithful helpers to West Africa, where all, with the exception of one, died within a few months of their arrival. The survivor, on her return to London, called on Mr. Webb Peploe, whom she happened to know. She told him, not knowing anything of the meeting at Keswick, how on the last Sunday before the Bishop was seized with his fatal illness he preached on the call and trials of Ezekiel. "And there may be one more demand," concluded the Bishop; "he may have to resign the desire of his eyes, and to bear the stroke without a murmur." The following morning she was sitting with the Bishop, and said to him, "Surely, Bishop, one could not forbear to mourn for the dead." Just then Mrs. Hill happened to come in, and was told of the question asked. She gave no reply; only smiled sweetly. That very night the Bishop and his wife were taken with the fever. For the greater part of the time they were unconscious. Once the Bishop was heard to say, "I am going home"; to which the wife replied, "We are both passing on to glory." And so they both went home without knowing the bitterness of parting.

Mr. Webb Peploe has an admirable helpmeet in his wife, Mr. Justice Lush's eldest daughter. "I have known her for thirty-eight years, and I have never seen her irritable." She and Miss Peploe are among the hardest workers in the parish, given, in season and out of season, to all manner of good works. Of the four sons, three are in the ministry. One holds a chaplaincy to seamen at Shields. Another has a living in Westmorland, and the third, who has just returned from South Africa, where he acted as military chaplain, assists his father in the parish.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

A CORNER OF THE DRAWING-ROOM.

"THEY'VE knowed each other," said Mrs. Miggins, "ever since they was that 'igh."

Here she disengaged her right hand from the folds of her apron and held it out, palm downwards, at a vague height from the ground. This height varied with her moods, which were kaleidoscopic and profuse and erratic.

Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Bloggs hugged themselves in their shawls expectantly, and drew nearer.

"Yes?" said Mrs Dobbins, coaxingly.

"Well, there for you!" exclaimed Mrs. Bloggs, with insidious interest in the subject.

The kaleidoscope of Mrs. Miggins's mind suddenly shifted. Mrs. Bloggs had betrayed her eagerness by just a shade too much. Mrs. Miggins was none too friendly towards Mrs. Bloggs at this period, having had recent disagreements with her about the common washhouse of the court. Therefore Mrs. Miggins looked Mrs. Bloggs up and down, and drawing within herself became inscrutable.

"Wyte and see what you shall see," she said, holding her head up triumphantly.

Then she went in, slammed the door, and left Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Bloggs discomfited. These moments of supremacy were as the breath of Mrs. Miggins's nostrils.

Of course they were talking about Jim and Liz. About whom else? It was by general consent the chief topic of conversation.

Without a doubt something was going to happen; for Jim had taken to bringing Liz, about once a week, a gigantic bunch of flowers, which he carried in an embarrassed yet persevering manner, and with a fatuous attempt at unconsciousness, as though he would like to put them down a sink but was determined to resist the impulse; and Liz had grown preoccupied, and had taken to gazing at the railway lights in a dreamy and absent-minded way as she waited each night on the platform of Bethnal Green Railway Station after her day's work at the mantle-making establishment. The lights were those of the multitudinous signals that for ever gleamed and throbbed from the network of lines running down to Bishopsgate Station. They formed a veritable constellation against the black sky as they flashed, white and red, yellow and green; and burned duskily here, and died away there; and sprang into birth in unexpected places, like mystic signs and portents from some dark shadow-land. Somehow they had a strange attraction for Liz of late. If she could have found a vocabulary, she would have told herself that she was at a turning point in her life, and that those railway lights, gleaming from out the frowning night, vaguely brought to her mind the idea of danger-signals flashing across the impenetrable darkness of the future. And somehow her eyes were always fixed, as if by some irresistible fascination, upon the light of dusky red that burned with ominous prescience at the mouth of the Bishopsgate tunnel.

Jim and Liz had known each other ever since they were boy and girl together at the great, dingy Board school in Pott Street. It was on one memorable day at this period that Jim had administered condign punishment to the school bully, Dick Nobbs, for thumping Liz and making her cry. From that date they were firm friends, in that quiet, casual, matter-of-fact way that may mean either everything or nothing. Somehow Jim kept up the rôle of protector, and somehow Liz took it as a matter of course that she was to be protected—and that by Jim. When Liz's father died and left her mother penniless, it was Jim who started the "friendly lead" among his acquaintances which resulted in a sum sufficient to pay all the debts and funeral expenses. When, three years later, her mother was carried off by the after effects of influenza, it was Jim who settled all the simple affairs and obtained for Liz a safe lodging with Mrs. Miggins, of Figgis's Court. So the years had gone by, and Jim was now a big, broad, pleasant-faced fellow, with a growing little business of his own as a wholesale greengrocer and florist. He had always been steady, had Jim, and careful of his earnings, and he could show you one of the neatest little vegetable carts, one of the fastest little ponies, and one of the most satisfactory account-books that any man in his walk of life could expect to have. He was slow and heavy in manner, peculiarly hesitating and deliberate in speech, very sparing in his words, straight as a die in his expressions of opinion, and honest as the day in business matters. Lastly, Jim was never known to lose his temper with man or beast; and they called him "Easy-Goin' Jim."

As for Liz, she was one of the nimblest workers that the mantle-making establishment could boast of, and could easily make her fifteen or twenty shillings weekly. This was but a mere fraction compared with Jim's earnings, but it sufficed for Liz, who was of an independent turn of mind, and paid her way, and owed naught, and accepted favours from no one—save, very occasionally, from Jim. There was always a warm corner in her heart for Jim. But even from Jim would she take nothing more costly than the weekly bunch of flowers from the fragrant pyramids which he brought down from Covent Garden Market every morning. For the rest, she was slim and tall, and in a manner comely; lissome in movement, with steady grey eyes, and a mass of dark brown hair, which, by some superiority of taste, she brushed straight back from her forehead, instead of trimming into a gaudy fringe, as most of her sisters of the factory were wont to do.

Jim brought her a bunch of narcissus, the first of the season. As usual, he went no further than the door, and he said nothing to Mrs. Miggins beyond the words "For Liz," as he handed them to her. But there was a flush on his big, honest face as he turned away.

Liz came home to find the narcissus on the table of her little room. Mrs. Miggins had forgotten all about them, being too fully occupied with another grievance against Mrs. Bloggs.

"What d'you think she's bin an' done now?" exclaimed Mrs. Miggins impetuously, as Liz came in.

"Who? Mrs. Bloggs, I suppose! I'm sure I can't tell," said Liz wearily.

"She's gone an' used that washus all day without as much as sayin' 'By yer leave' to any of us; an' there she's bin mincin' in an' out as though the whole place belonged to her. An' 'ere I'm goin' to wash to-morrer, an' I expect that I shall find that place in such a sloppy mess that I'll 'ave to clean it up myself afore beginnin'; an' what with one thing an' another——"

Liz was not a sympathetic listener this evening. She went into her room and closed the door. She started as she saw Jim's flowers in the jug on the table. The next instant she had plucked them, almost passionately, from their receptacle, and had thrown them on the floor. She looked at them a moment, and then, quickly stooping, picked them up with a world of remorse in her face and restored them gently to their place. Then she turned to the window, and somehow that red light by the dark railway tunnel danced before her eyes in the flickering darkness. Always, of late, that red light!

That very evening Jim, returning from a visit to a sick member of his club, saw something as he passed the end of the court which caused him to stagger and reel as though from a sudden blow. Under the lamp-post which lit the narrow entry to the small street stood Liz and Bill the greengrocer—they called him "Perlite Bill" because of his spick-and-span manner. Even as Jim caught sight of them, Bill put his arm round Liz's waist and inclined his head towards her.

Jim turned away, and, leaning against the wall, drew his hand mechanically across his forehead. He was about to move away, steadfastly keeping his eyes averted from the court entrance, when a light footfall went past him, and Perlite Bill, barely glancing to the right or the left, stalked jauntily down the street, whistling an air. Jim, looking round, went quickly up the alley, and caught Liz within three yards of her own door.

"Liz!" he said huskily.

Liz started and turned round quickly.

"Jim!" she replied.

There was a slight tremor in her voice, and her face was pale as the light of the window fell athwart it.

"Liz!" Jim went on hoarsely, "I seed you an' Bill—I couldn' help it—I was goin' past, and—I seed you."

"Yes," said Liz in a whisper.

"Liz, I—I didn' know as—you and Bill——"

"I was going to tell you, Jim—I was indeed—the very next time I met you. I was going to tell you before anyone else, Jim! It was only to-night that—that——"

She looked up at him piteously, and saw something in his face that caused her to burst into tears. She laid her hand on his arm. Jim caught hold of it and took it hungrily between his two great horny palms.

"Why, Liz," he said gently, "don't take on like that! What call have you got to cry? I believe as you was goin' to tell me—there, straight! I never knowed you to do anything sly, Liz, and we've bin friends a few years now. If you likes him better—than—anyone else, Liz, there's nothing to be ashamed of. I s'pose you do, Liz, like him better, Liz—in that way—than anyone else, Liz!"

Liz turned her face away, and burst afresh into tears.

Jim straightened himself. There was a wondrous kindness in his voice when he spoke.

"You needn't ha' bin afraid to tell me, Liz. There, there! pull yourself together, my gel! It ain't your fault, Liz—not one little bit! It's my thick 'ead as is to blame. Come, Liz! Go in an' show a smilin' face. You ain't got no call to vex. You've done nothin' but what is straight an' square."

Liz went in, somewhat comforted, and Jim looked after her, smiling and nodding "Good-night." And when the door was closed he turned away and began to walk at a great pace down the Cambridge Road. The dull clouds which all day had been gathering overhead had closed in, and a fine drizzling rain was falling which floated and swayed upon the air like a thin mist. The streets became silent and deserted, save for the light and hubbub of the gin-palaces or the footsteps of belated pedestrians. Jim's lodgings were hard by, but he was wet through when at last he entered them that night.

Next day he turned into Perlite Bill's green-grocery shop—a poor, ill-stocked establishment in the Hackney Road.

"I just called in on a bit of special business, Bill," he said.

Jim's face lengthened for a moment, and then assumed that suave, bland aspect which it mostly wore.

"Well, Mr. Robinson," said Bill, in oily accents, "to tell the truth, I've bin expectin' of yer. But business has bin very bad this last month, Mr. Robinson, and I'd tyke it very kind of yer, very kind indeed, Mr. Robinson, if you'd leave that there little balance stand over for another week or fortnight, when I promise on my word an' honour——"

Jim shook his head impatiently.

"It ain't that I've called about," he said in his heavy, deliberate way. "Look 'ere, Bill—straight now—I understand as as you are keepin' company with Liz."

Bill's manner suddenly changed. His tone became perky, and his eyes crafty.

"P'r'aps I am, and p'r'aps I ain't, Mr. Robinson! What abaht it?"

Jim looked at him wonderingly.

"I don't see as you've got any call to beat about the bush, Bill. Anyways, I considers you the luckiest chap around 'ere."

Bill burst into a loud guffaw.

"Well, I never! Is that 'ow the land lays? I 'ad no idea as you was on that tack, Mr. Robinson! Well, we can't all be the fyvoured one, you know! I'm very sorry as I've cut you out, but reely I 'ad no idea as you was in the runnin'."

A dusky red had slowly mounted into Jim's face. He took no notice of Bill's speech.

"What I've come to say is this," he said, slowly. "I've known her many a year now, and I considers her the best-livin' and the straightest gel as ever I've come across, and—well, the truth is, I'd do anything so as Liz should be comfortable and happy in her married life. And—well, if you are the man she likes, I'd do anything to 'elp you, see!"

Bill began to listen keenly.

"Now look 'ere, do you mean it with Liz—straight?" asked Jim.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Robinson, in course I do," said Bill, quickly, and with unction.

"If you don't," said Jim, putting his teeth together, and closing his fist, "if you play any fast an' loose business with Liz——But there, we won't talk of that. I'll tell you what I'll do. I want Liz to have a comfortable home to go to when she gets married. I'll set you up in a better shop—in the corner shop down the road—and I'll put in a full stock to start with, and lend you twenty pounds for capital, if you'll promise me two things—fust, not to say a word to Liz about it, and second, to do everything you can to make a comfortable home for her."

Bill would undertake to do anything and everything. He made promise after promise.

"Caused him to stagger and reel, as though from a sudden blow."—p. 134.

He called Jim his "benefactor," and spoke a glib speech of fulsome thanks. And finally he approached Jim with the intention of grasping his hand as a proof of touching gratitude.

Jim moved off impatiently.

"Oh, stop that, Bill!" he said. "What I've said I'll do I'll do! There's only one thing more as I wanted to ask you."

Jim here grew red in the face, and began to stammer.

"I—well—you see, Bill, I—I've always sent Liz a bunch of flowers about once a week, we bein' old friends. I—I—s'pose you don't mind my keepin' on sendin' them, Bill?"

Bill stared at him in utter astonishment.

"Well, I didn' know but what you might object," said Jim, apologetically. "I take that very kind of you, Bill."

Then he went, with his big, heavy stride; and Bill, as he looked after him, indulged in a mimic pantomime, which eventually gave way to a whistle, loud and long.

"Well, if this 'ere ain't a queer go!" he exclaimed. "Of all the soft coves I ever seed, 'e's the softest! I goes an' tykes 'is gel away from 'im, and 'e comes 'ere an' sets me up like a gentleman, just for doin' it! Bill, my boy"—he was now surveying himself complacently in a small mirror which he always kept at the back of the shop—"Bill, my boy, you've struck oil this time!"

And, on the strength of his good fortune, he called down his housekeeper, an aged aunt, to "mind the shop" for him, and sallied forth to order a new suit of clothes—a reefer jacket with a silk-faced collar, a fancy waistcoat, and a delicate lavender-coloured pair of trousers, bell-shaped at the extremities.

It had been November when Jim had discovered that Liz and Bill were keeping company. A dull, dreary winter it was that followed, days of yellow fog, grey skies, intermittent rain, and raw mists succeeding each other with dismal and monotonous regularity. Muddy streets and slimy pavements, and that blank sullenness of mien which is one of East London's chiefest moods, held sway until the end of December. Jim went about his work from morning till night in his deliberate, steady-going way, and his business grew and flourished apace. He was fast earning a reputation, was Jim, in the auction-room at Covent Garden Market for his foresight and acumen in buying, and older men than he would often consult him before taking any risks. He had started in the wholesale fruit line too, in a small and careful way, and was having modest cargoes "over" on his own account. He never saw Liz now, but regularly, once a week, he left a bunch of flowers for her at the door, at a time of the day when he knew she would not be at home. Liz always regarded them mournfully when she came in, and once or twice she was very near to crying. But she never sent any message in return, save words of simple thanks, which were delivered by Mrs. Miggins, finely filtered, as it were, through a stream of declamation anent Mrs. Bloggs. As, for instance:

"I put 'em in the jug, Mr. Robinson, lars week. Now what do you think that there Mrs. Bloggs 'as bin an' done now? She left 'er pailful of clothes, as was soakin' for to-morrow's wash, right in the doorway of the washus, an' I goes in, quite innercent like to 'ave a look round, an' falls right over the pail. That woman worries my life out, she does. Well, I was goin' to say, as I put 'em in the jug, an' give 'em plenty of water, an' they made the place smell helegent—an' that reminds me as I shall 'ave to make a complaint to the landlord if Mrs. Bloggs don't keep the washus in a better state. Well, I was goin' to say as Liz she told me to say 'Thank you very much,' Mr. Robinson, an' I might make so bold as to add, Mr. Robinson, on my own account, that I 'oped as you was goin' to be the man, but there's no accountin' for tastes. Now there's that person nex' door——"

But Jim hastily sheered off. He had heard all he wanted to hear. That "Thank you" at second hand was all the health and sweetness of his life just now. But he went round, sometimes, to see Bill in his new shop, and asked him anxiously how he was getting on.

"Oh, splendid," Bill would reply jauntily. "In course, I kep' my promise, Mr. Robinson, an' I haven't spoken a word to Liz abaht our little business; but I'm doin' a rattlin' good business 'ere, an' I'll soon 'ave enough money laid by to furnish a very comfortable sittin'-room for Liz."

Bill here looked craftily at Jim.

"Hear, hear!" said Jim, with real heartiness.

"But, in course, Mr. Robinson," Bill went on smoothly, "'aving that hextra expense, I'm sorry I can't pye back that twenty poun' just yet."

"What does the twenty pound matter to me!" said Jim, a trifle sadly. "Pay me when you can, or don't pay me at all, just as you like. All I want to bring about is a bit of comfort and 'appiness for Liz in her married life."

"Now, that's very kind of you, Mr. Robinson," said Bill eagerly. "I tyke that very kind indeed! Your generosity tykes me quite unawares, Mr. Robinson"—Bill drew his sleeve across his eyes—"an' I don't quite know how to express my gratitude."

XUM

Jim went away looking as happy as a child, and Bill gazed down the road after him with supreme contempt.

"Well, of all the soft coves I ever seed," he exclaimed, "'e is the softest! 'E ain't fit to 'ave money, 'e ain't."

It was in mid-March that Liz and Bill had arranged to be married. But before the end of February Bill suddenly disappeared from his shop in the Hackney Road. His neighbours arose one morning and found his place closed, and all his stock and furniture cleared out "as clean as a whistle." The news fled round as with wings. Most people nodded their heads with a knowing look, and refrained from expressing surprise.

"Just what I thought!" exclaimed Mr. Bilbin, who kept the sweet-stuff shop opposite. "I've seen it comin' some time. 'E's bin goin' in for the bettin' line, 'e 'as. What can you expect when a man 'as bin spendin' 'alf his time gallivantin' about the races instid of attendin' to his business!"

Let us in mercy draw a veil over that time for Liz—proud, independent Liz—high-spirited Liz, whose praiseworthy boast had always been that no man had ever had the chance of jilting her. To a girl like Liz the thought of such a humiliation is as a hot iron touching an open wound. She was one of those women—and they are to be found, we rejoice to say, amongst the poorest and humblest—whose maidenly pride revolts at the idea of being the sport and plaything of any man. Such womanly spirit is its own salvation, and it was so with Liz. It was her pride that carried her through, that bade her look the world bravely in the face, that bade her laugh, and snap her fingers, and go on her way with seeming unconcern. But underneath this brave exterior the iron ate its way deeper, and with a greater bitterness than any words could express. Liz had a feeling, half of compassion, half of contempt, for her own position.

"You've been and lowered yourself now, and no mistake!" she exclaimed scornfully, as she went to and from her work.

And then came another feeling—a feeling of intense pity for Jim. She had made cheap in the eyes of the world, not only herself, but poor Jim, good-hearted, honest Jim, who had loved her so faithfully, who had stood her friend through thick and through thin ever since they had been children. There burst upon her heart, like an angry wave, a mingled rush of pity, remorse, and self-scorn when she realised it all; and when by the very defection of one man, so mean, so miserable, so contemptible, the other stood out upon the vista of her life so big-hearted, so noble, so true. "You've been and lowered yourself now, and no mistake!" It was not only contempt that rang through the words. There was a note of dreary and utter anguish in them—of pitiful compassion over that slow, heavy, honest face, that haunted her every hour of the day. Dimly, as through a vague mistiness, she saw her path—the path of expiation—a rugged, lonely, painful path, leading up a dreary mountain waste. She must tread that path. That must be her punishment. Only so could she retain a vestige of self-respect. Her woman's instinct told her that Jim would come to her as faithful and loyal as ever when a month or two had gone by; and she realised that the temptation would be great, smarting as she was from her first trouble and disillusion, to lay her head upon his big heart and cry her grief out. She had lowered herself and him. Should she lower herself and him still more in saying "Yes" to him now, simply because another man had run away? She fought it all out in her mind as she stood waiting at Bethnal Green Station and gazed upon those palpitating lights which flashed in the dusky jaws of the darkness.

"'I tyke that very kind indeed!'"—p. 137.

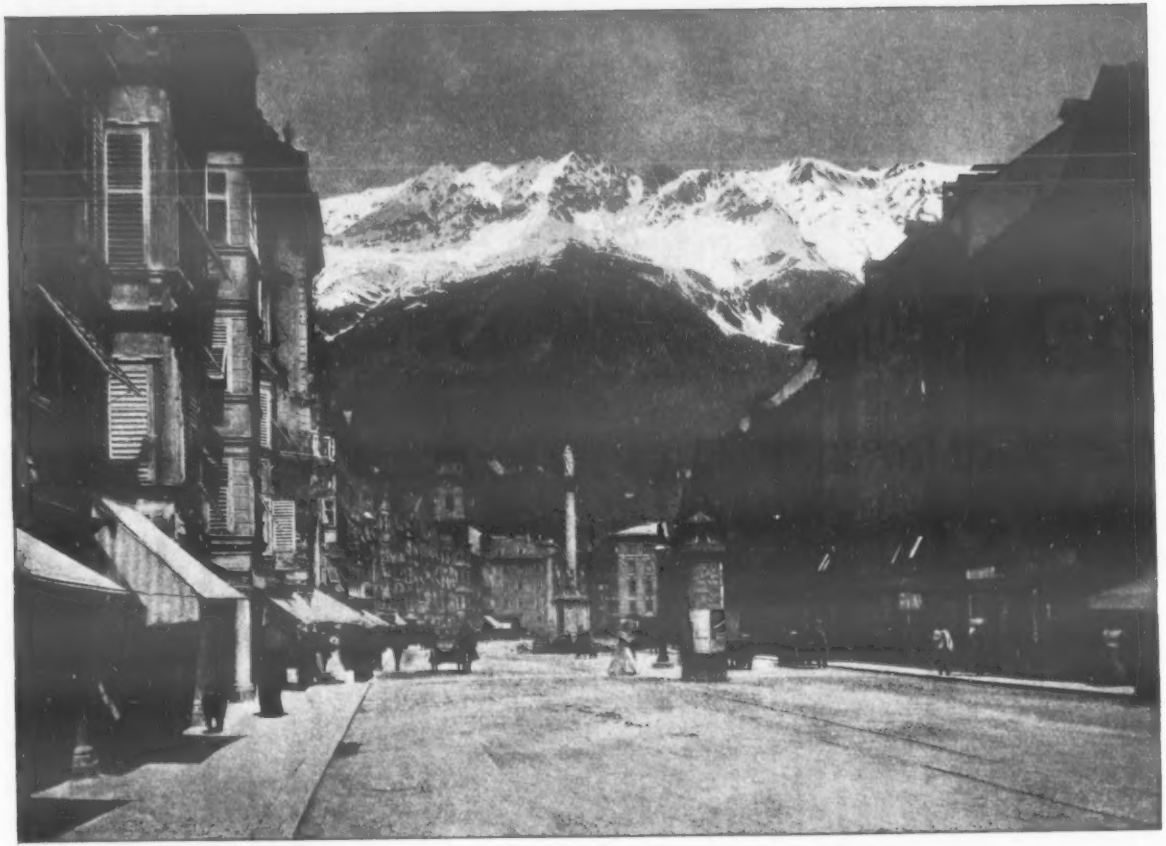
* * * * *

"It's no good, Jim! I can't get over the thought that I've cheapened you. Oh, Jim, I've cheapened you before other people! I wouldn't care so much about myself. But you—as everyone respects——"



"I don' know what you means when you says you have cheapened me, Liz; but this is how it seems to me—if there's anything of that kind about it—if you looks upon it as a disgrace that Bill has run away, then you should let your oldest friend help you bear the disgrace, Liz. And if you thinks as you've cheapened me—though I don' know what you mean—and let me hear anyone else say it! But all the same, if you thinks it, well, you ought to stand by me and help me bear it, Liz. . . . Whatever you says, Liz, I don' care what it is, I shall stand by you. . . . Liz, it don' matter to me what people thinks. . . . I'm not made that way, Liz, to give the go-by to old friends. . . . Liz, I'll never leave you, I don' care how you puts it. . . . Of course, I won't come near you, as you'd rather me not, but . . . Liz . . . whenever you wants me—I don' care if it's ten years to come—you'll know as I'm waiting to come to you."

But Liz was firm. She had cheapened Jim, the one true friend of her life. That was her constant grief, that cut her heart with keenest pain. Having seen her path of penance, she trod it bravely. How could Jim respect her, how could she respect herself, if now that this trouble had fallen across her she ran to Jim like a coward, and cast half the burden upon him? These were the unspoken thoughts that crowded upon her mind. She could not put them into words. She only saw her duty as a half-light that gleamed and played evanescently somewhere among the far-off clouds. But having seen it, even vaguely, she clung to it with all the tenacity of which she was capable. Put into her own words, it all lay around this one thought: "I can't bear to think as I've cheapened Jim. I want everybody to think that he won't have me now as I've been disgraced by Bill going off."

* * * * *

Twelve months have passed by since then, and Liz has trodden her self-imposed path of penance with steady singleness of purpose. I think she is beginning to feel that she has nearly worked out her punishment. The red light down by the scowling tunnel at Bishopsgate fascinates her no more. I saw her at Bethnal Green Station one evening a short time since. She looked comelier than ever, and her face was raised to the stars that shone like a million gleams of hope and promise in the sky of futurity. Which star was she looking at? Was it not that one to the west that gleamed so peacefully, so steadily, as it nestled in the great heart of the night, far above the rumbling city?

And thus Mrs. Miggins to Jim when he brought his flowers last week: "I put the lars lot in water, Mr. Robinson; an' Liz, she fastened one in her dress. An' oh, p'r'aps you 'ave'n' 'eard, but Mrs. Bloggs 'as mended her wyes of late, and 'as explained herself in many things. We've made it up, an' she sent me in some of 'er pastry this mornin', with her compliments, an' a very light 'and she 'as got, I must say. Why 'ere's Liz a-comin'! Oh, you sly gel! I'll tell on you! She snapped the flower out of her dress, Mr. Robinson, as soon as she come round the corner and seed you!"

(Photo: Wurthle & Sohn, Salzburg.)

THERESIEN STRASSE, INNSBRUCK.

AT INNSBRUCK.

By Mrs. W. K. Clifford.

(Photo: Wurthle & Sohn, Salzburg.)

GOLDENE-DACHL, INNSBRUCK.

IN these days girls are becoming very independent, and happily they are none the worse for it. Their interests are wider than formerly, their eagerness more courageous, their curiosity more healthy and far-reaching; and in this lies their safety. They have, in a sense, become citizenesses of the world. Besides, it is recognised that they have capacities and common-sense that may be exercised beyond their homes; and there are many pleasant things they can do, many ways in which they can combine in creating pleasant memories and stimulating knowledge, without help or interference from that other sex which is not always at hand—and whose presence, indeed, would often be an embarrassment.

All this was brought home to me last August at Innsbruck. I supposed that everybody—as in our pleasant arrogance we usually describe the little set or the particular class to which we belong—had been to the beautiful sleepy capital of Tyrol, and that every month of summer saw it crowded with my country-folk. But, looking round at the faces of the two hundred people or so at the table d'hôte, I could not discover more than a dozen that were English; and yet it was the middle of the season. Of these few, the majority, after a hurried look at the Franciscan Church and the Goldene-Dachl, were only passing through on their way to Botzen or Toblach.

Then three girls—their ages twenty-two to twenty-seven perhaps—who evidently constituted the whole of their party, set me thinking. They appeared to be enjoying themselves immensely. They were very quiet, and kept rigidly to themselves. It would have been as difficult to insult as to impose upon any one of them; for, though they seemed eager to do everything thoroughly, they evidently managed their expenditure very carefully, and never rushed into extravagances. They were simply dressed, and had come to stay some little time in the place. Probably they had made an arrangement—pension, of course—which they found advantageous, for at Innsbruck, though the hotel-keeper knows how to ask a good deal, he is always open to a reasonable argument; it is even possible with top rooms to do things very cheaply indeed. What sensible girls they were, I thought, looking at them, and what an excellent time they must be having! Why are young people so seldom allowed to make expeditions by themselves—the right sort of young people, that is? The yearly holiday is always a difficult thing to arrange, to say nothing of the fortnights that may be snatched at Easter and Whitsuntide, and going abroad is less expensive than staying at a fashionable English place. Parents have often done their share of it before their children have grown up, and are not eager to begin again; or they have not the courage to face the fatigue of a family party, with its expenses, and occasionally its wrangles. Besides, girls like to foregather with their contemporaries; they are young, and eager for an amount of going about which only fatigues their elders, and to investigate places and things that parents often know by heart.

The three particular girls of whom I have spoken did not look like sisters. They were evidently friends, or cousins perhaps. Imagine, if their parents had been with them, what a huge party it would have made—six well-behaved middle-aged people, with half a cartload of luggage! On the other hand, if they had come, these three, with say a gladstone-bag and a hold-all each, how easily the whole thing could be managed! And for a party of this sort no place could be better chosen than Innsbruck. It is easy to get to, fairly inexpensive, and has none of the sameness—and let it be added, for the benefit of nervous mothers, virtually none of the Alpine temptations and dangers—of Switzerland. The mountains are high, the scenery glorious, the people courteous and pleasant, the place itself is quaint, delightful and quiet. It is not dull, but it does not exact best clothes or lend itself to frivolities—it seems to be too well mindful of its past for that—and for a wet day there is the Franciscan Church. The cultured but hackneyed tourist who has seen that "Hofkirche" twice or thrice for a hurried two minutes, since first going round it years ago with his Baedeker, and then has gone off to give a glance at the Goldene-Dachl again, may scoff. Let him. Neither is as well known to the average traveller as he imagines; and to dreamers, and lovers of the world as it was in the centuries that are gone, they are an unceasing fascination.

(Photo: Wurthle & Sohn, Salzburg.)

INNSBRUCK HOFKIRCHE.

The Goldene-Dachl, which should come first, since it existed first, was once an addition to a palace built by Count Frederick of Tyrol early in the fifteenth century. It is all that remains of that palace. Count Frederick loved and governed the Tyrolese wisely, and was adored by them; and it was he who virtually created a middle class in the Tyrol, for previously there had been only the nobles and the peasants. That the nobles lived at the expense and pains of the peasants may be taken for granted, when we remember the times; and that Frederick should care for his humblest subjects, should revise their taxation and grant them privileges, roused a measure of astonishment and indignation which resulted in his being called "Frederick of the empty purse." This description, he was assured, would describe him admirably if he continued to govern the lower class without oppression or undue exaction. To prove his affluence, in spite of his sense of justice, he put up a new balcony to his palace, and over it a roof of gold. The "gold" is gilded copper, and shines out to this day in a dazzling state of preservation.

The Franciscan Church dates from a century later. It was built by Ferdinand I., who raised in it to the memory of his grandfather, the great Emperor Maximilian, one of the most unique monuments in the world. Books have described it generously enough; but, for the benefit of any girls who may think of making the expedition I have imagined, I will remark that it is placed in the middle of the church, and on the four sides of it are represented in white marble and wonderful workmanship the chief events of his life. Apart, on either side of the nave, in a row, stand immense bronze figures of great ladies, knights in armour, mighty rulers, and various heroes of all ages—Maximilian's ancestors, contemporaries, and relations, who could in any way be considered as having belonged to the time of chivalry and romance of which he was one of the last representatives.

They begin with Clovis I. of France, the husband of Clotilde. Then, to take them without regard to their order, come many Hapsburgs, with their long noses and unmistakable features; while our own King Arthur, slim, moustached, and evidently fair, looks a good deal like a modern young soldier, save that he is in armour: he leans on his sword, his visor is raised, and the English arms are on his shield. He and Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths (it will be seen that the company is as far-reaching as it is select) are considered the best of all the figures. Godfrey de Bouillon and Philip the Good (who founded the order of the Golden Fleece) are interesting, and so, in a different way, are his son, Charles the Bold of Burgundy, the father of Maximilian's first wife, and Johanna—"Mad Johanna," as she was called—daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, who married Maximilian's son, Philip I. of Spain. They are assembled, these great ones (in a double sense), not to bear the kneeling effigy of Maximilian or his monument company, but as mourners and torch-bearers. The torches are missing, but the position of almost every bronze left hand shows the intention to hold one.

Sightseers come from all parts of the earth to gaze at the monument raised to the honour and glory of Maximilian and the wonderful figures gathered round him. They tramp about the church as if it were a museum, whisper their comments, consult their guidebooks, ask questions, and go their way. But the whole collection, even the church itself, gains by being considered as a symbol of bygone romance rather than from any religious point of view. Perhaps to the cynic it may seem a little ludicrous that, after all, Maximilian's ashes should not lie beneath the gorgeous monument—that it is only a cenotaph. He is buried in another place; his subjects often talked of bringing his bones to their rightful destination, but it was never done.

Adjoining the Franciscan Church is the Silver Chapel. Here are the little figures of the saints that were meant to supplement the immense bronze ones of the heroes round Maximilian; but most interesting of all the chapel contains are the tombs of Ferdinand II. and his first wife, Philippina. About these two there is a charming romance. She was far beneath him in station, a lovely damsel of Augsburg, and betrothed to a well-to-do lover. One fine day Charles Quint rode past with Ferdinand by his side. Philippina cast down some flowers from her window at the Emperor's feet, and her eyes met those of his son. It was a case of love at first sight, speedily followed by an elopement and a secret marriage that was only tardily recognised at Court. The prince's family were never reconciled to it, and a proud mother-in-law so much embittered life for Philippina that at last she opened a vein and bled to death in her bath, so that her husband might make another and more suitable marriage.

But to go back to practical matters. The way to Innsbruck is easy. Go to Basle, from Basle viâ Zurich over the Arlberg Railway to Innsbruck—as simple and easy a journey as could well be desired. There are endless excursions from Innsbruck for walkers, excellent roads for cyclists, and for those who neither walk nor cycle good diligences, to say nothing of carriages for those who can afford them. I can imagine nothing more delightful than a little group of girls, knowing each other well, who are lovers of scenery and longing for new and healthy experiences, than to go together in the manner I have suggested.

(Photo: Wurthle & Sohn, Salzburg.)

KING ARTHUR OF ENGLAND

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—IV.

Basil Pierpoint, curate-in-charge of Lynton St. Maurice, visiting his church one evening with a friend, finds a girl, a stranger writing in the parvise chamber. He peremptorily demands her departure. The girl, Evelyn Retallack, has come with two friends, all three being high school mistresses, to spend the summer holidays in this Devon village. Evelyn happens to be writing a story, and now resolves to pillory Pierpoint therein. As all Lynton St. Maurice is Retallack property, Pierpoint's interest in the girl is roused. Next day his friend, Claude Winwood, visits Lyntonstowe, the Retallack's manor house, to find out who Evelyn Retallack is.

CHAPTER V.

ON THE USE OF THE HEELBALL.

"THE present owner of Lynton St. Maurice," began Winwood, "and the purlieus thereof is Miss Elinor Retallack, now absent from these parts, soon expected home."

"Yes, I know."

"Her father was a certain Arthur Retallack, and her mother was an heiress, and owner in her own right of, roundly speaking, the neighbouring parish of Lyton St. Mary. Her father died before her grandfather, Colonel Retallack."

"My dear fellow," interrupted Pierpoint, I know all that, and the Colonel died quite suddenly, some fifteen years ago. He had a carriage accident and was killed on the spot."

"I perceive then you know everything."

"I know all that ancient history and about poor old Snell. He was in the trap with the Colonel, and he also was pitched out, only he came off with a brain-fever and—well, the consequent loss of some brain-power. But I thought you might have found out something about Miss Evelyn Retallack, the girl we have met here."

"No; I found out nothing about her. Why, I thought it was war to the knife between you two?"

"We made peace to-day. I went to call, and took her some books."

"See the advantages of being a curate! Now, I should have no objection to making that young lady's acquaintance, especially as your parish affords so few; but I have no possible excuse to offer for calling on her."

Basil Pierpoint fell asleep that night very much at peace with all men. Next day, Sunday, brought no check to this frame of mind. Evelyn Retallack and her companions were a conspicuous part of the small and shrunken congregation. The church of Lynton St. Maurice had been built when the village and neighbourhood were much more thickly inhabited than at present. Now two or three country gentlemen from the neighbourhood, two or three professional men from the village, the small tradespeople, and a few farmers from the country round, made up the congregation. Evelyn was very attentive during the sermon; Alice taught in the Sunday school; everything passed off smoothly.

romance rather than from any religious point of view. Perhaps to the cynic it may seem a little ludicrous that, after all, Maximilian's ashes should not lie beneath the gorgeous monument—that it is only a cenotaph. He is buried in another place; his subjects often talked of bringing his bones to their rightful destination, but it was never done.

Adjoining the Franciscan Church is the Silver Chapel. Here are the little figures of the saints that were meant to supplement the immense bronze ones of the heroes round Maximilian; but most interesting of all the chapel contains are the tombs of Ferdinand II. and his first wife, Philippina. About these two there is a charming romance. She was far beneath him in station, a lovely damsel of Augsburg, and betrothed to a well-to-do lover. One fine day Charles Quint rode past with Ferdinand by his side. Philippina cast down some flowers from her window at the Emperor's feet, and her eyes met those of his son. It was a case of love at first sight, speedily followed by an elopement and a secret marriage that was only tardily recognised at Court. The prince's family were never reconciled to it, and a proud mother-in-law so much embittered life for Philippina that at last she opened a vein and bled to death in her bath, so that her husband might make another and more suitable marriage.

But to go back to practical matters. The way to Innsbruck is easy. Go to Basle, from Basle viâ Zurich over the Arlberg Railway to Innsbruck—as simple and easy a journey as could well be desired. There are endless excursions from Innsbruck for walkers, excellent roads for cyclists, and for those who neither walk nor cycle good diligences, to say nothing of carriages for those who can afford them. I can imagine nothing more delightful than a little group of girls, knowing each other well, who are lovers of scenery and longing for new and healthy experiences, than to go together in the manner I have suggested.

(Photo: Wurthle & Sohn, Salzburg.)

KING ARTHUR OF ENGLAND

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—IV.

Basil Pierpoint, curate-in-charge of Lynton St. Maurice, visiting his church one evening with a friend, finds a girl, a stranger writing in the parvise chamber. He peremptorily demands her departure. The girl, Evelyn Retallack, has come with two friends, all three being high school mistresses, to spend the summer holidays in this Devon village. Evelyn happens to be writing a story, and now resolves to pillory Pierpoint therein. As all Lynton St. Maurice is Retallack property, Pierpoint's interest in the girl is roused. Next day his friend, Claude Winwood, visits Lyntonstowe, the Retallack's manor house, to find out who Evelyn Retallack is.

CHAPTER V.

ON THE USE OF THE HEELBALL.

"THE present owner of Lynton St. Maurice," began Winwood, "and the purlieus thereof is Miss Elinor Retallack, now absent from these parts, soon expected home."

"Yes, I know."

"Her father was a certain Arthur Retallack, and her mother was an heiress, and owner in her own right of, roundly speaking, the neighbouring parish of Lyton St. Mary. Her father died before her grandfather, Colonel Retallack."

"My dear fellow," interrupted Pierpoint, I know all that, and the Colonel died quite suddenly, some fifteen years ago. He had a carriage accident and was killed on the spot."

"I perceive then you know everything."

"I know all that ancient history and about poor old Snell. He was in the trap with the Colonel, and he also was pitched out, only he came off with a brain-fever and—well, the consequent loss of some brain-power. But I thought you might have found out something about Miss Evelyn Retallack, the girl we have met here."

"No; I found out nothing about her. Why, I thought it was war to the knife between you two?"

"We made peace to-day. I went to call, and took her some books."

"See the advantages of being a curate! Now, I should have no objection to making that young lady's acquaintance, especially as your parish affords so few; but I have no possible excuse to offer for calling on her."

Basil Pierpoint fell asleep that night very much at peace with all men. Next day, Sunday, brought no check to this frame of mind. Evelyn Retallack and her companions were a conspicuous part of the small and shrunken congregation. The church of Lynton St. Maurice had been built when the village and neighbourhood were much more thickly inhabited than at present. Now two or three country gentlemen from the neighbourhood, two or three professional men from the village, the small tradespeople, and a few farmers from the country round, made up the congregation. Evelyn was very attentive during the sermon; Alice taught in the Sunday school; everything passed off smoothly.

Thereafter, Pierpoint began to wonder how he could next and with any decent pretext pursue his acquaintance with these girls. He had not far to seek. Going into the church one morning, he caught sight of a figure he knew, away in the north transept. She was diligently reading the monuments, and had not perceived his entrance. His way led him to the parvise chamber. He had come to seek a book, and held on his course.

After a considerable time, he came down again. There she was, seated on a bench, and, just at her feet, was Winwood, rubbing one of the Retallack brasses, the two keeping up a lively stream of conversation.

And Pierpoint had stayed a long while in that parvise chamber to give her time to leave the church first!

How had Winwood made her acquaintance? How interested she seemed in his work! And had she not told him (Pierpoint) that these things had no interest for her? Well, it was no concern of his. Basil turned on his heel and left the church.

Yet the conversation at this moment was innocuous, not to say commonplace.

"I am afraid that is rather bad heelball," Miss Retallack was saying.

"It's not too superior," Winwood replied, pursuing his work steadily and evenly.

Evelyn got up and stepped over to her companion.

"How much better you do it than I! I have not patience enough."

"Why, it is a special characteristic of your sex, is it not?"

"Men say so, but we know better. It comes of your habit of generalising about us."

"Oh—we generalise too much, do we?"

"Yes; you arrange us like pins—first the main divisions of black pins and white pins; then we are done up in packets of assorted sizes."

"Come! who is generalising now? Surely man has found some finer shades of difference between woman and woman than that?"

"A few of the keenest of you have also noticed the fact that some of the pins are sharp and some blunt."

Winwood laughed. He guessed to himself to which division this particular pin belonged.

Now the history of how these two came to be thus engaged is as follows: Winwood had sauntered into the church that afternoon with the express intention of rubbing that particular brass. When he approached it, he saw to his surprise that somebody else had started on that very task. There lay the paper and heelball, but no worker. He hesitated what to do. To remove the unfinished work was scarcely possible to him; to go away with his own unaccomplished was a bore.

A step was heard. He looked round, and there was Miss Retallack. Their eyes met. Winwood bowed and said:

"Pardon me, but do you know if anyone is rubbing this brass?"

"Yes," replied the damsel, "I am—if you have no objection."

"None in the least," he hastened to reply, and could not forbear a smile. The girl's tone was so aggressive that he deemed the utmost suavity, tempered with indifference, would prove the best solvent for her asperities. "Only I had come with the intention of doing the same thing myself. There is no law against rubbing brasses, is there?"

"Not that I know of. I am really not well versed in ecclesiastical law, however. I have already broken it, unwittingly, in this parish. But I am sorry to keep you from this brass. I shall have this finished soon," and she knelt to her work.

They were both on a holiday, both strangers to the place; there was such an air of frankness about the girl that he ventured and said:

"You are interested in brasses?"

"Not at all. I am only rubbing this for a friend who collects such things."

"Mine is quite a parallel case."

Evelyn paused a moment to push back her hat. She looked tired.

"It is tiring work, is it not?" Winwood began again. "I always tell Meredith—my friend, I mean——"

"Meredith?" she exclaimed.

"Yes; I rub these things for a friend of mine, Dick Meredith."

"No!" she cried, incredulity in her tone and a merry flash in her eye.

"But—yes, please," he answered, smiling back. "May I ask why? It's never——"

"Why, I am doing it for him, too!" she cried. "Dick Meredith is my cousin—at least I have a cousin of that name, and he is a curate——"

"In Croydon? St. Philip's?"

"Yes!"

"Well, that is good!" cried Winwood.

"I think," she laughed, "it is a parallel case with a vengeance."

"Then," cried the other, with a quick motion forward, "may I venture to do what I have been longing to do since you began—may I finish that rubbing? It is too tiring for you, I am sure."

"You are very good. Well, it does seem rather absurd for both of us to do it for him. Did he write and ask you for this special one?"

"Oh, no. He does not know I am here probably, but I have received a general order to rub all interesting brasses that come in my way, and, noticing this one the other day, I considered it came under that category and decided to do it for him."

Winwood was on his knees now, working away with a will.

"He wrote and asked me for it," she said.

"Perhaps," her companion cried, springing to his feet a moment later, "perhaps I may introduce myself, as your cousin knows me? I am Claude Winwood."

Evelyn seemed to remember the name as one of Dick's friends. At all events, they had now a set of mutual acquaintances in the whole Meredith family. Miss Retallack seated herself on a bench near him, and Winwood felt bound to confess inwardly that he had never before found brass-rubbing so interesting a pursuit. He gave himself a momentary pause now and then to look up at the girl's bright eyes as the minutes flew by swiftly.

CHAPTER VI.

EVELYN STUDIES CHARACTER.

"AND do you really think you need trouble yourself about the people here?"

"Why, it is my profession!" replied Pierpoint, gazing at her with some amazement.

"Oh, yes, I know; but a profession—well, the very meaning the word has in common speech is enough to free one of responsibility. The thing one professes is often just the very thing one does not hold to. Is it not so?"

She was standing by her bicycle as she spoke, balancing it now with two fingers, now with three. He held his with one good grip. In no fanciful way, the different attitudes might be taken as expressive of their characters.

"It is not so with me—I trust."

"But if you are responsible for every soul in your parish, you are responsible for me! I am in your parish now." He glanced at her again. This sounded very like mockery. But her face was quite grave. "Excuse my questioning you," she went on graciously. "You see, I am a student of character, and in view——"

"And so you want to dissect me?" he interrupted, laughing. "Well, I don't mind being pinned to a card, if you promise to let me see how you label me afterwards."

"I promise," she cried quickly, a gleam of amusement in her eyes. "I know the genus already, but the species baffles me.'

"I should have thought the latter was the easier to find. I am only 'a poor persoun of a town.'"

"Oh, I don't mean how you go down in the census, of course. Statistics confuse one. Don't you think data only interfere with sound theories?"

"I don't know about that; but, if you will allow me——" And he took her bicycle from her. "This hill is really very steep; do not try to ride it——" for she had put her foot on the pedal.

"Well," she yielded, "I suppose we must accept certain conclusions in dynamics. It is, however, a bore at times."

"Undoubtedly," he replied, smiling, "the world would be far more to our liking if we could remake it and eliminate friction."

"Ah, no; that would never do, I fear; for, you see, the world that would suit me would never suit you."

He looked at the dainty figure beside him and the wide stretch of moorland beyond, backed by crouching tors.

"I think," he said, in a deeper tone, "I think—I could suit myself to your—to most worlds."

"You! 'Ah, would some god the giftie gie us!' I am afraid, Mr. Pierpoint, you have not studied your own character."

"Perhaps not," he returned humbly. "It takes a lifetime to do it." The last words were jerked out, for one of the bicycles went over a huge stone. "This is certainly a bad road. I fear it would have been better to have advised you to take the lower road."

"With the pony-carriage? How could you suggest anything so unadventurous! Besides, I chose this of my own free will. You laid the alternative before me, and you are thus relieved of all responsibility."

"I am afraid I do not feel so. I have only ridden here alone, or with men, before. With a lady it is different. I forgot this long hill."

"Do men always feel responsible with women?"

"Of course!" he laughed, looking round again. Her tone and look were that of a child seeking information. "Especially," he added, "when one has given them too much of their own way. I fear you will be very tired.

"Not I," she answered brightly, "I am used to hard work and long walks. And it is so nice for the poor, dear bicycles to get a good walk in this delicious air."

They paused a moment to view the lovely sweep of tor behind tor ending far away with the pale blue weirdness of Mis-tor. The girl took off her hat to feel the coolness of the breeze. Her companion came to the swift conclusion that the prettiest thing in nature was little red-brown curls blown into rebellion. Then she quenched the vision with her uncompromising sailor, and, as she drove the hat-pins home, remarked placidly:

"I hope you don't mind my asking you so many point-blank questions. I fear it is my only idea of conversation. You see, I spend nine months of the year propounding questions to children, and one does not glean much information, after all. Of course, one gets answers one never expected, but, at the best, it is only just the knowledge I have tried to put into their little heads returned to me in language whose baldness makes one shudder. By the way—may I say it?—I like your sermons." Pierpoint held himself a little straighter. To do good was certainly the dearest wish of his heart. "You use nice adjectives," went on the clear voice. "I think they are your strong point." A pause, for somehow he did not walk quite so erect, and, literally, he had no reply ready. "You don't mind our discussing you, do you? For," with a very gracious inflexion, "we can choose another topic, if you prefer it."

The poor curate could only laugh. It was certainly flattering, yet he was keenly on the look out for mockery.

"You were good enough to state at the foot of the hill that you meant to dissect me. I suppose the process is going on still. As a rule, naturalists do not trouble about the wriggles of the victim. I am only hoping that at the summit of this tor we shall be allowed to change places."

"But you don't wri—I mean I am not suitable for that treatment. I have no marked characteristics."

"Indeed!" He raised his eyebrows.

"Oh—you think I have? Instance, please, and don't mind if they are faults. It is your duty, you know."

Yes, he knew that.

"Well!" ("Cocksureness" rose to his lips, but one cannot well use that term of a lady to her face. He paraphrased.) "Don't you think you are sometimes, sometimes—well—quite sure that only you are in the right, and everybody else in the wrong?"

"Well! I like that!" she exclaimed, pushing back her hat vigorously. "Now, if there is one characteristic of yours that I have noted, it is just that!"

They had reached the top of the hill. Evelyn resumed the care of her bicycle. To her last remark he merely smiled. She thought she detected a lofty superiority in his look, and wished she could find something crushing to say.

"This hill is rather steep," he remarked; "do not coast it, I advise."

"Thanks," as she pulled the wheel straight into position; "I am sorry to disregard ecclesiastical advice, but I always coast. And I am quite sure of the species now—it is distinctly irritans."

She was off before she ended, and the last word came back to him over her shoulder. A quick gleam of anger swept over Pierpoint's face. Then he shrugged his shoulders. Mockery, he told himself, was hateful in man or woman. Then he, too, mounted his bicycle, and rode after her. But none too fast, and Evelyn had joined the rest of the party at the foot of the hill, round the corner, before he overtook her.

The "rest" consisted of Evelyn's two companions, Winwood, and a few friends whom Miss Alicia had gathered together in order to show a little of the country to her new acquaintances. Miss Alicia was, indeed, the point of cohesion, the beginning and end of this adventure.

Now, as Pierpoint came up with the group, he approached Alice, who sat smiling in Dr. Trehane's trap. Not a glance did he bestow on the parishioner who, it must be owned, at this time occupied most of his thoughts, until her name, repeated in many tones of remonstrance, compelled attention, and Alice broke off in the middle of a sentence. They were soon aware of the deadlock. As the party was now at the entrance to Lyntonstowe Park, it was proposed not to return to the village by the high road, but to turn aside and show Lyntonstowe and its gardens to these Londoners. Judith had agreed at once, and in the curtest monosyllables; but Evelyn stood very still and straight by her bicycle, her head in the air and a flush on her cheek. A distinct negative was her reply to the proposal. She did not wish to go to other people's houses, people with whom she was not acquainted.

It was eagerly explained to her by many voices that all the company—at least, all the Lynton folk—knew the Retallacks of Lyntonstowe.

"And does nobody ever visit the houses of great people?" began Mrs. Trehane.

"Yes, great people," broke in the girl, "but these Retallacks—well, they are just Retallacks, like——"

"Like yourself!" cried young Glinn, laughing.

"You may be distantly related to them, Miss Retallack," Mrs. Trehane continued with emphasis. "It is well to know something of the heads of one's family."

"You are right, madam," replied the girl, with a bow. She was quite pale now, erect, with dark lashes resting on her cheek.

The formality of her reply struck Winwood's ear. He looked at her steadfastly.

"They paused a moment to view the lovely sweep of tor behind tor."—p. 147.

In another moment she cut the knot. Turning her bicycle, she said, with a haughty little smile:

"Don't mind me! I have heaps of work to do for my—my study. I will go home now." And she was off.

Winwood turned quickly to Pierpoint.

"Will you not go with her?"

"Certainly not," replied that gentleman.

"Then I will."

In a few minutes he overtook her. He begged that he might accompany her. But she declined. And when he urged she said:

"Please, go back. I had really rather go alone. I am quite used to doing things alone and taking care of myself. Thank you very much, all the same; but, you know, we working women are born with an extra skin."

"One too few, I should have thought," he could not help saying as he looked at her a little sadly.

Her erect young figure, her rounded cheek, the very curliness of her hair—in a word, all that was so girlish, unformed, defiant about her—struck him with a feeling of pathos he could not account for.

"Well, I will obey you," he answered quietly, respecting her wish, and, turning, he slowly rejoined the rest of the party.

CHAPTER VII.

AND JUDITH STUDIES EVELYN.

IN the twilight, as Evelyn sat alone, she was thinking of this little scene, thinking of Claude Winwood with much kindness, when the door opened to admit her two companions. They had much to tell, and it took much time, but the gist of it was that, on entering Lyntonstowe House, they were informed that Mrs. and Miss Retallack had come home the day before. Alice and Judith were for at once retiring, but at this moment a lady appeared coming down the wide stairs. All the old inhabitants hastened forward to meet her. It was Miss Retallack.

"Miss Retallack? You mean Miss Elinor Retallack," broke from Evelyn.

"Well, yes; her name is Elinor, but, of course, she is Miss Retallack here—is she not?—seeing all this belongs to her."

"I wish you could change with her, Evelyn," Judith remarked absently. "I should like to stay at Lyntonstowe. The library is very fine."

"Would you?" said Evelyn, with a little curl of her lips. "Make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, my dear. It is the only way to get on in this world. Sell your dearest affections. The market price for them is sometimes high."

"But I have not finished": and Alice went on to relate how they had been introduced to Miss Retallack, what a pleasing impression she had made on them: "a sweet girl, but shy and timid."

"She looks as if the wind had never been allowed to blow on her," added Judith.

"Quite a different and, of course, much superior up-bringing to mine, I suppose?' from Evelyn.

"Different; but I query the superiority," replied Judith. "You certainly have the advantage of her in mothers."

"Have I—really?" she spoke eagerly.

Judith shook her head slowly.

"I should not like to be even connected with Mrs. Retallack of Lyntonstowe. I should welcome any relationship to your mother."

Judith was more sparing in praise than blame: Evelyn sprang up and gave her a hug.

"You are a dear, Judy! Was she—wasn't Mrs. Retallack pleasant to you?"

"Mrs. Retallack is just ice—smooth ice to some, rough ice to others. Alice and I were an unknown genus to her, and her manners sank below zero."

"Now, Judith," Alice interposed, "you know she did ask us to have tea. Miss Retallack took the whole party to the drawing-room," she explained to Evelyn. "A lovely room, with long windows and a smaller drawing-room beyond, opening on to a south terrace——"

"And a bow window to the west?"

"Yes! How did you know?"

"Oh, I—I have heard a description of the house. Go on."

"Well, she offered us tea—Mrs. Retallack, I mean."

"But no sugar," muttered Judith.

"And she was nice," went on Alice, unheeding, "and most courteous to that funny old Miss Baird."

"Miss Baird is a cousin of Lord Rainsford's."

"Stop that cynic's mouth, Evelyn!"

"No; I like her best when she is a cynic; it gives me an opportunity of being optimistic. There is never room for Judy and me in the same boat; we take turns in our opinions; only—I am going to agree about Mrs. Arthur Retallack."

"Then you must also agree about the daughter; for she is a sweet girl, and all the young men seemed to think so, too. Mr. Winwood and Mr. Pierpoint had never met her before. The latter seemed especially charmed."

"Naturally; it's his duty to be obsequious to the Lady of the Manor."

"I shouldn't call him obsequious," Judith's love of justice intervened. "It was simply a case of admiring a nice-looking, graceful girl."

When Evelyn left them that evening—to add another chapter to her book, she said—Alice lay quietly on the sofa and Judith stared before her. Suddenly she broke the silence:

"Alice, Evelyn is a relative of these Retallacks."

"Yes? I suppose all Retallacks are related somehow. It is an uncommon name."

"Evelyn is a near relation, and there has been some quarrel in the family. I should like to know."

"Do you really think so? But we cannot ask her, can we?"

"No; I suppose not. Poor little thing!"

Alice looked up. Such tenderness was unwonted. Judith flushed and added:

"A child of her years should not be bitter. She was so to-night."

And, upstairs, Evelyn had a little weep before she slept—perhaps to wash out the bitterness.

"A very pleasant afternoon," said Dr. Trehane to his family that same evening.

"Except for that absurd girl," answered his wife.

"Miss Retallack?"

"That London Miss Retallack. I don't know her Christian name."

"Evelyn," came promptly from the lips of Harry Trehane.

His mother looked at him for a moment.

"She is a very ridiculous girl, and far too proud for her station in life. I am sure she is a poor relation whom dear Mrs. Retallack has had to keep at arm's length."

"She may be poor," returned the doctor; "in fact, I conclude she is; but she doesn't want much pushing away. It isn't an arm's length that is needed; a finger length would send her into the next parish."

"Right you are, sir," cried Harry.

And his mother looked at the young man again.

Miss Alicia had, however, no qualms as to the success of her picnic. For had she not, concerning this, held solemn synod with Miss Selina? As usual, a singularly unanimous synod, since, seeing that Miss Selina heard only every tenth word of Miss Alicia's rapid statements, she had long since fallen into the attitude of the spirit that assents. She always agreed to everything proposed by Miss Alicia, and when the project turned out well she said, "Ah, yes, Alicia, you did well to follow my advice." But, if ill, Miss Selina, nothing deterred, shook her head: "Ah, well, I told you so! Your experience is longer, but not so wide as mine. Perhaps you did not hear my warning. I am sorry; but I fear you are getting a little deaf, Alicia. It runs in our family. My own hearing is not quite so acute as it was, and you are older and must be getting hard of hearing."

Long before such a speech was ended Miss Alicia would have left the room abruptly. Miss Selina, picking up her stitches, would not have heard her departure. The elder sister's temper was quick; flight was the only means to preserve it.

The meeting, therefore, had been unanimous when Miss Alicia proposed to call on "those poor young things at Mrs. Hill's." Mr Pierpoint had vouched for the fact that they were ladies. In state the call had been made and returned. Each interview was interesting. But has not Evelyn long since made copy thereof? And the incidents, being therefore in print already, may not now be given here. Only Miss Retallack's remark, as she at length broke silence on her homeward walk, may give the clue.

"Well," she exclaimed, after a deep breath. "I mean, gramercy! How charming are the centuries other than ours! For this peep I shall be thankful—doubly thankful—that I live in the nineteenth."

Nevertheless, Miss Alicia's mediævalism did not prevent her wishing to give her young friends the pleasure of such society as Lynton St. Maurice afforded. This picnic was to have introduced them to it.

Looking back on the day's doings, she was sorely puzzled by Evelyn's conduct.

"And, you see, she would have met the Lyntonstowe people, Selina. Now, was it not really stupid of her to turn her back like that?"

"Turned? I don't think that dress was turned, Alicia. It looked very fresh."

Miss Alicia shouted louder.

"Ah, yes; very stupid, as you say. I am glad you see it, Alicia. Of course, I should not like to call you so to your face, but since you acknowledge it, my dear——"

This time, Miss Alicia gave it up in despair.

She searched in her own mind, however, for Evelyn's motive. At length, when preparing for bed that same night, a sudden thought struck her, so that she positively dropped her hair-brush in surprise and started off to tell Selina, then stopped as suddenly.

"No use," she cried to herself. "Poor Selina could never take it in. I wish Rainsford were back from the Riviera, and I would tell him. How very curious! Where can my hair-brush be? Dear, dear!"

CHAPTER VIII.

"PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."

ANOTHER person, a few days later, received a similar enlightening re Evelyn Retallack.

It was at the Rectory, on the occasion of a small tennis-party given by the curate-in-charge to some of his parishioners.

Here Winwood found himself—perhaps it would be truer to say manœuvred to find himself—by the side of Evelyn Retallack. She was so much the most entertaining person present. The other girls—Trehanes, whose laugh never seemed to end; Vennicks, who blushed when you spoke to them; Hernes, unable to talk of anything but cycling; Hoblyns (a trifle passées these), who never waxed lively, except on vaccination and its evils—how different they all were from this alluring little person, whose moods varied with every hour and were ever fresh! Her very daring, her camaraderie, charmed him. There was no need to limit his vocabulary when he spoke to her. She could almost finish his thoughts for him.

Evelyn had just ended a rather vigorous game of tennis and stood fanning herself with a chestnut leaf.

"It is hot out here. Suppose we go into the library to rest a little?" said the wily one at her side. "The thermometer at this degree suggests a deep armchair and tea."

"Tea is out here. See Miss Alicia under the plane-tree!"

"But those long windows lead to the library, and tea can be brought therethrough to tired persons by humble attendants."

Evelyn laughed and succumbed. It was a pleasant meal, and enjoyed by each.

"May I look at the books?" she asked, after a while. Her eyes had been wandering over them for some time. "Books always make me hungry," she murmured.

At this moment the door opened and Pierpoint entered. A quick change passed over Evelyn's face. She stiffened somewhat.

"Miss Retallack," he began, "I have been looking for you. Have you—oh, you have had your tea?"

"Mr. Winwood kindly looked after me."

"Miss Retallack would like to examine your bookshelves, Pierpoint."

"With pleasure. But they are not my shelves, unfortunately. My own books do not present so distinguished an appearance."

"You are ashamed of them!" she cried. "I know: they are all yellow-backs, pseudonyms, and the like."

"You put me on my defence," he answered gaily. "These," pointing to a small set of shelves, "contain my modest library."

"I see," she assented, after a moment's scanning of the shelves, "except the 'twenty books clad in black and red' which you keep at your 'bed's head.' 'Social Economics,' 'Our Duty to Our Neighbour'—I withdraw the accusation of light literature, Mr. Pierpoint; these are decidedly heavy."

"But saved by some poetry."

"Do you read poetry?" she went on rather absently. "Do you write much?"

"Poetry? Certainly not. Do—do you?'

"Heaps."

She flashed up a smile at him.

"Really? And—how can one become the possessor of your poems? Who is your publisher?"

"Alas! No publisher as yet has been so far-seeing as to confer that immortal honour on himself."

"I would give anything to read your poetry," said Pierpoint slowly.

"And I to see you write it," put in Winwood. She glanced at him. "'Non compta mansere comæ,'" he went on, looking at the ceiling.

Her quick blush showed a moment's embarrassment. Then she laughed it off.

"Which, being interpreted, means, 'They had lost their hairpins.'"

"But if it is not published," persisted Basil, "at least it is—perhaps—to be had in manuscript?"

"Typed."

"Well—typed. Anyhow, I want so much to read it. Can you be persuaded? Teach me how to ask you."

"I should not dare to teach my pastor anything, unless it were a Christian grace or two."

"Is not this a fascinating edition, Miss Retallack?" interposed Winwood, in his capacity as buffer.

"'Pilgrim's Progress'!" she cried. "What quaint, delightful pictures! I have never had a 'Pilgrim's Progress' of my own," she went on in a voice sedulously plaintive. "Now, if you really mean all you say—as a pastor should—let us make an exchange. Instead of this book, you shall have my last lyric."

"Alas! that you should fix on that, for it is not mine. Take all the rest instead!"

"So is it ever," she smiled: "'for it was borrowed.'"

She opened it and glanced unconsciously at the title-page. Suddenly her face changed, and she was silent. With an effort the girl closed the little volume and turned to Winwood, all the brightness gone from her look.

"I think—perhaps Alice will wish to go home."

"It is quite early," Pierpoint expostulated, "and you and I have not yet played together. Will you play with me now? Everybody else seems tired."

"And therefore I shall do to stop a gap."

"Please don't always misunderstand me," with a new and humbler accent in his voice. She was looking at him quietly in that inscrutable fashion of hers. Altogether, an air of detachment had fallen on her. "I know I am always saying what offends you. But if you knew—I wish you would understand——"

Winwood had retreated to the bookshelves, and Pierpoint's voice fell.

"Is there a mystery about you?" She smiled faintly as they passed out through the window.

"Not at all; Winwood says I am as plain to read as print. I wish you would read me a little plainer. Indeed, Miss Retallack, I should count it the highest honour to be numbered amongst your friends."

"I have no friends," she answered, a little wearily. "People in our family always quarrel."

"I will gladly accept the quarrels with the friendship."

Evelyn caught Alice's eye beaming on her. Her mood changed suddenly.

"I am going to play tennis with you now, Mr. Pierpoint," she returned briskly. "Do you want me as a partner or an opponent? I am excellent in either capacity; ask those youths there," with a wave of her hand to Harry Trehane and the two or three other young men of the party.

Winwood later, as soon as he conveniently could, took down the little brown volume. On the fly-leaf was written in a boyish hand: "Evelyn John Retallack: from his father."

Meeting one afternoon, in the village post-office, the old librarian of Lyntonstowe, Winwood fell into chat with him. Mr. Snell was walking home. Winwood, unoccupied as usual and a little désœuvré, joined him, and proceeded to open a brilliant discourse on the weather. He had vague thoughts of a fishing expedition for the morrow. Did Mr. Snell think the weather would be propitious?"

Mr. Snell shook his head. He really did not remember the weather signs.

"You are always buried in books, Mr. Snell. Happy man!"

"I don't read much, Mr. Winwood," the old man said slowly.

"I should have thought you would have read half that library by now. Does it take so much time to keep it in order?"

"No; scarcely anyone ever comes to disturb them."

"But then——" Winwood stopped: it struck him that the conversation was developing into a cross-examination. He searched for another subject. "It must make things more lively at Lyntonstowe having Mrs. and Miss Retallack back."

"Perhaps, Mr. Winwood. Miss Retallack is good and sensible; but I see little of her mother."

"Miss Retallack is an only child, I suppose?"

"An only child, and"—the old man's voice dropped—"and a disappointment. The Colonel wanted a boy, and then, when he heard of the other boy, then he did it."

"She could almost finish his thoughts for him."

Winwood remained silent, rightly judging the old man more likely to be communicative if left unquestioned. Nor was he wrong. Soon the librarian continued, as if to himself:

"He never got over the loss of Evelyn. And how could he?"

"Evelyn? Evelyn Retallack?"

Winwood could not forbear the exclamation.

"Of course: Evelyn John Retallack. What else? Like his father and grandfather before him. Evelyn and Arthur—those were always the Retallack names. And the second was Arthur."

"Colonel Retallack had two sons?" Mr. Snell looked up wonderingly at the speaker. "I am a stranger here, you know," Winwood said insinuatingly, "but I am interested in the Retallack family history. I did not know there were two sons."

"Of course there were two. Arthur lies buried beside his father in the family vault, and Evelyn—well, we don't know where he is. And where would be the use of finding him either. Penniless his father made him, and penniless he must remain, unless——" He sighed.

"Why should——Did he displease his father?"

The old man made no reply for a moment. They had reached the end of Fore Street. Now he stopped before a house.

"I think I must go in here, Mr. Winwood," he said. "And so I have to wish you good-evening."

Whether the visit had been determined on beforehand, or was now used as a pretext to keep the Retallack history shrouded from him, Winwood could not guess. At any rate, it only made him more resolved than before to find out whether the girl who so interested him was in any way bound up with that history. He bade Mr. Snell good-bye, and directed his course straight for Miss Baird's house.

Miss Alicia was at home, and made him very welcome. The elder Miss Baird had always been plain and always quite unselfconscious. This gave her a frank manner with men which contrasted with the rather punctilious behaviour of her younger sister. Miss Selina had been pretty, and she never forgot the fact. Now, on perceiving the entrance of the young man, she adjusted her frills a little, and by a clever manœuvre substituted a black silk sock for the red woollen muffler she had been knitting.

Winwood underwent long and ample greetings. Where would he sit? They were so pleased to see him. Had he had his tea? How was Mr. Pierpoint? And his cold? What! he had none? No cold? Miss Alicia was certain she had heard a sneeze from the direction of the vestry the evening before in church. Well, she was pleased Mr. Pierpoint had escaped cold, but, if ever he should have a cold, she would recommend Mr. Winwood to give him camphor—at once!

Mr. Winwood, granted a moment to reply, mildly explained that he would not be always with Mr. Pierpoint, and perhaps it would be better to propose these remedies to that gentleman himself.

"Yes, yes, of course. I am sorry to learn you will be leaving us, Mr. Winwood, and just now, when the Retallacks——"

"Miss Baird," he ventured to interrupt, "may I make a straightforward request of you? Will you tell me the family history of the Retallacks?"

"Don't you know it? Well, really, there is nothing to tell, except the old Colonel's disinheriting his son.

"His eldest son?"

"Yes, of course. But you cannot be surprised when you remember the opinions he held, can you?"

As she paused a second, Winwood hastened to observe that he did not know what those opinions were.

"Oh, they were dreadful! I forget what they were exactly, but not such as a gentleman should have, I am sure, and——Selina! What were Evelyn Retallack's opinions?"

"Millions!" exclaimed Miss Selina. "Surely you mean at most one million, Alicia? And who left it to him? I am very glad indeed, poor fellow. Be careful of that habit of exaggeration, Alicia."

Miss Alicia had begun to speak rapidly before Selina ended.

"It is very distressing, Mr. Winwood, poor Selina's deafness. Selina! I said o-pin-i-ons!"

"I understand. So that is what she was. Dear me! I should never have thought a pin-manufactory could be so lucrative."

The elder sister started up and, putting her lips to her sister's ear, shouted the question once more. This time Selina heard.

"Dear me, Alicia," she cried, with a start, "I am only a little—I mean, I do not hear quite as well as I did, but you seem to think I am quite deaf!" Then she faced Winwood. "I fear Mr. Retallack's opinions were not admirable. In fact, they were, I assure you, such as no gentleman should profess." She took up again the black silk knitting, which had fallen on her knee. "No gentleman," she repeated in a final manner.

"You see; I told you so," exclaimed Miss Alicia. "Now was that not dreadful? And are you any longer surprised that Colonel Retallack disinherited him? Especially when you remember what a hot-tempered man he was."

Winwood, with an air of resignation, again remarked that he was a stranger to Lynton St. Maurice—in fact, that was why he had troubled Miss Baird with his questioning. Secretly, he repented the questioning now; at least, if all he could gather was information of this vague and diluted kind.

Eventually, however, he reached a solid substratum of fact, and when he at length bade Miss Baird farewell and betook himself down the road to the Rectory, he pieced it all together. Colonel Retallack had two sons, Evelyn and Arthur. At an early age Evelyn developed opinions displeasing to his strongly Tory father. As we have seen, neither Miss Alicia nor Miss Selina was very explicit as to what these opinions were. Winwood could only suppose they were, in the old gentleman's eyes, heterodox either in politics or in religion—probably in both. The breach thus made was further widened by the son's refusal to enter the army, the profession his father had chosen for him, and the final split came when Evelyn refused to marry Charlotte Buchan, the only child of the Colonel's old brother-in-arms, Major Buchan, and heiress of the Lynton St. Mary estate. Yet even this might have been condoned, but that he immediately, and in defiance of his father's express prohibition, married a penniless girl, whom, in Miss Baird's words, "he had picked up somewhere," and whom nobody in Lynton had ever seen. Arthur, the second son, proved more amenable. He did all his father wished, moulded his opinions exactly on his, entered the army, married Charlotte Buchan, thereby joining the Buchan estates to the Retallack, along which they marched, and then—his duty done, as it were—developed rapid consumption and died.

"His mother was delicate, and so is his daughter, too," remarked Miss Baird.

Gently induced back into the direct path of the narrative, she went on to tell of the grief of the Colonel, his disappointment (well-known) that Arthur's child was a girl, and then, the year after Arthur's, his own sudden death.

"A skittish young horse, and he a man already up in years. But he wouldn't be warned, Mr. Winwood, and now—although I know his opinions were quite sound, for Rainsford, our cousin, always says so, and so does Mr. Burton—still I ask you what is the use of sound opinions when your real opinion is just—yourself, and when you are quite sure of only one thing: that you are in the right, and everybody else in the wrong?"

"I suppose then," Winwood had replied with a smile, "that, we may take it, is a Retallack characteristic."

"Not with Arthur. He was very gentle and easy to manage. Charlotte, his wife, managed him entirely."

"And when Colonel Retallack died so suddenly?"

"Then his will was produced, leaving all to little Elinor Retallack."

"And Evelyn had completely disappeared?"

"Completely—at least, as far as the Lyntonstowe people know. There was once a rumour of his having a little son born to him, but nobody knows anything certainly."

Winwood remembered old Snell's mention of the "other boy," and his mind flew to wills and their codicils. Here Winwood came to the crux of the whole matter.

"And this Miss Evelyn Retallack, Miss Baird—who do you think she is?"

"Well, Mr. Winwood, I have my suspicions there. You must know that a very similar thing happened to the Colonel's own father and uncle, only that it was the younger son who quarrelled and went off in a huff. I think our young friend is one of his grandchildren—if connected really with these Retallacks. I know he has some grandchildren, and he lives in Canada."

Winwood, however, decided otherwise in his own mind.

[END OF CHAPTER EIGHT.]

"'Did he displease his father?'"

A Novel Christmas Banquet.

By Elizabeth L. Banks.

"TO Educated Women of Gentle Birth, Destitute and Alone——"

So began the strange invitation to a strange Christmas banquet given a few years ago in New York by a well-known church and society woman.

I attended the banquet in my capacity as newspaper reporter, and I speak of it as "strange" because, indeed, it was the strangest as also the most touching banquet I ever attended.

For a certain part of that Christmas Day I was on duty for my newspaper, and it was my task to report the doings at various charity Christmas feasts which were that day given to the city's poor.

Altogether merry and jolly I found the partakers of the newsboys' dinner, when I peeped upon them at the beginning of my round. It fairly did my heart good to see them in their hundreds gathered about immense tables, whereon were turkey and cranberry sauce, and escaloped oysters, and plum puddings, and mince pies and celery, and everything else the Christmas appetite could fancy. I watched them scramble into their seats, grab the turkey-legs with their two hands, bite off the meat, use their knives instead of forks, and their fingers sometimes in place of either.

"Why, say," said one of the grinning youngsters to me, "w'at ye doin' at our dinner? You ain't no newsboy!"

"No," I answered; "but I'm what might be called a 'newswoman,' because I'm going to write all about your Christmas dinner for to-morrow's paper."

"Hurrah! Hurrah!" came the chorus from the boys. "Say, fellers, ain't it fine? This yere lady's goin' to write about our dinner for her paper. Say, miss, just put my name in as one o' the guests, will ye? I'm Billy Snyder. An' there's me brother, an' Sam Jones, too—don't forget 'em, will ye? Say, just take the names of all of us, an' print 'em, and when I calls out to-morrer's paper I'll shout: 'Yere's yer mornin' paper—all about the newsboys' dinner—buy a paper, mister, and read all the names of us fellers what was there!'"

It was "merry Christmas" with those newsboys, sure enough. Some good people were giving them a free dinner, and they were enjoying it as only boys of their ilk could enjoy such a feast. There was but one cloud upon their happiness—the fact, which I tried to impart to them as gently as possible, that I could not put their names in the paper because of lack of space. But I got a good report of their merriment, and out again into the white Christmas weather I went, then on a cable car to the "up-town" or fashionable part of New York.

"TO EDUCATED WOMEN OF GENTLE BIRTH, DESTITUTE AND ALONE.—You are invited by Mrs. —— to a Christmas Dinner here in her house to-day at two o'clock."

In the drawing-room window of one of the brown-stone houses was the sign, the magnet that had drawn me from the newsboys' dinner on the east side to another Christmas dinner on the west side. A few days before Christmas the invitation had been published in the various New York newspapers; and then, on Christmas Day, lest any of the wished-for guests might not have read the papers, there shone from the window of the brown-stone mansion the light to guide them thither.

At the door of the drawing-room stood the hostess, receiving her guests.

"A merry Christmas! I am pleased to see you," was her greeting to each one that passed her. She extended her hand, and several times, as guest after guest passed into the beautiful room beyond, I noticed a pained, half-bewildered look on the face of the hostess, and once or twice her eyes were bright with tears.

No servant stood near to announce the guests, since all were nameless for the day. Some, the hostess recognised as friends of former years; some, I, too, knew as grand dames of a time not long gone by; but to each and all only the cheery greeting, "Merry Christmas! I am pleased to see you," was given, and, finally, when a hundred of New York's gentlewomen—"destitute and alone"—had passed through the hospitable portal, the doors of the dining-room were thrown open, and the guests took their places at the tables.

The table linen was of the finest damask, the silver shone resplendent, the china was beautiful and costly, the glasses thin and dainty, and the table decorations were such as only taste and wealth could provide. In front of each cover was a tiny cut-glass vase of flowers.

Around the tables there were gathered sweet-faced women with white hair; women with tired, careworn faces and dark hair; and there were some young girls whose beauty shone out in spite of the melancholy of their eyes. All were well dressed—that is, there was nothing cheap or loud or gaudy about the apparel of the guests—but many of the hats and dresses were a bit old-fashioned, and none of the clothes were absolutely new.

A handsome woman of about forty was wearing a black satin dress: satin which, when purchased, must have cost five or six dollars a yard. Her hat, old and behind the times as it was, showed that it had originally been bought of a certain milliner who is known to supply only the richest of New York's women with headgear. Her boots were of the finest kid, and had been mended in a neat, though amateurish, way by the wearer. One knew instinctively that her feet were encased in silk hose, doubtless much darned.

"I really could not eat any dinner today," she said, as she tried to smile up at her hostess. "Just a cup of coffee—that is all. You see, my head——"

But it was not her head. It was her stomach! As I looked at her I knew the woman was starving; that she had got past the ravenously hungry stage. Two days before, perhaps, she might have felt hungry, but now she felt only faint and weak, and craved for her Christmas dinner nothing but a cup of coffee. Some years before, she had been giving charity dinners herself, and called in the children of the poor and fed them in her own palatial home. Her hats and dresses were then of the latest style and make, bought in London and Paris, where she had been accustomed to go every year.

"'I'm pleased to see you,' was her greeting."

At a table there sat society belles of a quarter of a century ago. There was one woman who had owned her hundreds of negro slaves before the war between North and South; there was the daughter of an honoured judge; the wife of an absconding defaulter; the widow of a clergyman who had once preached to one of the wealthiest of eastern congregations; there were some women and girls who were trying hard to earn a living by office work, as dressmakers, as milliners, but who, because they were gentlewomen who had never been trained to pounce upon the "almighty dollar" and catch it as it came near, were failures, and must needs be pushed to the wall by the other working women of New York—the less refined and less dainty, but the stronger and better trained.

When the dinner was over and some of the guests were leaving, a woman I had known in another city a few years previously, and whose entertainments I had many times written up for the society columns of the paper on which I had then held a position, recognised me and turned aside to speak to me.

"You here! You here!" she whispered in an agitated voice. "Surely you cannot be going to write up this as a brilliant social function, with the names of the guests and the description of the gowns we are wearing! Promise me one thing for the sake of the days when I used to help you to fill your society page: you will not put my name in among the names of the guests at this dinner."

"I am not putting any names in," I answered. "Indeed, I am to write very little about it, except to say that a dinner to gentlewomen was given this year, and that I hope every Christmas to follow may see another such dinner."

She pressed my hand, and went out silently. I left the house and continued my reportorial round. How happy were the faces at all the other "charity dinners"! How the idea of being "written up" appealed to the newsboys, and the bootblacks, and the cripples, and the inhabitants of the slums! Truly, it was "merry Christmas," indeed, at all the other places. There were smiles and cheers, and a gulping down of good things. Only in the brown-stone mansion where a rich gentlewoman presided at a table where were gathered these other gentlewomen, "destitute and alone," did I find sadness on every face. Yet, of all the Christmas charities, I doubt not that this was the one most needed and most deserved and appreciated by those to whom the invitations were sent out.

As I have said, it all happened a few years ago in New York, and all my Christmases since then have been spent in London. Here also I have, Christmas after Christmas, gone about to report upon the feasts spread for the poor. I have heard the smacking of the newsboys' lips over the huge bites of prime Christmas roast beef; I have heard the watercress and flower girls counting aloud the plums in the slices of plum-pudding which lay upon their plates; I have seen "the poor" of the East End heartily enjoying their Christmas goose with apple sauce, and I have seen the little children of the mission chapels laughing gleefully as they played with their Christmas toys—all these things have I seen provided by London's rich and well-to-do for London's poor.

But not yet have I known of a feast provided for London's women of gentle birth, "destitute and alone," of whom there are many hundreds more than there are in New York.

There are many of them who live in the topmost, backmost, cheapest little rooms of apartment houses in the most select of West End neighbourhoods, in order, as they will say with a mirthless smile, to "have a good address." For they do not like anyone to know they are poor, these gentlewomen who are "destitute and alone." They are supposed by their landladies to "go out for their meals." Biscuits and watercress, with sometimes a bit of cold ham or beef, bought ready cooked, or an egg, surreptitiously boiled over a little spirit-stove, form the bulk of their none too frequent meals. Their clothes look often out-of-date, but their skirts do not look drabbled or dirty, for when they are in their little rooms they mend and brush and patch and darn, re-trim their hats with the same old flowers and ostrich-tips, and the same old ribbons, turned and pressed.

In her room the poor lady has no Christmas fire—but who suspects that? She has neither roast goose nor roast beef of Old England for dinner. She will eat a biscuit and some cheese—that is, unless this year some London woman follows the example of the New York woman, and gives a novel Christmas dinner.

But would she go if she were invited? Would scores of others like her become guests at a party where the hostess took them by the hand and wished them "A merry Christmas," inquiring not their names, stipulating only that they should be women of gentle birth, "destitute and alone"?

I am not sure; I cannot know; but I believe there would be many guests at such a Christmas feast in London. The hostess must be herself a woman of gentle birth and tact and diplomacy. She must not, on the day of the feast, call in her friends to help her receive her guests. It were better she should receive alone. She must not give over the entertainment of her guests to her servants. Though she should advertise her intention of receiving in the newspapers, she should see that no representatives of the press are there to report upon the identity of her guests. Indeed, if there were any possible way of keeping the address where the dinner is to be given out of the papers, it would be preferable.

The door of the hospitable house where the feast was to be given could not, of course, be left open during the two or three hours when the dinner was in progress. Both the wintry weather and the danger of the entrance of thieves would forbid that. The knocker would be used by the guests, the door opened by a servant, and the guests conducted to the drawing-room where the hostess awaited them. That is all. It requires a careful thinking out, management, and delicate handling.

"When they are in their little rooms they mend and brush and patch and darn."

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

DECEMBER 21ST.—Christmas Lesson.

Passage for reading—St. Luke ii. 8–20.

POINTS. 1. The angels tell of the Saviour's birth.
2. The angels rejoice in heaven and earth.
3. The shepherds tell the good news to all.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Christ the Saviour. A soldier, worn out in his country's service, took to playing the violin as a means of earning his living. But after a time his hand became feeble and tremulous, and he could no more make music. One day, while sitting sadly by the wayside, a man passed along and said, "My friend, you are too old and feeble; give me your violin." And he took the man's instrument and began to play most beautifully. The people gathered round in large numbers; and the old man held his hat, and money was poured in till it was full. The violinist played again, still more sweetly, and the hat was again filled with coin. Then the stranger gave the old man back his violin and departed. A whisper went round, "Who can he be?" And someone said, "Why, that is Bucher, the great violinist, who is known all over the kingdom!" He had taken the poor man's place, assumed his poverty, endured his disgrace, and played his music, and earned his livelihood that he might rescue him from want. So the Lord Jesus comes down, and He finds us in our spiritual want, and across the strings of His own broken heart He strikes a strain of music which is praised in earth and heaven. He takes our poverty, He shares our life, He dies our death.

Universal Joy. The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the wide world's joy. The lonely pine on the mountain waves its sombre boughs and rejoices in the sun's light. The little meadow violet lifts its cup of blue and turns it to the sun. The tall sunflowers bask in its light and warmth. So Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, cheers all. The angels in heaven rejoice at His birth. Little children love His name, and early lisp His praises. The sinner repentant shakes off his chains of sin. The aged believer departs in peace, for he has seen His salvation. Love and joy and peace attend His path. Songs of praise bless His name, and all who come to Him rejoice in the sunshine of His love.

Telling of Christ. Mr. Moody, the evangelist, writes: "In a prayer meeting I once attended at Boston, most of those who took part were old men, but a little tow-headed Norwegian boy got up and said, 'If I tell the world about Christ, He will tell the Father about me.'" Mr. Moody adds: "That wrote itself upon my heart, and I have never forgotten what that little boy said, but have tried to do what I could in telling the world the tale of Jesus Christ."

DECEMBER 28TH.—Lessons of the Old Year.

Passage for reading—Isaiah xxxviii.

POINTS. 1. The certainty of death.
2. The need of preparation for death.
3. The future life of the righteous.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Death the Common Lot. A beautiful story is told of Buddha and a poor woman who came to ask him if there was any medicine which would bring back to life her dead child. When he saw her distress he spoke tenderly to her, and he told her there was one thing which might cure her son. He bade her bring him a handful of mustard seed—common mustard seed. But he charged her to bring it from some house where neither father nor mother, child nor servant, had died. So the woman took her dead baby in her arms, and went from door to door asking for the mustard seed, and gladly was it offered her; but when she asked whether any had died in that house each one made the same sad answer, "I have lost my husband," or "My child is dead," or "Our servant has died." So with a heavy heart the woman went back to Buddha, and told him how she had failed to get the mustard seed, for that she could not find a single house where none had died. Then Buddha showed her lovingly that she must learn not to think only of her own grief, but must remember the griefs of others, seeing that all alike are sharers in sorrow and death.

Death to be Prepared For. One of the captains of Charles V. of Spain requested the favour of discharge from public service. The Emperor demanded the reason. The thoughtful officer replied, "There ought to be a pause between the tumult of life and the day of death." A young prince asked his tutor to give him some instruction about preparing for death. "Plenty of time when you are older," was the reply. "No," said the boy; "I have been to the churchyard and measured the graves, and there are many shorter than I am."

The Future Life of the Righteous. A Christian minister said to his friends just before his death, 'I have for years believed and taught that religion was well adapted to the dying, but now I know it. My friends talk about my going down into the valley of the shadow of death. I am now in it. And when they think me just going into it I shall be coming out of it into perfect day."

JANUARY 4TH, 1903.—Paul and Silas at Philippi.

Passage for reading—Acts xvi. 22–34.

POINTS. 1 The Apostles suffer tribulation.
2. The Apostles praise God.
3. The gaoler is converted.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Meaning of Trials. God deals with us somewhat after the manner of an ancient painter with his pupil. The young artist produced a picture of much merit, which was greatly admired by all. His heart was swelled with vanity. He laid aside his palette and pencil, and sat daily before his easel, admiring the offspring of his own genius. One morning he found his beautiful picture wiped out from the canvas. He wept bitterly. His master appeared, and said, "I have done this for your benefit; the picture was ruining you." "How so?" demanded the pupil. "Because in the admiration of your own talents, you were losing your love for the art itself. Take your pencil and try again." The youth dried his tears, seized his pencil and produced a masterpiece, which but for this severe trial would in all probability never have been executed. Paul and Silas realised that "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth."

True Blessedness. A learned doctor once prayed that God would show him someone to teach him the way of happiness. He came one day to a church porch, and saw a man dressed in the poorest clothes and his bare feet covered with dust and dirt. He greeted him saying, "God give thee good day!" The poor man answered, "I never had an evil day." Again he said, "God prosper thee!" The other answered, "I never had anything but prosperity." "God bless thee!" said the doctor, "how can that be so? Explain it to me, for I understand not." "Willingly," said the poor man. "I never had an ill day, for if I am hungry I praise God; does it rain, or snow, or hail, is it fair weather or foul, I praise God. I have never been unprosperous, for I know that what God does is best; and what God gives or ordains for me, whether pain or pleasure, I take cheerfully from Him as the best of all, and so I never had adversity. I was never unblessed, for I desire to live only in the will of God. I can rest in nothing else than God. Now that I have found Him, whatever happens, I am always happy."

The Conversion of an Officer. In July, 1719, Colonel Gardiner, who was then leading a most licentious life, had spent one Sunday evening in dissipated company, and had an appointment to meet someone else at midnight. While he was waiting for his friend he took up a book to pass away the time. As he was reading he saw an unusual blaze of light fall on the page, and, looking up, he saw before him, as it were suspended in the air, a representation of the Saviour on the cross, surrounded by a glory. At the same moment he heard a voice saying, "O sinner, did I suffer this for thee, and are these the returns?" The vision filled him with unutterable astonishment and agony of heart. Pierced by a sense of ingratitude to God, he from that moment forsook his evil life.

JANUARY 11TH.—Christian Living.

Passage for reading—Philippians iv. 1—13.

POINTS. 1. The Christian's duty—steadfastness.
2. The Christian's privilege—joy and peace.
3. The Christian's state of mind—contentment.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Hold Fast. Crossing the Mer de Glace, that great "sea of ice" which forms the largest glacier in Switzerland, the traveller comes to a pass which is called "Le Mauvais Pas," the dangerous path. It runs along the side of the mountain. It is scarcely a foot wide. Above it is a wall of rock, while below at the depth of several hundred feet is the glacier, with its sharp points of ice and rock. Path it is called, but in many places it is in reality nothing but the sharp jutting inequalities of the face of the precipitous rock. Only let your foot slip, and it is a sheer leap into another world. But there is really no danger. Why? Because round the face of the rock, within your grasp, the Alpine guides have fixed a rope, fastened with iron staples to the great mountain wall of granite. So long as you grasp it you know that you are safe. Your feet may slip, but the trusty rope saves you from a fate which would be certain death. Faith is the rope by which a Christian holds on to God. Let him be steadfast in that hold and nothing can hurt him, for underneath him are "the everlasting arms."

Two Sides. Two boys went to gather plums. One was happy because they found them, the other unhappy because they had stones. Two men recovering from illness were asked how they were. One said, "I am better to-day"; the other, "I was worse yesterday." When it rains, one says, "This will make the roads muddy"; another, "This will lay the dust." Two ladies examining a bush, one observes that it has a thorn, the other that it has a rose. Two boys keeping a hive, one got honey, and the other, being careless, a sting. The first called them honey bees; the other, stinging bees. "I am glad," says one person, "that it is no worse." "I am sorry," says another, "that it is no better." One says, "Our good is mixed with evil"; another says, "Our evil is mixed with good." Some people are always sorrowing, others always rejoicing. Which is better?

Contentment. A king went into his garden one day and found everything withering and dying. He asked an oak what the trouble was. He found that it was sick of life because it was not tall and beautiful like the pine. The pine was out of heart because it could not bear fruit like the vine. The vine was going to throw its life away because it could not stand erect and have as fine fruit as the pomegranate; and so on throughout the whole garden. But when he came to the heart's-ease the king found its bright face uplifted, as full of cheerfulness as ever. Said the king, "Well, Heart's-ease, I am glad to find one brave little flower in this general discontentment and dying. You don't seem one bit disheartened." "No, your Majesty, I know I am of small account, but I concluded you wanted a heart's-ease when you planted me. If you had wanted an oak, or a pine, or a vine, or a pomegranate, you would have set one out. So I am bound to be the best heart's-ease that ever I can."

A NOBLE SUITOR.

A Short Story by Scott Graham.

CHAPTER I.

ELSIE MAITLAND stood on a rustic bridge spanning the little river which ran through the Midland village of Aston Crucis, with a vastly discontented expression on her pretty young face. The scenery around her was charming: a plantation of noble old oaks and beeches, through which the clear stream babbled, and melodious with the notes of birds and the cooing of wood-pigeons; whilst above her head stretched the deep blue sky of June. But, instead of finding any pleasure in her surroundings, she only tapped a volume she was carrying against the handrail of unbarked fir, and sighed, and sighed, and sighed again.

Everything here was so dull!—so slow!

She had no eyes for the mellow sunlight filtering through the light-green leaves to the dappled water which murmured soothingly at her feet. She was bored to death, and felt herself a most injured young woman because she had no money of her own, and, having lost both parents, was dependent for everything upon her uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Hunt, who lived at a pretty house in the village called "The Knoll." Everybody else thought her most fortunate in having such a beautiful home without being obliged to work for it; but Elsie was always conscious of being more or less de trop at "The Knoll." The Hunts had married late in life, after waiting for years, and, having no children, and being devoted to each other, spent their days pottering about their beautiful garden, or driving through the lanes, perfectly happy so long as they were together. In the evenings Mr. Hunt read to his wife, or they played cribbage or backgammon.

In this staid, elderly household Elsie's bright youth could not but be somewhat of a disturbing element, albeit her guardians were exceedingly kind to her. She did not possess the art—seldom acquired in early youth—of finding pleasure in little things, like the Hunts; and she loathed the country at all times. Until she was sixteen she had lived in London, and gone to a London High school; and her knowledge of a wider world had given her a distaste for the narrowness and dulness of provincial life. Many a time she felt a mad longing to go away somewhere—anywhere—where there would be something to do, and plenty of nice, congenial people to know. But she was hampered by not having a penny in the world beyond the liberal allowance her uncle made her for dress. And the worst of it was that, if she listened to her uncle and aunt, she would have to remain buried in this horrible village all her life. Without consulting her, they had quite settled, in their own minds, that she was to marry David Foster, the village doctor's only son, who would, in due time, succeed to his father's practice, and live happily ever after. David was quite willing, though he had never proposed in so many words; his father approved, and the rest of the village looked smilingly on, saying what an excellent match it would be for Miss Maitland. It was useless for Elsie to protest that she detested David Foster; the more she snubbed him, the more devoted he became; and the Vicar's wife was already at work upon an elaborate tea-cloth, destined for her wedding present to the happy pair.

It made Elsie rage furiously to think that her future should be thus planned out, without her consent being asked. "Marry a man with huge feet, and red hair, and a turned-up nose, and the most antiquated notions about what it's proper for girls to do!" thought she viciously. "Not if I know it!"

She sighed again as she looked at the book in her hand. It was a novel of the most romantic type, in which the beautiful heroine was adored by an equally delightful hero, possessed of a title, a fortune, and every accomplishment under the sun, who finally married her after various exciting adventures and misunderstandings. Why could not something equally pleasant happen to herself? Elsie mused discontentedly. Why could she not have a lover six feet two, with melting eyes of Irish blue, and a title, and a fine estate? Life would be worth living then: there would be some romance in it, instead of the wearisome daily round!

A step echoed on the woodland pathway, and David Foster himself appeared, blushing crimson at sight of her. He certainly was a plain young man, whose boots were thick, and whose serviceable tweeds bespoke none of the affectations of the dandy. But a physiognomist would have liked his honest, clean-shaven face, for there was both power and kindliness in it. Poor David! He was madly in love with pretty, disdainful Elsie, and, for that very reason, always embarrassed and tongue-tied in her presence, just because he wished to appear at his best.

"Oh—it's you, Elsie," he stammered lamely, feeling the silliness of the speech, even while he made it. "What are you doing here all alone?"

The question put her back up instantly. "Am I obliged to render you an account of my movements, Dr. Foster?" she retorted scathingly.

"Oh, no, of course not!—of course not!" he said hastily. "Only, I met your people driving in the phaeton, and I thought——"

"You thought I ought to have gone with them? Thank you, I'm not fond of sitting with my back to the pony, and feeling quite out of it all the time, with uncle and aunt forgetting I'm there at all!"

"I've often asked you to come for a drive with me," he sighed. "Kitty is really a splendid goer, and I got father to buy the new high dogcart on purpose for you, because you said you hated driving in a low-hung carriage. Do come for a drive—I've not got much to do this afternoon——"

Unfortunate young man! It was not a judicious speech, and promptly Elsie turned upon him. "I'm sorry you should be at a loss to fill in your time, Dr. Foster! I decline to be made a convenience of, because you've nothing better to do; but you've only to ask Miss Baldwin, and I'm sure she'd be delighted!"

Miss Baldwin was an elderly young lady in the village, who had been vainly setting her cap at David for a long time.

"I wish I didn't always contrive to offend you by everything I say," groaned the disconsolate lover. "I'm afraid I must be very stupid, to put my foot in it so often. I don't want to drive with Miss Baldwin—or anybody but you. And you know it!" he added, gazing reproachfully at her with his honest grey eyes.

Elsie, quite unappeased, twitched her graceful shoulders with a petulant movement. She had not the faintest intention of driving with David; for, if she did, the whole neighbourhood would at once conclude they were engaged.

"Miss Baldwin is a much better catch than ever I shall be," she rejoined perversely. "I'm sure you couldn't do better than marry her—she has heaps of money, and she simply adores you!"

"If I ever marry, it will not be for money, but for love, as you know very well, Elsie," he said, so firmly that she felt justly rebuked. "But you oughtn't to be moping here all by yourself," he added, his face softening as he scanned her pretty, disconsolate profile. "Come home with me to tea, and I'll get the girls from the Vicarage to come in for some croquet."

"You know I detest croquet! I never can get through the horrid narrow hoops! Oh! can't you go away?" she cried, fretted beyond endurance by the affectionate concern in his kind eyes. "I don't want anything but to be let alone! I'm not a child, to be petted and bribed because I'm cross!"

Seeing there was nothing else for it, he did go; his stout, country-made boots clumping so dejectedly over the plank bridge that to any observant listener they told a pathetic tale. But Elsie, wrapped up in her own selfish grievances, had no remorse for the pain she might have inflicted upon poor David. Indeed, it is to be feared, in her mood of revolt against all the world, she was rather pleased than not to think he was unhappy too. The London season was just at its height now, she reflected dismally; and yet here she was, moping in a dull country village, with nothing to do all day. The few men the war had not taken from the neighbourhood were elderly and dull; their wives and daughters were frumps; they all thought Elsie ought to be deeply grateful to the Hunts for their kindness, and they had not the smallest sympathy with her restless discontent. Why—oh! why—could she not be like the lucky girl in the novel, with a devoted lover in the peerage, asking nothing better than to marry her?

Next afternoon she started off for a long cycle ride—chiefly, I fear, because the Hunts, who were not gifted with much tact, had pointedly announced that David was coming to tea. Naughty Elsie said nothing, but inwardly resolved that tea-time should find her miles away from Aston Crucis. As she cycled swiftly through the village, whom should she meet but Miss Baldwin, very smartly dressed, as usual, and resolutely juvenile; and the spirit of mischief prompted her to stop and greet the lady effusively.

"You haven't been to see us for ages," she said sweetly, as Miss Baldwin extended her white-gloved hand. Nobody else in the village would have dreamt of the extravagance of wearing white kid gloves every day—or, indeed, any gloves at all. "Do go round to tea this afternoon, if you've nothing better to do. I'm sure my aunt will be delighted, and David Foster is coming."

Poor Miss Baldwin at once fell into the trap; and the wicked girl rode off chuckling, as she thought of David's face when he arrived to find she herself was not there and Miss Baldwin was. The idea put her into quite good spirits, and she sped briskly along, enjoying the sweet country air in spite of herself. She had gone several miles when an ominous feeling of heaviness about her back wheel warned her that something was the matter with her tyre. She pumped it up, but two minutes after it was worse than ever; and it became very clear that it was so badly punctured as to be useless. There was no house near where anybody was to be found capable of repairing it, and she was quite unable to do it herself; there was no railway station for miles, and cabs existed not in that rural neighbourhood. She sat down disconsolately on the bank, resolving to wait until somebody came along who could help her. At the worst, the rural postman was due to pass on his rounds in another hour, and by him she could send a message to "The Knoll," asking for the wagonette to be sent for her and her machine.

Despite her vexation, she made a very pretty picture as she sat by the roadside, her rustic straw hat casting a most becoming shade over her charming face. A handsome young man who presently appeared from the opposite direction, also on a cycle, was clearly of that opinion; for he stared hard at the disconsolate maiden as he passed her, then dismounted, and came back to her.

"Excuse me, madam," he began, very politely lifting his straw hat. "Are you in any difficulty?"

He had blue eyes, she noticed, like the hero in the novel; and she smiled upon him graciously as she observed his well-fitting clothes. David's suits never hung free from wrinkles, and were seldom of a becoming colour. She explained that she had punctured her back tyre, and the stranger was all solicitude in a moment. Might he try to patch it up for her? He could not pretend to be an expert, but perhaps he could cobble it up to last until she reached home.

She was only too glad of the offer, and before he had completed his task, in which she assisted to the best of her ability, the freemasonry of youth, and of the road, had established the most friendly relations between them. She gathered that he was a young gentleman of means, for he said that he was stopping at another village about four miles from Aston Crucis for the fishing.

When he had finished, he took out a dainty cambric handkerchief, and carefully wiped his soiled hands. Her woman's eye dwelt with pleasure on its fineness and whiteness, and—yes!—there, quite unmistakably, was a coronet embroidered in one corner. What a delightful coincidence! Evidently, this handsome young stranger was a peer, and everything was going to happen exactly as in the novel!

"You must allow me to ride home with you, madam," he said, with the politeness which had so impressed her at first. She supposed peers must have better manners than commoners—at any rate, David never addressed her with such marked deference. "It's rather a lonely road, and you might meet a tramp, or your tyre might break down again. It would ease my mind if you would allow me to see you home."

"I am Miss Maitland, of 'The Knoll,' at Aston Crucis," she rejoined. "Certainly you can ride with me, if you will be so kind. But won't you tell me to whom I am indebted for mending my tyre?"

He hesitated a moment, still rubbing his hands with the handkerchief. "My name is Pynsent," he said at length.

"Lord Pynsent?" she asked quickly. Being a Briton, she was naturally a snob, as all true Britons are. "I noticed that there's a coronet on your handkerchief," she added in explanation.

He looked down at it with a slight start, and then up again at her pretty face. "The truth is, I am Lord Littlewood," he explained, rather hurriedly. "Only it isn't always convenient to use one's title when one's travelling and doesn't want to be pestered by society bores—don't you know?—and so at the inn where I'm staying I call myself Pynsent."

"Well, I shall certainly introduce you to my uncle and aunt as Lord Littlewood," she said resolutely, delighted at the romance of the whole thing. How splendid that her chivalrous helper should turn out to be a nobleman in disguise! How like a novel! She insisted that he should come in with her when they reached "The Knoll," and be presented to the Hunts, who received the young stranger cordially enough. Any newcomer made a break in the village life whose dulness Elsie so continually deplored; and handsome young peers were not encountered every day. So they requested Lord Littlewood to stay to dinner, which he did very readily. Elsie had never looked prettier, or been in gayer spirits, than on that evening.

CHAPTER II.

"THE fellow's a cad—a beastly cad—with the manners of a shopwalker, and the stupidity of a barber's block," David Foster cried wrathfully five weeks later, anent the modest young peer who had tried to conceal his title from Elsie. By this time Lord Littlewood had been taken up by all the neighbourhood, and in consequence had removed to the little inn at Aston Crucis, to be nearer his new-found friends. Everybody called upon him; and so many dinners, garden-parties, and picnics had been given in his honour that the county had not been so gay for years. A rich young bachelor peer was a prize which seldom came in the way of the match-making mammas of Angleshire, and they made the most of their opportunities. But, as was very evident, Elsie Maitland was the favoured damsel. The two were much together at the local entertainments, and he spent one or two evenings a week at "The Knoll." Even the staid and cautious Hunts had been quite carried away by the popular enthusiasm; and, since their niece would not marry David Foster, they would be glad for her to accept Lord Littlewood, if she felt inclined. Elsie was quite pretty enough and graceful enough to adorn a coronet; and it looked as if such an honour would soon be hers, to the great rage of many envious rivals, who muttered that she was a nasty sly cat, and a minx.

Honest David, left out in the cold and snubbed more than ever, had to listen with a sore heart whilst people gushed over Lord Littlewood's handsome face, his well-knit figure, his exquisite taste in dress, his politeness to ladies, and so forth. Now, to his mind, the peer was not in the very least a gentleman. His fine manners bordered on obsequiousness, he betrayed a marvellous ignorance of many things which most educated people are familiar with from their cradles, and ever and anon a mysterious something about him grated on the young doctor, who flattered himself that he knew a man when he saw one. If he dared to hint as much to Elsie, she instantly accused him of envy and jealousy; and in these days he more and more often came for consolation to a widow, Mrs. Trevor, an old friend who lived in a pretty cottage near the church. She was the widow of a general, and had many friends in the smart world; but preferred to rusticate in this secluded spot, and live on very little, to save money for her three sons, who were all in expensive cavalry regiments. Mrs. Trevor

"'Excuse me, madam,' he began, very politely, '. . . are you in any difficulty?'" was very great on family and pedigree; she knew all about everybody who was anybody, and kept a recent "Peerage" at hand, to consult when any titled person came in question.

"I don't like him myself, David," she said kindly. "But I suppose he's all right—there is a Lord Littlewood of that age, and he makes no mystery about himself." She opened her "Peerage," and read that the present Viscount was twenty-six, possessed various estates, which were named, and had a house in Grosvenor Square. All these particulars, indeed, had been already furnished by Lord Littlewood himself. He was accustomed to talk of his hunting-box in Leicestershire, his grouse-moor in Scotland, and his yacht at Cowes, until David could have strangled him with pleasure. Indeed, he had already invited several people to join his party for the moors on the Twelfth, the family from "The Knoll" being the first to be asked. He had travelled, too, and talked about Assouan and Philæ, Rome and Colombo, as airily as though all these places were accessible by a twopenny 'bus. Poor David, who had never been farther than the Isle of Man, felt this an added grievance.

"After all, David, though we may not like him personally, we must admit it would be a fine chance for Elsie," suggested Mrs. Trevor.

"It isn't that!—goodness knows, it isn't that!" burst out the faithful lover. "If he were worthy of her, I'd gladly stand aside, so that she might be happy! But he isn't even a man—he's a brainless fop, full of ridiculous airs, and not half-educated! A cad and an ass, that a girl like Elsie would soon come to despise—and what consolation would his title and estates be then?"

"It is a pity—a great pity. As you say, he isn't worthy of her, and she would soon find it out. And I shouldn't like our spoilt Elsie to be unhappy—naughty, perverse child though she is! I'll tell you what I'll do, David—I'll ask some friends in London to find out all they can about Lord Littlewood, and report to me. He may be engaged to somebody else all the time, and only playing with Elsie. I shouldn't be surprised."

"If I find the rascal has been deceiving her, I'll break his head!" declared the young man wrathfully.

That evening all the neighbourhood was bidden to a "musical evening" at the Manor House; during which festivity Dr. David appeared so melancholy that Elsie sharply told him he looked like a stage murderer. She and Lord Littlewood flirted all the evening, and went in to supper together; and more than one shrewd matron remarked in David's hearing that it was evidently a settled thing, and, no doubt, Elsie's wedding would be the next excitement.

Her head was completely turned, as anybody could see. David had worshipped her for years without a tithe of the encouragement she bestowed upon Lord Littlewood. He could take her away from this dull place, and give her gaiety, wealth, and social position; and she believed she could be satisfied with that, albeit not many brains were stored up in that handsome golden head of his. He had not yet formally proposed; but evidently it was only a question of time, and meanwhile she was very happy in her brilliant dreams of the future.

He himself had taken care to ascertain her own position. The Hunts were well off, and, if Elsie married to their satisfaction, they intended to bequeath her their property. She had expectations also from her godmother. "You see, a man in my position has so many expenses that it drives him to think a good deal about ways and means," Lord Littlewood explained, in apology for the direct questions he put to her on the subject. Elsie was not at all offended, but rather gratified to know that her lover was seriously considering the matter. Had David done the same, she would have called him a mercenary money-grubber; but the glamour cast by a pair of blue eyes and a title blinded her to all else.

It was noticed by the village postmistress that Mrs. Trevor received a great many letters about this time, and wrote many to most aristocratic addresses. She kept a keen eye on Elsie and her adorer, and encouraged David with the one word, "Wait!"

Towards the end of July she issued invitations for a large garden-party. This was remarkable, as she had no space for big entertainments. Elsie arrived with the Hunts, looking like a poet's dream in a new gown of blue muslin and lace; and at her elbow came Lord Littlewood, very spruce in a smart grey frock-coat, with a pink carnation in his buttonhole. A game of croquet was presently started on the little lawn, Elsie and the peer being partners; and, play once fairly begun, the hostess slipped away into the house unobserved.

The game was progressing admirably, every stroke of Lord Littlewood's being watched by an admiring throng, when Mrs. Trevor came quickly down the steps leading to the lawn, followed by a tall, pale, light-haired young man, who limped along by the aid of a stick. Lord Littlewood's back was towards the new-comer, and he was just preparing a particularly brilliant stroke to dazzle all the ladies.

Crack! and his ball, admirably aimed, hit another, far off, just inside the boundary-line. There was a murmur of applause, but before he could move the lame young man limped up from behind him, exclaiming sarcastically, "Well played, Stubbs!"

If twenty thousand frightful fiends had suddenly appeared before him, his lordship could not have looked more terrified than he did at these simple words. He turned as white as chalk, his mallet fell from his hand, and his knees visibly knocked together. Mrs. Trevor, in the background, smiled maliciously; whilst Elsie looked utterly bewildered.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said the hostess, slightly raising her voice, "allow me to introduce to you Lord Littlewood, who has kindly come here, at great personal inconvenience, to unmask an audacious impostor."

Elsie's lover mopped his damp brow, and looked about, as though considering in which direction it would be safest to bolt. His very collar looked limp with cowardly fear; and the fact that half the county was looking on did not tend to increase his composure.

"This fellow," said the lame young man, pointing to the craven cringing before him, "John Stubbs, was my valet, until I dismissed him for stealing things from my wardrobe, and, like a fool, forbore to prosecute because he snivelled and shammed penitence. Why he should want to pass himself off for me, I don't know; but it was easy enough, for I was safely out of the way, as I'd gone fishing to Norway, and dislocated my ankle so badly I can hardly walk even now. I suppose he thought himself safe from discovery; but this lady, Mrs. Trevor, wrote to some friends of mine, and then the whole thing came out. I've come from Norway expressly to have the pleasure of exposing him. And now, you reptile, what have you got to say for yourself?" he demanded, turning to the wretched jackdaw in peacock's plumes, who was actually grovelling before him on his knees.

Elsie was as white as John Stubbs. The modern girl does not faint, so, although David looked at her anxiously, she contrived to stand her ground. But if the crater of Etna or Vesuvius had been obliging enough to open just then at her feet, she would gladly have jumped into it, to escape from her present humiliating position. What a splendid opportunity David had for revenge, if he chose to say, "I told you so!" He had always stoutly declared that "Lord Littlewood" was not a gentleman. To think that she had allowed herself to be made love to by a valet, dismissed for dishonesty! No doubt the coroneted handkerchief which had first arrested her attention was a part of his plunder!

* * * * *

Many people, outrageous at being duped, talked of prosecuting the detected impostor; but, on second thoughts, decided not to expose themselves to the ridicule which must ensue. As he had not actually stolen things from them, he could hardly be punished for accepting their hospitality under false pretences; and, indeed, he sneaked off at the earliest opportunity. Those who had been loudest in praising his handsome face, his aristocratic air, his delightful manners—the obsequious courtesy of a valet—were the first to argue that the contemptible creature was not worth the trouble of punishing.

Some kind people, pitying Elsie, blamed Mrs. Trevor for arranging the girl's public discomfiture. But the widow maintained that she wished Elsie to have a thorough lesson; and nothing but seeing her lover publicly unmasked as a coward and a knave could have cured her of her infatuation. Expostulation in private would have been of little use, since the plausible scoundrel might have talked Miss Maitland round, and made her believe him an injured innocent. Many people, of course, said cutting things to the girl under the guise of friendship; and daily she expected David to say, "I told you so!" She resolved that if he taunted her with her folly she would go away and become a hospital nurse, and never return to Aston Crucis again. But he never once alluded to the humiliating episode, and the only difference was that his manner was kinder than ever.

"David is a gentleman — not a valet dressed up in his master's clothes," thought Elsie. Many people wondered why John Stubbs should have entered on such a course of deception. His empty vanity had first induced him to do so, when he saw how Elsie was impressed by the coroneted handkerchief; and though he had never hitherto flown at higher game than ladies' maids, when he discovered that she would have a handsome property, he seriously set himself to win her. He shrewdly surmised that if he could only stave off discovery till the eve of the wedding, either her pride would compel her to marry him to avoid an unpleasant scandal, or the Hunts would offer a handsome bribe to get rid of him. He had inherited a little money from his grandmother, and it was this which enabled him to stay at the inn and pose as a gentleman of fortune.

Elsie was sadly subdued in these days. She fancied everybody was laughing at her, and she avoided society as much as possible. One lovely summer evening, she was strolling dejectedly in a lane near "The Knoll," where the honeysuckle grew, gathering what sprays she could reach, and wondering why the finest were always too high to pluck. She was standing on tiptoe in the vain endeavour to reach an especially pink bit, when a horse's trot was heard, and David appeared round a corner.

"'This fellow,' said the lame young man, pointing to the craven cringing before him, 'John Stubbs, was my valet.'"—p. 167.

She was angry at herself for blushing scarlet, and to hide her cheeks grabbed industriously after the honeysuckle. He checked his horse—he always looked his best on horseback—and in a minute had placed the coveted spray in her hand.

"Thank you—it's very sweet," she said confusedly; but, without replying, he rode off.

"I suppose he's in a hurry to get home to dinner," she thought, a little disconsolately. The Hunts had gone to a bazaar in a neighbouring parish, and would not be back for some time yet; and though she had refused to accompany them, she nevertheless felt dull in their absence, and wished she had somebody to talk to. Even David would have been better than nobody!

As she sauntered listlessly along, she heard a horse's hoofs again approaching; and David reappeared, his honest face aglow with satisfaction, and carrying a bouquet of beautiful honeysuckle.

"I noticed this growing further along the lane, and I thought you'd like to have it," he said, putting it into her hand.

"And you went back on purpose to get it, though I know it must be your dinner-time!" she answered gratefully, thinking how like David it was.

"Oh, that doesn't matter at all! There's nothing I wouldn't do to please you, Elsie—surely you know that by this time."

"Oh, don't!" she cried piteously, thinking how little she merited his never-failing kindness. "You make me feel such a horrid wretch!"

Bold for once in his life, he stooped from his saddle, and kissed the little drooping, dismal face, although by no means certain that Elsie would not box his ears for his presumption. But she did not: and, gaining courage, he kissed her again.

The Vicar and his wife, driving home from the before-mentioned bazaar half an hour later, smiled to each other as they passed the two young people, so absorbed in each other that they never noticed the pony-carriage.

"Do drive faster, Henry—I shall start again upon my teacloth this very night!" said his wife briskly. Since the episode of John Stubbs the embroidery had languished in a drawer. "I was very nearly finishing it and giving it to Mrs. Lake for her bazaar. But I'm glad I didn't now—I began it for Elsie, and I'd rather she had it than anybody else, though I have felt sometimes as if I'd like to shake her!"

"Don't be too hard on her, Margaret," said the Vicar, with an indulgent smile. "After all, she's very young!"

"And very pretty!" said his wife shrewdly.

THE VOYAGE OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS.—II.

By the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D.

THEIR difficulties had by no means ended when they had reached in safety the Low Country. The Englishman loves his native island with a peculiar affection. He can leave it with good courage if necessity demand—otherwise England never would have been the colonising power it is—but wherever he goes he carries England with him. He is rarely, if ever, truly naturalised in any other land. His heart returns with that love and longing which Browning has so beautifully expressed, wherever his temporary sojourn may be. Pathetically does Bradford give expression to this English sentiment, the more pathetic that his expression is so self-restrained. "They heard," he says, "a strange and uncouth language, and beheld ye differente maners and customes of ye people, with their strange fashons and attires; all so farre differing from y^t^ of their plaine countrie villages (wherin they were bred, and had so longe lived) as it seemed they were come into a new world." This was not all, and not the worst. They had to meet "the grime and grisly face of poverty." Their independency led them into contentions, and presently they left Amsterdam for Leyden. Here for some twelve years they lived, and if Bradford's testimony may be accepted, won good repute among their neighbours. Yet still they were in a foreign land, and in a land which afforded no prospects of future advancement to them or to their children. Return to England was impossible, and the minds of the more adventurous among them began to turn toward the newly discovered America. Could they not find there a living place which would be English, and yet freed from English persecutions, and where they might build up for themselves and their successors that Kingdom of God on the earth which it was always their hope to establish?

The King of England desired to promote colonisation schemes in this new land. Commercial interests had visions never to be realised, of the great profits this new land would bring in to England. These influences pled their cause for them. They were not enough to overcome the ecclesiastical prejudice which ruled in the English Court. The most that could be obtained was one of those compromises which to philosophy seem curious, but in history have not been uncommon. The King would by no means consent that they should have religious liberty granted to them by law; but he would consent to connive at their violation of the English law of conformity in the new colonies, provided they carried themselves peaceably. With this compromise with the Government they were fain to content themselves.

Their next problem was how to secure the means for their adventure, for they had no means of their own. Long and troublesome negotiations finally resulted in the organisation of what in our time we should call a corporation, curious in its construction, yet possibly suggesting a scheme by which modern labour troubles might be lessened, if not removed. In this corporation capitalists and labourers combined, each colonist or labourer upwards of sixteen years of age having a certain stock interest in the corporation allotted to him, with the proviso that at the end of seven years the capital and profits, namely, "the houses, lands, goods and chatles, be equally devided betwixte ye adventurers and planters," that is, between the capitalists and the colonists, the adventurers being the capitalists, and the planters the colonists.

Assurance having been secured from the King that their going would not be interfered with, and capital on terms that seemed hard to them, and wrung out of their necessities, having been obtained, wherewith to make their journey and start their colony, they sailed to Southampton from Leyden, and after much labour and trouble provisioned their two ships, the Mayflower and the Speedwell, and set out upon their voyage. Their second ship did not speed well. She leaked, and presently they put in to Dartmouth for repairs, started again, but still she leaked, so that they must needs put in to Plymouth for further repairs, where at length she was abandoned, and some of her passengers remaining in England, and some of them joining the Mayflower, the historic ship, overloaded, started on her voyage. It is not strange that Bradford thinks the leakiness of this ship was due to deliberate mismanagement on the part of the shipmaster, which is probable enough; but concerning this charge I am inclined to think that the Scotch verdict, "Not proven," must be rendered.

Of the perils of their voyage; of the difficulties of their finding any harbour where they might land; of their diversion from their original intent to a more northern destination; of the unauthenticated, though not wholly improbable, story that this was due to the treachery of the shipmaster of the Mayflower, bribed by the Dutch, who wished to keep the more southern shores for themselves, there is not space here to write. It is not possible to tell the story of their final landing more graphically than it has been told by William Bradford in his history:

"But hear I cannot but stay and make a pause, and stand half amased at this poore peoples presente condition; and so I thinke will the reader too, when he well considers ye same. Being thus passed ye vast ocean, and a sea of troubles before in their preparation (as may be remembred by yt which wente before), they had now no freinds to welcome them, nor inns to entertaine or refresh their weatherbeaten bodys, no houses or much less townes to repaire too, to seeke for succoure. It is recorded in scripture as a mercie to ye apostle and his shipwraked company, yt the barbarians shewed them no smale kindness in refreshing them, but these savage barbarians, when they mette with them (as after will appeare) were readier to fill their sids full of arrows then otherwise. And for ye season it was winter, and they that know ye winters of yt cuntrie know them to be sharp and violent, and subjecte to cruell and feirce stormes, deangerous to travill to known places, much more to serch an unknown coast. Besids, what could they see but a hidious and desolate wildernes, full of wild beasts and willd men? and what multituds ther might be of them they knew not. Nether could they, as it were, goe up to ye tope of Pisgah, to vew from this willdernes a more goodly cuntrie to feed their hops; for which way soever they turnd their eys (save upward to ye heavens) they could have little solace or content in respecte of any outward objects. For sumer being done, all things stand upon them with a wetherbeaten face; and ye whole countrie, full of woods and thickets, represented a wild and savage heiw. If they looked behind them, ther was ye mighty ocean which they had passed, and was now as a maine barr and goulfe to seperate them from all ye civill parts of ye world. If it be said they had a ship to sucour them, it is trew; but what heard they daly from ye mr. and company? but yt with speede they should looke out a place with their shallop wher they would be at some near distance; for ye season was shuch as he would not stirr from thence till a safe harbor was discovered by them wher they would be, and he might goe without danger; and that victells consumed apace, but he must and would keepe sufficient for them selves and their returne. Yea, it was muttered by some, that if they gott not a place in time, they would turn them and their goods ashore and leave them. Let it also be considred what weake hopes of supply and succoure they left behinde them, yt might bear up their minds in this sade condition and trialls they were under; and they could not but be very smale. It is true, indeed, ye affections and love of their brethren at Leyden was cordiall and entire towards them, but they had little power to help them, or them selves; and how ye case stode betweene them and ye marchants at their coming away, hath allready been declared. What could now sustaine them but ye spirit of God and his grace?"

Here, their voyage over, their landing made, their colonial problems yet to be met and solved, I must in this article leave them, while I ask the reader's attention to a consideration of the principles which they represented and the effect which they have produced on human history.

Jesus Christ compares the Kingdom of Heaven to a grain of mustard seed,

"which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs." Except in the development of Christianity itself, from the seemingly insignificant beginnings wrought by the Nazarene and His eleven disciples, I know of no illustration of this truth more striking than that furnished by the story of the Pilgrim Fathers. Four Cambridge preachers in contiguous parishes lift up voices of protest against the civil and ecclesiastical despotism of their times. Four little parishes of men without wealth, social standing, or scholarship, catch the spirit of freedom from these preachers, and for the sake of the principles in which they believe, sacrifice home, comfort, and country, and imperil life itself. When they migrate from their parishes, the movement, so far as England is concerned, seems to have come to an end. "The Pilgrim district in England," says Mr. Arber, "consists of nothing but an open country, dotted over with small villages and townships that even at the present day have a very small population." The Pilgrim movement subsisted in this district for twenty-two years—no longer—and yet out of this Pilgrim movement have grown results not only far greater than the most prophetic of the Pilgrims could have conceived, but in important respects far different from anything they desired. Speaking in general terms, disregarding those qualifications which would be necessary to a strictly accurate and scholarly statement, the Pilgrim movement, in its inception, represented three distinct principles: the first purely ecclesiastical, the second partly ecclesiastical partly political, the third purely political.

Ecclesiastically the Pilgrims repudiated in toto the Church organisation of their times. They were equally hostile to Papacy, Prelacy, and Presbyterianism. It was their essential doctrine that any body of Christians might covenant together to do Christ's work. If they did so covenant together, this fact constituted them a Church of Christ, with full and absolute power to frame their own creed, organise their own ecclesiastical system, and order their own worship, without let, hindrance, direction, or supervision from any external authority whatever. And this organisation was a pure democracy in which all were equals, the preacher, or elder, or bishop—call him what you will—being only one of those equals assigned for the time being to a specific function for the better fulfilment of the same. In other words, the Church of the Pilgrim Fathers was a pure democracy.

This was their first principle, and I am inclined to think the one to which they attached the greatest importance. It has been accepted only by a very small proportion of the Christian Church. In America it is not consistently accepted and acted upon by the descendants of the Pilgrims. Experience has shown that much closer relations between these democratic associations than the Pilgrim Fathers ever conceived of is necessary for their efficient co-operation. Temporary gatherings of the Churches called Councils, permanent ones called Conferences or Associations, and a national one known as the National Council, have all been called into being; while benevolent societies, originally independent of the Churches, but now directed and controlled by representatives of the Churches, carry on their common and co-operative work. Congregationalism in the United States is no longer the pure democracy that it was in the Plymouth colony, and all indications point to the time when these Churches will be somehow or other correlated in one distinct ecclesiastical organisation. It is my own belief that this organisation will more nearly approximate the Episcopalian than the Presbyterian; that is, that the Congregational Churches will be more likely to have superintendents, whom they will not call bishops, but who will exercise a certain advisory supervision over the common work, than presbyteries or synods which will exercise a legislative authority over it.

The second principle of the Pilgrim Fathers—one partly ecclesiastical, partly political—was the entire separation of Church and State. To understand their doctrine the reader must understand the contrary doctrine against which they protested. Mr. Arber thus states it: "As regards Episcopacy, the Bishops were appointed at the King's choice, and were as much officers of State as the sheriffs. They held their lands by feudal tenure. It was government from above; and dependent solely on the royal will and pleasure." The Bishop was a judge; he could call any men before him; he could condemn them and send them to prison, and from his decree there was no appeal or succour through the secular courts, for the writ of Habeas Corpus had not yet been invented. It was the doctrine of the Pilgrim Fathers that the Church, as such, possesses no civil powers. In this respect the Pilgrims differed from the Puritans, who carried over to the Massachusetts colony the principle of ecclesiastical supremacy.

In America the Pilgrim doctrine of the separation of Church and State is accepted absolutely and without question, alike by Jew and Christian, by Protestant and Roman Catholic, by Congregationalist and Episcopalian. It would be difficult to find any man possessing any influence in America who believes in or desires any organic relationship between the Church and the State. And in the main, the principle of the Pilgrim Fathers in this respect seems to me, if I may be permitted to express the opinion of an onlooker, to be substantially accepted in England. I have no inclination to discuss the question of Disestablishment. Most Americans will agree that the question whether a country which has an established Church should disestablish it is very different from the question whether a country which has no established Church should establish one. On the second question we are all agreed: upon the first we are generally willing to be silent. We have problems enough of our own to solve without undertaking to solve the problems of other lands. But it is absolutely certain that the English people of every ecclesiastical opinion would unite in repudiating the kind of connection between Church and State which existed in the time of Laud.

The third principle of the Pilgrim Fathers was purely political. It is more difficult to define it in a sentence, or even to describe in a paragraph. Their democracy had no real affinity with the democracy which, in the beginning of the nineteenth century, was imported from France into America, and would, perhaps, have been imported into England, had it not been, first, for the French Revolution, and, second, for William Pitt. The democracy of the French Revolution was based on the apotheosis of humanity, the doctrine that the state of nature is the state of innocence and excellence, that government grows out of a compact by which men have surrendered something of their individual liberty for the sake of social order and organisation, that all government therefore rests upon the will of the majority, that all authority in government is derived from the will of the people. The democracy of the Pilgrim Fathers was very different both in its genesis and in its nature. They were pre-eminently students of the Bible. From the Bible, as they understood it, they derived their political no less than their ecclesiastical and their theological ideas. They were men of the Book, and, in some peculiar sense, men of the Old Testament. They believed in a theocracy. Their aim was to establish a Kingdom of God on the earth. They believed that all authority is vested in and derived from God. They believed in democracy partly because they found, or thought they found, democratic principles embodied in the Mosaic commonwealth; partly because they believed from their experience under a monarchy that democracy would be a better method of arriving at an apprehension of the divine laws than the method of a monarchy or an aristocracy. Their democracy was primarily ecclesiastical, secondarily political, always religious. In America these two democracies, that of France, brought to our shores by Thomas Paine and represented in our history by Thomas Jefferson, and that of the Pilgrim Fathers, brought to our shores by Governor Bradford and represented by all the influences which have streamed out from New England, have been, and still are, in conflict.

This is not the place to enter into the controversy; it concerns the American more directly than it does the Englishman, although I cannot but think it in some sense concerns the people of both countries. It must suffice to say that in my judgment, in their essential spirit and in their fundamental principles, the Pilgrim Fathers were right and the French Encyclopædists were wrong; that government is a divine order, not a human invention; that democracy is a means, not an end; and that peace, order and well-being will never come to the world until the world finds a way to establish that Kingdom of God on the earth which the Pilgrim Fathers sailed across the sea that they might establish in the Plymouth Colony.

THE LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

A Huron Cinderella.

A Story for the Children.

"I'M tired of telling you stories," said the Indian chief Ossawippi, as the missionary's little boy interrupted his snowshoe-making for the fiftieth time. "Tell us a story yourself." And all the Indians sitting round on the river-bank looked up from their work and grunted "Ah, ah!"

This was only fair, Rennie thought; so he stood up, with his hands in his pockets and his back to the broad-flowing Ottawa, and told the Indians his favourite story of Cinderella.

"Pretty good!" said Ossawippi, when the tale was done. "But it's only a white Cinderella, after all. I like the red Cinderella better."

"Then tell it me!" shouted Rennie, turning a somersault among the shavings. "Tell it me now!" And he squatted at Ossawippi's feet. Ossawippi went on quietly threading the thongs of hide from side to side of the snowshoe, but presently he began to speak, and this is the tale he told:

Once upon a time there was an Indian chief who had three daughters; and they lived in a lodge by the side of the Ottawa River—not in a wigwam, mind you, but a good old Huron lodge, like a tunnel, made of two rows of young trees bent into arches and tied together at the top, with walls of birch-bark. Oh! it was an honourable old lodge, with more cracks in the birchbark than you could count, all patched and smeared with pitch.

The chief had three sons too, but they died in a great fight with the Iroquois. A good old fight it was—none of your white man's fighting, spitting bullets at each other from half a mile away. When our brave Hurons had used up all their arrows they threw down their bows and rushed on the Iroquois with their tomahawks. They screamed and howled like eagles and wolves, and the Iroquois were so frightened that they wanted to run away, but their own magic-man threw a spell upon them, so that they could not turn round or run, and they had to stand and fight. The Iroquois are the cousins of the Hurons, and come of a brave stock; and as the Hurons were few compared with the Iroquois, few as the thumbs compared with the fingers, the Hurons were beaten, and only two score men of the tribe escaped down the river, and none of the women except the chief's three daughters.

Now the two eldest daughters were very proud, and loved to make a fine show before the young men of the tribe. One day a brave young man came to the lodge and asked the chief to give him a daughter for a wife.

The chief said, "It is not right that I give my daughter to any but a chief's son." However, he called his eldest daughter and said to her, "This young man wants you for a wife."

The eldest daughter thought in her mind, "I am very handsome, and one day a chief's son will come and ask for me; but my clothes are old and common. I will deceive this young man." So she said to him, "If you want me for your wife, get me a big piece of the fine red cloth that the white men bring to the fort, far down the river."

The young man was brave, and he took his birchbark canoe and paddled down the river day after day for seven days, only stopping to paddle up the creeks where the beavers build their dams; and when he stopped at the foot of the great rapids, where the white men lay behind stone walls in fear of the Indians, his canoe was deep and heavy with the skins of the beavers. The white men were at war with the Indians, and, though he was no Iroquois, his heart grew cold in his breast; but he did not tremble: he marched in at the water-gate, and the white men were glad to see his beaver skins and gave him much red cloth for them; so his heart grew warm again, and he addled up the river with his riches. Twelve days he paddled, for the current was strong against him; but at last he stood outside the old lodge, and called the chief's eldest daughter to come out and be his wife. When she saw how red was his load, she was glad and sorry—glad because of the cloth, and sorry because of the man. "But where are the beads?" said she.

"You asked me for no beads," said he.

"Fool!" said she; "was it ever heard that a chief's daughter married in clothing of plain red cloth? If you want me for your wife, fetch me a double handful of the glass beads that the Frenchmen bring from over the sea—red and white and blue and yellow beads!"

So the brave paddled off in his canoe down the river. When he came to the beavers' creeks he found the dams and the lodges, but the beavers were gone. He followed them up the creeks till the water got so shallow that the rocks tore holes in his canoe, and he had to stop and strip fresh birchbark to mend the holes; but at last he found where the beavers were building their new dams; and he loaded his canoe with their skins, and paddled away and shot over the rapids, and came to the white man's fort. The white men passed their hands over the skins and felt that they were good, and gave him a double handful of beads. Then he paddled up the river, paddling fast and hard, so that when he stood before the old chief's lodge he was very thin.

The eldest daughter came out when he called, and said, "It is a shame for so ugly a man to have a chief's daughter for his wife. You are not a man; you are only the bones of a man, like the poles of the lodge when the bark is stripped away. Come back when you are fat."

Then he went away to his lodge, and ate and slept and ate and slept till he was fat, and he made his face beautiful with red clay and went and called to the chief's daughter to come and marry him. But she called out to him, saying, "A chief's daughter must have time to embroider her clothes. Come back when I have made my cloth beautiful with a strip of beadwork a hand's-breadth wide from end to end of the cloth." But she was very lazy as well as proud, and she took the cloth to her youngest sister, and said, "Embroider a beautiful strip, a hand's-breadth wide, from end to end of the cloth."

Now the youngest daughter was very beautiful; so her sisters were jealous and made her live in the dark corner at the back of the lodge, where no man could see her; but her eyes were very bright, and by the light of her eyes she arranged the beads and sewed them on so that the pattern was like the flowers of the earth and the stars of heaven for beauty. But when the youngest daughter had fallen asleep at night her eldest sister came softly and took away the cloth and picked off the beads.

In the morning she went to her youngest sister and said, "Show me the work you did yesterday."

And the youngest sister cried, and said, "Truly I worked as well as I could, but some evil spirit has picked out the beads."

Then her sister scolded her, and pricked her with the needle, and said, "You are lazy! Embroider this cloth, and do it beautifully, or I shall beat you!"

This she did day after day, and whenever the young man came to see if she was clad for the wedding she showed him the cloth, and it was not finished.

Now there was another brave young man in that village, and he came and asked the chief for his second daughter. The second daughter was as proud as the first, and said to herself, "One day a great chief's son will come, and I will marry him." But she said to the young man, "If you want me for your wife, you must build me a new lodge, and cover the door of it with a curtain of beaver-skins." The young man smiled in his heart, for he said to himself, "This is easy: this is child's play." So he built a new lodge, and hung a curtain of beaver-skins over the door.

But when the chief's daughter saw the curtain, she said, "I should be ashamed to live behind a curtain of plain beaver-skins like that! Go and hunt for porcupines, that the curtain may be embroidered with their quills."

So he took his bow and his arrows and went away through the woods to hunt. Twelve days he marched, till he came to the porcupines' country. When the porcupines saw him coming, they ran to meet him, crying out, "Don't kill us! We will give you all the quills that you want." While he stood doubting, the porcupines turned round, and shot their quills out at him so that they stuck in his body, and ran away into hiding before he could shoot.

Then the young man, because he had already been so long gone, did not chase the porcupines, but left the quills sticking in his body and went back to the village, saying to himself, "She will see how brave I am, that I care nothing for the pain of the porcupine quills."

But when the chief's daughter saw him she only laughed and said, "You cannot deceive me! It was never heard that a chief's daughter married a man who was not brave. If you were brave, you would have twenty Iroquois scalps hanging from your belt. It is easy to hunt porcupines; go and hunt the Iroquois, that I may embroider the curtain black and white with the porcupine quills and the Iroquois hair."

Then the young man's heart grew cold; but he took his bow and his arrows and went through the woods; and when he came near the Iroquois town he lay down on his face and slipped through the bushes like a snake. When an Iroquois came to hunt in the woods, he shot the Iroquois and took his scalp; and this he did till he had twenty scalps on his belt. Now all the time that he lay in the bushes by the Iroquois town he ate nothing but wild strawberries, for the blueberries were not yet ripe; so when he came to his own village and called to the chief's second daughter, she said, "You are an ill-looking man for a chief's daughter to marry. You are like a porcupine quill yourself. Nevertheless, I am not like my sister, and I will marry you as soon as the curtain is embroidered."

Then she took the curtain of beaver-skin and gave it to her youngest sister, and said, "Embroider this curtain in black and white, so that it shall be more beautiful than the red cloth and the bead work." So the youngest sister, when she had done her day's task on the cloth, and was tired and ready to sleep, took the quills and the hair and began to embroider the curtain, black and white, in beautiful patterns like the boughs of the trees against the sky, till she could work no longer, and fell asleep with her chin on her breast. Then her second sister came with her mischievous fingers and picked out all the embroidery of quills and hair, and in the morning came and shook her and waked her, and said, "You are lazy! you are lazy! Embroider this curtain!"

"She saw a wonderful great chief."

In this way the youngest sister's task was doubled, and she grew thin for want of sleep; yet she was so beautiful, and her eyes shone so brightly, that her sisters hated her more and more, for they said to themselves, "If a great chief's son comes this way, he will see her eyes shining even in the dark at the back of the lodge."

One day, when the chief looked out of his door, he saw a new lodge standing in the middle of the village, covered with buckskin, and painted round with pictures of wonderful beasts that had never been seen in that country before. There was a fire in front of the lodge, and a haunch of a deer was cooking on the fire. When the chief went and stood and looked in at the door, the lodge was empty, and he said, "Whose can this lodge be?"

Then a voice close by him said, "It is the lodge of a chief who is greater than any chief of the Hurons or any chief of the Iroquois."

"Where is he?" asked the old chief.

"I am sitting beside my fire," said the voice; "but you cannot see me, for your eyes are turned inwards. No one can see me but the maiden I have come to marry."

"There are no maidens here," said the old chief, "except my daughters." Then he went back to his lodge, where his two elder daughters were idling in the sun, and told them, "There is a great chief come to seek a wife in my tribe. His magic is so strong that he cannot be seen except by the maiden whom he chooses to marry."

Then the eldest daughter got up, and snatched the red cloth out of her youngest sister's hand, and wrapped it round her, and smeared red clay over her face, and ran to the new lodge and called to the great chief to come and look at her.

"I am looking at you now," said a voice close beside her, "and you are very ugly; you have been dipping your face in the mud. And you are very lazy, for your embroidery is not finished."

"Great chief," said she, "I will wash the clay from my face, and I will go and finish the embroidery and make a robe fit for a maiden who is to marry the great chief."

Then the voice said, "How can you marry a man you cannot see?"

"Oh," she said, "I can see you as plainly as the lodge and the fire. I can see you quite plainly, sitting beside the fire."

"Then tell me what I am like," said he.

"You are the handsomest of men," she said, "straight of back and brown of skin."

"Go home," said the voice, "and learn to speak truth."

When she came back to the lodge, she flung the red cloth down on the ground without speaking.

Then the old chief said to his second daughter, "Your sister has failed; it must be you that the great chief will marry."

So the second daughter picked up the beaver curtain and flung it round her, and ran to the empty lodge; and, being crafty, she cried aloud as she came near, "Oh! what a handsome chief you are!"

"How do you know I am handsome?" said the voice. "Tell me what clothes I wear."

So she guessed in her mind, and, looking on the painted lodge, she said, "A robe of buckskin, with wonderful animals painted on it."

"Go home," said the voice, "and learn to speak truth."

Then she slunk away home, and squatted on the ground before the lodge, with her chin on her breast.

Now, when the youngest daughter saw that both her sisters had failed, she said to herself: "They tell me I am very thin and ugly, but I will go and try if I can see this great chief. So she pushed aside a corner of the birchbark, and slipped out at the back of the lodge, and stole away to the painted lodge; and there, sitting by his fire on the ground, she saw a wonderful great chief, with skin as white as midwinter snow, clad in a long robe of red and blue and green and yellow stripes.

He smiled on her as she stood humbly before him, and said, "Tell me now, chief's daughter, what I am like, and what I wear!"

And she said, "Your face is like a cloud in the north when the sun shines bright from the south, and your robe is like the arch in the sky when the sun shines on the rain."

Then he stood up and took her for his wife, and carried her away to live happily in his own country.

"And what did the other two sisters do?" asked Rennie. "Did they marry the brave young men?"

"The story doesn't say," said Ossawippi. "Let me get on with my work."

HOWARD ANGUS KENNEDY.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A HINT FOR THE NEW YEAR.

THOSE who lament that there is not sufficient "go" and enthusiasm among present-day workers might do worse than imitate some of the methods of the pioneers of the Temperance movement. A return to first principles would do good all round. For example, might it not be worth while to try Joseph Livesey's plan of sending a Temperance tract to every family in a parish on New Year's morning? The New Year is proverbially a time for making a fresh start, and who can tell what great results might follow a wide distribution of Temperance teaching from house to house in the first week of 1903? A telling tract written in simple language, with a copy of the pledge and a space for a signature, was one of Joseph Livesey's favourite methods for keeping the work going, and it is a plan which experience shows it is difficult to beat as an effective means for gaining recruits.

THE WORK IN HOLLAND.

During the past ten years there has been a steady development in Temperance work in Holland, and many of the educated classes have been led to take an active part in the movement. We give the portrait of

(Photo: J. Reissig, Utrecht.)

MISS HARRIET CROMMELIN.

Miss Harriet Crommelin, of Utrecht, who is widely known as a very earnest leader, particularly in the women's branch of the work. Her father is a highly esteemed judge, of Huguenot descent, whose sympathies can always be counted upon for any Christian or philanthropic effort. Miss Crommelin was born at Dordrecht, and at the age of nineteen came over to England and entered as a student at the well-known Westfield College, Hampstead. It was here that she was first brought into active connection with the Temperance movement, and, after some thought and prayer, she signed the pledge of total abstinence and became an active worker. Upon her return to her native land she resolved upon awakening an interest in Band of Hope work, and in the first beginnings of her efforts met with considerable opposition. A Band of Hope Union was formed in 1896, and Miss Crommelin became an active member of the Executive Committee. She has done much to fight the drink traffic in the poorer quarters of the town, and is untiring in her efforts to reclaim intemperate women. Miss Crommelin is a most attractive speaker and gifted writer. She has a wide knowledge of English literature, and has translated several English books into Dutch, her first success in this direction being a translation of the late Professor Drummond's "Programme of Christianity."

A CHRISTIAN INDIAN WORKER.

The Rev. S. J. Chowrryappah, who is at present on a visit to London, has been a leader of the Good Templar movement in India. He is a native of Madras, but received his early education in England, and was trained as a missionary under the Baptist Missionary Society. He is a powerful preacher and speaker, and his varied experiences furnish him with telling illustrations which never fail to ensure the interest of his hearers. A few years ago he was elected Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Madras. At the recent session of the International Supreme Lodge held in the Parliament House, Stockholm, he was chosen as the Right Worthy Grand Chaplain of the entire Order, and was one of the deputation received by King Oscar II. The world-wide organisation of the Templars, embracing as it does nearly every known nationality, has few more picturesque personalities than the Rev. S. J. Chowrryappah. He has already taken part in many meetings in England, and has been welcomed with great cordiality.

THE VOICE OF SCIENCE.

In fulfilment of our promise we give another sheaf of medical testimonies bearing upon the Temperance problem. Next in importance to the Declaration to which we referred last month must be placed the celebrated "Cantor Lectures on Alcohol" which were delivered by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson before the Society of Arts in November and December, 1874, and January and February, 1875. The eminence of the lecturer in the world of science at once focussed attention upon his utterances, and we have his own testimony that he "could not remember to have delivered any lectures that have attracted so much earnest public attention." Large audiences were present at the delivery of the lectures, and the small volume in which they were subsequently published has been repeatedly reprinted, in all probability reaching a larger circulation than any other work dealing with the medical aspect of the Temperance question. Space will not permit of more than a few extracts from this remarkable work, which we shall leave to speak for themselves:—

"Alcohol cannot, by any ingenuity of excuse for it, be classified amongst the foods of man. It neither supplies matter for construction nor heat. On the contrary, it injures construction and reduces temperature."

"The systematic administration of alcohol for the purpose of giving and sustaining strength is an entire delusion."

"Whenever we see a person disposed to meet the effects of cold by strong drink, it is our duty to endeavour to check that effort, and whenever we see an unfortunate person under the influence of alcohol it is our duty to suggest warmth as the best means for his recovery."

"There is no form of consumption so fatal as that from alcohol. In plain terms, there is no remedy whatever for alcoholic phthisis. It may be delayed in its course, but it is never cured."

"Alcohol, an artificial product devised by man for his purposes, and in many things that he outside his organism a useful substance, is neither a food nor a drink suitable for his natural demands."

"If this agent (alcohol) do really for the moment cheer the weary, and impart a flush of transient pleasure to the unwearied who crave for mirth, its influence (doubtful even in these modest and moderate degrees) is an infinitesimal advantage by the side of an infinity of evil for which there is no compensation and no human cure."

Side by side with these emphatic opinions of Sir B. W. Richardson may be placed the testimony of Sir Andrew Clark, given by him in the noteworthy lecture to the All Souls', Marylebone, Temperance Society in 1886:—

"As I looked at the wards in the London Hospital to-day, and saw that seven out of ten owed their diseases to alcohol, I could but lament that the teaching about this question was not more direct, more decisive, more home-thrusting than ever it had been."

"When I think of the terrible effects of the abuse of alcohol, I am disposed to give up my profession, to give up everything, and go forth upon a holy crusade, preaching to all men, 'Beware of this enemy of the race!'"

(Photo: C. Malmberg, Stockholm.)

THE REV. S. J. CHOWRRYAPPAH.

The same distinguished physician in a lecture delivered in Messrs. Morley's warehouse in the City gave this piece of advice:—

"Every adult man who finds himself after trial—and every man should try—to be a thousand times better without alcohol, should not resume it, because he will work better, he will enjoy more, he will have a longer exemption from disease, he will probably live longer, and certainly he will do better in all the higher relations of life"; and he added, "For all purposes of sustained, enduring, fruitful work it is my experience that alcohol does not help, but hinders, it."

One further testimony may be given, and this shall be from Sir William Gull, who much astonished the late Duke of Westminster and the other members of the Royal Commission on the Liquor Laws by the following observations:—

"I think that, instead of flying to alcohol, as many people do when they are exhausted, they might well drink water, or that they might very well take food, and would be very much better without the alcohol. If I am fatigued with overwork, personally, my food is very simple. I eat the raisins instead of drinking the wine. I have had a very large experience in that practice for thirty years. This is my own personal experience, and I believe it is a very good and true experience."

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS' FUND.

Looking Backward and Looking Forward.

A GOOD many years have passed—to be precise, fifteen—since THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund was started with the cordial co-operation of our Readers. It was never our aim to gather a large fund, and, in the matter of the money collected, the Readers of THE QUIVER have done many greater things in the course of their forty years' association with philanthropic and religious efforts. Greater things they may have done, but never, we venture to think, any better than have been done through and by THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund. The work of that Fund is not to be measured by the number of children—some of whom are no longer children—whom it has directly benefited, for its operations have had the effect of stimulating the interest of our Readers in institutions which have the same aim as the Fund, and our pages month by month are witness to the practical expression given by our Readers to this interest.

WILLIE: OUR FIRST BOY.

Each month we publish a list of subscriptions received during the few weeks immediately preceding the printing of the number, and each year we print a balance sheet showing how these subscriptions have been applied to the objects of the Fund. But something more than this may fairly be required to keep alive interest in those whom our Readers have made their protégés. At the annual meeting of an orphanage or other school dependent upon subscriptions, the managers often make a point of bringing together some former pupils, that the subscribers may see for themselves the practical result of the work in which they have had a part. In the case of our protégés this is not altogether possible, for the children whose maintenance was undertaken by our Readers were housed at first in Dr. Barnardo's Homes and Miss Sharman's Orphanage, and some of the little band are already settled in the Greater Britain across the Atlantic. But if we cannot bring together subscribers and ex-"waifs" on any common platform, our own pages are still open for the reunion, and we propose to put together some particulars of those who have been our protégés, for the encouragement of past and present subscribers to THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund.

Who has forgotten Willie, the first of THE QUIVER waifs? He was a bright-looking little fellow of ten when he was rescued by Dr. Barnardo from a tramp-mother, and he grew apace in the healthy country life which was his lot when he was boarded out with foster-parents who soon became very fond of him. Some of our Readers may remember a picture which our artist, Mr. Rainey, drew of him in his country home, which was published in our pages. Soon afterwards Willie attracted the attention of another artist so completely that Dr. Barnardo and THE QUIVER were both relieved of any responsibility for the lad's future. He was adopted by the artist, and now, in his manhood, Dr. Barnardo says of him: "He has grown to manhood, good-looking, right-thinking, noble-minded, and I hope and believe that there is in his heart a profound gratitude towards that Heavenly Father Whose providence has kept him from every ill and prospered him in his goings."

WILLIE: IN HIS COUNTRY HOME.

Willie's place was taken by a lad named Sydney Lawrence, and when he, too, no longer needed the help of our Readers, Frank Albon was chosen as his successor. Both these lads are now in Canada doing well, and Dr. Barnardo's helpers have, very kindly and at considerable trouble, caused inquiries to be made as to their present position, that the particulars might be put before their old patrons. Of Sydney Lawrence Dr. Barnardo's agent in Canada writes: "I am pleased to report that Lawrence's record in Canada has been thoroughly satisfactory and creditable. He was over six years in one situation, and received at the end of that time Dr. Barnardo's silver medal for good conduct and length of service. He has developed into a manly, sensible, well-conducted young fellow, and a credit to the Homes in every way. At the present time he is engaged in the lumber woods in Northern Ontario, but will probably return to his old quarters in the spring, when he will have no difficulty in getting work, and where his services command the highest current rate of wages. I may add that he has a considerable sum on deposit in the Savings Bank, to which there is every prospect of his adding from time to time until he accumulates enough to start on a farm for himself."

WILLIE: AS HE IS TO-DAY.

(Photo: Rosebear, Toronto.)

SYDNEY G. LAWRENCE: NOW IN CANADA

Frank Albon was placed out in Winnipeg when he emigrated to the New World, and of him the agent says: "I am glad to be able to say that he is doing well. He has a respectable Christian home, with every comfort and kindly treatment. He is well dressed and cared for, and is described as 'a bright, promising boy, in excellent health and physical condition, taking an interest in his work, improving rapidly in general usefulness, and altogether making a success of himself.'"

The fourth boy in whom our Readers have been interested is John Harrison, who is our present "Waif." He has been boarded out at Broxted, and the healthy conditions under which he now lives are doing much to counteract the evil effects of neglect and unsatisfactory surroundings in his infancy.

(Photo: The Boys' Home Studio, Stepney Causeway, E.)

JOHN HARRISON: OUR PRESENT BOY.

We have put the boys, so to speak, in "the front row" in our reunion, because their more varied careers offer a prospect of greater interest than those which are open to the girls who have been our protégées. Our first little girl was Winnie, whom Miss Sharman introduced to us, and who was under our care a very short time. Happily, her mother's circumstances improved, and she removed the child from the Home. Her place was taken in 1892 by Susie, who is still, at sixteen, helping Miss Sharman, who lately sent us her portrait with a specimen of her needlework. This is a little frock which amply justifies Miss Sharman's remark that Susie has developed into an exquisite needlewoman. The sight of her bright face will well repay those subscribers to the Fund who remember her as the little maid on whose behalf we appealed to them—not in vain. When Susie's schooldays were nearing their close Miss Sharman found for us a successor to her in the person of Rosie Heelis, who is still in the schoolroom.

(Photo: Eastbourne Photographic Co., Clapham Common, S.W.)

SUSIE: A RECENT PORTRAIT.

WINNIE: OUR FIRST GIRL.

No season can be more appropriate than the present for such a reunion as ours. As Christmas draws near we are all apt to look backward as well as forward. We look backward to the list of constant subscribers to THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund in its earlier years, and we sometimes wonder who will come forward to take the place of "An Irish Girl" and "J. K. E. (Govan)" whose pseudonyms appeared with such unfailing regularity in our lists month after month. It is only in this way that the Editor can thank these friends and many others for their cordial co-operation in this work. We respect and sympathise with the anonymity of these friends. Truly Christian charity does not ask for the publicity of a widely circulated "list of subscriptions." Some acknowledgment of the safe arrival of contributions is demanded alike by prudence and courtesy, but the Editor, who has had the pleasure of acknowledging and passing on so many contributions from the two friends mentioned, has no idea of their identity.

We must look forward as well as backward for the work must go on. These latter years of war have thrown many more "waifs" upon the charity of the British public, and especially upon its Christian charity. It is a noble spirit that moves a nation to care for those who are left behind by the heroes who have bled and died for their country; but these pressing claims have, in some cases, diverted the stream of charity from the no less deserving and innocent victims of that unending war with those ever active foes of all lands, casualty, crime, and disease. Many of our old helpers in the work of this Fund have passed away, and we are anxious to enlist the sympathies of new friends in the service of the waifs. Subscriptions should be addressed:

(Photo: E. Jenkins, Tunbridge Wells.)

ROSIE HEELIS: OUR PRESENT GIRL.

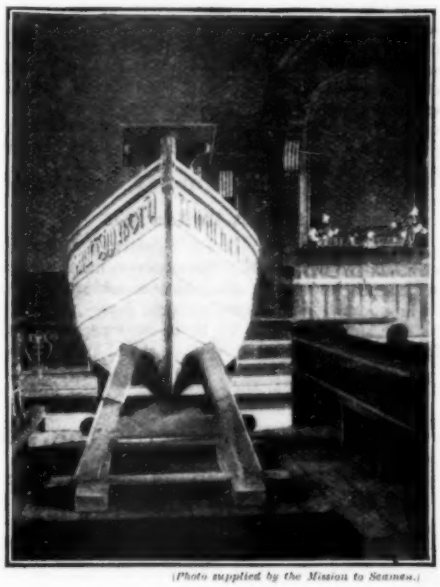
The Editor of The Quiver,
La Belle Sauvage
Ludgate Hill
London, E.C.,

and the envelopes containing them should be marked "Quiver Waifs' Fund" in the top left-hand corner. Contributions of a shilling and upwards will be acknowledged as early as possible in the pages of The Quiver, and all donations of £1 or over will be specially acknowledged at once by letter.



It rests with the Readers of The Quiver to determine whether we are to be privileged to help the girl and boy in whom we are now interested on the same path towards Christian womanhood and manhood as has been trodden, with the help of former Readers, by those who have been in the past "Quiver Waifs."

Some New Books.

In no department of education has there been a more marked advance during the last few years than in that which is concerned with the teaching of natural history. The old method was either to neglect the subject altogether, or to treat it in such a "dry-as-dust" fashion as to deprive it of all interest for the young student. How different is the plan of Miss Arabella B. Buckley (Mrs. Fisher), in her "Eyes and No Eyes," published by Messrs. Cassell! Here we have chatty papers, illustrated most effectively by forty-eight coloured plates, and many other illustrations. A book like this makes lessons a pleasure, and must help to deepen the interest of the youngsters in the phenomena of Nature.—A new book from the pen of Edna Lyall is always welcome, but there is a specially quaint interest in "The Burges Letters" (Longmans), which is well described as "A Record of Child-Life in the 'Sixties." It is something more than a story, and the contrasts it draws will be appreciated in many households.—An interesting book which has just been published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott is "Seed Time and Harvest," the autobiography of Mr. James Rennie, a well-known colporteur, edited by Mr. T. Bowick. From the same publishers we have also received the Rev. F. B. Meyer's new volume, "Samuel the Prophet." The distinguishing note of Mr. Meyer's work is always spirituality; his earnestness goes through and through every line which he writes.—In "Neither Jew nor Greek" (Chatto and Windus), Miss Violet Guttenburg gives us a most interesting picture of Jewish social life in London. The story is well worth attention for its own sake, but its setting is one which will appeal particularly to our readers. If this is, as we believe, a first book, it is full of fair promise.—Messrs. Isbister have sent us a copy of Mr. Stopford A. Brooke's "The Poetry of Robert Browning," which is a companion volume to one on Tennyson which has helped many a student of the work of the late Laureate. This new book seems, from first impressions, just as well qualified to help and train the reader.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of the following works:—A new edition of Major W. H. Turton's "The Truth of Christianity" (Jarrolds); "He Died for Me," a capital missionary story, by the Rev. Arthur Le Feuvre (Elliot Stock); "Recognition after Death,' by the Rev. S. Herbert (J. Finch and Co.).

A Novel Pulpit.

The pulpit of which a photograph is given here is probably unique, being in the form of a boat, a new and original idea for the Seamen's Mission Church, Sunderland, to which it belongs. The pulpit was given by the officers and men of the Medway torpedo-boat destroyer flotilla, in 1901, in memory of a pleasant visit to Sunderland, a day's pay being contributed for the purpose, and was built in Birmingham, and dedicated by the Bishop of Durham.

(Photo supplied by the Mission to Seamen.)

A NOVEL PULPIT.

The Banana Produces no Seed.

The banana has been so long in the care of man that it is completely subdued to his uses. It has lost the power of producing seed. The banana seed would be useless for human food, and take up the time and the force of the plant to produce and ripen it. For the end for which the banana exists, to produce human food, all that would be sheer loss. So the seed is left out, and all the space is taken up with soft, nourishing fruit matter. The banana can be propagated only by shoots. And as it is in the care and service of its master, this is no loss, but a gain. Is it not the same with the Christian and his Master and Owner? What is the use and the aim of all our long experience, reproofs, prunings, culture? Is it not that the harsh, useless things be put off, and the whole life made sweet, harmonious, useful? And is it not striking and full of testimony of what God can do for a man, when we see the spaces of a heart (as we can see the parts of a banana-fruit when we cut it across), which in other men are full of anger and worldly desire, full of purity and love? The banana has delighted to yield itself to man. Other plants which have been long cultivated have not been nearly so easy to subdue. The pear, for example, keeps its hard core and useless seeds, and it easily produces and harbours in itself gritty lumps. Why should we not rather be like the banana, which yielded an easy victory to its owner and so generous a return? Why should we not be delighted to yield ourselves to God, and to be fellow-workers with Him Who loves us? For God's glory is not some selfish end on His part, but only another name for our good.

A Shaft at Random Sent.

PREACHERS have often remarked how the sermons by which they themselves have set the least store, and which they have considered among their poorest pulpit productions, have proved to be the most helpful to their hearers, and most fruitful in spiritual results. Dr. Newman Hall tells us how a woman, who was standing at one of the doors of his crowded church on a Sunday evening, was brought to repentance by an impromptu passage, which, by an irresistible impulse of the moment, he inserted into a written sermon. No less a preacher than Charles Haddon Spurgeon asked his friend and biographer, Pastor Williams, for a Sunday's subject, one Saturday afternoon. Mr. Williams suggested the theme of the loathsome leper who came, and was not brought, to our Lord. The searching eloquence with which the borrowed lesson was pressed home had its reward (as Mr. Spurgeon gloried to relate) in the conversion of a sinner of the deepest dye. An army chaplain, long gone to his rest, was once preaching to the troops, and was denouncing some particular sin. A soldier got up and exclaimed, "I did not do it. I did not." One is almost sorry to have to add that the self-convicted culprit was at once marched out of the church under arrest for breach of discipline.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from October 1st up to and including October 31st, 1902. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: L. R., Newcastle, 5s.; R. S., Crouch End, 5s.; M. A. L., Hounslow, 5s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "An Irish Girl," £2, 10s., £2, 10s., £2, 5s., £1, 2s. 6d. The following amounts have been sent direct: "Alpha," £1; "Stud," 10s.; J. S., 7s. 6d.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

13. What place was known as the 'city of David"?
14. How did the angels partake of the joy at Christ's birth?
15. In what way were the shepherds the first missionaries of the world?
16. By what distinguishing mark were the shepherds to know the infant Jesus?
17. What message did God send to King Hezekiah showing to us the need of preparation for death?
18. What special sign did God give to Hezekiah to assure him of his recovery from sickness?
19. What is known of the character of Hezekiah during the fifteen years which God added to his life?
20. What was the law as to scourging among the Jews and Romans?
21. What Roman law was broken by the magistrates at Philippi?
22. Why did the gaoler at Philippi seek to kill himself?
23. What characteristic of the Christian life does St. Paul specially point out to the Christian converts?
24. What does St. Paul give as the cure for over-anxiety? Quote passage.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 95.

1. Because the Israelites so soon fell away into idolatry, and God would not then give them victory over the Canaanites (Judges i. 2, 3 and 12-15).

2. The five lords of the Philistines, the Canaanites, the Sidonians and Hivites (Judges ii. 22, 26 and iii. 3, 4).

3. When through their sin the Israelites were oppressed by their enemies God raised up judges to deliver them (Judges ii. 15, 16, 18).

4. The tribe of Ephraim, who inhabited Samaria (Is. xxviii. 1-3, Amos iv. 1 and vi. 1-6).

5. A swift destruction at the hand of a mighty and strong one, the kingdom of Assyria (Is. xxviii. 2-4).

6. Gideon was commanded to reduce his army of 32,000 to 300 (Judges vii. 2-4, 7).

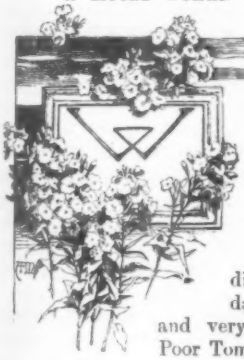
7. Gideon asked God to give him a sign of victory by making a fleece of wool to be dry while all around the ground was wet with dew (Judges vi. 36-40).

8. All the earrings they took from the Ishmaelites and the golden ornaments they obtained from the Midianites (Judges viii. 24-27).

9. She refused to go home and leave Naomi, but went to Bethlehem and worked for her (Ruth i. 16, 17 and ii. 2, 3).

10. Ruth became the wife of Boaz, a man of great wealth, and thus the grandmother of King David (Ruth iv. 13, 21, 22 and ii. 1).

11. That which God revealed to him in his boyhood concerning the house of Eli the High Priest (1 Sam. iii. 11-14, 18).



12. A man of God was sent to tell Eli of his sons' sinful life and his own dishonour to God (1 Sam. ii. 27-29 and 22, 23).

A Christmas Novel by Katharine Tynan.

CHAPTER I.

A LITTLE WOMAN AND A SHOE.

WITH Mrs. Williamson the merry heart went all the way. Most women would have been crushed by the burden that fell upon her when Tom Williamson died, leaving her eight daughters to bring up, and very little to do it on. Poor Tom's affairs were found to be dreadfully involved when he died. The only reproach the widow was ever known to address to his memory was a characteristic one.

"Oh, Tom, Tom!" she said, "why didn't you trust me, dear? To think I should have been spending with a light heart when the making was long over! And to think you carried that burden by yourself, when I could have shouldered half of it at least! Oh, Tom Tom!"

She had really been fitter to bear the burden than he. He had been born with a silver spoon in his mouth, so far as mercantile affairs were concerned. He had taken up an honourable tradition of business, and followed it honourably. But when times of storm and stress came he had neither the courage nor the resource to weather the storm. When the big crash came which involved Williamson's Tom fretted himself to death, thanking God at the last that Williamson's would pay twenty shillings in the pound, and that none could ever impute their ruin to the firm.

Williamson's did pay, and gave occasion to the newspapers to write fine leading articles on the stability of commercial honour. But when the payment was done there was very little left to provide for the widow and the eight daughters, the eldest of whom was a tall child with her hair in a flaxen pigtail, already thinking of long frocks, and the youngest was Barbara, a little creature of four, with a face like moonlight in a great frizz of gold-red hair.

Mrs. Williamson had sprung from the same class as her husband. As a girl she had never known what it was to have anything denied her; and Tom kept up the spoiling process, for spoiling it would have been if the little woman's heart had not been unspoilt. She had been an only daughter, and her fond father, refusing to take the chances for her, had handed over the business which bore his name to his younger partners, in consideration of the very handsome dowry she had brought her husband. Now that, too, was gone. It had been well if the old father, who would not take the chances, had tied up the dowry for her and her children. But then—Williamson's was as safe as the Bank. Celia would not need to be protected against the vicissitudes of her husband's fortune.

"Poor Mrs. Williamson!" said her friends. "What is she to do with all those girls? And not three hundred a year all told! And she, who has been used to everything of the best! How she will miss her fine house and her servants and her carriage!"

Mrs. Williamson did miss them, perhaps; but if so, she made light of it. Indeed, she told her old friend Lady Caird, the widow of a City knight, who came clattering to the door of her new abode shortly afterwards with a carriage as fine as the Lord Mayor's coach, that there was much to be said for her changed circumstances.

"You see," she said, "the exercise is so important now that I am come to middle age; and, since I have less to do in the way of visiting and shopping and sight-seeing, I should be lost if I couldn't help in the housework. Then the trouble has proved one's friends. Think of Susan, the kitchen-maid—the kind, faithful creature offering to come with me as general; though I assure you, my dear Lady Caird, I hardly knew Susan, and had done for her no more than the commonest Christianity obliged me to do, and that was only to make her see a good doctor when she seemed to be going into a decline."

"I know, my dear," said Lady Caird, her shrewd old eyes twinkling; "and we all said what a silly woman you were, Celia Williamson, to call in so expensive a man as Drummond for your kitchen slut, and only hoped our own Johns and Cookies would know nothing about it. Now, where are those children? I want to take as many of them as my Noah's ark will hold for a drive through the Park and the West End, and afterwards we shall have tea at a pastrycook's. Those American people at Knightsbridge will do very well. Now, where are they all? Where are Cis and Audrey, Dolly and Pat, Phyllis and Alice, Nancy and Barbara?"

"You can't take them all. Take Cis and your god-daughter, Bab. You had Audrey and Patricia last week."

"I shall take four. The other four can come next time. I confess the eight would rather incommode my gouty toes, and make me more ill-tempered than usual."

The mother looked at a little silver watch on her wrist.

"They will be out of school now. How they will fly when they see the barouche, as soon as they have turned the corner of the street! You are too good to them, dear friend."

"Stuff and nonsense! When I have the old carriage full of them, I am consoled for an hour for being a childless woman. You should give me Bab, Celia. Not that I'd have much to leave her. Sir Joseph meant it all for Samuel Caird, and to Sam it must go, though he doesn't interest me—a starched prig. Still, I could do very well for Bab while I lived, and would save what I could from the income for her afterwards."

Mrs. Williamson looked at the old lady with eyes that asked for mercy.

"Not Bab," she faltered. "Not little Bab, the baby. She would fret, no matter how good you were to her. Bab wants her mother."

"Oh, aye, Bab wants her mother," replied the old lady, with cheerful philosophy. "And so do Cis and Audrey, Patricia and Phyllis, Dolly and Alice and Nancy. You are the most selfish of mortals. There, my dear, don't look at me so round-eyed. You will always be the little woman that lived in the shoe. By the way," getting up and walking to the window, "I don't dislike your shoe, Celia. It's well made and not ill fitting. If only you could dump it down somewhere else!"

"They're good houses," said Mrs. Williamson eagerly. "There's not as much room in them as we are used to, it is true, but they're certainly well built. I daresay we'll find it a bit cramped as the girls grow up, but it is cheap. Of course, the rent would be three times as much if the neighbourhood were all that is desirable."

The old lady stood in the large windowed recess gazing out over the strip of ground at the back which was common to the dwellers in the parallel lines of houses. She raised her lorgnette to her eyes and took in the faded, depressed air of the high houses the other side of the grass-plot, which shut out any glimpse of sky.

"Damp and unwholesome!" she said at last. "And what grass, Celia! What poor mangy earth!"

"The trees are real trees," said Mrs. Williamson deprecatingly.

"Ah, yes, poor things! I remember when there were fields here. The trees were trapped, sure enough. Once they were country trees. Is that washing hung out I see over there? And there is a young man of colour going up and down under the dripping black boughs."

"We heard a thrush yesterday, dear Lady Caird. The servants next door told Susan that it comes every year and builds here. I was so grateful when I heard it."

"Of course you were. I'll tell you what, my dear"—the old lady turned about sharply—"there would always be a thrush building anywhere you were"

A wave of pleased colour floated into the widow's brown cheeks.

"When the trees get their leafage we shall not be able to see the houses," she said. "Of course, the outlook is very shabby in front. But then one need not look that way. And it is really nice to have the open space at the back."

"You won't be able to have any neighbours," said Lady Caird, with a severe eye.

"Oh, but why not?"

"I fancy myself letting Bab walk out with the young man of colour, and chum with those hook-nosed young women with the penchant for yellow and scarlet who have just gone in by the garden of the house where the washing is hung out!"

"There is plenty of time to think about Bab, since she is only a baby still. But the place is not as bad as you think. There is a number of old-fashioned people here who own their houses, and won't leave them, although the deluge has swept over them. There is Mrs. Patten. You see the house with the covered-in balcony. Poor lady! she is a great invalid, and has very little companionship. Her daughter is an art student in Paris. She is really very nice, very cultivated, and extremely handsome. She ought to be a woman of affairs only for her wretched health. As it is, she belongs to a good many humanitarian societies. She keeps her own carriage at the mews across the street. She has invited me to drive with her."

"Very kind of her, I am sure," said Lady Caird, with a sniff. "But if you want driving, you need not go to a complete stranger for it."

"Ah, but it is a charity to the poor lady. At least she seems to like my society."

"So do other people."

"She is good enough to say that I am intelligent," said Mrs. Williamson with a bright blush. "She has plenty of friends—indeed, she holds quite a little court of old ladies here. But she doesn't seem to feel any equality with them—in mind, I mean. She rather patronises them; and at times she seems to grow quite tired of them. And then she has no companionship but that of her dogs."

"I daresay she's an old tyrant, like myself. Any other possible neighbours, Celia?"

"Well, there's an old gentleman who goes out in a bath-chair with an attendant. Mrs. Patten says he's very rich. He lives in one of the oldest, biggest houses across the garden. He has taken the most extraordinary fancy to Bab. And one day, when I was passing through the gardens, he introduced himself to me in the most courtly way, and asked me as a great favour to allow Bab, any fine day she was in the gardens, to talk to him a little."

"And what did you say?"

"Why, of course, I said 'Yes.' He is a dear old man, with great bushy eyebrows and rosy cheeks, and eyes as innocent as Bab's own."

"H'm! He might leave the child a fortune."

"Hardly," said Mrs. Williamson, smiling. "He is very rich, I believe, but he has a family of his own, and is a most tender father. They are married and away from him, but there is no end of objects for his money."

"Well, your garden seems to be more interesting than it looks. Any more possible people?"

"There is the little tutor, two doors away. He has a big wife and several wild little children. She sits all day by the window, writing novelettes for the penny papers, while the children make a circus of the garden. There is the French lady with the bulldog. There is the Indian lady with the mongoose."

"It seems very lively," said Lady Caird. "And so you are satisfied to pitch your tent here. What about your old plan of going to live in the country?'

Mrs. Williamson breathed the softest of sighs.

"It is postponed till all the girls are educated."

"Ah! Bab is four. That gives you about sixteen years."

"The schools are good and cheap here. We must be cramped for—sixteen years."

"You talk as if you had an eternity to live, Celia," said the old lady sharply.

"Sixteen years is not so much to look back upon. But there are the children! Doesn't it sound as if they were going to knock the house down?"

A moment later the children were in the room, giving Lady Caird such an enthusiastic welcome as proved that to them, at least, her pretence of ferocity was something too transparent to be noticed.

CHAPTER II.

A GARDEN IDYLL.

AFTER all, Lady Caird had nothing to do with the first marriage in this happy family, which took place about two years after the Williamsons went to live in Malplaquet Gardens.

The first bride was Cecilia, the eldest girl—Cis for short. She had only just put up her hair—soft silky hair of a colourless blonde—and lengthened her frocks till they covered her modest feet. She was transparently fair, and when in the light frocks her mother selected for her she walked about the gardens on a summer evening she was like a flower, a flower wind-blown and slender, a narcissus, a snowdrop, an anemone; for the garden had many flowers of the cabbage rose and dahlia and poppy kind.

Perhaps Cis was sweeter by contrast with the early developed, oriental maidens who crowded the gardens.

The house which faced the Williamsons' across the bald patch of tennis-ground, and commanded the windows before the three slender poplars at the end of the garden came out into leaf, belonged to an Army coach.

Mrs. Williamson's girls—they were but children yet—kept an almost conventual seclusion in the tall old house that had seen better days. That is to say, they were not debarred from walking in the gardens, but the mother allowed no promiscuous friendships or acquaintances; and when they had lived there for two years they had a fairly large bowing acquaintance among their neighbours, but hardly any more intimacy than with Mrs. Patten and Mr. Selwood, the rich old gentleman, and the family of the little tutor, whose quiet heroism in providing so many hungry beaks with food oddly touched Mrs. Williamson.

His name was Mr. Short, and he was employed at several of the coaching establishments with which the neighbourhood abounded. He seemed to be for ever running to or from a class; and the number of occasions during the day when he found time to pop in and say a word to Mrs. Short, who grew more monumental every year, was past counting.

However, the young gentlemen at the Army coach's over the way were very much fluttered about Cis, and tall Audrey, and black-haired Patricia, who had left their babyhood and childhood behind them with astonishing rapidity, and sprung into young slips of womanhood, straight and slender as saplings.

Cis, especially, always passed the Army coach's with a stir of her pulses and a little rush of pink to her pale cheeks. She was conscious of many eyes at the windows as she passed, but that need not have caused her such deep perturbation.

The real cause of it was a young gentleman, Roland Earnshaw by name—but then Cis did not know his name—a grey-eyed, brown-haired, comely specimen of young England, with whom Cis came face to face one lovely June afternoon, when the new leaves were out, all their banners and tapestries of green silk more heavenly because of the startling contrast of the dingy houses. Cis was wearing a white frock with a green sash on that occasion. She had been visiting Lady Caird, and the barouche had brought her back, depositing her at the entrance gate to the gardens, which the Williamsons always used, because they liked to forget the dingy houses which faced their hall door in Malplaquet Gardens.

Cis was looking for her key. Her pocket was not more get-at-able than any other young woman's; and she was wearing the shaped skirt of that year of grace which so overlooked and contemned the pocket that one might wear it a month and never know it possessed such a thing.

The shaped skirt added to Cis's height and slenderness. She might have been the goddess of gardens as she stood by the shabby iron railings, fumbling after that hidden pocket. She wore the snowdrop's colours, and had as radiantly innocent and virginal an air. So young Earnshaw thought, though he would not have known the least bit in the world how to express it, being a not particularly clever youth: no one would have thought the less of him for that, however, seeing he was so honest and manly, and so very pleasant to look upon.

"Let me open the gate for you," he said, producing his key.

Cis looked for a second so startled that she might have flown. But she stayed, murmuring her thanks shyly, her eyes after that first glance veiled by her large transparent lids.

After that meeting Cis became a more complicated creature, even to her mother. She was no longer the simple child, with the outlooking gaze of childhood. Her eyes looked inwards now, mused upon something with which the visible world had nothing to do.

Mrs. Williamson was conscious of the sudden change without being able to assign a cause for it. Cis became at once more staid and more radiant than before. The radiancy Mrs. Williamson might have understood if she could have had a glimpse of the fact that a mere passage through the garden might mean a moment of rapture that gilded the whole day and the dreams at night for her young daughter.

Still shy and virginal, Cis did not often take that passage. Something made it impossible to her that she should seem to court that glance from young Earnshaw's grey eyes, the lifting of the hat which sent quick throbs and thrills through her young veins.

XUM

"'Oh! mother, what does it mean?'"—p. 198.

She took to entering and leaving the house by the front way, and derived a certain satisfaction from the knowledge, dreary as it was, that she had refused the delight of the casual meetings. They never spoke, those two. By-and-by the boy found out that Cis had given up the garden for her entrances and exits. It chilled him a little, but his ardour only sprung up as does fire when a little water is spilt upon it. He took to haunting the front entrances to Malplaquet Gardens whenever he had a few minutes to spare, and was often rewarded by the sight of Cis.

Cis, at least, never looked beyond. Those glimpses were enough for her. Further acquaintanceship would have seemed impossible, since mother discountenanced such things. But, indeed, Cis never thought about it, nor that the lads at the Army grinder's were birds of passage. Cis's golden dream for the present had no shadows at all in it.

Then one day Mrs. Williamson had a note from Mrs. Patten. Would she come and sit in the balcony and drink tea with her that afternoon? She had a particular reason for wishing to see her.

Mrs. Williamson smiled to herself. Mrs. Patten's court was out of favour. Only the day before she had seen one of the old ladies stand humbly outside the gate of Mrs. Patten's little garden, calling softly to the occupant of the balcony. But—although Mrs. Williamson, watering the flowers in her own balcony, could see Mrs. Patten's still pretty arm with its frill of real lace falling about it, where it supported her novel—no answer came from the creeper-hung recess. And at last the old lady went slowly and sadly on her way.

But this time the subject of Mrs. Patten's talk was not general, but particular. It was, in fact, Roland Earnshaw.

"His father, Brigadier-General Earnshaw, is the very soul of honour," said Mrs. Patten, waving her hands about, "the very soul of honour. And Roland is all he could wish. I have known the boy from his childhood. So he came to me. 'I want to be introduced to Mrs. Williamson and her daughters,' he said, 'and I thought perhaps you would be so kind, Mrs. Patten.' He looked so eager. Ah, my dear, what a thing it is to be young! And then I said to him—I can take liberties, my dear, with the boy I remember as a newborn infant—'Which of them is it, Roland?' and for an instant he sat there silent, turning his hat about in his hands, and looking so handsome, and so young. Then he said, 'Mrs. Patten, it is Miss Cecilia.' And I asked him how he knew her name, since he has never spoken with her. He said he didn't remember how, but that it exactly suited her. So I thought you might let me bring him to call, and if Cis——"

"You go too fast," said Mrs. Williamson, in a startled voice. "Cis is only eighteen."

"And Roland is twenty-three. But by the time he has his commission——Of course, they would have to live on his pay almost, for the dear old Brigadier has so many sons. He could, no doubt, do a little for them, and I—Roland ought to have been my godson——"

"Oh, stop, stop!" said Mrs. Williamson, half laughing and half crying. "Why, Cis doesn't know him yet!"

"You mean she has never spoken to him. But then he opened the garden gate for her one day. To hear him you would think it was the gate of Paradise. And Cis has known him quite well ever since; though, of course, she is too delicate and too honourable to have an acquaintanceship of which you knew nothing."

"There has been a change in Cis," said the mother, with the voice of one whose eyes are being opened.

"Yes, there is a change in Cis"—Mrs. Patten was intensely romantic, although Mrs. Williamson suspected from her reticence that her marriage had not been a happy one—"I have seen it for some time past, and knew that Cis was in love. And I trembled, dear friend, I trembled lest it should be someone unworthy. Lest she should come to leaning on the love of a dog, as I have in my old age, because other loves have failed me. I could not have hoped that it was Roland—so good, so honourable, with such traditions of honour and loyalty. It was too good for this weary world."

The end of it was that Mrs. Patten made a ceremonious call with her young friend Mr Roland Earnshaw. And after that the young man came alone. And presently his father and mother called, and Mrs. Williamson was delighted with both. And very soon it was settled that as soon as Roland got his commission he and Cis were to be married.

Roland justified everything Mrs. Patten had said of him. For all his youth, he had the seriousness of manhood. His love affair did not, as Mrs. Williamson feared before she knew him better, distract him from his work. On the contrary, he worked with redoubled ardour, passed his examinations with credit, and before he was twenty-five had received his commission and was a married man.

Mrs. Williamson had taken him into her motherly heart long before that time. The only grief was that the young couple would have to go to India.

Everyone sped them with good wishes and kind actions. Lady Caird forgot her little pique at not being allowed to present Cis and take her about, and gave her her trousseau, specially chosen for the life in India.

And Mrs. Patten gave Roland, who ought to have been her godson, a cheque for a hundred pounds.

Their honeymoon was to be spent on the big ship that was to take them out to India. It was better so, since it saved a long contemplation of parting.

Indeed, it was all done so quickly that Mrs. Williamson could hardly believe the evidence of her senses when Cis's place in the house was vacant. The mother's tears fell as she watched the promotion of Audrey to Cis's wardrobe and Cis's looking-glass. Audrey now was to have her hair up and her skirts lengthened. Indeed, she wore her first long skirt at Cis's wedding.

CHAPTER III.

A FULL QUIVER.

HEN Audrey married Raymond Earnshaw at twenty, and Dolly married a friend of his, who was a Government engineer in India, on her nineteenth birthday Lady Caird became downright angry.

"Upon my word," she said, "if you don't save Pat for me, I shall fall out with you, Celia Williamson. And, what is worse, I shall take Mina up for spite; and that would be the killing of me."

Pat was the one who justified her name by the possession of the darkest blue eyes possible, with silky rippled black hair and white skin. But it was Pat who chose to go governessing to Spain. She had a desire to see the world. And though Lady Caird, in despair, offered to take her to Paris and Milan, Venice, Genoa, and Rome, and pay her a salary as companion, Patricia turned up her delicate little nose at the offer.

The chance of the position had reached Patricia through a French lady of the bluest blood and most pinched poverty, who was an occasional visitor to Mrs. Patten. Madame de Chavannes was the friend of the Marchioness de Santa Fé, and was entrusted with the delicate task of finding an English governess for her daughters.

Pat went in everyone's despite, and wrote home presently that none were so kind and so simple as the grandees. She was wrapped up in luxury and kindness, and was only afraid that it would be quite a long time before she should see mother and the girls. She did so much for the Marchioness—all light and easy things, such as writing her letters and arranging her flowers—that she had a conviction that she could not be spared. Her pupils were three girls, all in the premature young womanhood of the South. Pat sent their pictures—beautiful young creatures with the full bloom of a peach or a plum, and with the strangest contrast of golden hair grafted on to their Southern beauty.

Lady Caird and Mrs. Patten had conceived an antipathy for each other at sight, as will often happen with the dearest friends of a third person.

"I didn't think it of you, Celia Williamson," said Lady Caird, "that you would let your little girl go among foreigners like that, all through that Patten woman with her ridiculous foreign airs and graces. Plain Briton is good enough for me."

"Pat would go, you see, dear friend," Mrs. Williamson responded meekly. "You don't know what it is when the young things grow up and will follow a way of their own. Besides, I can trust my girl."

"As well as taunting me for not having chick nor child of my own," growled Lady Caird; but her eyes showed that she did not quite mean what she said. "All the same, you can tell Madame Patten from me, that I'd rather be the widow of a City knight—after all, Joseph's carpets were honest and sound—than a fine French madam like herself, neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. And if she doesn't get on with that daughter of hers, who prefers to work at art in a garret to being her mother's companion, there's a great deal to be said for the young woman."

"But vraiement!" said Mrs. Patten, on the other hand, "what a typical Britoness is your friend Lady Caird! The world of art is a closed door to her. She is an archive of ancient superstitions and prejudices. No free air ever blows into the recesses of her mind. Kind! Sincere! Estimable! But surely, after all, the life is affreuse."

Mrs. Patten always dropped into French when she was excited, and her speech about Lady Caird was accompanied by many wavings of the hand, and many ups and downs of her high, dramatic voice.

When Pat was gone, Mrs. Williamson looked round about her much more roomy house, and dropped a tear to the memory of the days when she did not really know where to pack away the children.

"I used to think we were rather cramped in Malplaquet Gardens, Ailie," she said to her daughter Alice, who was most like herself, "but I am afraid we are going to have too much room, after all."

"Wait till your daughters and sons-in-law begin to come home on leave," said Alice, with a bright blush.

Alice had just become engaged to the son of the French lady with the bulldog, who had married an Englishman, and was as British as her dog. They were of the few old residents in Malplaquet Gardens who owned their houses, and kept up a certain state amid the shabbiness and decay that were creeping like a dry rot all over the neighbourhood.

Young Hilary St. Ives had been swaggering in his first middy's suit, home for a holiday, when the Williamsons came to live at Malplaquet Gardens. He was now first lieutenant, a handsome, bronzed fellow, with the clean, wholesome, straightforward look of the sailor. His ship was ordered to the China station for three years; and it was arranged that after the brief honeymoon Alice was to sail for Hong Kong in the charge of friends, and set up a little home there in readiness for her husband whenever he could come to it.

Next Nancy married an Indian civil servant, a widower, with one little child, whom she met at the Earnshaws. At his first coming—he was home on sick leave—Clement Dunstan was a weary, sad, and disillusioned person. He was twice Nancy's age at least, and he was not particularly well-to-do. In fact, he had been one of the unlucky ones of the world. Things had seemed to go wrong with him without any fault of his own; and at thirty-eight he had considered his youth over, the hill climbed, and the dreary and dusty descent, only brightened by his little son, all that was to be traversed. And Eric in a way was a grief, for his delicacy, the delicacy of an Indian-born child, nearly broke his father's heart.

But love laughs at improbabilities. Young Rupert Earnshaw had long been in love with Nancy, who had proved adamant to the gallant young soldier.

But here was another matter. Here was someone to love and cherish and comfort, someone for whom to build the world anew.

"I should never have dared to ask you," Dunstan said to Nancy, after the incredible happiness of the engagement had come about.

"If I hadn't shown you how willing I was," she replied, her eyes dancing.

"If you hadn't been so heavenly kind. But oh, child, do you realise how little I have to give you? It isn't only your beautiful pity for me and for Eric?"

"It is my pity for myself," said Nancy, with cheeks as rosy as Love's own.

After the engagement Clement Dunstan threw off ten years of his real and twenty of his apparent age before Nancy had come into his life. The faded, tired look passed from his eyes, the lines from his face, as though Nancy's hand had smoothed them away. The grey hairs remained in his head; but perhaps Nancy loved him the better for those signs of the troubles he had passed through. He became spruce, as befitted a bridegroom to be; and Mrs. Williamson, who had been rather dismayed at first when she heard of Nancy's choice, was now happy to admit that Clement was quite as much a credit to her as her other sons-in-law.

It seemed, indeed, as though Mrs. Williamson's shoe were not to be emptied of its children. Cis had been home once, with an ayah and a very shadowy-looking baby, who became quite sturdy during his London winter, though in a general way Malplaquet Gardens would not suggest itself as the happiest place in which to rear children.

Next winter it was to be Audrey's turn; and Dolly and her husband were to come home for six months' leave of absence in the spring. Dolly's husband, who had rather more of this world's goods than the Earnshaws, talked of taking a country cottage that would accommodate Mrs. Williamson and Bab from time to time whenever they chose to come to it.

But Audrey's children were even more delicate than Cis's, and the shadow of parting which begins to grow over the father's and mother's heart almost as soon as an English child is born in India projected its blackness nearly to eclipse with Audrey.

The mother felt with pangs that Audrey after next winter must return alone. There must be some place found for the children, where they could grow and thrive in a more temperate clime. And where would such a place be except with the grandmother?

Phyllis and Bab, who were the only two now left, were not likely to object. Why, they spoilt little Eric Dunstan dreadfully; and when Mrs. Williamson had a thought that the only way to save Eric for the father who worshipped him was to keep him at home, she had but to impart it to her young daughters for them to clamour that Eric should be kept at Malplaquet Gardens.

So Eric was installed when his father with his young bride returned to India, and soon ceased to be the lonely, over-wise child who had been his sad father's companion.

Bab now was very like Bab at four. She had a clear, ivory-pale complexion, with a few golden-brown freckles. Her eyes were brown with a dash of red in the brown—that is to say, they were the unnameable bronze of the pheasant's feathers. The little ivory-pale face looked out from masses of red hair, as unruly and lovely as it had been in babyhood.

But, after all, it was Bab's heart that mattered. Such a generous, loving, faithful, willing little heart! Her mother used to say, stroking the irreclaimable tresses, that Bab's red head was a fire of cheerfulness when days were dark. Bab sometimes blundered, because she was so eager and impetuous; but everything was to be forgiven her for the sake of her heart of gold.

"She will give herself up to these children," her mother said to Lady Caird. "Little Indian children are apt to be specially exacting. I must see they don't exact too much from my Babbie."

"She's the flower of the flock," said the old lady, with the air of giving a vicious snap which usually accompanied her speeches. "Phyllis is a sweet creature—very like what Cis used to be; but none of them is a patch on little Redhead. You ought to have given her to me when I asked you, ma'am. And now here I am with the gout in my ten toes, and I can't even show the world what a pretty thing is hidden away in Malplaquet Gardens."

"I hope I shall keep these two a long while," said the mother.

"You may, because you have exhausted the eligibles of the district. Oh, you match-making mother, how did you do it? If you could only know how we talk about you in Kensington over the teacups, we who can't marry our daughters by hook or by crook, even though we never were ruined and never had to retire to the tarnished glories of Malplaquet Gardens!"

Mrs. Williamson smiled. Her old world had not been by any manner of means bad to her.

"Perhaps I shall have to ask you to take them about a bit when the gout passes over," she said. "But there is plenty of time for that. Why, Phyllis is only eighteen."

"Her sisters were very little older when they married. Still, I am going to the new man in Wimpole Street for my toes. I want to have a coming-out daughter, even if I can't make merry at her wedding."

CHAPTER IV.

THE OLD FRIEND.

So once again, No. 17, Malplaquet Gardens, was filled to overflowing.

The ayahs departed in time, and their places were taken by more or less trim English nurses. It was some time before Mrs. Williamson hit on a nurse who did not despise the scanty accommodation of the house and yet was efficient. But she found such a one at last, strong as a little pony, faithful as a dog, and with an unbounded capacity for work and absorption in the children.

Only now, when Mrs. Williamson was rearing new broods, did her enforced residence in Malplaquet Gardens fret her. No gardener ever watched his slips and seedlings with half the tender anxiety she had over the heavy eyes and sallow cheeks of her little grandchildren.

She had reared her own children in London, and they were a credit to London air and sanitation. But her own had not been weakened and enervated by spending the first years of their lives in India. Now her brood of weary, peevish little boys and girls grieved the tender, motherly heart.

"If I could only get them to the country!" she would say to Phyllis and Bab. But the house was on her hands for three years yet. She had taken it for five years originally, renewing the lease as it fell in from time to time.

And the wish seemed impossible of realisation for other reasons. The country house was a dream Mrs. Williamson had to relinquish with a sigh.

Besides, Phyllis, who was a student of the Royal College of Music, had a good many tuitions about Kensington and Holland Park, for which Malplaquet Gardens was very convenient. Bab stayed at home and helped her mother. In quiet moments together they often talked of their dreams—for it was Bab's dream as well—of the gardens, the bees, the fowls they should keep, the little black Kerry which should give them milk for the children.

Bab talked of it to someone else, to whom she had talked of everything since she was four years old. This was old Mr. Selwood, whose attachment to Bab had not lessened. He had given her a big doll's house on her fifth birthday, which was almost too overgrown for the house that contained it. Year after year from that time he had loaded her with toys at Christmas and on birthdays. He had given her her first silver watch at ten years old, and replaced it by a delightful little gold one, studded with pearls, depending from a bow brooch of diamonds, when she was sixteen.

Mr. Selwood had now been for some time confined to the house. Another in his case, unable, as he was, to pay for all the mechanical contrivances for the alleviation of pain and weakness, had been bed-ridden. But Mr. Selwood was able to lie on his invalid sofa near the window of the room in which a bright fire burned, and look out through the bare boughs of his chestnut on as much of life as passed in the garden below.

The chestnut boughs were thickening now with the promise of buds. Soon the gummy pink leaves would be bursting their sheath. Next they would shake out their delicate five fingers of crumpled leafage. A few days more and the tree would be hung with banners of green silk of a most heavenly colour. Then the invalid could pry upon the birds' secrets, could watch the mother thrush, bright-eyed and patient, sitting upon the eggs through April and early May, while her mate sang his country song for her listening ear.

Mr. Selwood would never consent to have the tree cut down or thinned, though it was true that in full leafage it darkened his room. It would be murder to do it, he said, twinkling, to Bab; but there was seriousness behind the twinkle.

In those latter days the old gentleman's sister had come to look after his household. His attendant, Cotter, might be trusted to look after him; but, indeed, the huge, old-fashioned house had been dreary and dusty enough without the superintendence of a woman.

Miss Patty Selwood altered all that. She was a little woman, as bright-looking as her brother, but very deaf. She took a fancy to Bab, because, as she said, while having plenty of conversation, Bab was still agreeably quiet. Bab, listening to Miss Selwood's replies at random to her remarks, wondered often what she was supposed to have said. But perhaps Bab's eyes and quick smile spoke for her.

There, too, sometimes came the little sallow-faced children from No. 17. They were as quiet and mouse-like as Miss Patty could desire, and played with the toys provided for them with an almost unnatural gravity.

"You see, they are not like English children yet," Bab would say, with the eyes of a mother. "They remained rather longer than they ought in India—those poor things dreaded so much parting with them. But they are really growing quite wild. Now the fine weather is coming we shall get some roses in their cheeks."

Further than the fine weather Bab did not venture to look. She had been a London bird through many Julys and Augusts and Septembers; and she knew how even robust children wither in the airless heat.

Miss Patty Selwood was always sending round chicken jelly, and calves'-foot jelly, and cod-liver oil, and all manner of things for the children, which Mrs. Williamson accepted gratefully as from a very old friend. But they did not seem to do much good. "They want air and light, air and light," said Dr. (who was now Sir Peter) Drummond, and lived in Harley Street, and sometimes came to see his old friend and patient. "Put them in the air and the sun, and they'll thrive without coddling." But that was just the one prescription so impossible to carry out.

It was coming up to Bab's birthday, which occurred about the end of May. Bab had been a great deal with Mr. Selwood during the preceding winter, and while the east winds of spring forbade even the thought of the hope the doctor held out that when the weather was balmy the old gentleman might be got out on his balcony for a few hours every day.

Some people in Mrs. Williamson's position might have grumbled at Bab spending so many hours with a sick old man who could pay for companionship or any other services he required; but not so the little woman. If Bab helped to smooth the last stages of the old man's journey, her mother was far too good a lover of God's creatures to forbid her. So Bab, unrebuked, did for old Mr. Selwood just what neither his sister nor his attendant could do for him; she read to him with the soft, educated voice and accent he desired to hear, she made music for him—a piano stood in a recess of the room—she played chess and draughts with him; he liked the bright glances, the head shy and bright as a squirrel's, opposite to him. At times, when he was not disposed for music or reading or games, Bab talked to him. He was quite in her confidence. There was hardly a thought of her innocent heart which he did not know.

A short time before that May birthday Mr. Selwood had a rare conversation with his sister Patty. Cotter had gone to welcome his son home from the Cape; and since Bab had transferred her ministrations to Mrs. Patten, who was suffering from asthma, the brother and sister were alone.

"Little Bab has been very good to me," Mr. Selwood wrote on the slate.

"Like a daughter, James," shouted Miss Patty. "Indeed, few daughters would be so good and so quiet. Even when she plays the piano, she does it quietly."

"Her birthday is approaching."

"We must give her something very handsome, James."

"I mean to. I want to give her The Lawns.

"That old house! What would the child do with it?"

"There would be room for those children."

"Aye, so there would. There is another batch coming home at Michaelmas. I met Mrs. Williamson yesterday. She gave me the letter to read, and I could see she was worried, though she smiled. I wanted to ask Bab about it. Her mother has no conversation. There would be room for forty of them in The Lawns."

"The place would be no use to Walter and Sydney. It is so out of the way that the rent would be very little. If it lay untenanted, now that Miss Deane is dead, it would go to rack and ruin. We were born there. I should like to think of Bab in the old rooms."

"You are quite right, brother. It is a very happy idea. We are both old folk, and we may take liberties with our friends. I shall give Babbie fifty pounds towards the furnishing."

"Bravo, sister."

"I often wish that I had nephews and nieces to whom my money was of some importance. I should like to tip needy boys, and give pretty things to girls who would else do without. Walter's and Sydney's children have everything."

"It is a disadvantage easily borne," replied Mr. Selwood, not troubling to write the remark on the slate.

"Better do it now than when we are dead," shouted Miss Patty.

"Write a note to Soames, and ask him to dine with me one evening. I shall want a deed of gift drawn out"

"Anything else, brother?"

"The Williamsons have their house for three years longer. They must go to The Lawns at once. I am going to buy up that side of the Gardens. I shall arrange for them to sublet. Soames will see to it."

"You are a good man, brother. You don't do things by halves.

"We should not be so rich if I and my father before me had not looked at every side of a question."

But the remark was addressed to the air, not to Miss Patty. Mr. Selwood had had enough of the slate, and was already wondering how long Mrs. Patten's selfishness would keep Bab from his side.

CHAPTER V.

THE DEED OF GIFT.

MRS. WILLIAMSON had, indeed, been somewhat fretted and anxious on the day when she had met Miss Selwood, and the spinster's bright, keen eyes had discovered her perturbation.

With little Eric, and three of Cis's children, and four of Audrey's, and two of Alice's, it was an uncommonly tight fit already at No. 17, Malplaquet Gardens. How, then, was it going to accommodate four of Dolly's? Yet where else should the children go except to their own Gran? If it came to Mrs. Williamson herself sleeping in the basement of the house—and it had almost come to that—the new little brood must be received.

There never were such comforts to their mother as Phyllis and Bab, the mother declared gratefully. Most girls would have grumbled at their house being turned into a nursery on a large scale, and themselves crushed into very cramped quarters. The sisters shared a long, narrow slip of a room, so dark except in very bright weather that it was next to impossible to see a pretty head in the glass or to make one's toilet other than by the sense of touch.

Yet the girls never grumbled. They had been taught to make their own clothes. Now they postponed their pretty things for the making of childish garments, with the assistance of the couple of nurses provided for the children by their parents.

But it seemed as though even Phyllis's and Bab's spirits were daunted by the suggestion of yet another nurse and four more babies. Where were they to be put, they asked, with the house already full to overflowing? Mrs. Williamson stood helpless before her daughters, only faltering, "Poor Dolly!" But at the appeal in her eyes Bab's tender heart melted.

"Never mind, dear," she said, "we will squeeze them in somehow. And meanwhile we must look for that commodious country house to which we are bound to migrate as soon as we are free of Mr. Jones and this house."

Mrs. Williamson was brighter for the rest of the day. She had been feeling that it was hardly fair to her own two young daughters to burden them with their sisters' children more heavily than they were already burdened.

The parents sent home all they could spare from somewhat narrow incomes, yet there were times when the children needed something or other that had to be paid for out of the grandmother's purse. The little woman had had to be careful all those years.

"'It is going to be good.'"—p. 200.

However, the preparations for the children's coming had not to be made yet awhile. They could still enjoy what Bab humorously called the space and freedom of their own house. By-and-by it would be time to think whether the drawing-room had not better be given up as a day nursery. Such a thing was imperatively required, even without the new arrivals, for one could count on many and many a winter day when it would be impossible to get the delicate children out-of-doors.

Bab's birthday brought a day of June strayed into May. She found the breakfast table decorated with roses. That had been Mrs. Patten's graceful thought; and a basket of strawberries big as little apples, fresh from Covent Garden, stood in the centre of the table.

Packages from India and China had been arriving these last few days, and had been confiscated by Mrs. Williamson till the happy morning should arrive. Now they flanked Bab's plate, and made the children's eyes round with wonder.

The packages contained delightful things—an embroidered sash, a finely wrought bangle of rough red gold, a necklet of silver filigree set with barbaric stones, a waist-belt of wrought silver, and a little sandalwood desk fitted in ivory.

Lady Caird had sent a pearl necklet, with a hanging heart of turquoise and pearl. She was always generous to her god-daughter.

The children had each laid their little, simple, trumpery offering by Bab's plate. It was delightful to see the shy excitement of those present when their special gift was reached, and Bab blushed with joy over it.

There was a Spanish mantilla and fan from Pat. Mrs. Williamson had drawn on her own scanty store of jewellery, much depleted, for a gift for her girl. It was a tiny brooch of garnets and seed-pearls, with a crystal space for hair in the centre—a little thing Bab had loved since the time she used to sit on her mother's hearthrug, a tiny red-headed baby, and turn over her mother's trinkets quietly for an hour at a time.

"Now for my present," said Phyllis, getting up and opening the door.

A Dandy Dinmont puppy, a mass of iron-grey hair and bright eyes, rushed frantically into the room.

"You sweetest creature!" cried Bab in ecstasy. "I could have liked nothing better, Phyllis."

Then Mrs. Williamson had to interfere, because the children had all left their porridge to grow cold while they crowded about the dog, who was in his new owner's arms.

"His name is Rags," said Phyllis. "He is awfully well bred. Mr. Knights gave him to me, because Monica has done so well at her music with me. I asked him to keep him for a few weeks till your birthday; and he promised to send a servant over from Holland Park with him this morning, and here he is!"

"Children, children," protested Mrs. Williamson, "everything is getting cold. You mustn't open anything else, Bab, till you have had your breakfast. The other things will keep."

"I think I have opened everything," said Bab, still hugging Rags, "except that blue envelope, which looks as if it would keep."

"Mr. Selwood has forgotten you this year," said Phyllis.

"I don't think he ever forgets," said Bab. "Not that I want anything from him but his love; he has given me such heaps of things. I'm sure anyone less nice than Mrs. Walter and Mrs. Sydney, and May and Roma, and Pauline and Agnes, would be downright jealous of his giving me so many things. But all the Selwoods are nice."

"Come, my dear, eat your breakfast," said her mother. "Rags will keep. Here are your strawberries. Ring for some more tea, Phil. We can't have Bab drinking cold tea on her nineteenth birthday."

Presently Bab had had her breakfast, and the children had been reclaimed by their nurses, and the pretty things had been fingered over again, Bab blushing and smiling, and a little tearful—as was her wont when she felt the goodness of her world to her.

She had heaped the things over her blue envelope, and had forgotten all about it; but presently when she began to gather them to take upstairs she discovered the derelict.

"Why, here's that letter!" she cried to her mother, who sat watching her with a tender pride. "It looks like a tremendous bill; but people oughtn't to have bills on their birthdays, and, besides, as I've never had any money, I don't owe any; and——"

"Just open it, my dear, and see," suggested Mrs. Williamson. "I daresay it's only a circular."

"That it isn't," said Bab. "There's a letter of some kind in it as well as another document. What is it all about? 'Messrs. Soames and Supple, Lincoln's Inn Fields.' Oh, I don't think it can be for me."

Phyllis came and leant over her shoulder.

"Dear Madam" (she read), "We are instructed by our esteemed client, Mr. James Selwood, to hand to you the enclosed deed of gift, by which he makes over to you the manor and lands of The Lawns, Oakdene, unconditionally. It is our client's wish that you should live in the house, but, as the deed is an unconditional one, you are, of course, not bound by it.—We are, madam, your very obedient servants, SOAMES AND SUPPLE: per J. S."

The mother and daughters stood and stared at each other, Bab looking almost scared.

"Oh, mother, what does it mean?" she asked, looking at the document in her hand.

"I think it means, dear," replied Mrs. Williamson in a shaking voice, "that the country house has come. The only thing I am doubtful about is whether we have any right to accept so handsome a gift from Mr. Selwood. Suppose we go round and talk to him about it?"

They had to wait a little while to see Mr. Selwood, for the doctor had actually given permission that morning for the patient to be moved on to the balcony.

When, at last, they were admitted there was Mr. Selwood sitting propped up on his sofa, with the balmy wind stirring his soft, white hair, and the thrush singing scarcely a yard away from him. He had a great bouquet in his hands, as big as a cart-wheel, which he presented ceremoniously to Bab. He looked very pleased and very shy at once, in anticipation of Bab's thanksgiving.

"Many happy returns, young lady," he said, after greeting Bab's mother.

"Oh, Mr. Selwood," began the latter, "I and this child have come to thank you. But it is really too much. I'm afraid Bab hardly ought to accept so much, even from a friend so kind as you."

"Stuff and nonsense, ma'am!" said the old gentleman, with a great frown. "A ruinous old house. Wait till you see it, and then maybe you'll be asking me to pay Bab rent for living in it. It's gone to rack and ruin because no one would ever consent to live in it who could live anywhere else. But there'll be plenty of rooms for your babies. And it stands high, you can see five counties from the upper windows. Where's my sister Patty? Patty, where's the slate? Ah, here it is?"

He scratched away furiously for a minute or two, and then handed the slate to his sister, who had meanwhile been greeting Mrs. Williamson and Bab in the warmest way, and shouting congratulations into Bab's little pink ear as though she were a deaf person.

When she had read her brother's message she immediately rubbed it out with great indignation.

"Stuff and nonsense!" she repeated in her turn. "What, not take The Lawns! Why, James and I were born there. It's only a handful of a place, though a fine roomy house. No one wants to live there. We let an old pensioner of ours have it for nothing, but she's died out of it, and now it's on our hands. My stuck-up nephews and nieces will have nothing to say to it. Too lonely, they say. Will you oblige James and me to go there, and cut ourselves off from our family, at our age?"

"You know, we have our house for three years longer," Mrs. Williamson put in to Mr. Selwood.

"No, you haven't, ma'am," he said, scowling. "I'm your landlord, and I'm going to evict you. What! You didn't know? I've bought up all that side of the Gardens. No use leaving it in the hands of needy folk like Jones, who'll only let the place get lower and lower. I'll evict you, ma'am. Perhaps then you won't turn up your nose at The Lawns, when you haven't got a roof over your and those children's heads."

"Oh, but Mr. Selwood——" began Mrs. Williamson in protest.

"Besides, it isn't you, ma'am, it's the little one. What do you say, Bab? Come here, and give me a kiss. You won't refuse your old friend's loving gift to you?"

"You are too good to us," cried Mrs. Williamson, in tears.

"And here's my sister trying to get in a word while you're making so much noise you can't hear her. She has a little gift for Bab in her pocket. Now say no more, you've offended me enough for one day. Here is something to drink Bab's health. Too early in the day? Well, you can just put your lips to it Queen Victoria drank it. What the Queen drank must be good. Cotter, you rascal, the corkscrew!"

Meanwhile Miss Patty had folded Bab's fingers over an envelope.

"To buy carpets and curtains with, my dear," she said. "The house is as airy as a windmill, and there's hardly any furniture in it. I don't want you all to get your deaths of cold. There, there, what a sensible woman that mother of yours is! I knew I should persuade her. You see, James hadn't to say a word."

Then they all stood round in solemn silence, and put their lips to their glasses while Mr. Selwood gave the toast of Bab, her health and happiness, and her future residence at The Lawns.

Afterwards Bab and Mrs. Williamson went home, much agitated. And then Bab suggested that they should take all the children to Richmond Park for the day and give them a picnic.

For that one day Mrs. Williamson would not think of extravagance; and what a golden day it was! They took the whole party by train, and at Richmond station hired carriages to carry them to the park. It was Bab's feast; so Bab and her mother, who were in the last carriage, stopped at the Maid of Honour shop, and laid in the most delightful hamper of sweet and substantial things.

It was a day the children would never forget. They spread their tablecloth beneath the trees at a point of vantage whence they could see the silver Thames winding away into its Berkshire valley. And the deer came near and watched them. The birds sang; and the ground was all dappled light and shade, like the sleek hides of the deer. They feasted and they played; and some colour came into the children's thin cheeks and stayed there.

It was only late in the evening, after all the sleepy heads were in bed, that Bab remembered how she had never found time through that delightful day to thank Mrs. Patten for her strawberries and roses.

"I shall run round the first thing after breakfast, in the morning," she said, "and tell her all our news. I wouldn't seem to neglect her, especially as she has been so ill lately. How she will miss us when we go to The Lawns!"

Bab already said the name with the air of ownership.

"Her daughter should come over and see after her. She really should," said Mrs. Williamson, who had such happy experience of daughters that she could not imagine one who was cold and careless.

And then Phyllis came in, and they sat long over a more than usually elaborate supper, discussing chiefly what arrangement was to be made about Phyllis, who could not think of giving up her pupils; but arriving at no very satisfactory conclusion regarding the matter.

CHAPTER VI.

AIMÉE.

MRS. PATTEN'S Kate opened the door to Bab the next morning with the most beaming expression, which for an instant rather mystified Bab.

Then, looking beyond Kate, she saw that the hall, which was usually a very tidy and decorated place, with its Indian hangings and pieces of Benares ware, was now full of rather shabby and untidy luggage, of which several upright wooden cases formed a part. A glimpse of a folding easel gave her enlightenment.

"Oh, so Mrs. Patten's daughter has come home," she said.

"Why, however did you know, Miss Bab?" asked Kate, with wide eyes. "Yes, indeed, she have come home. And the mistress is as happy as happy. Who'd have thought she missed Miss Aimée so much all this time? But there, wait till you see her! I declare she have transformed the mistress already. Yes, miss, she can breathe much more freely to-day, and is to sit in the drawin'-room. The doctor, he says the fine weather, but I says Miss Aimée. Asking your pardon for not wishin' you many happy returns of the day, wot was yesterday. Just step in and wait, miss."

Bab went into the drawing-room, which she found full of Mrs. Patten's dogs. As though they fancied she might consider herself uncivilly treated, they all came and sat round her in chairs, which made Bab burst into laughter. However, the dogs had heard a movement overhead, and, instead of being offended by her want of gravity, wagged their tails very hard, and listened with all their ears.

In a second or two the door opened and Mrs. Patten came in, leaning a little heavily on the arm of a young lady whom Bab guessed to be Aimée.

"Ah, Babbie, my dear," said Mrs. Patten, kissing her on both cheeks. "You are come to share in my joy. How little I knew what your birthday would bring for me! This is my Aimée, my dear daughter.'

She dropped into a chair, lifting her hands and eyes in a manner with which Bab was long familiar.

Bab looked a little shyly at Aimée, who responded by a frank glance of admiration at her.

"I am very glad you have come home," she said, in her soft, low voice. "Your mother has needed you."

"Ah, yes," said Aimée. "I did not know. Why did you not let me know, my friend? Did you think, then, that your little Aimée was altogether heartless?"

She had an arm about her mother's neck. Bab's first impression was that she was extraordinarily French. Her soft grey gown fitted her as though she were moulded into it. Bab wondered how it was fastened. Her second impression was that Aimée was extraordinarily pretty. She had a little head of black curls, and eyes of a vivid pansy blue. Her complexion was a soft warm white. She had a delightful little cocked nose, and a full white chin. The poise of her head had something graceful and vivacious about it like the poise of a bird's.

"I came to thank you so very much, dear Mrs. Patten, for your kind thought of me yesterday," said Bab, very conscious of Aimée's direct gaze. "Now, I must not stay. Mother will be so glad to hear that Miss Patten has come home."

"Tell her to come in and see me. I've told you about her, Aimée—the old woman that lives in a shoe, you know. Not that your dear mother is an old woman, Bab, oh, but certainly not! I've called her that from the first day. I want to show her my Aimée. To think that it is more than fourteen years since she left me!"

"Hold your tongue, little mother," said Aimée. "The child will think me an ancient. I was little when I went."

"So little, but such a spitfire!" Mrs. Patten's voice rose and fell. "And now she is a success, an exhibitor at the Salon, quite a famous person."

"Are you full of affairs, very busy?" asked Aimée, coming and standing by Bab. "Oh, please, are you?"

Bab wondered what Aimée could be pleading about, but Aimée's mother enlightened her.

"She wants to paint you, Bab," she said. "It is just the old Aimée, a mass of impulses. Must it be now, my daughter?"

"Now, now," said Aimée, "if she can only give me an hour. I will fetch my things in an instant. Oh, pray do not move. Your head against the trellis of green leaves. It is just so I want you. If I could not get you now, the inspiration would be lost for ever."

So Bab found herself, to her amazement—Kate having taken a message to her mother—sitting for her portrait to a girl whose existence she had forgotten an hour ago.

Mrs. Patten sat and read the morning newspapers. She was a great woman for being in touch with the events of her day. But more often than not her eyes were on her daughter instead of on the printed page. The air of the room was full of a subdued happiness. Now and again a dog thumped his tail to show that he felt sympathy with his human friends. A bee buzzed about the mignonette on the balcony. Out in the sunny garden one or two white butterflies flitted over the pinched roses, which were all Malplaquet Gardens could produce.

Aimée painted energetically, walking all the time between the picture and the door to get the point of view.

"It is going to be good," she said at last.

"In the old days, Aimée," her mother reminded her, "you always said at first that things were going to be good, but later on you were in despair over them."

"I am so to-day, maman. It is the hunger of the artist. I am incredulous when they tell me I have done well. There is always the hope, and always—always—the despair. I would give my life to paint as De Courcel paints, splashing the brush on—so—to the canvas. But ah, dear heaven, what an effect! What life, what a soul! The picture speaks to you."

Suddenly Aimée flung down her brush and covered her face with her hands.

Before Bab and Mrs. Patten could do more than look at each other in alarm, she had uncovered her eyes again and dashed away a bright tear or two.

"There!" she said. "I rejoice that there are such painters in the world, though I am not fit to touch the hem of their garments!"

"Miss Williamson's sister is also an artist—a musician," said Mrs. Patten, anxious to create a diversion. But Aimée was painting away feverishly having apparently forgotten her agitation.

"She should come to Paris," she said. "You can't paint here. There are no skies, no light. She should come to Paris. It is the place for artists."

"Phyllis will be so very glad to meet you," said Bab, shyly.

"Tell her she must come to Paris, she must come to Paris," muttered Aimée, standing back to see the effect of a stroke of her brush.

She came up to Bab then, and, taking her head in both hands, composed the position to her liking. Then she placed a great pot of purple and white iris by Bab's side, to reach about the level of her small ear.

"Talk, talk!" she said. "I want to get you animated."

"Tell us about your birthday yesterday, and about all your presents," said Mrs. Patten.

"I," murmured Aimée, as though to herself, "have long ceased to remember birthdays."

"Kate told me how she saw your little party going off so happily," went on Mrs. Patten. "You gave the children a day in the country! In a happier state of the laws people with children will be compelled to live in the country."

"Ah!" said Bab, her eyes sparkling, "I wanted to tell you. They are going to have the country. How they will thrive in it!"

She then proceeded to unfold the story of Mr. Selwood's gift in a silence only broken by the "Good, good!" of Aimée, as she approved of Bab's animated countenance, and now and again an imperious little command to put her head more to one side.

"I am so glad," said Mrs. Patten in her most lamenting voice, "so very glad! It is what any of us would have done, if we could. Fortunately, Mr. Selwood is rich. Sixteen rooms, you say? But, Babbie, how are you going to furnish sixteen rooms?"

"That is a trifle," said Bab. "Or at least, we needn't think of it yet. We are going as soon as ever we can fix up things here. We long to get the children into the country for the summer. We don't want to lose any of it for them. Of course, it will be sad to leave our dear friends here. We shall be very grieved at leaving you, Mrs. Patten."

"But you won't be leaving me, child: I shall be leaving you. Oh, yes, I am going with Aimée. It is what I should have done long ago. How I have suffered here, amid these fogs and melancholies, especially since I grew too old for the journey to Paris! Ah, it is new life to think of being there! I shall have no more rheumatism, no more asthma. Aimée and I will take care of each other."

After that Mrs. Patten became thoughtful. She let the papers slip off her lap. There was a little table at her elbow with the Spectator and Guardian on it, with one or two of the monthly reviews and a little knitting basket. She drew the basket towards her and began to knit, her eyes on her daughter as she painted.

"I am going to ask Mr. Selwood to take this house off my hands," she said at last. "I hear he is buying up all about us."

"Better be quick, maman! I do not want to be here past July. There is a cottage at Barbizon where thou and I—— Ah!"—a low "Ah" of ecstasy. "We shall see the golds of August there. But what of the furniture? Shall you sell it?"

"Not that, Aimée. It has lived with me so long. I should as soon think of selling the dogs almost."

"You must put it away, then; do something with it. We shall not be able to carry it. It is monstrous in design."

She looked around contemptuously at the solid early Victorian furniture with which the room was filled.

"It was your papa's choice, Aimée."

The girl gave a little shrug of her shoulders.

"Of a certainty it was not from him I received my artistic inclinations," she said.

"I have thought it all out," said Mrs. Patten, dropping her knitting upon the papers that had slid away from her. "We shall come here no more, Aimée. The furniture is of no use to us. To store it would be useless expense. And there are those sixteen rooms. It shall be Bab's birthday gift. What do you say, Bab? It is comfortable and well made, if my daughter does not approve of it."

"It is ugly," said Aimée indifferently. "I myself—I should burn it. It is not right to bring up children with ugly objects about them. Still, if you have a sentiment about burning or selling, someone must have it. Even those chairs and tables will not make Babbie's head less glorious."

"I shall see about it at once," said Mrs. Patten, with great animation. "Why should we stay an hour longer than we need? To-morrow may be east wind, and I shall not be able to breathe."

"Mamma——" began Bab.

Mrs. Patten rang a bell by her chair to summon the maid.

"I shall ask her to come in at once and talk it over. But I can't believe that she will need any persuasion to help an old friend out of a difficulty. Ah, no! I cannot believe it of so dear and self-sacrificing a disposition."

It was her way of putting the matter to Mrs. Williamson; and the little woman, between laughing and crying, found herself accepting, on Bab's behalf, Mrs. Patten's furniture for Mr Selwood's house.

"The things will be like old friends," said she. "I always think new furniture so blank-looking."

"I am so glad you will house them," said Mrs. Patten. "Aimée would be ruthless. She would commit them to the flames."

"With all uglinesses," said Aimée.

"Oh, I am very glad to save them from that fate," said Mrs. Williamson. "I think them beautiful. Such comfortable things."

She patted the chair on which she sat as though she were grateful to it for the rest it afforded her.

The sitting had extended itself to two hours, and Bab, in spite of her excitement, began to look a little tired, so Aimée graciously permitted her to rest. In the interval Mrs. Williamson asked to be allowed to look at the portrait. In her own mind she thought it smudgy and indistinct; and surely Bab's hair was never so red, and the shaking leaves in the trellis never so green! In her heart of hearts she preferred the early Victorian portraits which Aimée had turned with their faces to the wall, as being impossible to live with, on first entering the house.

"There, there!" said Aimée, waving her away. "The picture is not meant to be smelt. I'm not rude, madame, in saying so. It was the saying of a very great man."

After that the only hindrance to their going was the portrait, for Aimée declared it was to be her masterpiece, even while she wept tears of rage over it.

She grew very fond of her neighbours, though she was so much older than Phyllis and Bab, not merely in temperament and knowledge of the world, but in years as well. Indeed, Bab had discovered long since that there were little fine networks of lines about Aimée's pansy-coloured eyes, and that the pretty, dark curls had a grey hair here and there. Not that it made her less pretty. Bab felt ashamed of her discovery, seeing how pretty and how charming Aimée was.

The frank comradeship, without sentimentality, which was Aimée's way of friendship, was given freely to Phyllis and Bab.

At first she was all for Phyllis throwing up her music lessons, and going with her mother and herself to Paris, to their flat near the Madeleine. How alluringly she painted the splendour of the free, full, artistic life Paris afforded the artist!

But when she was told of Sidney Le Mesurier she urged her plan no more.

"Ah," she said, "a lover, a husband! The life of an artist has no room for such things. You may make yourself happy so, my little Phyllis. You will never be an artist!"

CHAPTER VII.

THE NEW HOME.

IF Sidney Le Mesurier has not come into the story before, it is perhaps because he was a very modest person, never thrusting himself forward till he was wanted, and so busy with his profession that if he could find time once a week to visit his sweetheart at Malplaquet Gardens, it was as much as he could do.

He was house-surgeon at the moment to a very overworked, overcrowded East End hospital, where accidents came in constantly, and the casualty wards were always filled to overflowing.

There did not seem to be very much prospect of an early marriage between him and Phyllis, and they had already been engaged a long time. But it would have taken a mother more worldly minded than Mrs. Williamson to try to part them. The pair had a staid, quiet devotion for each other which was like the love of husband and wife, if not altogether so contented. And Mrs. Williamson had said many a time that she hardly missed a son of her own, having Sid. It was such a good thing that he was not to be snatched away from them to the ends of the earth, like the other sons-in-law. He was Mrs. Williamson's right hand, to be consulted about everything, his keen, sensible advice to be taken about everything.

When he was told of Bab's birthday gifts, and the question came up of what was to be done about Phyllis, he arranged it in the twinkling of an eye. Phyllis had better lodge in the house of an old lady he knew and could trust with so precious a charge. Sid would not let her be lonely; and she must come home to The Lawns for holidays.

Phyllis accepted his decision, as she would have if he had ordered her to the block, with shining eyes. Of course, she could not have gone to Paris, or even to The Lawns, since it would have meant leaving Sid lonely in London.

By-and-by, when the happiest thing in the world had come to pass, Sid meant to walk the Paris hospitals for a couple of years; and then Phyllis could devote herself to her music, and peep into Aimée's world of art, and taste the delights of which that vivacious person discoursed so ecstatically.

However, that time still seemed far enough away. The morning when Mrs. Williamson and Bab and all the children left London for Oakdene Sid had managed to get an hour or two to himself, so that he might be at the station with Phyllis to see them off, and to escort her afterwards to the white house with the green shutters, in a district of North London where there were still gardens, despite the crowding and pressing of the human hive.

It was Tuesday, and things were to be somewhat in order by Saturday evening, when Phyllis and Sid were to come down for the week-end.

Tears were in Mrs. Williamson's kind eyes as the train steamed out of the station.

"Poor children!" she said, as much to herself as to Bab; "poor, poor children!"

"They are all right," said Bab, happily. "You know Phyllis would rather have Sid, with his uncertain prospects, than any other lot the world could afford her. Still, I don't see why they shouldn't marry. We could give them a wing of The Lawns, and they could do just as they are doing now; but, of course, they would feel happier being married."

Bab looked unutterably wise as she said it, and Mrs. Williamson, who was blest with a keen sense of humour, smiled to herself quietly.

"Why, so we could, Bab," she said. "I wonder now if they would think of it?"

"Of course, they would like to set up a home of their own; still, they could wait for that, and it would be nice to feel that they belonged to each other. Phil thinks now that she can go on waiting indefinitely since they care for each other. Yet as time goes on she will feel it."

"Poor little Phil!" said the mother, compassionately. "I do hope that the waiting will not be so long as to wear out her patience."

They had augmented the domestic staff—which, apart from the nurses, had hitherto consisted only of the faithful Susan—by a patient of Sid's, a little, pale-faced, bright-eyed woman with a head of shock hair and a thin, bent figure. Now and again she looked towards Mrs. Williamson, from her seat at the far end of the railway carriage, with the alert affectionate glance of a pet dog. Rebecca was what is called a superior person; and had come very low in the world before the day when Dr. Le Mesurier first saw her crushed and bleeding from the effects of a cab accident in the Commercial Road.

She did not look the kind of person who would be acceptable in the ordinary British household. There was something a little mad about the over-bright eyes, the oddly bleached complexion, the nervous movements of the muscles about the mouth, and of the little claw-like hands in their gentility of shabby kid gloves.

But Dr. Le Mesurier had been interested, and had enlisted Mrs. Williamson's ready sympathy. Rebecca was engaged as cook, and the sensible Susan fortunately took up the queer little forlorn, uppish waif of humanity, and was prepared to stand by her and see that she wasn't laughed at, at least before her face, by those nurses."

"It's like a home-coming," said Rebecca, the day after Mrs. Williamson had engaged her, "and, my dear lady, I was led. I've been stimulating about the world for this hour, and the instant I laid eyes on Dr. Le Mesurier I knew he would be my guide. The heart is the groundwork, and if the heart is right all else is right; and I'll never leave you, my dear lady, not if things were ever so."

Saying which she imprinted three hard little kisses, as though from the beak of a bird, on Mrs. Williamson's hand.

"I do hope she will be efficient, dear," said Mrs. Williamson to Bab, "for I am sure I should never have the heart to send her away if she insisted on staying."

"She'll be all right," Bab responded cheerfully. "Sid is a good judge of character, and Sid says she's thorough."

"Ah, but how can he tell about her cooking?" said Mrs. Williamson doubtfully.

"Never mind, dear," Bab laughed. "I'm sure she'll be all right. I wonder how you managed in the old days, when you were the mistress of a houseful of servants? When you had to give notice, did you do it by letter? And did you tremble when you heard the postman's rat-tat-tat, with the fatal missive for Cook or Jane or Ann, as the case might be?"

"It was a great ordeal," confessed Mrs. Williamson, between a smile and a sigh

However, a few days sufficed to prove that Rebecca was a great find, for not only was she an excellent cook, but she had a nervous energy which impelled her to work all day and a considerable portion of the night. She was likely to be invaluable in the move from the one house to the other and the getting the new house into order.

They arrived at Oakdene about noon, and at The Lawns a quarter of an hour later

They found their new estate on the edge of a very pretty village, which embowered itself in trees that had not yet lost the colours of the spring. When they drove up to the green gate with the white posts, which formed the entrance to The Lawns, Bab noticed the first thing how a few rosy blossoms yet lingered on the apple boughs that hung over the white walls, blossoms side by side with tiny green apples fully formed.

It was her first sight of her new possession. Susan had gone down the day before to receive Mrs. Patten's furniture, which had been sent on so that they would not come into an empty house.

They could see the house windows over a tangle of boughs above the high wall, and beyond the overgrown little carriage way which the green gates standing open revealed. There was a delightful scent of new hay in the air, and blackbirds and thrushes were singing ecstatically.

"It is a red house," said Bab, "with a tiled roof. And such quaint windows! But oh, it does look neglected."

"We shall soon set that to rights," said her mother, quietly cheerful.

"Why, so we shall. Just hear how the birds sing! And look at those children, how they stare! They have never seen real English country before. Ah, and here comes Susan! I can see she has been scrubbing since cock-crow. Why, we have neighbours! See, mother dear, there is a red house just like ours on this side, and over beyond the wall on the other side among the trees I am sure I see chimney-pots."

"I knew we had one next-door neighbour," said Mrs. Williamson. "That must be Mr. Grayson's house. Mr. Selwood mentioned that an elderly gentleman and lady lived quite close to us. He said we should not find them troublesome neighbours."

"Of course, I remember. It was there Susan was to get the key. I fancied it was somewhere in the village, at the post-office or something."

They had now traversed the little carriage-way on foot, leaving Susan to carry in the small articles of luggage, with the assistance of the couple of coachmen and the two nurses, and a stout woman, with her sleeves rolled up above her elbows and a strong smell of soapsuds about her, who had followed Susan out of the house. Rebecca had entered the house by the open hall door while they stood staring about them, and emerged in an incredibly short space of time bearing a jug of rich-looking milk for the children, with a couple of goblets to drink it from.

The children, who had stood silent from excess of agitation, wondering at the unfamiliar surroundings, presently scattered in charge of the youngest nurse to explore the overgrown gardens, while a meal was being got ready for them by the indefatigable Rebecca.

Overgrown! It was overgrown. The gravelled walks were almost indistinguishable from the grass plots. Roses and creepers trailed from the walls and lay forlornly among the weeds with which the ragged, box-bordered beds were filled. Thistles and dandelions had sown themselves freely. Briars sprawled quite at home among the peonies and the pansies. The once velvet lawns from which the place had its name were now prairies of coarse grass; nettles and docks grew up to the house walls. The boughs of the trees were tangled and matted as the result of long neglect. Even the hall door steps had their little colony of weeds growing in the interstices.

"I don't mind dirt and neglect in the country," said Bab courageously. "In the country they are romantic."

"Wait till you see this 'ere 'ouse, Miss Bab," said Susan at her elbow. "Such dirt I never see! And that old party Mr. Selwood kep' in it, a perfect impojition! Mrs. Belson and myself—she's a good working woman for country—'as been cleaning out somewheres to lay your 'eads to-night, to say nothing of them blessed children. I hope 'tisn't finding it rheumantic they'll be, after all the slooshin' of water. Though I can't think o' them with rheumantics, nor any other kind of antics, seeing as how they're too good to live, as the sayin' goes, bless their little 'arts!"

"I don't suppose they'll be long so," laughed Bab, who felt light-hearted enough to fall in with Susan and vanquish the old enemies of dirt and disorder. "Why, I believe they are positively shouting! That was little Douglas—was it not?—that tiny shriek of joy. You'll be wishing presently for the happy days when they were good and quiet."

"That I shall not, Miss Bab," said Susan. "For, although a single woman, I expect nothing more than nature, and I don't 'old with quiet ways in children—that I don't."

They were by this time in one of the long rooms of the ground floor, where the furniture which had come the day before stood about in a helpless, disorganised kind of way. At one end Susan's assistant had been scrubbing, and the smell of soap strove with the atmosphere of a house long shut up and uncared for.

A French window was open at the far end, and Bab went towards it.

"It's picnicking day to-day, Miss Bab," Susan said, in explanation of the table standing outside the window, with knives and forks and a tea-tray laid upon it on a white cloth, and a large white cloth upon the grass beside it. "And if I were you and the mistress I'd just sit down there and wait for the eggs and bacon and the cup of tea Rebecca is making for you this minute. For trouble's a thing that'll keep; and, deary me, this house is a trouble to a clean art."

The simple meal was hugely enjoyed. At this garden side of the house they were out of sight of the straw and litter of the furniture vans, which added a squalid town detail to the neglect by which wild Nature had regained her own.

The grass had to be beaten flat to make banqueting couches for the little children as they sat to their meal. It was so beautiful in itself this grass, all grey and brown, its million seeds hanging like the spray of a fountain, that Bab thought quite regretfully of the necessity of having it cut down. But a meadow had no business to be springing up in a garden, and so it would have to go.

"I daresay we shall find garden tools somewhere," she said to her mother, "and, if not, we must only borrow them from the gentleman next door."

"That you won't, Miss Bab," said Susan, who was present during the discussion. "That gentleman you'll never lay eyes on, if you'll believe me. When I called for the key that day—an' me a single elderly woman, ever plain, and not one to set 'arts beating pit-a-pat, as the saying is—that gentleman 'e just glid in the room like a ghost, dropped that there 'ouse-key on the table, and scurried away like any 'are I ever 'eard tell on. I asked the person wot opened the door to me wot was the matter; an' she told me that, although blessed with a missus, that there gentleman is mortal afraid of the female sect. I'm not surprised, looking at the person wot opened the door, for she looked to me a downright cat."

"'You are doing it all wrong, missie.'"—p. 208.

"You mustn't judge people on such slight knowledge, Susan," said her mistress, who had, however—and Susan knew it—a very strong faith in her old servant as a judge of character.

"'Tis only just to let Miss Bab know, ma'am, that to depend on Mr. Grayson is no better than dependence on a broken reed. Wait till we get the 'ouse in order a bit, me an' Rebecca, an' them blessed children out all day long, glory be! and if we don't find some way of clearing off all this rubbish of grass, my name's not Susan Stout. Not that I ever looked to do man's work; but in the country you must do as country does. And that midget of a Rebecca, if she is flighty, is worth a million o' them nurses, for all their bonnet strings! It'll put a bit o' colour in her, maybe, a-shavin' of that grass."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE NEIGHBOUR ON THE LEFT.

HOWEVER, the summer was long to get things into order at the neglected Lawns, and, as Susan had said, it was a blessing that the little ones could be out-of-doors all day, so that the tireless workers would be left to their work.

At first it seemed as though things never could be straight, as it seems with any undertaking of the kind. But, as the days passed, bit by bit order seemed to resolve itself out of chaos.

Fortunately, the house was old and solidly built of the best material money could buy, so that, beyond the neglect and the grime, no great harm was done. In many of the rooms the paper hung in strips from the walls, and where it did not it had become so grey and dingy that Bab, who was queen-regnant, decided it would never do to live with.

Downstairs they had no such difficulty. A dining-room oak-panelled, with a decorated ceiling and a high carved oak mantelpiece; a drawing-room white-panelled, with a faint tracery of cupids amid wreaths of flowers, and cherubs playing the lute and dulcimer—these were good enough for the most exacting tastes.

But the bedrooms were another matter. Part of Miss Selwood's fifty pounds was spent in the plainest wall-paper of pink and apple-green and cheerful yellow. Mrs. Belson, who had helped with the rough work at first, turned out to have a son, Bill, a cripple, who was handy at many things.

Bill undertook to hang the wall-paper for a moderate sum, and did the work very well. When he had taken his ladder and pastepot away, and the rooms were scrubbed out, Bab and her mother put up the curtains they had bought in the piece and made themselves. Indeed, all that summer the hum of the sewing-machine in the house was as incessant as the drone of bees without.

The curtains cost surprisingly little, and when they were up—apple-green curtains for the pink rooms, pink curtains for the green rooms, and plain white for the yellow rooms—they made a world of difference. And when that was all done there was still a goodly slice of Miss Selwood's gift intact.

They had agreed that carpets were almost out of the question. Fortunately, some very grey and indistinguishable floor covering which had been on the rooms when they came, proved—after Rebecca and Susan had taken it on to the grass, and spent many hours with scrubbing brushes and ammonia, soft soap and hot water—to be very good Brussels carpet, of a lily and fern design, which was cheerful and not too ugly.

Some more of the fifty pounds went in covering the nurseries with cork-carpet and curtaining the little beds, besides providing portières and screens against the winter. Bab was her mother's daughter in thinking of the children's comfort first of all.

But when the house was sweet inside, and delightful to look upon outside, with its windows shining, and the pretty curtains stirring in the summer wind, Bab turned her attention to the garden. The wide lawns that stretched away down to a cup of a valley in the near distance must be left for the present. Bab thought that if they were mown for hay it might be worth something; but by the time the house was habitable funds were very low, and must remain low till Mrs. Williamson's next remittance came in.

So Bab sighed over the lawns, and over the couple of Kerrys she saw pasturing there for the children in her imagination, and turned away. They must do the things by little and little; and, after all, the milkman in the village supplied them with excellent milk, and the children were thriving beyond their wildest hopes.

The garden, where Bab had begun to clear a little space from the weeds, was bounded on one side by a high red wall, which divided it from Mr. Grayson's demesne. In spite of all the neglect, the fruit trees yet bore, and the wall was hung with cherries, black and red and white, while apricots and peaches were growing big, and the pears, that would not be ripe these three months yet, already seemed too heavy for the boughs to hold them. There were apples and plums espaliered around the choked beds; but the strawberries and raspberries, the currants and gooseberries, were so mixed up with bindweed and all manner of grasses that there was no getting at them.

Perhaps, later on, they might have a man to help them to clear away the jungle; but now hired help was out of the question. It was, of course, a great thing to think that there would be no rent to pay any more; yet the moving had been very expensive, although everyone had been so kind. Presently Bab knew that she would have Susan and Rebecca attempting impossible feats by her side; but meanwhile she must work alone as best she could.

She did discover in an outhouse some rusty garden tools, which Rebecca, by the aid of rags and oil, restored to some measure of efficiency. At first she found the fatigue of stooping at her weeding intolerable; the spade made her hands blister and her back ache, the shears gave her a disjointed feeling about the thumbs and fingers. At first she was in despair, feeling that she would never be able to make practical use of any of the things, and she had the hunger of the true country lover, long condemned to town, to be a gardener.

But as day followed day she found that she could dig a little more, wield the shears with greater freedom, and stoop longer at the weeding without the broken-back feeling she had had at the first.

They were all working out-of-doors by this time—Susan and Rebecca at the grass, Mrs. Williamson at the plots that once were flower-plots round about the house; but Bab had the garden to herself, and she grew to love the solitariness of it.

The garden was not walled all around. The house stood to the north of it. The eastern boundary was the wall that divided it from Mr. Grayson's; but the western was only a fine yew hedge, and to the south a low privet wall left it bare to the beneficent wind and the sun. For all its neglect, the place was sweet and wholesome, too open for dankness and vapours. At the head of her garden, since it sloped, Bab could see the lawns and the fields beyond, and the waving tree-tops of the wood that lined the steep side of the valley.

She had no time to think about her neighbours, nor had she explored the country round about, not even to the extent of walking as far as the coppice through which she could see the chimney-stack of her neighbour on the west.

On Sundays she had her church-going, and the intervals were filled in by letter-writing, for Bab wrote long accounts of all their doings to Mr. Selwood, to Lady Caird, to Aimée, and to all the sisters.

Still, as she went about her work in the garden she sometimes had an idea that eyes were upon her.

The neighbouring house was quite close to theirs, and once or twice, through a break in the trees of Mr. Grayson's garden, she had caught a glimpse of a lady sitting at an upper window. Once she had been almost certain that the lady was crying, and Bab had felt a pang of pity for her, since the bent head in the distance seemed a pretty and demure one, and Bab was fond of elderly ladies.

She had begun to flatter herself that she was making an impression in her little corner of the garden when, one afternoon, as she was staking some pinks, something soft and cool struck her on the ear.

She looked up startled, but there was no one in sight; only on the path beside her lay a most lovely rose, white, with the faintest pink at the heart and just suffusing the lovely petals.

With an exclamation Bab stooped and picked it up. Such a light of pleasure broke over her face that it was a thousand pities the donor could not see it. But there was no donor in view. A blackbird cocked his head knowingly in one of the trees that overhung Mr. Grayson's wall, and looked from his bright eyes as though he could tell her something very interesting; but it was quite obvious that the blackbird had not thrown the rose, since this is not a fairy tale.

Bab pinned the rose in the bosom of her navy-blue working frock, and felt the perfume of it about her all the rest of the day. It was the one rose she could wear, for Bab's red locks did not consort with roses as a general rule. The queer mystery of the thing delighted her, although she had no sentimental dreams of a fairy prince. Indeed, her imagination went no further than a small old gentleman with a skull-cap, whom she had seen from the attic walking about the most exquisitely kept garden she had ever dreamt of.

A few days passed, and nothing happened. Then Bab took it into her head to try to graft the exquisite rose which had been given to her out of the sky on one of the garden roses which had become quite wild.

Bab had seen roses grafted, and went at the operation with a stout heart. She had made the incision, put in the dark red thorn from her beautiful rose, and was binding up the wound, when she had again the sensation of being watched.

She looked up hastily, and saw a mild, old red face looking down at her from the high wall. As their eyes met the face grew pinker, the skull-cap above it was suddenly whisked off, and said the old gentleman:

"You are doing it all wrong, missie."

"Oh, am I?" said Bab, looking dreadfully distressed. "I'm so sorry. I did want to grow roses like the one you gave me."

"The one I gave you?" the gentleman said, growing dark red.

"The one you threw down to me," rejoined Bab, her ingenuous eyes looking straight at him. "Didn't you give it to me, then, or was it an accident? I thought it so kind of you. I have wanted to thank you."

"It was—an accident," said the old gentleman barefacedly. "And so you want to grow roses like that, miss? You are in a great hurry, considering that that garden of yours is poisoning the country with bad weeds! You would hardly believe that that wretched bindweed of yours has come to me somehow underground."

"I'm so sorry," said Bab, looking up with clasped hands. "It's a horrid thing, isn't it?"

"I should say it was," said the old gentleman with heat.

"And so is this thistledown," went on Bab.

"Thistledown is another; but not so bad as bindweed. It's surprising what a lot of poison you have here."

"How you must hate me for injuring your exquisite garden!"

"Not as bad as that," said the old gentleman. "But how do you know my garden is exquisite?"

Bab felt rather ashamed to confess she had peeped.

"I can see it from the attic windows. I can't help that, can I? And it is so lovely!"

"It is our one happiness," said the old gentleman emphatically. "By the way, you'll never clean that garden of yours; and you'll never graft roses."

"Oh, don't say that!" cried Bab. "Won't you—won't you help me?"

But this was rash of Bab, seeing that she had heard of him as so shy and retiring.

"Help you!" he repeated after her. "My goodness, no! I couldn't help you."

And with that he was gone.

It was quite a week before she saw any more of him; and then she looked up again one afternoon to find him staring down at her. This time he did not look so alarmed or so red, and his face wore a look of great determination.

"You'd better let me turn my lazy Tom and his two lads into that garden of yours," he said. "You'll never get it into order. A pack of women! No tools, no knowledge, nothing! Those maids of yours are ruining the turf for ever. Cutting the grass with shears, too! What do they think shears are made for?"

"Who is Tom?" asked Bab in surprise. "And why should he be turned into my garden?"

"Because he's a lazy rascal, and has nothing to do in mine: he pretends to be my gardener. Because your garden is a great affliction to me, and has gone very near to driving me out of the country. Only for my poor wife——"

"Has it really?" asked Bab, conscience-stricken. "I hope that will soon be a thing of the past. The bindweed now——"

"Pooh! You are scotching, not killing it. Let Tom at it. I think I see American blight on an apple tree of yours. If that spreads, my fruit will be ruined."

"What shall I do with it?"

"You, missie! Let Tom do it. Some people use paraffin oil; but I believe in burning, cauterising, if you don't cut down the tree, and, if it is a bad case, I cut down the tree. I'll send Tom to-morrow."

"Oh, please, I don't think mother would like it."

"Then I shall take an action against you for ruining my garden. I've been thinking of doing it to Selwood a long time, but Selwood and I are old friends. Now, you are a stranger to me."

The mildness of his face made this threat the more alarming.

"You'd better send Tom than do that," said Bab, in tones of despair.

"Ah! I thought you'd come to a sensible decision. Only for a few days, to oblige me. It's very kind of you. Can you catch?"

He dropped a peach into Bab's outstretched hands; and then Bab could hear his descent as he scurried down the ladder as fast as his feet could carry him.

CHAPTER IX.

THE NEIGHBOUR ON THE RIGHT.

BAB knew by now the name of her neighbour on the west. It was Mr. Chesilton, and he was the Squire and Lord of the Manor. She had seen his iron-grey head in the big pew at church, and a brown head beside it, pleasantly rippled over its surface with a suggestion that the hair would have been wavy if it had not been cropped so very close. That must be Mr. Chesilton's nephew; but since Bab understood that Mr. Chesilton and Mr. Selwood had not been very good friends—there had been some dispute about a right of way—she did not suppose she was going to be very neighbourly with the Manor House.

In her preoccupation with many things she had forgotten to warn the nurses that they were not to trespass on the Chesilton property. Indeed, except so far as her own little property was concerned, she knew very little about the lords of the soil. She knew that the long rolling field that ended at the wood finished her own demesne; but whether Mr. Chesilton owned the land beyond, or Mr. Grayson, or whether there was a landlord or landlords of whom she knew nothing she had hardly considered.

The nurses were Cockneys, and, like all the race, vastly enterprising where country adventures were concerned. To Bab one day the children, chattering at lunch—they grew as talkative as a grove of young chaffinches—described how they had been turned out of the wood by a gamekeeper and bidden to come there no more.

Bab asked the nurses about it. Yes, the story was quite true. Cis's nurse, Florence, a sturdy little person with eyes as brown as mountain trout pools, who thought that all the world was made for children, was quite excited over the indignity they had suffered. The children had been swinging in the wood, the babies had been asleep in their carts or on rugs spread on the ground, the nurses had been sewing. Rags had been putting up small birds for his pleasure. When into this peaceful paradise had come a horrid man in velveteens who had ordered them out.

"I told him he did ought to be ashamed of himself," said Florence; "but he up and said that every pheasant his master shot cost him a pound, and that we, and our dog, and them blessed lambs hollering with joy, were disturbing the game. I told him I thought his master a silly, seeing as how he could buy pheasants in the Portobello Road for one-and-six. I think he was ashamed of himself at that; but he said nothing at all, only stood holding the gate open in the most aggravating way for us to go out. And stood there till we was out of sight. As though we were going back into his old wood!"

"Oh, Florence," said Bab, breaking into the aggrieved narrative, which threatened to go on indefinitely, "you don't mean to say you opened a gate to enter Mr. Chesilton's woods."

"Why, of course, I did, miss. There isn't any other place about so nice and shady, and the sun is hot. The old padlock looked rusty, so I just took and knocked it off with a bit of stone."

"You broke a padlock!" cried Bab, aghast. "But that was a very serious thing to do, Florence. Did it not occur to you that you oughtn't to do it?"

"It never did, Miss Bab. The place looked cool and dark inside, and the sun was a glare, and little Douglas, the pretty lamb! he was complaining of his head. If that there Mr. Cheesingdon thinks more of his blessed pheasants than he does of Christian children, I'd like to tell him to his face what I think of him, so I would."

"Well, you must find some other place to take them, Florence," said Bab, looking serious, though much inclined to smile; "and be sure it isn't on Squire Chesilton's land."

"There isn't much shade anywhere else, Miss Bab, except we go down to the wood over the valley. And that may be his for all we know. And such a long way to go in the glare! He must have a heart of stone, that Squire Cheesingdon."

"Perhaps he knows nothing at all about it," suggested Bab. "Of course, the gamekeeper has his orders. And it was very imprudent of you, Florence, to take Rags into the wood. Indeed, Rags had better keep with me for the future. He might easily get shot in this country which is so much given up to game."

"You don't mean to say as they'd shoot him, a little pleasant thing like that!" said Florence, with round eyes of horror. "And all for the sake of a thing you'd buy for one-and-six in the Portobello Road. If that's the country, give me London!"

A few days passed after this conversation. The children went daily to the wood over the baked fields, returning only to their meals. It was quite true that there was little shade about the place, especially since Tom and his assistants had lopped and pruned. The Lawns lay on a high hill-top, exposed to the glare of a brilliant sun. There were many woods all about, but they were sacred to game, and Mrs. Williamson had seconded Bab in forbidding the nurses further trespassing.

A few days passed, and there came a late afternoon when Bab, busy in her garden, heard the voices of the nurses and children as they trooped home from the fields. She smiled to herself as she heard the babel of little voices where there had used to be so listless a silence. Oh, how delighted their mothers would be if only they could see them now! thought Bab, smiling happily, and tasting the sweet joy of knowing that it was through her the children were here instead of withering in the London summer.

She was thinking these pleasant thoughts when she saw Florence come quickly along the garden path, wearing a very important face.

Bab sprang up hastily. She had the heart of a mother, rather than that of an aunt, and a very young one at that; and she was terrified lest something should have happened to one of the children.

"What is it, Florence?" she asked, breathlessly.

"It isn't that at all, Miss Bab," Florence replied. "Only, I wanted you to see what that there Squire Cheesingdon has put up—the wretched man! I couldn't a-bear to tell the mistress about it. There, I wish I had him in London. He'd soon know what people think on him."

"What is it, Florence?" asked Bab, expecting to find a mare's nest, for Florence, like all her class, was something of a sensation-monger.

"If you just come with me, Miss Bab. I wouldn't soil my lips by repeating it. But as sure as ever them lambs are in bed, me and Susan and Rebecca 'll 'ave it down if it was as much as my place is worth."

Bab, wondering, got up from her stooping position and went with Florence. They crossed the prairie grasses of the field, towards the belt of woods which encircled the Manor House, and were now in all their summer darkness of splendour.

As they went pheasants and partridges ran before them in the grass. The plumage of the pheasant was not unlike Bab's hair. Her hair was conspicuous as she went, and the nurse's white dress dazzled in the sunlight.

When they had come quite close to the wood, around which a rather unnecessarily strong iron fence ran, broken only by the little gate of Florence's delinquency, the nurse suddenly stopped, and pointed with a dramatic gesture to something above their heads.

It was a board, fixed in an oak tree. Bab looked up and read what was inscribed on it. The inscription was in great black letters that had a suggestion of violence. It ran:

TO TRESPASSERS.

Take Warning. This Wood is set with Man-Traps and Spring Guns. Anyone walking there does it at their own risk.

(Signed) GILBERT CHESILTON.

"Did you ever hear of such an old villain, Miss Bab?" cried Florence excitedly, watching Bab's face while she took in the contents of the placard. "Do it at their own risk, indeed! I've a great mind to go in there, and have the law of him if he murders me."

"You mustn't do anything of the kind, Florence," said Bab, forgetting to smile. Indeed, her lips quavered, and she was near to tears, because she felt so helpless and so angry; for, since the board was new, it must have been put up because of her tender little brood. She could not bear that anyone should threaten the children.

"You are sure it was not there before you trespassed, Florence?" she asked, and her voice had an imploring ring in it.

"Sure!" repeated Florence. "I wish I was as sure that my uncle at Gravesend was dead and had left me fifty pounds! It wasn't there last night at seven o'clock, Miss Bab, for as soon as them lambs was asleep I run out to hunt for my thimble which 'ave been lost since I was in the wood, but I disremembered that the last place I'd had it was there. Sure enough, I found it hiding of itself under an ivy leaf, and little the worse for being out of doors five nights, for it was Tuesday that man turned us out."

"I'd rather have given you a new thimble than that you should have trespassed again," said Bab, in some distress.

"Begging your pardon, Miss Bab, I wasn't going to make Squire Cheesingdon a present of my thimble," replied Florence, a little red in the face.

"Oh, well that's done with now," said Bab, ever of a peaceful turn. "But for the future you mustn't come this side of the field at all. By the way, how did you discover the board? I hope you weren't looking for anything else."

"Not me, Miss Bab. Catch me coming within a mile of his old wood. The thing caught my eye as I came walking up the field with the children. It's as plain as a church clock. So I just ran over to see what he'd been doing. I declare my blood boiled when I read it."

"Ah, well, don't think about it any more," said Bab, turning away. "It is fortunate we haven't Squire Chesiltons both sides of us."

There was the unmistakable aroma of a very good cigar in the blue evening air. There was an apologetic cough. Then a young man came shamefacedly out of the wood, lifting his hat from the brown head which Bab had seen in church. His left hand held the cigar out of sight, but Bab could see the little faint blue spiral of smoke ascending from it against the darkness of the wood. He stood just within the railings, and looked at Bab with honest grey eyes a little troubled.

"I'm so sorry about that," he said, indicating the board with an upward jerk of his head. "He would do it. He has the gout rather badly. But there aren't any man-traps or spring guns. You might walk the wood from end to end and meet nothing more harmful than yourself."

"He meant it for the children," said Bab, with a dark shadow in her own eyes. "They are such quiet little things. I wish they were much wilder and rougher. But they were all born in India. They have not been long enough at home to be like other children. And the wood was doing them so much good!"

"He wouldn't hurt a fly," the young man went on. "Why, I've known him to—to"—he hesitated for an instance of his uncle's mercy—"to hand over a bird he'd shot to the keeper to finish it, because he couldn't bear to do it."

"He oughtn't to have shot it then," said Bab, with childishly severe brows.

The young man passed over this speech as too femininely illogical for an answer.

"He's awfully fond of little kids he is—indeed," he went on, stammering in his hurry to get the words out. "He doesn't know about the children. Davies, the gamekeeper, reported that he found a number of people in the wood with a dog, and no end of noise going on. He had an old quarrel with your—relative Mr. Selwood. And it is very hard to rear the birds, what with seasons too wet and too dry."

Bab had a whimsical notion of mentioning that you could buy the birds in the Portobello Road for one-and-six, as she felt sure Florence was longing to do; but the notion passed, and her serious mood returned.

"He should forget old quarrels," she said, "and above all he oughtn't to visit them on other people who have never even heard of them."

"I wish he could hear you say that, Miss ——." Bab quite refused to fill up the gap in his speech. "I shall tell him about the little kids as soon as he's better. I've no doubt he'll take down the board then, and feel horribly ashamed of himself, though I don't expect he'll ever acknowledge it. I think, when he knows, he wouldn't really want to deprive the children of any benefit they might receive from the wood. He is very tender-hearted where children are concerned."

"He has a very good nephew," said Bab, with the quaintest and most formal of bows.

As Miles Chesilton sauntered back through the wood to the Manor House, with his cigar between his lips, he thought much on the little preaching girl, as he designated Bab in his thoughts. What hair she had, like golden wire! No, he put away the comparison energetically, for what wire was ever so fine and so soft? Then the ivory-pale face with its few golden freckles, encircled by the wild glory of hair, how piquant it was! And those delightful, russet-coloured eyes; and the milky teeth like a young child's.

"If Uncle Gil could see her," he muttered to himself, "he'd forgive old Selwood all he ever did against him. And by the way, from what I remember of it, I believe Selwood was in the right. It seems a pity old friends should fall out over a stupid thing like that. It was like Uncle Gil to make himself a sort of village Hampden, and throw down Selwood's work because he thought it interfered with an ancient right of way which had been superseded by a road, and so is never used and never will be. I wonder what the little girl is to Selwood. I should like to hear her telling Uncle Gil he shouldn't shoot birds. And yet, though she did frown at me, she has a sense of a joke; I thought once she was going to make one. I wish Uncle Gil could see her. He's very soft where women and children are concerned. How fond she is of those children! And yet she is little more than a child herself."

Bab, on her part, was thinking that, after all, young Mr. Chesilton ought not to be blamed for his uncle's barbarism. He had really very nice, frank, kind eyes. No doubt he would prevail with his uncle to take down that horrid board. And mamma need not be told about it, since it would distress her so much.

CHAPTER X.

THE CAUSE OF WAR.

A FEW days later Bab was picking the suckers off her strawberry plants right under the wall which divided the two gardens when a voice came out of the sky as it seemed.

"Why not have goats?" it asked.

Bab looked up and saw Mr. Grayson's eyes looking down straight into hers.

"I've been thinking over it a good deal he went on; "and I've come to the conclusion that goats are what you require."

"What for?" asked Bab, sitting back a little for greater ease in conducting the conversation, and wondering whether Mr. Grayson were not a little mad.

His next words proved that he was sane enough.

"'What is it?' she panted, coming up."—p. 217.

"That field of yours is absolutely worthless now," he said. "The hay, as hay, is only fit to be burnt. I'll clear it off for you. You can pay me next year, when I'll buy the crop. There'll be a nice bit of picking for goats under it. Put in three. They'll keep the children in milk."

"Goat's milk! I never thought of such a thing," said Bab.

"Of course you didn't, coming from an ignorant place like London, where people's minds are as dark as its streets. But I can tell you"—the old gentleman spoke testily—"that goat's milk is exactly what those children of yours require."

"I am very much obliged to you for thinking about it," said Bab. "But where shall I get the goats?"

"Tom knows of three, milking. He'll send them round for you to see. Don't pay a penny more than fifteen shillings apiece. If you like, I'll buy them and deduct the price from the hay crop next year. You won't? Very well then. Business is business, that's all."

"You are very kind," said Bab, with shining, grateful eyes, looking up at him. "Won't you come in and let us thank you? I can hardly see you, craning my neck up like this!"

"Bless my soul, no," said Mr. Grayson. "I never go anywhere. What on earth made you think of such a thing?"

"Your kindness." Bab had tears in her eyes. "Just fancy your thinking about the children and what would be good for them! And how good you are to me! Such a kind, thoughtful neighbour!"

"No, no," said Mr. Grayson, emphatically; "a curmudgeon, a curmudgeon. I never want to see anybody. I'm very well content with my own company."

"So different," Bab went on as though she had not heard him, "from that horrid Mr. Chesilton."

"Ah, Chesilton, Chesilton; his bark is worse than his bite. No, no; no, no. I'm not half as good a fellow as Chesilton at heart, mind you, and the heart is the thing that counts."

"Well then, if you won't come in and be thanked, would you let mamma come in sometimes and see Mrs. Grayson? Mamma is so tender and so cheerful. 'An invalid lady——"

"Bless my soul, no," said Mr. Grayson, almost rudely. "My wife doesn't like visitors."

His head disappeared in a flash, and Bab was left repenting her rash speech—her heart was always running away with her tongue. And now she felt so snubbed and disheartened.

While she knelt there, very crestfallen, there began a shower around her of many things; first a rose, then a peach, then an enormous strawberry, then a couple of lettuces, then a little bunch of asparagus neatly tied together. At last over popped Mr. Grayson's head again.

"Southam wouldn't like it," he said; "and she wouldn't either, or I shouldn't mind what Southam liked. The woman takes too much upon her. Thank you very much all the same."

The rest of the time, as Bab went on soberly with her work, she thought a great deal about the poor little lady, who had sat at the upper window, with her poor face quivering and distorted with tears. And yet she had plenty of cause for happiness: for there was the exquisite garden, in which she was quite well able to walk about; and the house was a delightful old house, and, according to Susan, was filled with all manner of beautiful if somewhat grimy things. Of course, she had lost her one little child. The thought of that made Bab very sad for her. Still Bab wondered why she need be such a prisoner, and Mr. Grayson too. She had seen Mr. Grayson at church on Sunday; but he scurried away exactly as Susan had described his doing when she went for the key, as if he dreaded anyone speaking to him. Yet he ought to have had plenty of old friends; and as for brightening, Bab was quite sure that if he would only make friends with her the children would be the greatest possible delight to him and Mrs. Grayson, and might be trusted in his beautiful garden, unlike other children Bab knew.

It was Bab's temperament to be a little rash in jumping to conclusions, and it was lucky that her judgments more often erred on the side of generosity than the other way.

But now her mind jumped to the conclusion that the shadow over the Graysons' house—Graystoke, as it was called—was Mrs. Grayson's maid, Southam. She was the person whom Susan had seen the day she called for the key; and time had not softened the asperity of Susan's mind towards her.

"Mark my words, Miss Bab," Susan had said emphatically only the day before, "that there Southam woman has got that sweet, pretty old lady under her thumb, and keeps her there. She's been the old lady's maid these twenty years, ever since their little girl died, and Mrs. Grayson has been a sick woman from that day. Maybe it's the interests of some I won't mention, as have black, bushy eyebrows and the skin of a rignoskerus, to keep that dear lady a sick woman. I say nothing, Miss Bab; but Mrs. Grayson, that we calls an old lady and acts as such and worse, is not by all accounts so many years older than the mistress, that looks to be her daughter. Why, Miss Hope would have been about the age of Miss Nancy if but she had lived."

Susan was familiar with all the village gossip, though she pretended great indignation when Mrs. Belson brought her a budget of it.

But without Susan's suspicions, which seemed to be the popular ones, Bab thought she must have suspected Mrs. Grayson's maid. She was a great raw-boned, black-browed, thin-lipped, cold-eyed person, who looked eminently fitted to be a prison warder or an attendant in a lunatic asylum, but not at all suitable as a nurse for a very gentle and delicate lady like Mrs. Grayson.

Bab thought the woman prowled like a cat. She had watched her from the garret window as she glided in a stealthy way about the garden, although her business there was no doubt quite legitimate. Once Bab had caught sight of her sleek, neatly banded head, bent in a listening attitude in a close, dark walk which ran round Mr. Grayson's garden. Craning a little further, she saw that Mr. and Mrs. Grayson occupied a seat just beyond the yew hedge by which the woman was listening.

Bab mentioned it to her mother; but Mrs. Williamson was singularly free from prejudices, and, while deploring the meanness of listening, thought that very probably Mrs. Grayson's maid took no such view of it as they did; she also thought it would be better for Bab not to overlook their neighbours.

So, gently rebuked, Bab thought the more. It was a place for thinking, The Lawns. And in those long, solitary hours spent in the garden her mind worked incessantly

Tom came duly to clear off the useless hay. As he came with a mowing-machine and two men the work was soon accomplished; and where the grasses had bleached white there was a fresh, green pasture, covered with tiny clover-heads.

The goats came and were purchased. Rebecca proved to have milked a goat in her early days, so the difficulty of milking was got over; and the goats turned out to be excellent milkers, and from the quantity they gave and their general air of well-being seemed to thrive well on the clover-heads. The children, too, prospered on the rich, sweet milk, and Bab was justified in writing enthusiastic accounts to India and China about the children's condition, which brought tears and smiles into certain lonely bungalows there.

In August a request came that Bab would join Mr. and Miss Selwood for a week at Margate. The old gentleman's health had improved so much that the doctors thought the change permissible.

Thither Bab went, and was very glad to be with her old friends, who were so glad to have her, and with whom she was the gayest of the gay. Yet the week was in reality a long one, though she would not have acknowledged it even to herself for worlds. While she sat on the crowded sands by Mr. Selwood's chair, and looked across to the other side where Miss Patty sat knitting and smiling back at her, she would not long for the quietness of The Lawns and the thousand and one interests that centred about her own house. Why, it would be the blackest ingratitude, she said, in her own mind, to grudge these dear friends who had given her all that happiness their one little week. And she did not grudge it. Yet when she left the white sands and the bands and the nigger minstrels and the crowds and crowds of people behind, she felt almost glad—would have felt quite glad if she had not just said good-bye to Mr. Selwood in his bath-chair outside the station, and if dear Miss Patty were not standing at the carriage door, sending all kinds of tender and random messages to Mrs. Williamson and the babes.

It was delightful to get home and to be made much of, and to feel that she had been so much missed that everyone thought the week without her like a year.

There was quite a feast spread for her; and Mr. Grayson, who had got to know somehow that she was coming home, had sent in a basket of his choicest flowers and one of beautiful peaches. And the tea was so good with the goat's milk, which is better than any cream, and the new-laid eggs so delicious, and the thin slices of ham and sweet country butter so acceptable to the hungry traveller, who only now began to feel the benefit of Margate air. Bab thought it a lovely home-coming altogether.

It was nearly over, and she had gone in to see the little ones in their cots, when Florence arrested her attention by an ominous "Ahem!" Florence had looked ominous right through, even when Bab presented her with a little silver brooch—she could never go anywhere without bringing home tiny presents for everybody—but then Bab had been too exhilarated to notice.

"What is it, Florence?" she asked, with a sinking of the heart. She hoped Florence was not going to leave—that her home-sickness for the London pavements had not become too grievous to be borne.

"It's them goats, Miss," said Florence, lifting that weight from her heart.

"The goats? Why, what have they been doing?"

"Why, they've stood up there on that Mr. Cheesingdon's fence, and they've stripped his trees as bare as my hand, right the way along. If you'll look out, Miss."

Florence lifted the blind. There was a full moon, and it shone on the bereft trees. They looked like a long range of ghosts in the moonlight.

"He 'ave put up another board," said Florence with gloomy satisfaction, "which 'ave wrote upon it, 'Goats or other animals injuring these trees will be shot.'"

"It doesn't look as if they could injure them much more," said Bab.

"Oh, can't they, though? Begging your pardon, Miss Babbie. They're a-eating of the leaves now, and the heights they gets to is surprising. They might be three times as high to see where they can reach to. And the branches they pulls down. And the greenstuff they eats. There! I couldn't have believed it, not of goats."

"We shall have to get rid of them," said Bab in despair.

"Not the goats, Miss Bab, and they so fond of the children! And their milk so good! Why, you can see the precious lambs getting fat on it! And so good for them driving away the goats from Mr. Cheesingdon's trees. They're at it all day long, and it's so good for their little legs! I wouldn't have them without it, not for anything."

"I must talk to Mr. Grayson to-morrow. I'm sure we can tether them. I've seen them tethered in picture books."

"They have been tethered," said Florence, "and they pulled up their tether. And what is more, the grey goat ate her chain. At least, we haven't been able to find it, although we searched the field for it high and low. But there, what do it matter, Miss Babbie, whether Squire Cheesingdon's trees are green or white so long as the children are happy?"

CHAPTER XI.

THE SICK CHILD.

SEPTEMBER came in very hot that year, with the thermometer in the nineties day after day. Everyone, even on the high hill-top, was languid with the heat; the children were fretful, and could not rest at nights. Every night there was a dank, rotting dew, which seemed to blacken and corrupt the vegetation. Every day the sun blazed in a brassy sky. Bab remembered such weather in Mallaquet Gardens, when the heavy air smelt of sewers that needed flushing; and was humbly grateful for the country because of the children, yet afraid to rejoice overmuch since so many children must live through the unwholesome weather in London and in London slums.

The wood on the edge of the valley proved, after all, to be Squire Chesilton's. Immediately after the episode of the goats it was placarded one morning with warnings to trespassers, and when Florence would have disregarded them gamekeepers turned her back with a hint of dangers in the wood to those who defied the placards.

After that Bab one day, as she went to the village post office, met Mr. Miles Chesilton with a gun on his shoulder and a couple of dogs at his heels. She would have passed him, but he pulled up in front of her, lifting his hat.

She stopped too. They were in the middle of the village green, and there were plenty of curious spectators, to whom the Squire's nephew and his doings were matters of much interest.

"I'm so sorry," he began.

"I don't blame you for it," said Bab, impelled to be gracious by the unhappy look in his eyes.

"I am glad you don't," he went on. "I had nearly brought him round—he is a dear old fellow really, not an ogre at all, but he thinks no end of the place, and those con——I beg your pardon—those wretched goats have ruined the plantation. And he will have it that you keep them on purpose to annoy him. He is very irascible, you know, and the goats——"

"I know. Mr. Selwood has told me how he would believe that the right-of-way was dug into entirely by way of interfering with him. So he went and flung all the clay into the trench again, and the tools over the fence; and, after all, Mr. Selwood was only making a drain, and the place would have been quite as it was in a little while. Then they went to law about it; and it cost them no end of money, and neither won, for of course it was proved that Mr. Selwood had no idea of interfering with anybody's rights. And so it ended, and they who were old friends have never spoken to each other since."

"That's about it, Miss Williamson." He had acquired Bab's name since their last meeting. "It seems rather foolish, doesn't it? I am sure he missed his old friend, but he would never acknowledge it. He will never acknowledge that he is in the wrong about anything. Yet he is really the best and kindest——"

"He needn't have shut the children out of the other wood too," said Bab, with a mother's frown. "However, it is a good thing he can't shut us away from the country and the sky.

I'm sorry for what the goats did; but I am going to keep them tethered for the future. You see, we can't do without them, for they give the children milk."

Miles Chesilton did not say what he thought—that no amount of tethering would keep the goats from his uncle's woods once they had tasted that forbidden sweetness, and that the next thing he looked to see was the goats dragging their tethers on the lawn of the Manor House, devouring the green things like a plague of locusts.

"No, of course," he said, instead. "But believe that I am very sorry."

"I knew it was not your fault," replied Bab, and then blushed when she had said it. But he had looked so troubled that once more her kind little heart had run away with her tongue.

He looked disproportionately radiant at her words, so that Bab felt impelled to bid him good-morning, and was uncertain whether to offer him her hand or not; however, as he put out his hand unhesitatingly, she could not but give him hers, and if he held it a second longer than was necessary Bab could forgive him that, for he had seemed to take his uncle's oppression so much to heart.

So now, banished from the woods, the children had their outings in the fields, on the roads, shadeless places, and places where bicycles came by swiftly and motor-cars rushed upon innocent travellers; and the changed state of things lay heavily on Bab's heart.

Even Mrs. Williamson did not know how fond Bab was of the children, and how since she was their hostess her responsibility towards them seemed trebled. On the roadside there was shade from the big trees and the woods between which the roads ran. But there also were monsters ready to rush upon little straying children. Bab rather worried Florence about it. In the end Florence thought she had better keep to the fields, and guard the children from the sun as well as might be.

But that was not so easy at noontide when the sun was high, and seemed to creep into every nook and cranny of the fields. Little children will wander, despite the utmost vigilance of the nurses, especially when the children were so many and so young as to be almost more than Florence and her assistant could manage.

These were days when the guns were popping all day in the turnip-fields, and Bab, looking from the upper windows, could see grey-coated figures that were those of Squire Chesilton's party of guns.

She became interested in those figures after it had become a common thing to find a brace or two of partridges on the hall-table, inscribed with Mr. Miles Chesilton's compliments. After all, it was not his fault if his uncle was disagreeable; and Bab became quite heated when she was alone in defending him from imaginary persons who would say that there ought to be no friendliness with the nephew of such an uncle.

Mrs. Williamson, who had the most tender conscience, was, indeed, troubled over those birds. She imparted her scruples to Bab. Did Bab suppose that Squire Chesilton knew of these courtesies of his nephew, and, if he did not, were they right in accepting the Manor House partridges?

Bab was quite sure the Squire knew nothing at all about it. If he did, he would have a fit. But she was just as sure that Mr. Miles Chesilton was of an age to act on his own initiative, and she thought they might take it for granted that he was free to distribute the birds that fell to his gun as he would.

Mrs. Williamson's scruples were laid to rest. Bab had told her every word that had been spoken between her and young Chesilton on the two occasions when they had met. Despite what the Malplaquet Gardens circles, in the old days, had called her cleverness in marrying her daughters off, Mrs. Williamson was not suspicious that every young man was a lover or suitor for her girls. Life had been so kind to the little woman that it was easy to believe in kindness which had no other motive than to be kind. She saw Bab despatch her little formal notes of thanks with interest. What a pity the young man's uncle was so unfriendly, else they might have been pleasant neighbours!

Her mother's unsuspectingness gave Bab heart-searchings during her solitary hours. Yet what was there to tell which she had not told? The young man's eagerness, something in his eyes when he looked at Bab, the strong grip, yet tender, with which he held her hand: Bab put the thought of these things away with a blush that stained the clear pallor of her cheeks. If these things had been, they were not to be put into words, not even for mother, not for anybody. And, after all, they were very shadowy.

One day, when Bab had gone upstairs on some trivial errand, she saw from the window the party of guns a couple of fields away. They were in the field where of late Florence had taken the children. She stood a moment idly by the window watching them. Then she saw the children come in sight over the brow of a deep cup, a disused gravel pit or the like, which the fields had taken back to themselves and clothed with their tender green. What a number of children there seemed, clustered about the two nurses! Then, with a sudden sharp throb of alarm, Bab noticed something—what was it? Something of fear, of trouble, in the way the group was huddled together. She snatched up her mother's opera glasses which stood near her, and looked through them.

Now she could make out Florence. She was carrying one of the children. The others were clinging to her skirt. They were coming towards home. They were near the grey-clad figures. Now one of the men had separated himself from the others and joined the little group. He called to the others, and they came as well. They were all about Florence. What, oh, what had happened? For surely one of the children was hurt. The whole scene spoke of anxiety and perturbation.

Bab dropped the glasses and fled out of the house. Forgetting the glare of the sun, she sped hatless across the field, meeting no one on her way. She had not gone far before she saw the others coming. Florence was no longer carrying her burden. The child was in Miles Chesilton's arms. Another man walked with the group, but the remainder of the shooting party had gone back to their work.

Ah! it was little Douglas that Miles Chesilton was carrying. Bab could see the child's pale golden head now. If anything had happened to him, what would Cis, his mother, say to them? He was the frailest and the most beloved of her children. Everyone loved little Douglas, the gentle, serious child whom love did not spoil, but rather made more pliant. He was Bab's darling of them all; but it was characteristic of Bab that she thought first of the child's mother.

"What is it?" she panted, coming up to them. "Is he hurt? Has there been an accident?"

"He is ill. There has been no accident. We shall get the doctor and see. I beg your pardon. You ought not to be bareheaded in this sun."

Young Chesilton turned to Florence, whose tears were running down her face. She understood, and handed her umbrella stupidly to Bab, who took it as stupidly. The old gentleman who walked with them, and who looked as unhappy as anyone, took it from her hand and opened it above her head

"I don't know what it is, Miss Bab," cried Florence, answering an unspoken question. "He seemed all right, only a bit sleepy, this morning, and I put him asleep on a rug under the hedge. When I came to look at him he was like this."

The child's face was flushed a dark purple colour. He lay quite limp and lifeless in the arms that held him.

"The doctor, the doctor!" said Bab, hardly knowing what she was saying. "There is no doctor within three miles."

"We shall get him as soon as possible," said the old gentleman. "Miles, give me the child. Take Troubadour and the dog-cart. Bring Vernon back with you. There, my dear, don't fret. The child is in the hands of God."

Bab looked at him, too terrified by her first experience of serious illness in children to feel much interested in anything. She had a vague idea that this must be Squire Chesilton, the children's enemy, who had forbidden them the woods and had threatened to kill their goats. Well, he was kind now, at last, when he saw what harmless little things they were, especially Douglas—Douglas whom everybody worshipped. Bab suddenly choked and stumbled.

They carried the child into the house and laid him on Mrs. Williamson's bed. The young nurse took the other children away to their own sunny, pleasant nursery. Florence remained, and Bab; and the grandmother presently came in with her bonnet and cloak still on, and sat and stared at Florence undressing the child.

She only spoke once.

"Cis has sent him a great box of soldiers," she said. "It came this afternoon. I have been writing to tell her how well they were. I have just been to post the letter."

"He did want his soldiers, the pretty lamb," said Florence, with a set face.

In the confusion no one noticed that Squire Chesilton, the upright, rosy-faced, white-haired old man, who had taken the child so tenderly from his nephew and carried him so well, had hastily disappeared as soon as he had laid the child down upon the bed.

And there was the box of soldiers from Cis, and the tender, rallying letter to her darling, who lay in a stupor with wide-open eyes that seemed turned back in their sockets through the nights and days that followed.

CHAPTER XII.

THE OGRE TRANSFORMED.

DR. VERNON had come and diagnosed the case. He had no doubt it was meningitis. Had the child had a fall? No. No hereditary tuberculous disease in the family? No. Had he been exposed to the sun during these glaring days? If so, that was the most probable cause of the mischief.

He was a hard-working, conscientious man, but ungentle in manner. To Bab's imploring question as to the chances he replied:

"Oh yes, there are chances; there are always chances. But it is a bad business, a bad business. I can only tell you that I've had experience of half-a-dozen cases of this sort, and the child always died."

There was only one thing to do—to telegraph to Sid. Fortunately he had not taken his holiday, there was a whole month due to him. He had been waiting till Phyllis could take her holidays, so that they might be at The Lawns together.

In the case of most men one might have hesitated at asking them to spend a much-needed holiday in professional attendance on a sick child. But not so with Sid. Twenty-four hours brought him. He was accompanied by a little grey-haired, brown-faced nurse, to whom he had been kind, and who had a great friendship for and belief in him.

"I took the responsibility," he said to Mrs. Williamson. "Nurse Shaw is the best aid any man could have in fighting a life and death fight. She will not upset the house as so many nurses do. You will see."

He took day duty with the child, and Nurse Shaw took the nights. A curious quietness settled down upon the big house, as though everyone in it were holding his breath while that fight was being waged.

Day after day passed. There was no change in the little body burnt up with fever, the straining eyes, the queer, unnatural chatter that came from the parched lips. There were days and nights when, except for sleep and food, doctor and nurse never left the sick-room. The nurse, whose nature it was to be as cheerful as a cricket, was now quieter than a mouse. It seemed an eternity that time of waiting; and Bab hardly dared to look through the half-open door of the sick-room at the strange, unnatural, little head, packed in ice bandages, that lay there with eyes looking backward, backward.

Even when at last the fever seemed to drop away, and the exhausted child slept naturally, neither doctor nor nurse lost the strained look their faces had worn. Passing in and out the sick-room little Nurse Shaw would pause to answer Bab's anxious questions kindly, and would then pass onward with a face full of care.

Weeping with the child's nurse—poor Florence had wasted with anxiety and remorse—the day the child slept Bab forgot to have misgivings. But afterwards they returned. Why did Sid yet look so grave, and why had he forbidden her to write yet awhile to tell Cis her darling had been in the jaws of death and had escaped?

Bab took to haunting the door of the sick-room, where now everything was so still. She kept her fears to herself. She would not sadden her mother, who was quietly and gratefully joyful, nor the child's nurse, nor the others who were only too happy to accept the good the day had brought them.

She transmitted the message to those who came to inquire, that the child was going on nicely; but though she heard, or fancied she heard, the disappointed inflection in Miles Chesilton's voice as he turned away day after day without seeing anyone but Susan, she would not see him, not just yet.

Even the garden had no help for her these days. She liked to steal away and be quiet and pray, where none could see her, that the child should be given back to his mother. Even prayer, save of the most ejaculatory kind, was difficult in those days. She stole between the sick-room door—the child was in the unfrequented wing of the house—and the Manor House wood all day long. She had found the boards gone, and the little gate open and fastened back lest it should close, the day after the child had been taken ill. Bab was not one to refuse the silent overture; and the wood, which was so solitary except for birds and wild things, was a comfortable place in her mood.

Yet she was hardly in the wood before a thought would strike her that there might be some news of the child; and she was back again as fast as her feet could carry her to the long, light corridor which she wore with her feet at night. Sometimes Sid came out and found her there, and smiled kindly at her, telling her the child was asleep. Yet why had he not relaxed a jot of his vigilance? Why was he as careworn as when the fever was at its height?

There were times when Bab thought of asking Sid; yet she feared his answer. Better uncertainty that still permitted her to look those other unconscious people in the face than a terrible certainty.

Then one day, as she was sitting in a window-seat of the corridor, the door opened and Sid came out. The whole expression of his face had changed. An immense relief, an overpowering joy, were in it. He came and seized Bab by the two hands.

"He is awake, Babbie," he whispered exultantly. "And his little brain is all right, thank God! He is as sensible as you and me. Come and peep at him."

Bab went in on tiptoe, and peeped at the little shaven, unfamiliar head. The child recognised her and smiled faintly.

"You can go and tell Nurse Shaw, Babbie,"

Sid whispered, rubbing his hands. "She won't mind being wakened up for that news. This last week has been the worst of all."

As Bab went downstairs, having imparted the good news to the little nurse, on her way to her mother, she heard the soft knock at the door which she had come to know was Miles Chesilton's. Often it had made her heart leap up in spite of her as she sat in the chilly corridor upstairs. October was near its close now, and the days had grown short and cold. But the house was golden to Bab as she came down the stairs and saw through the fanlight above the door the warm corn-coloured gold of the great chestnut without.

"Ask Mr. Chesilton to come in and speak to me," she said to Susan, who came hastily from the back premises.

She opened the door of the drawing-room and went in. Her mother was not there, sitting with her needlework in the chimney-corner, as she had expected. Her cheeks tingled with a sudden sense of her own rashness at receiving the Squire's nephew alone; but there was no trace of the colour when he came in, stepping softly as though his footsteps might wake the child

"Well?" he said, smiling at her frankly. "What is the good news to-day?"

"The best of news. He is awake and knows us. I would not see you before because we did not know how it was going to be. His dear little brain might have been injured, and it is such a wise little brain, clear as crystal. Think what it would have been if we had had to give my poor sister and his father back the shell of their boy!"

He uttered an ejaculation. His emotion brought him a step nearer to Bab.

"I had no idea that there was such a danger," he said soberly, "and I am very glad I hadn't. The Squire has been fretting himself to death over it. But we thought for the last week that the child was out of all danger."

"So did everyone except the doctor and nurse. I suspected it, or at least I suspected something from their silence. Oh, thank God!"

He looked at her with honest sympathy.

"You look as if you had been going through a good deal."

"I have. I used to hide in your wood from the unconscious faces of those who thought there was only cause for joy. I found it a great refuge."

Her natural instinct of graciousness had impelled Bab to make the speech; but she could not have anticipated the flood of delight that swept over the young man's face.

"You've been in the wood? It was like you to understand. The dear old man set the gate open himself, chained it back himself. Even the goats may come in now."

"They are in their house for the winter. We can't presume too much on Squire Chesilton's goodness," said Bab, blushing with pleasure.

"Ah, that reminds me, Miss Williamson. Would your mother allow my uncle to call? He wants to make his amende in person. He would go up to the cannon's mouth to do right, once you have brought him round to see that it is the right."

"I think my mother will be glad. But she is not the cannon's mouth, you know."

The young man looked with interest at Bab's sparkling eyes and the innocent enjoyment of her smile.

"No, indeed. I saw her once. I don't think anyone need be afraid of her."

Mrs. Williamson came in then, and being made acquainted with the young man's request gave a very willing assent. She was pleased with young Chesilton, who had the modest and eager manner which commends young people to their elders. Miles Chesilton had the fortunate way which pleases a woman, whatever age she is. There was a little air of homage in the inclination of his sleek head which won the heart of the elderly woman, who remembered the days when she was charming.

He went away almost immediately, divining that Bab had not yet told the great news to her mother.

"What a nice boy! How fond his mother would have been of him," began Mrs. Williamson.

"I am glad his uncle is so sorry," said Bab, simply. "But I wanted to tell you, dearest. The child has been awake and recognised us, thank God! Now I know what has been weighing on Sid's spirits. There has been a danger, happily past, that the child's brain might be injured. He is himself, thank God! His little soul looked out at us awake and conscious from his sunken little eyes. He will do well now, Sid says."

"Thank God!" repeated the grandmother humbly.

The next day the Squire came with his nephew. Such a subdued Squire! Bab could measure the difference because of Susan's stories. According to Susan, Squire Chesilton was of most volcanic temper, and his language picturesque to a degree when he was put out.

He too won Mrs. Williamson's heart by the thoroughness with which his amende was made.

"I hear the little chap is doing well," he said with contrition. "If he had not been, I could never have forgiven myself. I cannot forgive myself now, because doubtless it was his exposure to the sun did the mischief. You will hardly believe it of me, ma'am, but I was wrong-headed enough—aye, indeed, and wrong-hearted enough—to think that my old friend Selwood had turned all those children loose upon me for my annoyance. I thought it was a school or an institution, I really did. You see, I shut my ears to what people might say; and there were so many of them."

"There certainly are," agreed Mrs. Williamson. "But you see, sir, I have so many daughters married in India, and one in China; and they are glad to send the children home to me, and I am very glad to have them."

"And I should think they are very glad to be here," said the Squire heartily.

"We are very glad to be here," said Mrs. Williamson. "We lived in London before; and there was no room for the chicks. But now we have plenty of room; and there is another little family coming to us soon. And presently the fathers and mothers will be getting leave and coming home too. But The Lawns has room for everybody."

"Mother would have slung hammocks all around the walls in Malplaquet Gardens," laughed Bab, "rather than turn anyone away."

"I can well believe it," answered the Squire. "But no doubt the free country is a great blessing and happiness, especially where little children are concerned. And I can only hope, ma'am, that you'll make any use you like of me and the Manor House. You're a newcomer, and this place has been neglected for long. And—and—in fact——"

So they made a pact of friendship. And after that the dainties that were showered on the sick child—at least, nominally on him, for no child, well or ill, could have eaten a tenth part of the game and grapes and new-laid eggs and such things that were sent for Master Douglas, with the Squire's compliments—were somewhat embarrassing to Mrs. Williamson, who was a spirited little woman, although it had fallen to her lot to accept so many kindnesses from her friends.

Once she protested that it was too much, but the protest fortunately was made to Mr. Miles Chesilton, instead of to his uncle. "For," said the young man, "if you were not to accept these trifles as kindly and heartily as they are sent, I really could not answer for the effect on the Squire. It might even drive him back to his angry ways and thoughts. Whereas now he has changed so much that I hope he will presently become reconciled with Mr. Selwood."

"How delightful that would be!" broke in Bab. "For Mr. Selwood has never ceased to feel it. He told me as much when I was with him at Margate in the summer, and that the estrangement was his reason for not coming here. He seemed to think, but I daresay that it was a mistake, that The Lawns was a sort of Naboth's vineyard to your uncle."

"It was certainly Chesilton property two hundred years ago. It was won from Ralph Chesilton at a game of cards. Still I think that has not affected my uncle's point of view. He and Mr. Selwood were friends till the trouble over the right-of-way, and that was entirely due to the Squire's hot-headedness and impatience."

So the friendship between the Manor House and The Lawns grew and prospered. And presently when little Douglas was strong enough to be taken for drives it was in Squire Chesilton's carriage he went, on a pleasant May day strayed into December.

Nurse Shaw was gone back to her hospital work, taking the goodwill of everybody with her, so Bab and Mrs. Williamson occupied the other seats of the carriage.

But Squire Chesilton, who had long forgotten his first humble demeanour, would allow no one but himself to do anything for the child. And little Douglas, oddly enough, liked the Squire to do things for him better than anyone else, and would turn away pettishly from more skilled fingers to the Squire's eager and awkward ministrations.

"For all the world like as if the child was his grandson," said the country people who met the carriage on the road.

It was an odd thing that the blustering Squire had become like wax in the hands of any of these little children. Perhaps Douglas was his pet of them all, but he was hard run for first place by Andrey's daughter Sheila, who promised to be the image of her Aunt Babbie.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE HOMEWARD BOUND.

IN the autumn of that year Dolly came home with her four small sons. She was to have six months at home, to get them used to doing without her; and at times, to hear her, those six months were like golden sands running out, while one counted them, and never to be regained once they were gone.

Dolly was the little one of Mrs. Williamson's family, childishly small and young looking, with a round, babyish face and wide, bright eyes under straight, black hair.

"'Here is your homage, Babbie,' she said."—p. 224.

Yet she was by no manner of means childish in character. Her marriage, like those of her sisters, had been a love match, and it was the shadow on these golden hours that Jim Lovell was left alone, administering the affairs of a baked little Indian town somewhere in the Bombay Presidency.

"You wouldn't believe it of Jim," said Dolly to Bab, who received her confidences with intense sympathy, "but the dear fellow, when he saw what it was going to mean to me to part with them, positively suggested that I should set up a little house at Brighton, and keep with them till he should come home in five years time! I can imagine myself sitting in the sea wind, listening to the band, while my old Jim boiled his head off for us with hardly ever a creature to speak to whose complexion was white!"

Bab's heart leaped to the scorn in her sister's voice. Dolly's feelings were quite the right thing, even if she did drop into a slangy phrase.

"There are lots who would do it, Doll," she said. "You remember Mrs. Buchanan, and Mrs. Everett, and Mrs. Cope. They were the gayest of the gay, too, unless anyone suggested that they were going back."

"I remember. Selfish cats!" was Mrs. Lovell's comment.

"Perhaps," suggested Bab, diffidently, "their husbands weren't like Jim."

"Perhaps not, indeed. I should just think they weren't. But that is no reason for leaving them in that awful solitude, with only brandy-pegs to console them, poor wretches! I'll tell you what, Bab—I have no patience with some women."

"Of course, if their husbands weren't—like Jim, they might be horribly fond of the children, poor women," said Bab, feeling that she was walking on uncertain ground, since she could have no positive knowledge of the feelings of the married.

Little Mrs. Lovell looked at Bab with a profound pity for her great ignorance.

"There are women, Babbie," she said, "who push out the husband for the children as soon as the children come, and they are the women who love by instinct, not by reason. Now I—it will be death to me to part with the children next April, to lose those tender years of theirs, and leave them to all the chances of life." She lifted her hand and dashed away a bright tear or two from her long, dark lashes. "It is a death that has always been in my thoughts since Watty was born. But it would be worse to stay with them, as my old Jim suggested. You see, it works out this way, Babbie. If the children don't miss me, and they won't miss me after a little while"—the small face was curiously contorted for a second—"they are very young, and it is not as though they were being left with strangers. So it will be only I that will suffer. Whereas nothing could make up to Jim for just me. He would go on missing me for ever."

There was a bright spot in each of her round cheeks as she concluded. Bab said nothing, but sat looking at her wonderingly. How good the love must be that lasted like that—nay, rather, that grew like that, for if some fantastic, unreal things of young love could not survive, surely immortal things come to take their places.

However, Mrs. Lovell intended to enjoy herself amazingly, so she declared, during those six months at home. Fortunately it was a mild, bright season till well into the winter, and just before Christmas the frost set in and turned the whole countryside to silver. So there was plenty of opportunity for outdoor life still, even though one had to be more careful with the children, especially with the new arrivals, than if they had been reared in England.

Dolly at first had looked enviously at her small nephews and nieces, whose cheeks yet carried some of the gold and crimson of the summer sun. Her own little ones were peaked and dark even by their not over robust cousins.

"Wait till next year," Bab would declare, flashing her quick, fond smiles round the little circle. Then she remembered and turned with contrition to Dolly. "You will see for yourself, Doll," she said. "Before it is time for you to return to Jim you will see those cheeks growing like little hard red apples, and those limbs putting on flesh. Yours have the best chance of all; for the others came to us in town. You remember, mother dear, how Malplaquet Gardens this time last year were swallowed up in black fog day after day for nearly a week."

"I remember," said the mother.

"And the children were so puzzled at the topsy-turvydom of breakfast by lamplight, and thought the days were lost, and that henceforth life was only to be made up of nights."

She turned joyous eyes on the prospect of the sparkling fields and woods outside the window.

"I am always feeling too happy at having the children out of London," she said more soberly. "Then I have to remind myself that so many children have to stay there."

"Only we are not responsible for those," said Mrs. Williamson.

"How very fond Babbie is of children!" Dolly remarked. "Yet she is little more than a child herself."

"Going on for twenty, good elder sister," replied Babbie, with a toss of her head.

"She looks exactly as she did when she was four years old," went on Mrs. Lovell. "You remember her, mamma, in a little moss-green velveteen smock, with her hair so very red, and her face just as pale and smooth as ivory, if not quite so yellow. She has changed very little."

"She has led such a quiet life," said Mrs. Williamson.

"Ah! India is the place for withering up the cheeks and drying the life out of the hair. Yours frizzes as much as ever, Babbie."

"Good little people," cried Babbie to the children, "we are taught that personalities are rude. Let us leave those rude mothers who talk about people before their faces. It is dry in the wood to-day, and there is a grove of hazel-nuts still heavy with the fruit. Come along, for everyone has to get on their gaiters and woollen gloves, and Aunt Babbie is coming too."

She swept the children out of the room with her in a cheerful, excited little crowd.

"How happy she is!" Mrs. Lovell said, turning to her mother as the door shut. "She radiates happiness. It comes like sparks from that hair of hers."

"She is happy indeed. She has been like that ever since we came, except while Douglas was ill, when she was eclipsed for a time. She loves the place, and has such a grateful heart. Babbie won't grumble at the seasons here any more than she did at Malplaquet Gardens."

"She told me yesterday she loved the winter best. It was glorious indeed, seeing a grove of bare black oak boughs outlined against a rosy and violet sky."

"She loves the winter best while it is winter. She will love each season best as it comes."

"Ah, well, mother dear, keep her as happy as that. Her lot could hardly be bettered."

"If you would all but be content to stay young! Little Babbie will grow like the rest of you. I confess I see no sign of it at present."

"What would you do if Babbie were to marry as young as the rest of us? What about the children?"

"I have sometimes thought of that. But she may not want to marry till the children are all reared and given back to you, if she marries at all."

"Marries at all! A girl with Babbie's looks and Babbie's pretty ways! What a loss it would be for somebody! There is, by the way, a very good-looking young man next door, who seems uncommonly taken with Babbie."

"His uncle has other views for him," said Mrs. Williamson quietly.

"How do you know?"

"He told me so."

"The young man?"

"Squire Chesilton. He destines his nephew for a certain Lady Harriet Agnew, the daughter of the Lord-Lieutenant of the county. I think it is a family arrangement. Think of my little Bab, the child brought up in Malplaquet Gardens! It is much too romantic to suppose that she should occupy the place destined for a Lady Harriet. Such things only happen in the stories written for women of the lower middle and working classes."

Mrs. Williamson's tone was not encouraging, but her daughter was not turned from the discussion.

"The Squire ought to have kept up his first attitude, then, towards this family. Where are his eyes, not to see Babbie?"

"He sees her very much," said the mother drily. "Indeed, I think that, after Douglas, he likes her best of all the children."

"Ah, I see. He thinks of her as a child."

"He thinks of her so little as a possible niece-in-law that he would be slow to suspect anyone else could think of it."

"You would not encourage the young man?"

"I should be sorry to have to discourage him; but I don't think the need will arise."

"Is he engaged?"

"I haven't gathered so much."

"Ah, mother dear, then, he isn't a bit safe. And then——"

But what else Mrs. Dolly might have said is a mystery, because there was a sudden rat-tat at the hall-door knocker, and a mighty clanging of the hall-door bell, and in rushed Susan upon them, in such haste that she had forgotten to change her apron or remove the soapsuds from her arms.

"It's Miss Pat," she panted, "in the station fly. Rebecca is opening the door to her this minute. I caught a sight of her from my pantry, so I thought I'd just run up and keep you from hearing the news sudden-like."

But Mrs. Williamson had turned a little pale, and was standing up, leaning with her two hands upon the cloth of the breakfast table.

"What can have happened?" she asked, turning scared eyes to Dolly. "We only heard a week ago, and there was nothing about her coming then."

"There hasn't anything happened," said Susan, wiping her arms down with her coarse apron. "She's handsomer than ever, and she's prouder than ever, sitting there among her boxes. She looks a deal too fine for the station fly. It's in one of them fine carriages that's always going by the door she ought to be sitting. She'd become it better than a station fly."

However, by the time the speech was finished Susan found herself talking to thin air. So, with a broad smile of welcome on her honest plain face, she followed the two ladies as they hastened out to greet the returned wanderer.

CHAPTER XIV.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS.

IN December gardening operations are necessarily limited, yet Bab found a good deal to do under the superintendence and advice of Mr. Grayson, whom Pat very soon christened the Head Gardener.

Not that he showed at first when Pat was anywhere about. But at other times he seemed to spend nearly as much time on top of his ladder as Bab did in her garden; and as he could be silent for quite a long time Bab came in time to feel his presence no more of a hindrance than that of the birds, who had begun to practise their spring songs and were on the most fearlessly friendly terms with her.

Indeed, she ceased to think of Mr. Grayson until he spoke to her, which he never did unless she was making a mistake in some of her gardening operations, when he would call down to her, "You're doing that all wrong, missie," with a suddenness which would have startled a more nervous person. But Bab would reply quite calmly, "Set me right then," and would stand with docility, shading her eyes, as she looked up at the old face above the wall and listened for instruction.

The garden was narrow and long, so that she was hardly ever beyond sight and earshot of her eccentric neighbour. Sometimes he would pop up when Pat, who had discovered a new talent for doing nothing at all, was standing on the garden-path gazing away to the south, with something in her eyes which Bab found uncommonly tragical.

Pat used to laugh when she detected the old gentleman in the act of popping up and down; but it was the laughter of one who has the keenest sense of humour—Pat was not Pat for nothing, and would laugh if she were a-dying—and the merriment, passing, left her with the lonely and stormy look in her great eyes once again.

She liked to be with Bab, who never seemed to notice things or ask questions as elder folk might. Yet Bab did notice, and thought to herself, bending over the wet winter clay, that all the desolation of the saddest evening skies was in Pat's eyes and Pat's expression—Pat who had used to be so independent, and to carry eyes shadowless as little pools that reflect only a hand's breadth space of bluest heaven.

At last, one afternoon the sisters were in the garden—Bab working, Pat dreaming as usual—when the most lovely pink rose, just cut from a hot-house tree, thudded on the gravel before Pat's feet.

She picked up the rose, and shook the gravel gently from its delicate petals. She glanced up at the wall. There was no one in sight.

"Here is your homage, Babbie," she said, handing the rose to her sister, who had not noticed it fall. Bab looked up, glanced at the empty wall, back at the rose, and shook her head, smiling.

"He has come round to you, Pat," she said.

"It is for you, Babbie."

"Not it! Even Mr. Grayson wouldn't expect me to wear a really pink rose. He has, I assure you, taken special care to suit my complexion when he has bestowed flowers upon me. That is why I am quite certain it is for you."

"It's awfully pretty of him," said Pat, "if it is really for me. I wish he'd let me thank him."

But there was no sign of the face which looked down so unconsciously and with such a friendly air when its owner found Bab alone.

However, later on, when Pat had strolled away to the wood with Rags for her sole companion, Mr. Grayson reappeared.

"Your sister didn't mind?" he asked anxiously.

"She thought it most kind of you."

"Tom did not like my cutting it—he wanted to show it. But I shall cut what I like. Servants grow very presumptuous nowadays. I shall have to dismiss Tom again. I dismiss him at least twice a year, but he never goes. They're afraid of you, my dear, when you show them you're master. At least, the men are; women folk are more troublesome."

"Why don't you dismiss Southam?" asked Bab, on the wildest impulse, "and see that she goes?"

Her face reddened and her heart beat as she made the astounding remark, which surprised herself almost as much as the hearer.

Mr. Grayson, indeed, stared down at her as though he could not believe the evidence of his senses, and his lips moved dumbly, saying over her extraordinary speech to himself.

"Dismiss Southam!" he said at last. "Dismiss Southam! Why, I never heard of such a thing. What would my wife do without Southam?"

"She would do very well," said Bab, looking up at him as daring as a robin.

"Why, bless my soul, I never heard of such a thing. Dismiss Southam!"

He stared at Bab for a moment with the blank incredulity in his eyes, and then was gone.

Lady Caird came to them for Christmas. It was a great reunion, what with Dolly and Pat home, and Sidney and Phyllis down for a whole ten days. And then the children. The children were to know what a real English Christmas was like. They were to have a Christmas-tree, and tableaux, and what not. The elders were as busy as ever they could be, planning all the delightful secrecies for the children.

For the tableaux some of the children had to be taken into confidence, but these were arranged by the younger folk, by Bab and Pat, Sidney and Phyllis, and only the actors were in the secret.

The big drawing-room was given over to the festivities, and Pat, who was mistress of ceremonies, carried the key.

The tableaux were for Christmas night. A few days before Bab suggested to her mother that their neighbours on each side of them should be asked to join. Mrs. Williamson acquiesced smilingly. But while the Squire and his nephew accepted with effusion, no answer came from the other side. Only just the last day there came in a great basket of Christmas roses and winter aconites and snowdrops, which were the very thing for Christmas, as well as some more conventional hot-house flowers. And when Bab set out to spoil her own garden she found her old friend looking over the wall.

"I wanted my wife to come," he said, in a half whisper, "but Southam wouldn't hear of it. I've been thinking of what you said about Southam. I can't leave my wife, you see. I am all she has."

Saying this he disappeared.

Bab was very sorry not to have the old couple; yet she thought, after all, that perhaps someone else would prevail upon them to quit their solitude. For on Christmas Eve the one thing which she needed in her cup of pleasure came, in the intimation that Mr. Selwood and his sister had decided to spend Christmas with them. Bab had not hoped for it, for she knew Mr. Selwood had always his own children and grandchildren around him for Christmas. But just at the last the plans had been altered, and the sister and brother were to revisit The Lawns for the first time for many years.

It can be imagined what preparations there were. It was fortunate that the tableaux and Christmas-tree arrangements were all so well forward, for Bab could not be got hold of on Christmas Eve, so busy was she seeing to Mr. Selwood's room and Miss Patty's; so that in the end Susan became rather offended, and remarked that, to judge by Miss Babbie's goings on, no one would believe that she (Susan) had ever made up a bedroom in her life.

Just at the last, when it was nearly time for the travellers to arrive, when the fires burnt brightly in their rooms, and Bab had given the last touch of comfort and prettiness to everything, she had a sudden thought that made her fly in dismay to her mother.

"Mother dear," she cried, "how could we have forgotten? There is the Squire coming over innocently to-morrow night to dinner, and walking straight into Mr. Selwood's arms! And they haven't spoken for twenty years!"

Mrs. Williamson's face reflected the dismay in her daughter's.

"It is very awkward," she said. "But it can't be helped now. We must only see that they are divided at dinner."

Then the guests arrived, laden with all sorts of parcels, which were huddled away mysteriously in the big bedrooms to await Christmas morning.

On the morning itself Bab managed to whisper in Mr. Selwood's ear the terrible intelligence that the Squire was coming to dine.

"Pooh, pooh!" said the old man. "Are we to think of our petty quarrels while the 'Gloria in Excelsis' is in the air? As for me, my dear, I have forgiven Chesilton long ago. But he's peppery—he's peppery—and will have kept it up for me. If Gilbert Chesilton will shake hands with me, I'll shake hands with him."

The Christmas dinner began at the unfashionable hour of six, on account of the children, and the tableaux that were to follow. The dinner was on the most orthodox lines—roast beef and plum-pudding, roast turkey stuffed with chestnuts, mince-pies, and any amount of holly and ivy. The plum-pudding was brought in flaming at the right moment; the popping of corks and the sound of the crackers the children were pulling added to the atmosphere of festivity.

To the relief of the elders, Squire Chesilton showed no trace of resentment at being confronted so unexpectedly with his old enemy. Indeed, as he sat with little Douglas on his knee, enjoying Mr. Selwood's good cheer, he looked as genial as possible. Still, he had given no sign that he had ever seen Mr. Selwood before. A stiff bow, when he came face to face with him, had not encouraged Mr. Selwood to further advances.

Presently one or other of the children disappeared, and those who remained were so overflowing with excitement that they could not keep still, and pears and grapes and apples were spread for them in vain.

So at last Mrs. Williamson took pity on them and announced the move to the drawing-room, whither so many of those who had sat at the table had preceded them, and disappeared as though by magic.

The drawing-room was splendidly arranged for the entertainment. At one end was a raised platform, with footlights before it, and heavy green baize curtains screening it. In front of the curtain the chairs were arranged as an auditorium, in a horseshoe shape, which gave everyone the best chance of seeing.

The suspense among the children was so great that by the time the curtains began to go back there was a little sob of relief from the audience.

The curtains were drawn back slowly, slowly. There was a soft light on the scene—Sid had seen to the limelight.

There was a troop of children going down a rocky defile. They carried little banners over their shoulders. An old man was leading them. The little ones were poised lightly as though they went leaping from crag to crag, light-footed as goats. The children in the audience were tremendously excited recognising the children in the tableaux. But was that—could it be—Sid, under the crown of white hair, his comely face half hidden by a long, white beard? And what were those figures behind the children? Other children? No: angels. With each little one an angel went. Above the tableau was written in letters of gold "The Children of Spinalunga."

Another tableau was very different, and yet not unlike. An old man, with a pipe to his lips, pointed to the distant mountains. The children were following him in a long line. Some were smiling, some running; one or two gazed backwards wistfully. Above were blue skies and clouds like snow. It was "The Pied Piper of Hamelin."

Again there was Bab, surely Bab, under the veil and crown of a queen. She held an apron full of roses, at which she gazed in awed bewilderment. Roses lay on the sward at her feet. At the side of the stage a group of children, forlorn now and in very shabby garments, held their hands for the bread which had become roses.

But perhaps the tenderest and prettiest of all was Bab as Sir Joshua Reynolds' Mrs. Cholmondeley, with the biggest of the children's dolls laid along her arm and pressed to her young breast and her fingers on her lips for silence.

Bab's mother was watching Bab from the darkened auditorium with tears in her eyes. If anyone had been looking at Miles Chesilton as he bent forward with his eyes on the tender scene, they might have wondered what Lady Harriet Agnew would have thought of the emotions on his face. Pat, indeed, at the corner of the horseshoe, looked at him once and away again, as though the sight hurt her.

The lights were turned up in the auditorium, and the audience seemed to come back with a sigh to the events of everyday life. There was a moment's pause. Then Squire Chesilton, who had been sitting by Mrs. Williamson, stood up deliberately and crossed over to Mr. Selwood. Without a word he extended his hand: without a word it was taken.

CHAPTER XV.

TROUBLE.

"BABBIE," said Lady Caird, on the last day of her stay, "what has gone wrong with Pat?"

They were in the drawing-room, which had resumed its usual aspect, the Christmas festivities being all at an end. It was a sparkling, frosty day of the new year, with a throbbing joyfulness in the air which told that the year had taken the turn towards spring. Everyone was out except Bab, who was nursing a little cold, and Lady Caird, who was rheumatic and loved the fireside in winter.

"What has gone wrong with Pat?" Bab repeated, from her seat on the fender-stool, where she was toasting her ivory cheek to a deep crimson. "Why, what makes you suppose that anything has gone wrong with Pat?"

"Equivocation, my dear," said the old lady, "which deceives no one, least of all your old friend. Tell me the truth, Babbie. Something may be done to set things right."

"Dear Lady Caird"—Babbie snatched up an Ophelia fan of peacock's feathers to screen her cheek, and made a picture that would have enchanted Aimée beyond words—"I don't know anything about Pat. I am so sorry. She is not like the old Pat, who had no secrets. I know what you mean. She is not the old Pat. More than that I do not know."

"Tell me now, Babbie, like a good child. What brought her home so suddenly from that place where that heathen woman sent her? I was always against it, you remember."

"Ah! That is precisely what none of us know."

"She was happy there?"

"Ideally happy at first. She used to write that they were exquisite to her. She was as happy as the day was long apparently. Then she came home. She made no explanation. She was tired of it—that was all. I think mother thought it quite natural she should be tired of it, and was too glad to have her back to ask questions."

"I know. She doesn't see the change in Pat. She has no suspicion of anything being wrong."

"That is because Pat never lets mother see her—as I have seen her. I don't know how you suspected it."

"I caught Pat, the evening of the tableaux, when she thought every eye was off her, or she had forgotten to think, and her shutters were down. She's had trouble, poor child, in those outlandish places. Has she never given you a hint, Babbie?"

"Except," answered Bab, in a low voice, "that once or twice she let fall a word about the place where she has been, saying that their exquisite courtesy is for those they consider the most beneath them, and that for her part she would rather be a poor girl in a cottage in England than swaddled in all that sweetness, which was but a kind of contempt after all."

"Ah!" Lady Caird became thoughtful. "If it was a matter of money now, Babbie. Of course, Sir Joseph's money goes to Sam. Still, I have savings. They are all meant for you, child; but you would not grudge the help to your sister."

"You are very good," said Bab gratefully; "but——I am afraid we shall not be able to help Pat that way."

"You don't know, child. Money can work wonders. Good British money over there where——"

Bab repressed a smile.

"Dear Lady Caird, the Marchioness is of royal blood. I'm afraid, if Pat's trouble has anything to do with anyone whom she met there, that money will not count for very much."

"Foreign royalties are always bankrupt," said Lady Caird. "Still, perhaps the money would be no good. It is only a little nest-egg, after all. So we can't help Pat in that way, you think, Babbie?"

The old lady looked at Bab wistfully.

"We can't do anything," Bab said decidedly. "Don't you see? Whatever has come to Pat, she must be left to fight it out by herself. She is fighting it out. It is not a thing in which we can meddle."

"Sure, Babbie?"

"Quite sure."

"I daresay you know best. I am a great many years away from my girlhood, and I was never in love with Sir Joseph in that foolish way. I had a fancy——Never mind. We were a loving old Darby and Joan, after all, till he was taken from me. I daresay he wore better than the fancy would have done."

Lady Caird went away with a last whisper in Bab's ear to let her know if there was anything that could be done for Pat.

"You will always be safe," she said, kissing her god-child. "You were born under a lucky star, my dear, and are a favourite of fortune. I shall have no need to intrigue benevolently on your account."

Bab laughed, a heart-whole laugh. She could like people very much without being in love with them, and she had heard with no perceptible dimming of her brightness about the Squire's arrangement of an alliance for his heir. She had had to put her foot on one or two little dreams, and bid them not raise their heads again; that was all.

She had not been in the garden for days because of her cold, and so had seen nothing of her old friend. Mr. Selwood had not been able, as Bab hoped, to persuade Mr. and Mrs. Grayson to take part in the Christmas festivities. He had visited them in their own house, and had been grieved at the change in Mrs. Grayson.

"She's nearly young enough to be my daughter," he said, frowning, as he described the visit to Bab. "What's sixty? I ask you what's sixty?"

"Why, I suppose it's just sixty," replied Bab, seeing that he waited as though for an answer.

"It's more than that, you minx. To a man of close on eighty it's youth. Why, I had the world before me at sixty. And there's that poor thing become quite old and feeble, positively feeble. She looks to me as though she weren't long for this world; and then what will poor Grayson do? For since they lost their little girl he's been completely devoted to his wife. Poor thing! she was quite pleased to hear all about the children—she's seen them from her windows, and seems to know them by heart. Yet, when I pressed the point, and asked her to come in and see them nearer, she looked at that black-browed woman, who was in and out of the room all the time like a dog at a fair, and said she couldn't think of such a thing. She was as flurried as though I had suggested a trip to the moon."

"'Oh!' cried Bab, 'you must never say such things again.'"—p. 237.

"I don't like Southam," said Bab.

"Nor do I, though I don't go as far as my sister, who says she's a murderess. I don't like to think of a gentle thing like Minnie Grayson in her hands. You can't imagine what a pretty thing Minnie was when Grayson married her. We were all in love with her, we were indeed, and Grayson as cock-a-hoop as possible because he'd won her. Still, you don't think the woman can do her any harm? Grayson is always there. Upon my word, if I thought otherwise, I'd go in and order her out myself."

"I think Mr. Grayson would get rid of her," said Bab, wisely, "only that Mrs. Grayson seems to cling to her. She has some kind of training as a nurse, and invalids get so dependent on their nurses."

"I know. I know that they will bear anything from them."

At last only Sid and Phyllis were left of the visitors, and they had but a few days longer to stay.

Bab, in her enforced house keeping, thought a good deal of the affairs of her little circle. After the conversation with Mr. Selwood just before he left, she thought often of the old couple next door, and longed that she might detach them from their limpet-like seclusion. Bab was sure that the children would make such a difference to Mrs. Grayson if she would become friends with them. Bab was sure no one could ever be sad or lonely with children about.

The children had gone to bed one evening, and their elders were having the quiet hour or two in the drawing-room which was the usual thing before retiring. Bab was making a child's frock by the light of the shaded lamp. Dolly was darning, with a whole basketful of little stockings by her. Pat was at the piano, playing something which had a deal of trouble and heartache in it. Looking across, Bab could just see her sister's delicate profile uplifted in the darkness of her hair; and, looking round the room, she wondered that no one but herself seemed to hear the wail of the music. The lovers were on a couch in a shadowy corner, happily absorbed in each other—as though, Bab thought with a certain affectionate contempt, they were together for only a little while, instead of being each other's companions in London as constantly as Sid's long hours permitted.

Suddenly the quietness of the house was broken by the tinkle of the electric bell at the hall door, which Sid had amused himself by setting up during his holiday.

"Who can it be?" asked Bab.

Her mother and Dolly looked back her wonder. Phyllis and Sid stopped talking in order to listen. Only Pat seemed to have heard nothing, but played on, her thoughts apparently a world away.

There was Susan's foot on the stairs, and another hurried, uncertain one with it. The feet were at the door. It was opened. Susan's voice announced "Mr. Grayson," and the little old gentleman came shambling into the room.

He was so obviously agitated that the words of welcome froze on Bab's lips. He stood panting a second before speech could come. Then he looked round the room, and his eyes fell on Sid's face.

"You will excuse my intrusion," he said to Mrs. Williamson, not looking at her, "but I understood from Mr. Selwood that you had a friend, a doctor, staying with you. Perhaps this is the gentleman? My poor wife is very ill, and the doctor is three miles away."

"I will come at once," said Sid, "if you'll allow me to fetch one or two things. Would you mind telling me what is the matter exactly?"

"She has fainted, sir, and we cannot bring her to." The old man began to tremble. "It seems that she has fainted before, but nothing like this—nothing like this. Her attendant has kept it from me. She has always been able to bring her round before, but we can do nothing now. Pray, sir, come at once."

"I shall be with you before you reach your own hall door," said Sid, seeing the old man could hardly bear the detention. "I have only to fetch one or two things that may be necessary."

Bab went downstairs with Mr. Grayson, and, seeing that his footsteps were somewhat uncertain, she put her hand into his arm, and led him as though she were his granddaughter. He did not seem to notice, but she thought he leant a little on her. When they reached the hall she hastily pulled on a pair of overshoes, and, reaching to the rack, took a warm wrap and put it over her head and shoulders.

Only then did the old gentleman seem to observe her.

"Are you coming with me, my dear?" he asked gratefully.

"Just to your door," she said. "Sid—Dr. Le Mesurier—will let us know if we can be of any use. Mother is a splendid nurse, and I have had a little experience with the children. We shall sit up and see if Sid wants us. Ah, here he comes!"

Sidney was following them over the frozen path, and had overtaken them in a second.

"Run back now, Babbie," he said. "Your dress is rather thin."

"We shall wait up for you, Sid."

"I don't suppose I shall be long," he replied, hurrying Mr. Grayson with him into the house.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE DOCTOR AND HIS PATIENT.

THE little party waited long for Sid's return, so long that the fire had to be replenished several times and the frosty cold crept into the house, as it will when the hour gets late, no matter how diligent one is over the fires.

It was an anxious little party, too. Mrs. Williamson's novel ceased to interest her in view of what was happening a few yards away. Bab had tired of her work, and let it fall into her work-basket. Dolly sat, a stocking extended for darning on her hand, with the needle sticking in it. Phyllis walked about uneasily, taking up things and setting them down again. Pat had left the piano, and sat in a low chair, with her chin in her hand, gazing into the heart of the fire. Only Rags slept and snored. And they could hear the servants stirring about downstairs. Neither Susan nor Rebecca was the kind to think of their sleep when there was anything in the nature of illness about.

At last Mrs. Williamson pulled the bell, and when Susan appeared in answer suggested that she and Rebecca should go to bed, since they were up at cock-crow.

"Begging your pardon, ma'am," said Susan, "I'll do nothing of the kind. 'Tisn't Christians we'd be calling ourselves if we could lie and snore like that dog there, not knowing whether that poor soul next door were alive or took. I misdoubt that Southam woman has been poisonin' of her. If so, I'll go to her hanging and welcome. My poor mother often told me of the time the pirates was hanged at Newgate, and——"

Just then midnight clanged in the frosty air from the church clock, and almost simultaneously there came the sound of Sid's foot on the grave outside; so Susan departed, and her reminiscence of the great hanging which her mother had attended went no further for the time.

In a second or two Sid was among them. His face wore a frown such as the little party at The Lawns had never seen it wear. A thought came to Bab's mind of "the awful takin'" Dr. Le Mesurier was in at the hospital, according to Rebecca, when there was dereliction of duty. All the same, there was something of strenuousness in his face, of power—as though, Bab thought, he had been waging a good fight and had come out of it triumphant, although still angry.

"I want Susan," he said to Mrs. Williamson. "Can you spare her to them next door for the night?"

"Here I am, and welcome, sir," said Susan from the doorway, where she had waited to hear the news.

"I can have her at once?" he asked, turning to Mrs. Williamson.

"Of course, my dear boy."

"I'll come back and tell you all about it," he said, dropping Phyllis's hand, which he had been absently caressing. "That woman Southam is locked in her room, and I have the key. But I want to transfer her, lest she should disturb my patient. I can trust Susan to keep guard over Mrs. Grayson."

"I can answer for Susan," replied Mrs. Williamson.

"If she puts a foot inside the poor old lady's room," said Susan, "I'll hit her over the head with a chair."

"Oh, don't do that," said Mrs. Williamson, seriously, which made Bab burst out laughing, despite her eager sympathy and curiosity about her neighbours; a laughter in which the others joined.

In a very short time Sid was back, and standing on the hearthrug, wearing still that Olympian frown on his young brow. They were all clustered about him, and Phyllis was looking up at him as though she looked at the Archangel Michael. Perhaps the expression of Sid's face was not so much unlike that of the triumphant archangel.

"The poor lady is in a quiet sleep," he said in answer to their questions. "We brought her round at last, though it was a tough job. And she will do all right now, I trust, under God."

Again his brows knitted and his eyes flashed fire.

"To think that such things should be possible," he said stormily, "considering that the husband was always about! Then what would have happened if he had not been?

Oppression of the helpless is the most abominable crime that human nature is capable of. I would punish it by the severest punishment that could be devised."

His sweetheart looked up at him with delighted admiration; but the others wanted to hear what had happened, and Bab's impulsive "Do tell us about it, Sid," brought the recital.

It seemed that Mrs. Grayson had a skin trouble, which the woman Southam, either ignorantly or knowingly, had persuaded her into believing was cancer. The woman treated it herself with quack remedies, and of course aggravated the trouble very much, causing the poor lady such suffering that Sid declared she must have endured tortures for a couple of years back. Nor was the bodily pain the only thing. Mrs. Grayson had the greatest horror of her husband learning the thing she supposed herself to be suffering from. This fear the woman had held over her as a whip, extracting money and jewellery from her as a bribe to silence. As soon as Mrs. Grayson had recovered from her faint, had discovered that the young doctor knew her secret, and had heard his assurance of the causelessness of her terror, she poured out everything in a rush of confidence to him.

"I can measure what her fear of the woman was by her agitation when she was telling me," Sid said. "She could hardly believe that she was not the victim of a mortal and terrible disease. As for the husband, he was frantic when he discovered what his wife had suffered."

"You have not let her go?" asked Bab, breathing fire and fury equal to his own.

"I locked her in her own room while I came for Susan. But she was frightening my patient there. So I removed her to the cellar downstairs. It is a nice dry cellar, fortunately for her; but I didn't stop to make inquiries."

"She let you lock her up quietly?"

Bab remembered Southam's height and brawniness and the dark determination of her face.

Sid laughed grimly, then stroked his biceps fondly.

"Luckily, I keep up my training," he said. "You see, it is very rough about the hospital, and one has to be able to mind one's self."

"And defend others," said Phyllis, with the manner of an outburst. "He will never let me tell you, mamma, but——"

"Nonsense, nonsense!" said Sid almost sharply, and then with a sudden contrition lifted up Phyllis's hand and kissed it.

"What will you do with her?" asked Bab, effecting a diversion.

"The poor lady wants us to let her go, but I don't think we can do that. There ought to be some kind of a mark against her, so that she will be less likely to get another position of the same kind. However, there will be time enough to think of that in the morning. It is time for sleep, children, time for sleep."

So they went to bed an hour after midnight, and slept as well as excitement would permit them to do.

Dr. Le Mesurier paid his patient a very early visit next morning, and found her better than he had dared to hope. Indeed, she was quite blissfully at peace, being relieved of the fear which had overshadowed her life and eaten at the roots of it for some years past. Mr. Grayson was by his wife's bed when the doctor paid his early visit, and did not seem as though he could tear himself away. She was so engaged comforting him in his grief and remorse over what he persisted in regarding as his negligence that she could not think of anything else. Both were quite willing to agree to Sid's proposal that he should send for his indefatigable little Nurse Shaw.

"This," he said, indicating Mrs. Grayson's trouble, "will need care for some weeks, at the end of which time I expect it will be entirely healed. After that there must be no more playing at invalidism. There is nothing wrong with your wife's health, sir," he said to Mr. Grayson. 'There is happily no reason why, after a time, she should not bustle about like any other woman of her age. As soon as she is out of my hands and Nurse Shaw's, I would suggest that you should take her away for a time from where she has suffered so much. Break the association. I would suggest the Riviera, now, in February."

The couple looked at each other rather helplessly; but there was something of hope and joy in Mrs. Grayson's mild, faded blue eyes.

"My wife has not been beyond her own garden for I don't know how many years," said Mr. Grayson irresolutely.

"Then it is time for her to make the attempt," rejoined Sid, smiling down at them, so brave and strong that it was encouraging to see him.

"The spring will begin in February, John," said Mrs. Grayson, putting a thin hand over her husband's. "Perhaps we shall feel able to think of Dr. Le Mesurier's project in spring."

"Of course you will," said Sid. "Isn't there someone, someone of your kin, who would go with you?"

But they shook their heads. They were a very lonely old couple.

Afterwards there was a consultation between Mr. Grayson and Sid, and as a result they somewhat reluctantly decided to let Southam go unpunished. So Sid went down and set the prisoner of the cellar free, and, having forced her to disgorge the greater part of her ill-gotten gains, he saw her out of the house, her black trunk being wheeled on the gardener's wheelbarrow to the inn, where she would find a conveyance to take her to the railway station. So she disappeared into the black world of London. She had, no doubt, feathered her nest well, even though she had had to give up the jewels; but it fretted Sid that she should have gone unpunished.

However, the people most concerned seemed to think very little about money, and to count it as a little thing that the woman should have gone off with so much spoil; and it was all important that the connection with Southam should cease as soon as possible for Mrs. Grayson's sake.

So she took her shadow off the threshold of Greystoke; and little Nurse Shaw came down in her pink-striped hospital dress, the incarnation of kindness and helpfulness, to take the patient in hand.

Then Sid called the women folk next door into consultation, for the house was found to be dirty and neglected, since Southam, for her own purposes, had strenuously resisted the introduction of other servants.

Fortunately Bab had just heard that Mrs. Patten's Kate and Ada, who had accompanied their mistress to Paris, had been sent back by her, since they seemed to suffer from home-sickness. So the pair were engaged for Greystoke; and a most admirable arrangement it seemed likely to prove, since they had been accustomed to serve a delicate mistress, as well as being competent servants.

There was now a great deal of communication between one house and the other. There was a cheerful bustle of cleaning going on in Greystoke, where the services of Mrs. Belson and her Bill were also in requisition. Sensational reports were constantly arriving of the dreadful state in which things were in the dark corners and places of the house, owing to Southam's neglect. The woman's ears must have been hot in those days, Susan remarked, "that is to say, if ears she has, which she haven't an 'eart."

So it came to the last day of Sid's holiday. Phyllis had a few days longer; and to look at her disconsolate face one would have thought the parting was to be for ever.

Sid had been to see his patient. It was now little more than a formality, as things were going on so well in Nurse Shaw's hands; and every day Mrs. Grayson grew brighter and prettier, so that it began to seem quite unfair to talk of her or think of her as an old lady.

The visit was rather a prolonged one. It was a wet morning, and Mrs. Williamson and her four girls were clustered about the drawing-room fire when he came in.

Phyllis turned her wonted smile of content and faith in him towards him as he came in. Her melancholies were not for Sid's eyes. She was the first to see that he was disturbed.

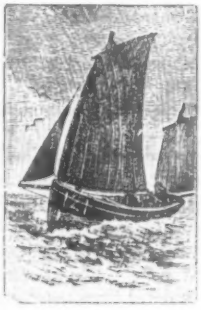
"Why, what is the matter, Sid?" she asked, making the others all look at him.

"Something very unexpected has happened," he said. "In fact, not to keep you in suspense, Mr. Grayson has asked me to go with them to Mentone in charge of Mrs. Grayson's health. They mean to stay till the end of May. He offers me something munificent—in fact, five hundred pounds for the time. I had no idea they were such rich people."

"And you have consented?" asked Mrs. Williamson.

"That depends on Phil. What do you say, child? I was wondering what I should do when my time at the hospital was up next month."

Phyllis had turned a little pale, but her eyes were bright.



"You will say 'Yes,' of course," she said, smiling at him.

"And you'd better come home while I am away. I want to see if the country will do for you what it has done for Babbie. The money will not be needed now. Who would have thought of five hundred pounds? What a windfall! And I really think, mater, that when I return in June we may get married."

So it was arranged; and when all the beds were gay with crocuses amid a sprinkle of snow, and the blackbird was shouting all day long from the black trees, Sid and the old folk next door went after the summer.

CHAPTER XVII.

A NEW FRIEND.

MEANWHILE the friendship between The Lawns and the Manor House had thriven apace to all outward seeming. The Squire was always finding occasion to drop in for one reason or other, usually something connected with the children. It was in vain for Mrs. Williamson or Dolly, who were responsible persons, to protest that he was spoiling the children. His gifts of toys and fruit and sweetmeats came in a steady shower just the same, and his plans for the children's enjoyment were made and carried out as rapidly as ever.

The country in winter does not offer many opportunities of entertainment to little children, but it was astonishing how many Squire Chesilton found for his small friends. Was there a meet of hounds? Then the carriages from the Manor House must convey the children in a huge state of merriment and excitement to witness it. No grandfather could have been more pleased than the bachelor Squire when on one of these occasions little Douglas discovered him, where he sat, motionless in scarlet, on a fine bay hunter, in the midst of a lawnful of ladies and gentlemen waiting for the signal to start. The Squire was the Master; but he made the field wait while he responded to the child's ecstatic shriek of recognition, riding to the side of the barouche, and lifting his darling for a few seconds in front of him on Crusader.

Then there were entertainments of one kind or another at the county town four miles off, and none of these went unattended by the children.

It was at a bazaar in the Town Hall that Bab beheld for the first time, with a certain wistful interest, Lady Harriet Agnew, whose name gossip had connected with that of Miles Chesilton.

She was a very handsome girl, so tall that she made Bab feel little beside her. Hers was the long, tapering figure which seems to belong almost exclusively to the aristocracy, and her height and slenderness were accentuated by the dress of the day. She was brown-haired, with a warm complexion and velvety brown eyes; and she looked with kindness at Bab and the group of children who came in clinging to the wide skirts of the Squire's old-fashioned coat.

She had charge of a stall of toys, and the Squire was her best customer. Watching her as she strove patiently to find out what the children liked best, Bab thought she could love her. She threw upward humorous glances at Bab, as she knelt down ransacking the hidden stores of her table for something to please an exacting child. Bab could not but smile back, and give the amused sympathy that was asked for.

Presently they were all satisfied, and a move to the tea-room was suggested.

"You will come, Harriet?" asked the Squire; but Lady Harriet shook her head. She must not think of tea for hours yet, now that the business was just beginning.

Then she turned to Bab with a sudden delightful smile.

"Do stay with me," she said, "and help me to sell. They will send you a cup of tea here. See, here is a whole basket of violets to be made up into button-holes before the golden youth begin to come in. And my hands are full with the toys. Please may I have her?" to Mrs. Williamson. "Do intercede for me, Squire."

But Lady Harriet did not need Mr. Chesilton's intercession. Mrs. Williamson was as much fascinated by her as Bab.

"I daresay Babbie would like to," she said, turning to her daughter. "Wouldn't you, dear?"

Bab would; so the little party sailed away and left her. Business was really rather slack at this hour; so Lady Harriet had time to carry off Bab to a dressing-room and array her somewhat as she herself was arrayed, in a sort of dainty muslin overall, with capacious pockets and much looped and trimmed with ribbons. Bab, with a green knot in her hair and a smock of muslin patterned with autumn leaves, was excellently suited.

Lady Harriet pulled her about, pinched here, and pulled out there, till at last she was satisfied. Bab's mane, which of late she had been trying to flatten to sobriety, stood out round her head like a halo. Her bronze eyes, ever so many shades lighter than the other girl's, were aglow with pleasure.

"'My love in her attire doth show her wit,'" quoted Lady Harriet, drawing her before a glass, and then dropped a sigh because she had not her string of emeralds to put around Bab's creamy throat.

"But I'm not going to a fancy ball," said Bab, laughing.

"No, but you're going to coax all the money you can for the hospital out of the pockets of Brattisford. Stay, I have an inspiration!"

She lifted a great bunch of violets and held them by Bab's ear, against the masses of golden-red hair. It was audacity itself, but it was a stroke of genius. Bab, looking in the glass, remembered how Aimée had painted her with the iris, and did involuntary homage to genius. She would never have thought of purple herself. But, indeed, Bab was an unconscious little soul, and not much given to meditation on the subject of her toilet.

"It's for such a little while," she suggested, feeling that she would not mind how long she stayed with Lady Harriet.

"For all day," said Lady Harriet, "and till ten o'clock to-night. You'll stay, won't you? I shall have some other assistants, but I want you, too. Your mother? Oh, I think she will let me have my own way. And I'll see that you're properly fed, and leave you at home myself."

Of course, Lady Harriet had her own way, and the Manor House barouche went home without Bab.

The afternoon was very quiet, only a few staid people coming in to make their purchases as in duty bound. Bab tied up all her violets in neat bunches, with a true-lover's knot of lavender ribbon, under Lady Harriet's instructions, and waited for the rush of business which was to come later, according to the charming stall-keeper.

During the afternoon the assistants Lady Harriet had spoken of arrived. There were four in all—beautifully dressed and more or less distinguished-looking girls, who had somehow the effect of making Bab feel rather dowdy, although their frocks were quite plain apart from the beautiful cut and style.

Lady Harriet introduced Bab, but Bab did not feel so much at home with the new-comers. They looked a little curiously at her; and then, having got into their bazaar costumes, were very busy, chattering a lot, with all their bright heads together, in a conversation which seemed to exclude Bab.

The talk was all of meets, and hunt breakfasts, and hunt balls, and garrison balls, and things that were to happen in town next season, with which Bab had no concern. She felt as far away from it all as Malplaquet Gardens was from Grosvenor Square.

She heard one of them—a tall, fair girl, whom Lady Harriet had named as Lady Muriel Langdale—ask who the little red-headed girl was. Lady Harriet said something too low for Bab to catch it, and then the other replied something about Lady Harriet being a pattern, and that Miles Chesilton must be very much obliged.

Bab turned red and white in the corner where she was pretending to be busy over her bouquets. She wished vainly that she had not stayed. All the shyness which was the result of her secluded life rushed over her in a positive anguish. Without being at all unkind or rude, Lady Harriet's helpers overlooked her as though she were not there. Lady Harriet herself made futile efforts to get Bab out of her corner, but Bab only got further in, like a little frightened squirrel in a cage. Oh, if only she were not too frightened to break away, and run home to her mother as fast as ever she could!

By-and-by a good many sleek-headed, well-groomed young men arrived and clustered about Lady Harriet's stall. Some of them looked at Bab with interest, and came and purchased bunches of her violets, paying her exorbitant prices. Bab grew shyer and shyer. She had never before known the agonies of shyness; but then she had lived in a little warm world of her own, where people knew all about her and were fond of her. She had not known what it was to be thrust out into a world of cold and curious eyes. She felt that she was "making strange" like the babies, and realised to the full what an agonising process that was. No wonder the little creatures screamed and cried at the unknown world. Bab felt almost capable of doing the same thing herself.

Presently there was some relief, for Lady Harriet, who had found time in the midst of all her business and pleasure to come now and again and pat her little friend reassuringly on the shoulder, spoke at Bab's ear.

"I want to introduce you to papa, Lord Wivelsham, who will take you to get some tea, if you would like it."

Bab looked up into the kind, rosy face, the blue eyes of which were looking at her with interest, and was comforted.

"She's dreadfully shy," said Lady Harriet, "and I've been keeping customers away from her so as not to overwhelm her. Take her away for a bit, and tell her that we're nothing to be afraid of."

Bab went gratefully. This tall, soldierly man, with the frank, kind expression like his daughter's, was another matter from the immaculately attired young men who had looked at her with interest and wonder, as though asking how she came there. While she was with Lord Wivelsham she quite forgot her fear, and it was only when they had finished tea, and it was time to go back, that the shadow fell upon her again.

"Are you going to be here all the evening?" she asked him eagerly.

"I am going to dine at the County Club," he said, "and call later on for you and my girl. I understand we are to have the pleasure of leaving you at home."

"Oh!" said Bab, with naïve disappointment. "I did hope you were going to stay."

Lord Wivelsham laughed.

"If I were a young fellow now," he began. He gave a ceremonious arm to Bab. The crowd was thick about the door of the tea-room. A good many people made way for him.

He led Bab back to Lady Harriet's stall.

"Make her enjoy herself, Hal," he said. "It ought to be easy enough. If I were a young fellow, now!"

"Oh, there are plenty of people willing to help her enjoy herself, but she's a mouse," said Lady Harriet, looking at Bab kindly. "I suppose we shan't see you till ten o'clock, dad?"

"The carriage will call for you at ten. Do you think I am going to trust myself back here to be pillaged? Not that I've anything left that is worth taking. Muriel has emptied my purse, to say nothing of Constance and Emily and Dagmar. Only Miss Williamson has not asked me to buy anything."

"She is a bad business woman," laughed his daughter.

"Here's my last half-sovereign for a buttonhole. Come, find me a pretty one, Miss Williamson. If I were a young fellow, now!"

He was gone out into the frosty night, and Bab felt that a friend had been taken from her.

Lady Harriet stood over her, with laughing brown eyes that yet had a look of concern.

"What am I to do with you, Mouse?" she asked. "I am going to have some tea. Will you have run into your mousehole before I come back? Tell me, my dear, shall I hand over the violets to someone else?"

"I'm afraid I'm very little use," said Bab, with contrition. She had no fear at all of Lady Harriet.

Just then Lady Muriel touched her friend's shoulder. "At last, Hal," she said in a whisper, which Bab heard.

Looking up then, she saw the sudden rush of colour to Lady Harriet's cheeks, the sudden consciousness in eyes normally as frank as a pleasant boy's. Looking for the cause, she saw Miles Chesilton. There was somebody beside him, a slight, youthful-looking man, with his sword-arm in a sling. Bab hardly saw him. It was so great a relief to see a friend, even though he was going to be engrossed.

"You are to take care of her, Miles, while I go to have some tea," Lady Harriet said. "We have frightened her dreadfully here."

"I didn't know Miss Babbie could be frightened," replied Miles Chesilton, with a well-pleased face. "I assure you she puts me at a disadvantage."

Bab smiled. She did not mind banter, now a friend had come.

"Don't keep her idle," Lady Harriet went on, "but help her to sell her flowers. Else when I come back I shall put Captain Marsden in your place. But I forgot. Miss Williamson, may I introduce Captain Hugh Marsden?"

The man with the wounded arm bowed. He had a pleasant, plain face, and Bab liked him. He was pale under his bronze, and had a soldierly aspect, a little careworn for his years. Bab was not afraid of him as she was of those ultra-fashionable young men.

Lady Harriet looked exhilarated since Miles Chesilton had come. How kind it was, Bab thought, of her to hand him straight over to look after another girl, while she went off with the more insignificant Captain Marsden.

She enjoyed the respite amazingly. It was quite a different thing to sell violets for the hospital while Miles Chesilton stood by and assisted her. In fact, she did quite a roaring trade, and was so busy that she quite forgot her shy terror of the band of tall young women at the other end of the stall, who took gold for their pretty trifles with the utmost equanimity, and served their customers with the air of goddesses.

Presently Bab's flowers would all be gone, and then she felt she could retire into a quiet corner and leave Miles Chesilton to his proper allegiance. But Lady Harriet came back; and after a time, when there was not a single bunch of violets left, she told the young man with her air of one accustomed to obedience to take Miss Williamson away and get her some food and make her happy till it was time for the carriage.

As she issued this breezy command Bab was sure she saw a certain amazement on the brows of the goddesses, and felt immediately guilty. Was it possible that Lady Harriet was sacrificing her own pleasure to making her feel comfortable? Remembering Lady Harriet's flush of exhilaration, Bab felt contrite. Miles Chesilton did his best to amuse and interest her. There was a desultory sort of concert going on, and, after they had had a meal together, he found chairs for Bab and himself in an upper gallery, which other people seemed to have overlooked. The music was amateurish, and he made no attempt to listen. But after a time his efforts to draw Bab into conversation ceased. Baffled and disappointed, he leant back and stared at the ceiling. And when Bab suggested with a sinking heart that they should return to Lady Harriet, he went without demur.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THIN ICE.

FTER that the frank friendliness of Lady Harriet's conduct towards Bab grew and thrived.

She had taken a fancy to the little red-haired nobody, to the amazement of her more sophisticated friends. It displayed itself by her dropping in at The Lawns at all manner of odd moments, which might have been embarrassing if she had been a different sort of person. But anyone more absolutely simple and unpretentious could not well be imagined. Everyone soon became used to Lady Harriet, in her riding habit, with her little hard black hat on the soft brown coils of her hair, and her riding whip held in her stout little gauntlets, standing on the threshold of a room and asking with her frank smile if she might come in.

That was a hard winter. The long frost, which had broken up for the one week in which Mr. and Mrs. Grayson, with Sidney Le Mesurier, had gone abroad, returned almost immediately, and held the ground in its iron grip till the very eve of April.

But it was January when Bab had attended the bazaar, and it was during the cold months that her friendship with Lady Harriet became an established thing.

Bab had paid several visits to Wivelsham, and had somewhat got over her alarm of the fine world. Sometimes she had been accompanied by her sisters, more often she went alone. Lady Harriet would come to fetch her, driving the high dog-cart, with the clever roan mare whom she handled so beautifully. The carriage would take her back in the afternoon or evening.

Miles Chesilton was nearly always there. His visits also had a way of synchronising with Lady Harriet's at The Lawns. That was quite to be expected, thought Bab and most of Bab's circle; and Bab had a way of effacing herself cheerfully, which made her conscience so happy that she had no leisure to think upon her heart. If she had temptations at times to feel dull and neglected, she promptly put them behind her. There was something too sound and sweet in her nature to allow its course to be checked or turned by any shadowy sentimental imaginings. She was grateful to those two because she never felt an undesired third with them. Indeed, Lady Harriet was most generous with her lover, handing him over to Bab as an escort, placing him by her at dinner, leaving them together in all manner of ways, and contenting herself with that pale, quiet Captain Marsden, who was nobody in particular, except just a hero, and as such a person of uncommon interest to Bab's small nephews.

For as time passed Captain Marsden, too, found his way to The Lawns, and drank afternoon tea there, while small boys hovered in the shadow of the screen by the door, and gazed at his plain face as though it were that of a god.

Bab was intensely loyal to her two friends, Lady Harriet and Miles Chesilton. He was her friend, although there had been a shadow of coldness between them, for Bab had sometimes smarted over Lady Harriet's generosity about her lover, and had resolved to show no selfish pleasure in his society, so that Lady Harriet should see that she was quite willing to try and amuse Captain Marsden.

Therefore she was annoyed with Pat, who said suddenly one day, in the midst of the family circle, that Captain Marsden was in love with Lady Harriet; and not only that, but added very deliberately, "and she is in love with him."

Bab turned a generous red. To be sure, Lady Harriet had never spoken her secret in Bab's ear; but Bab believed she knew it, for all that.

"It is not true, Paddy," she said indignantly. "Lady Harriet is——" And then she stopped, adding lamely, "Captain Marsden pleases Lord Wivelsham, who likes his company because, of course, they are both soldiers."

"You know nothing at all about it, Bab, nothing at all," Pat responded, with the chilliness which was a new feature in her since her return from Spain. Bab had a petulant impulse to reply that Pat knew nothing at all about it, but refrained with a start of the mind as though she had been on the point of saying something she ought not. What Pat did or did not know in those latter days was something of a mystery to Bab.

In February and March the lake in the Manor House woods was frozen over. It was Lady Harriet, who had so much joy in outdoor pursuits, that suggested the skating parties under the full winter moon which were such a great success. The lake ran nearly the length of the woods, and was very beautiful, with deep masses of trees going to its edge and climbing the steep sides of the ravine in which it was set. Here and there by the lakeside was a bare stretch of lawn, and on these great fires were lit. Some of the skaters skated with torches, and every evening while the skating lasted an immense moon rolled up in the steely sky and hung suspended above the lake. There was a tent where hot tea and coffee were served through the afternoons; and altogether those skating parties were voted delightful while they lasted. It was a pity that the moon should have waned so soon, putting a stop to them.

Lady Harriet skated, as she did most things of the sort, brilliantly well. She had learnt her skating during a winter spent in Canada with her father; and as she sped about on the ice in her scarlet gown with its trimming of sables many admiring eyes followed her.

Miles Chesilton skated well also, and Captain Marsden was a very fair performer.

Bab, who had never skated before, seemed to take to it naturally, doing very well indeed for a novice. Of course, Lady Harriet was always ready to coach her, and she had so many private lessons from her and from Miles Chesilton, in the mornings before the skaters arrived, that quite soon she could be trusted to go by herself.

There was one thing that troubled Bab on those delightful afternoons, and that was that she found Mr. Chesilton so constantly by her side. He was ready to put on her skates as soon as she arrived by the lakeside. He was ready to fetch her a cup of tea or coffee. Would she venture on the lake beyond the lit and crowded portions, he was by her side to escort her. Bab liked it—liked it very much indeed—but it began to trouble her conscience.

It was true that Lady Harriet did not seem to mind, but that only troubled Bab the more. Because this friend of hers, who had become so dear to her, was frank and generous and trusting, it seemed all the worse to take advantage of her great-heartedness.

No girl, argued Bab, however generous, could really like to have her lover dancing attendance on another girl; and it was a kindness on Mr. Chesilton's part which Bab felt she must show him she could do without.

But, try as she would to get rid of him, he seemed always to come back. Bab tried very hard to be cold to him, to discourage him. Occasionally she succeeded in bringing a baffled and hurt look into his face; but then her contrition would be so great that she would undo what she had accomplished. Indeed, Miles Chesilton's air of happy, restored confidence after one of these occurrences was worse than what had gone before. Suddenly Bab came, at last, to have an inkling of the truth, or of part of it. How awful it would be, she cried out to herself, if Mr. Chesilton were really to like her better than Lady Harriet! She was standing before the glass in her own little bare room one wintry evening. She had run away home from the lake before anyone could miss her, and was now changing her bodice for dinner. She was glad to be alone for a few minutes, and she had stolen upstairs without going into the drawing-room where the others sat.

She caught sight of herself in the glass, and saw that her cheeks, usually so pale, were scarlet. She clapped her hands over them. They wore the very hue of guilt, she thought. What was it Miles Chesilton had said, had looked? She would not think of that. But, oh how hard it was to do right for him and for herself! She had tried that afternoon to keep with Lady Harriet and Captain Marsden, but they had not seemed to understand. "Take care of her, Miles," Lady Harriet had called back, skimming away from them. Was ever such faith, such trust? Oh, if she could betray it, if she could let him betray it, she would not be fit to live, she thought with youthful exaggeration.

Turning then, she had apologised to Miles Chesilton for her slowness which kept him behind. She was quite safe by herself, she suggested. He bent his head and looked into her face. "Come, let us follow them," he said, holding out his hand.

She put her own into it, and he quickened his pace. It was like skating in a dream, that endless flying which takes no heed of obstacles. They left the other skaters behind them, and the trees and the fires with their leaping lights and black shadows, and were out on the open part of the lake. Up there it was all silence and whiteness, and a swift wind went with them and sang in their ears.

Suddenly Miles Chesilton pulled up.

"Thin ice beyond, Miss Barbara," he said. "No one but myself would have dared to bring you so far, but I know every inch of the lake."

He laughed with the exhilaration of the hour and the strong exercise, and perhaps something else.

"I wish it might have gone on for ever," he said, leading her back more gently. "And see how far we have come! Did you imagine we had left the others so far behind?"

"They will wonder what has become of us," responded Bab, soberly.

"Not they," he laughed. "You don't suppose that anyone misses us? Not Lady Harriet, for instance, and Marsden."

"Lady Harriet is very kind," said Bab sedately. "You are all very kind in letting me be a drag on your pleasure."

It was then that Miles Chesilton turned and looked into her eyes.

"You are all so clever at skating," she faltered, "and I am slow. And, of course, you would naturally prefer to be with her."

"With whom?" asked Miles Chesilton in a tone of stupefaction. "Why should I prefer to be with anyone? And I don't. So long as you will give me the privilege of being with you. Miss Barbara—you must know! Bab, my dear, dearest——"

"Oh!" cried Bab, with so much trouble in her voice that it froze the hot words on the young fellow's lips, "you must never say such things again. I can never speak to you again if you say such things. I can't endure it. What must you think of me?"

"Think of you!" he answered slowly. "Why, my dear, I was trying to tell you."

She pulled her hand from his so suddenly that she would have fallen if he had not put out a hand to steady her. He was looking straight into her eyes, and the moon was full upon her face. What he saw there smote him like a sword. That he should bring that look of terror into any woman's eyes, into the eyes of the girl he loved!

For a second or two he was silent as they sped on towards the fires and the flying figures which crossed and recrossed their brilliance.

Then he spoke, and there was something like a sob in his voice.

"I shall not frighten you again," he said; "you may be quite sure of that."

When they came opposite the tea-tent he turned towards the bank.

"I see the Squire and Lord Wivelsham walking up and down," he said, "there by the cedar. You can see the red tips of their cigars. I shall leave you with them while I fetch you some tea."

He took off her skates as carefully as ever, but Bab felt that his carefulness was a heaping of coals of fire on her head.

"I think I would rather go home," she said, "if you do not mind. Please tell Lady Harriet. No, please, do not trouble to come with me. It is only up this path to the gate."

But he went with her to the gate by which he had first seen her. Turning to look back as she crossed the field to the house, Bab had seen that he was still there.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE DON.

THE next day Bab asked almost humbly for Pat's companionship when she went skating. She did not think of absenting herself, for that would only have brought her friend eager to know the cause. No, she must go, of course, and not betray herself; but she was quite determined that she would not find herself again alone with Miles Chesilton.

Pat refused her rather coldly. She had taken to long solitary walks, and when she was within doors she shut herself away just as persistently by the application with which she devoted herself to a book or to music. Even Lady Harriet had not been able to coax her out of her cell, though she had tried. "Let her alone," said Mrs. Williamson to Bab, when Bab fretted to her mother over the change in Pat; "she will come back to her own sweet self presently. We can do nothing for her."

The mother said it with a sigh for the old, exquisite days when the children had been really hers. Yet she was too wise a woman to force herself upon even her own child's soul when that soul would be lonely.

She had spoken once to Bab, and had then been silent.

"I saw the trouble in Pat's eyes as soon as I looked upon her," she said. "Let her keep her secret, Babbie! It is my consolation to know that, whatever it is, Pat has done nothing wrong. I am quite sure of that. My girl has done nothing wrong."

So they had let Pat take her own way, hoping that the hurt she had received—whatever it might be—would heal in the peace of home and love and the country. But to the eyes made watchful by love the months as they passed brought none of the childish roundness and softness back to the girl's face. Her eyes kept their tragic loneliness. Plainly, it was no common sentimental trouble which had befallen Pat.

Disappointed of Pat for a companion, Bab went to Phyllis. Phyllis was genuinely grieved to refuse Bab. She had her letter to write to Sid. Later on, perhaps, she would join Bab on the ice.

Dolly shivered, and leant forward with her hands to the blaze when Bab suggested that a spin on the ice would do her no end of good.

"It would mean pneumonia, child," she said, "and you would have to account for me to Jim."

The children were out of the question—this year. Next year, God willing, the boys would be ready for the hardy winter sports.

"I declare," said Bab, between laughing and the slightest suspicion of tears, "you remind me of the poor little boy who would go idling, and all the horrid things were too busy to play with him."

"You've done very well without us before," said Pat, with the touch of cynicism which was a new thing in one of Mrs. Williamson's daughters. "Why this sudden desire for our society?"

It was enough for Bab, who went off meekly without a word.

There was a frosty red sky of winter, and a light haze lay over the landscape. Every twig of the black boughs was visible against the rosy arch of heaven; and the moon was just rising through the haze, where already the star of evening glittered in trembling radiance.

The wood was still in the frost, save for the crackling of dead leaves and twigs under Bab's feet as she hurried on in perturbation of spirit. She could hear the laughter and voices ascending from the lake below. She took a round, crossing the tiny bridge between the lake and the overflow, from which she could see the barely lit expanse of the ice. She leant a few minutes on the rail of the bridge, which was cut deeply with the initials and hearts and darts, and true lovers' knots of generations of rustic lovers. She waited there a little while to collect herself Ah, well! love was not everything, she said to herself, lifting up her heart to the heights. One could be cheerful and happy without love or marriage; and what would those be if honour and duty and faith were over-ridden to reach them?

A solitary skater sped towards her where she leant upon the bridge. She thought she recognised the figure; but then everything showed dimly and the moon hung round and red in the sky, whose roses were now obscured as though by thin columns of smoke ascending.

Anyhow, the imagination was enough. The skater would not have seen her. There was a dark background of woods behind her. She fled from the bridge, and up the steps on the other side that led to the path through the thicker portion of the wood, a path little frequented except by gamekeepers. So many were the paths and the arcades on that side of the wood that one had easily lost one's way without the clue afforded by the shouts of the skaters and the cheerful ringing of their skates, and by the lurid mass of the fires and braziers the other side of the lake.

When at last she had made the circuit she came out close by the tent where the tea and coffee were being served. She was carrying her skates on her arm, and as she went down to the edge of the ice where there was a row of chairs, she looked about her timidly, half expecting to see the tall figure of Miles Chesilton skating somewhere near at hand, waiting for her as usual.

But he was not there, and the stab of disappointment which came with the knowledge made her blush with shame in the darkness.

Then someone spoke to her close at hand. It was the Squire's voice.

"Do you want an old fellow to put on your skates for you, Miss Bab?" he asked.

"I don't know," replied Bab confusedly. "Perhaps—perhaps I shall not want to skate just yet—since you are here."

"Ah, quite right, quite right! Give a chance to the fogies. You will have some tea, child? I don't know where Miles has got to, nor Harriet and Marsden. They will come this way presently. Here is a beautiful skin rug to keep you warm. And here in this dark corner is Wivelsham. You haven't seen him, my dear. And may I introduce Don Alvarez Santillana, Miss Williamson?"

A tall figure stood up from a chair and bowed profoundly.

"Don Alvarez is an old friend of Wivelsham's. He shot the leopard whose skin is now making you so comfortable. He and Wivelsham have been a deal about the world together."

Bab bowed. The stranger remained standing, and asked in excellent English if he should fetch some tea for the señorita.

Bab thought she would go to the tent. She had seen Miles Chesilton pass by among the throng of skaters, and had wondered if he would see her sitting between his uncle and Lord Wivelsham and come to speak to her. Then she had discovered that Lady Harriet was with him, one hand lightly resting on his arm as they skated. Lady Harriet would surely see her the next time she passed, and would insist on her making a trio of the duet. And Bab was not ready for that, just yet.

Don Alvarez helped her from her chair, and the leopard-skin rug in which she was entangled, with a manner as though he led her out in the pavane. With the same courtly air of homage he assisted her up the frozen slope

Once in the tent, preoccupied as her thoughts were, she could not choose but look curiously at the man whose voice was so distinguished, whose bearing even in the darkness had a stateliness which was not insular. Don Alvarez was looking at her frankly, out of very bright eyes, with an air of grave good breeding that prevented his intent gaze being anything of an impertinence.

Bab looked away shyly. In one glance she had seen that the Spanish gentleman was very handsome, with clear dark skin and finely cut features. He had a little moustache and pointed beard, and the hair at his temples was grey. He was not a very young man, this Don Alvarez, but somehow he impressed Bab more than any young man she had ever seen. But was it his habit, she wondered, to be so tremendously interested in people at a first meeting? And yet there was something impersonal in his glance. If Bab had been the veriest coquette, instead of being the most simple and unconscious of creatures, she could not have ascribed that scrutiny of his to any reason very flattering to herself.

She drank her tea in silence. Presently she thought, when Don Alvarez had grown tired of looking at her, she would look at him again. He had a face like a picture. Bab's thoughts flew to Pat. How interested she would be in hearing of Don Alvarez! Or, at least, the old Pat would have been. Perhaps the new Pat would be coldly indifferent, as she had come to be about most things of late.

When he had replaced her cup, Don Alvarez touched lightly the skates hanging from her arm, which she had forgotten.

"Allow me?" he said, taking them from her; and then, when they turned to leave the tent, he added, "May I have the pleasure of putting on these, señorita? I have not skated, oh! not for long; but I should like to skate once more, if the señorita would permit me."

Bab found herself assenting as though in a dream. She never thought of refusing Don Alvarez. Indeed, was it not the best thing that could happen, for could she not shelter behind his presence from that moment she dreaded when she must meet Miles Chesilton face to face? Yet that moment was something that must be reached and put behind her. They must both forget his brief folly of last night.

When they came back to the two older men they interrupted a speech of Lord Wivelsham's which showed that the subject of conversation had been Lady Harriet and Miles Chesilton.

"I don't see Marsden anywhere in sight," said the Squire, turning to Bab, "and that selfish couple seem engrossed in each other. We can't blame them, my dear, can we? But it is a pity you should lose your skating."

"The señorita will skate with me," said Don Alvarez, still keeping Bab's hand on his arm. "She will so honour me. I have not skated for some time, but I do not think I have forgotten."

"Ah! I remember. It is eight years ago now since we were at Vienna," said Lord Wivelsham. "The Danube was frozen over, and you were among the skaters. How you made them stare! Where did you learn your skating, by the way? The Tagus does not freeze."

"You forget I am a citizen of the world. I have spent many winters in Holland. I had my first lessons on the Neva. You will trust me, señorita?"

Bab sat down without a word to have her skates fastened on.

"Bear with me," she said, as they went towards the ice. "I am only a beginner. I am afraid you will find me very slow and awkward."

"I shall not find you so," he assured her seriously. "Believe me, it is impossible. There, if you will place your hand just so. I can guide you, direct you better. Ah! it is pretty ice."

They were off smoothly. The moon had risen now, and the ice was covered with skaters. Halfway down the lake a board had been put up with a warning upon it that the ice did not bear. The skaters avoided that portion of the lake. They kept near the cheerful lights of the fires, cutting figures of eight, enjoying themselves in company as is the way of pleasure seekers.

But out beyond where the ice was not very thick there were two dark figures which Bab was sure she recognised.

They were safe enough in venturing, since Miles Chesilton knew every inch of the ice. But Bab wanted to avoid those skaters; and the Don, as though he understood, never crossed their path, while he kept well away from the throng of skaters, along the strongest part of the ice in the shadow of the trees.

Bab wondered what had come to her skating. She went no longer over-conscious of inexpertness and afraid of herself. Up and down, round and round, they went as easily as though they flew. It was like the dreams in which one is suddenly expert in some manner of locomotion unknown hitherto and exhilarated beyond the exhilaration of every-day life.

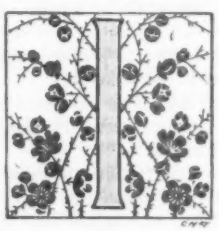
"You are not tired?" Don Alvarez asked, presently.

"I do not feel as if I could ever tire," said Bab, simply. "How superbly you skate!"

"I learnt it among people who practise it six months of the year; not like here, where they skate once in a blue moon. But I am glad you are not tired. You feel as though you were resting? You can listen to me?"

The Don was holding her two hands now, and Bab began to wonder what was coming.

"I can listen," she said. "I had no idea skating could be so easy, so—luxurious."



"Ah! that is well. I want to talk to you about something that most intimately concerns me."

A name formed itself on Bab's lips, but was not spoken. She had a sudden, wild idea that Don Alvarez was going to talk to her about Pat, that Pat's mystery was going to be explained.

"I am ready to listen," she said, in a low voice; and then a little pause fell between them, in which she thought she could hear the beating of her heart.

CHAPTER XX.

MISUNDERSTANDINGS.

"AM come to England, said Don Alvarez, "seeking one of your name. It is your sister whom I have sought with prayers for all these months."

Lady Harriet and Miles Chesilton passed them in the shadow of the trees. Some gay speech of Lady Harriet's reached them, blown after them as they sped on through the darkness. Bab had hardly eyes or ears for the couple.

"My sister—Pat!" she said. "What can you want with Pat, Don Alvarez?"

"Yes, Pat; it is her beautiful little name. We have Irish blood, we Santillanas. She went away from me; but I had faith that I should find her, and I am here."

"'Ah, Señorita Patricia,' said the Don, taking Pat's hand."—p. 215.

"She does not know?"

"She does not know. If I were to present myself to her suddenly, she would spurn me perhaps. She has much to forgive."

"I know." A sudden resentment flamed in Bab's heart. "She went to your country full of joy and confidence and faith. She has come back hurt, not herself. Perhaps she will never again be her old happy, trusting self. What did you do to her, Don Alvarez?"

"I! I did nothing but love her. And she loved me. It was other people who were cruel to her. And yet not willingly. It is the code of manners in Spain that is to blame. Listen, and I shall tell you. The Marchioness de Santa Fé is my sister. Perhaps you know that?"

"I know nothing, Don Alvarez. Pat has been silent since she returned."

"Poor child! Well, it is so. But I have lived much out of Spain, and have ceased to be of the Middle Ages. The third time I saw your sister I loved her. I had loved before. I am forty years of age. But Donna Maria died before she was my wife. I thought never to love again, but my heart was not dead, as I had thought. The fires in it sprang up again. I loved your sister, and she loved me."

"You should have let her be," said Bab, with indignation that seemed to make her years older. "She was only the English governess; and your family is very proud, Don Alvarez."

"It is very proud." He spoke with a curious grave joy and pride. "There is not a page of the history of Spain which has not the name of Santillana written upon it. It was so the trouble arose, or in part. But I have lived much out of Spain. I never thought of asking if your sister were noble. I saw her, and I loved her, and it was enough. I asked her if she would become my wife. She honoured me by consenting. Then—I was called away. I know what Spain is—that my sister would never endure the marriage till perhaps it was done. I went to a lady—she is a lady-in-waiting to the Queen, but she is English, and a dear friend of mine. I asked her if she would receive the Señorita Pat till we could be married. She said yes, and I came back as fast as I could travel. She was gone. My sister wept on my neck, but she would not divulge the secret of her address. I left her without a word. I have sought your sister ever since. Now I have found her."

"But—I don't see what Pat has to forgive you, Don Alvarez."

"Ah, poor child! She has much to forgive my blood. You see, it is like this. The governess in Spain has charge of the young girls. No matter how young and beautiful she is, they expect impossible things of her. She is not to feel her youth and beauty: she is to be a duenna. They will be kind to her, oh! tenderly kind—you don't know how soft, how warm, our Spanish mothers are—but thoughts of love and marriage are as much forbidden her as though she had taken the veil. What happened was that our secret was discovered in my absence by a malicious elder woman, who carried the story to my sister. I had forbidden Pat to speak. She was so brave, so true, she would have confessed everything to my sister. Alas, poor child! as it was, before I could return they had sent her away, under a cloud. She did not know how it is forbidden in Spain, among the nobles, to love as you love here. What they said to her of me I know not. My sister is incapable of speaking anything but the truth. But Pat was gone. After I had left my sister's presence in anger I could find no trace of her. But I have found her. Now, will your sister see me, señorita?"

Bab looked straight before her. She hardly heard the last question. She was thinking of Pat's cold and stormy eyes when she thought no one was looking at her. She could understand now. It was more than an ordinary love trouble that had so altered Pat. She could not think of the word disgrace as applied to her sister, yet there was no other word. High-minded, high-spirited Pat had suffered unmerited disgrace, unmerited shame.

"Perhaps she will never forget it," she said in a low voice, and speaking her own thoughts rather than addressing the man by her side.

"She will forgive," he said simply, "because she loves me And in time she will forget. I would have gone to her at once, without preparation, if I had not met you. But—she will need preparation. What can she think of me that I have not found her before?"

"She has been most unhappy. She thinks you do not care. What else could she think?"

"I will go to her at once. She will forgive. I have been searching for her. Imagine, señorita, I came to this country seeking your sister. I knew no more than that her name was Pat. And her other name: that is not uncommon. There are many Williamsons."

"It is as common as Smith," said Bab, and her eyes danced for a second. "It does not stand out, shine out, like Santillana, Don Alvarez."

"Even in Spain there are few that do that. But now I have told you my story. Will you lead me to your sister? I am sure of her forgiveness. Destiny is on my side. It was the lightest of chances that I should have come to my old friend Wivelsham, and found —Pat. You will lead me to her."

"I had better let her know that you are here."

"Come then," he turned her for the shore. "Am I to come with you? She is close at hand, near, is she not? She need not suffer many minutes longer. And I—how I have suffered!"

The last words, spoken under his breath, altered the whole situation for Bab. Why, it had not been his fault, after all! As they came within the range of the fires she looked up at the grave, noble Spanish face. There was no deceit there, she thought, in her usual headlong fashion. It was a good face, a chivalrous face.

They did not return to the Squire and Lord Wivelsham, who were now pacing up and down by the lake-side. Bab hardly thought what she was going to do, how she was to announce to Pat that her lover had found her. So great was her preoccupation of mind that she never noticed Miles Chesilton standing in the shadows and watching her, with a heavy frown on his face. Lady Harriet was no longer with him. He started forward as Bab sat down to have her skates taken off; then repressed himself and stood watching. There was angry amazement in his face as he saw them pass side by side up the ascent to the path, the Spaniard carefully helping Bab over the steep places. His lips moved in the darkness, but no word came from them. Just then his uncle and Lord Wivelsham resumed their chairs close by him, and went on with their conversation in ignorance of his presence. Their first words told him that they had seen Bab and the Spaniard depart in company.

"Things seem to be going well for the Don," said the Squire.

"Excellently. He has my best wishes. He is the soul of honour; a fine gentleman, if ever there was one," replied Lord Wivelsham.

"A curious kind of romance," went on the Squire.

"If you'd told it to me, I'd have believed it a fairy tale. He comes of a fanatically proud stock. I doubt if the others ever will receive Miss Williamson. But he will go through with it, and never feel his pride compromised. With any but Santillana I should be dissatisfied; but, as I have said, he is the soul of honour, and as gentle as he is honourable. I hope the little girl is worthy of him."

"She will look her part as well as any Spaniard of them. You may trust her mother's daughter, so far as the heart goes, and the head too."

Miles Chesilton waited to hear no more, but skated off furiously along the ice. He passed Lady Harriet and Captain Marsden, and did not answer their merry hail. He skated away furiously towards the unfrequented portion of the lake. He looked black as thunder, if anyone could but have seen the expression of his face; and his mood was a reckless one. But presently he was brought to himself by hearing an ominous crackle in the ice under his feet. He smiled grimly as he skated away from it.

"If I had hesitated a second," he muttered to himself, "the old man would have been left alone, and that would never do."

He ate through his dinner rather silently. The Squire watched him from under his beetling brows, concluded things were wrong somehow with the lad, and refrained from worrying him till he should be ready to speak.

Speech came soon enough. After dinner they retired to the billiard room, as they usually did when alone. The Squire sat down in his chair by the side of the fire, and set about lighting his pipe. His nephew took a cue, and knocked the balls about in a desultory fashion.

Presently he came over and stood on the hearth-rug in front of the fire, looking down at the grey head in the chair with affection.

"I've only got you to please, sir," he blurted out, suddenly.

"Why, my dear lad, you always please me," responded the Squire, looking up at him with the fondest, proudest look.

"Not always, sir. I haven't asked Harriet yet, though I know your heart is set on it. I shall ask her to-morrow."

"You will, my boy? God bless you. I love Harriet, and I want to have your children about me before I die."

He held out a hand. His nephew took it and pressed it. Then he returned to the billiard table.

CHAPTER XXI.

HAPPY LOVERS.

MEANWHILE Bab and the Spaniard had arrived at the door of The Lawns. A rosy light shone cheerfully through the old-fashioned fanlight above the hall door. Looking up at it, Bab extended her hand towards the knocker, then drew it back and turned to her companion with a whisper.

"I shall have to smuggle you in, Don Alvarez. I do not want my sister to meet you unprepared!"

"I can wait here," he answered eagerly. "I have a cigar. I shall not find the time too long—that is, no longer than I should find it anywhere in the world while I waited for—your sister."

"With the thermometer at six degrees below freezing point! Besides, the maids might discover you and take you for a burglar. No, we must do it some other way. Wait a minute. I will open the door to you myself."

She left him there, and in a few seconds the door was opened, and she was smiling at him through the opening. She preceded him down the hall to a little room at the back, which her mother had insisted should be hers exclusively as a token of her ownership of the house. Bab would never have thought of it for herself; she was always one to give away everything.

There was firelight in the room. Bab stirred the wood, which sent out a shower of rosy sparks. She lit her lamp, by which she was accustomed to read or write in the very few hours during which she chose to be solitary. Then she left him, smiling back at him as she went out and closed the door behind her.

In the drawing-room she found only her mother enjoying blind man's holiday, and looking into the heart of the fire. She was thinking of old days, and her eyes were wet in the firelight.

"Is it you, Dolly?" she asked. "Ah! no, it is Babbie. What brings you back so early, little one?"

"Something has happened," said Bab, coming forward from the shadows. "Where is Pat? It concerns Pat."

"She is in her room. She grows more and more solitary. What is it, Babbie?"

"There is a Spanish gentleman in my room—a little like Sir Walter Raleigh, who was no friend to the Spaniards—a little also like Don Quixote. He is in love with Pat. He says she is in love with him."

"Where has he come from? Where did you find him? Who is he?"

"He comes from Spain. I found him on the ice. He had come there with Lord Wivelsham, whose friend he is. He is Don Alvarez Santillana, the brother of the Marchioness de Santa Fé."

Mrs. Williamson looked at Bab startled.

"A Spaniard of such rank! What do we know about him? How do I know I ought to let him see Pat? Where has he been all this time? He has made her suffer, but she will live through it. What am I to do, Babbie?"

"You are as bad as Lady Caird. If he had an English title, you would not distrust him. I noticed that Lord Wivelsham's manner to him was more than friendly. He has been looking for Pat. Better let her know. It is her affair. She is twenty-four, and she knows the world. Trust Pat."

"I do trust her. Shall we call her down, Babbie? I think you are right. Girls are stronger, more self-reliant, than when I was a girl. I'm afraid Pat would not let me make her life for her, i I wanted to. You all take it out of my hands."

"You have me for ever."

Bab took up her mother's hand, with the worn wedding-ring upon it, and kissed it fondly.

"You have me for ever. You and the children are enough. I will run up and tell Pat. That poor Don must suffer while he waits."

She found Pat leaning on the window-sill, looking out on the frosty sky, which still had its rose-leaves. The room struck chill to Bab. She put her arm around her sister's shoulder.

"It is cold, Pat," she said. "Don't you find it bitterly cold, after Spain?"

Pat shivered a little.

"It is better than Spain, Babbie," she said dreamily. "I have been thinking. I am very glad to be at home. You are very good to have me, and I am often disagreeable. Presently I shall go out in the world and work again, but now I am glad to be at home, and grateful for all your love."

It was more like the old Pat than anything Bab had heard from her sister since her return.

"I knew you were unhappy," she answered softly, "but of course you love us. Do you think I couldn't understand that you were hurt, that if you were short with me you only spoke out of pain?"

Pat turned great eyes on her. They were full of the moonlight, and looked forlorn and strange.

"You can understand now, Babbie," she said, "because you care for someone yourself. But you will be happier than I am."

"I am going to be happy with mother and the children. I shall never leave them."

"Is it like that, Babbie? I thought you were sure to be so happy," said Pat wistfully. "You are sure you are not making a mistake?"

"I am going to be very happy, with mother and the children," Bab repeated steadily.

"I have thought all this time that it was only I was the one to be hurt," Pat went on, in the same dreamy voice. "All mother's girls have been so fortunate. You have only to listen to Dolly. What matter if she has to choose between Jim and the children? She is the happiest of women, as I have heard her say herself, even though she must leave those mites next April. And look at Phyllis and Sid! And your future looked just as rosy as theirs. I thought I was the one of mother's daughters cut out for unhappiness, only I."

"I never had any future of that kind. But, oh, Pat dear! supposing you were going to be the happiest, and not the unhappiest of girls?"

The little thrill in her voice passed by Pat unnoticed.

"Poor little Bab!" she said. "Poor little Bab!" She took Bab's cold hand and stroked it.

"You are quite, quite sure, Babbie? I am so sorry, and I have never been so deceived, except once—except once."

Bab sent a thought towards the patient watcher in her little room. She remembered him as she had seen him when she turned back to smile on him, so tall that his head touched an oak beam in the ceiling, so serious and dignified in his bearing.

"Perhaps you were not deceived," she said.

"About you? About myself?"

Suddenly the flood-gates were opened. The revelation of what she supposed to be Bab's unhappiness melted the chill in Pat's heart. She began to pour out her narrative, the words stumbling over each other, broken by sobs—how she had cared about someone who had seemed to care for her, and more than cared for him, set her young faith on him, reverenced him, idealised him with all her young passionate heart.

"He was forty, Babbie," she said, half laughing between her sobs. "Do you remember when we thought forty immensely old? Perhaps you do still. When we read our novels I could never bear the hero if he was over thirty and had a beard. He—who left me to bear all the suffering—he was forty—he had a beard—he looked a hero. You remember the Spanish pictures—there was a Velasquez—he was very like it. I felt when he stooped to me as though it was some hero-saint—too fine, too lofty for earth. And after all—he left me—a wretched girl—not knowing how I had sinned in ignorance against all their codes—to bear the brunt—to bear the brunt. It was not what the Marchioness said—it was her eyes: it was as though I had been wicked. Oh, the shame of it! I have never been able to feel self-respecting—like other girls—since."

She broke off because the sobs choked her.

"I think I should have trusted him—no matter how black things looked against him—with his face," said Bab.

"His face! What do you know about his face?"

Pat looked at her with a wild surmise in the moonlight.

"I might say I remembered the Velasquez," said Bab, between laughing and crying, as she strained her sister to her; "but I won't say it. I've seen him, Pat."

"You've seen him? Don Alvarez Santillana? You are jesting, Babbie. You have never seen him. He is at the Spanish Court."

"I left him about twenty minutes ago in my little room downstairs. He is there still, poor man, unless he is consumed with his own impatience. You would not let me tell you, you were so long-winded. How well you describe him, Pat! If you had told me before, I should have known him when I saw him. But sericus! My dear Pat! He will never enjoy a joke as long as he lives."

Bab was talking nonsense, and knew she was. The return of Pat's lover had excited her like wine.

"Oh! Babbie, you are not jesting, are you?" cried Pat, jumping to her feet.

"If I were, I should deserve to be beaten. Come now. Bathe your eyes, though I don't suppose he'll think them less beautiful because of your tears. I came up to dress you for the great occasion, and here I am consoling you for your sorrows."

"If he is here," said Pat, incredulously, "it must mean that he cares for me. I suppose he found out that he cared for me more than he thought."

"More than he thought! He has been walking England—like Thomas à Becket's mother, wasn't it?—with only one name for clue. He did not know where you had flown to. His sister refused your address."

"I wrote to him."

"He never had the letter."

Bab was dressing Pat, as she went on, in her simple dinner frock of lavender muslin and chiffon. The most elaborate garment could have done no more justice to her white skin and black hair, and to the purple-blue of her eyes.

The sisters went downstairs together when Bab too had changed her dress. Pat was trembling, as Bab felt when she touched her hand. When they reached the door of her little oak room Bab opened it, and they passed within.

"I have brought you my sister, Don Alvarez," she said.

"Ah, Señorita Patricia," said the Don, taking Pat's hand and bowing above it. "Ah, Pat!"

Then Bab left them alone in the warm little firelit room, and went to the drawing-room, where her mother yet sat in the firelight.

"We had better see if Rebecca can do anything extra in the way of dinner," she said. "Not that I suppose Don Alvarez will know what food is set before him. It will be a banquet of Paradise to him anyhow."

Her mother took her hand fondly.

"I ought to be used to these surprises from my daughters," she said. "Yet this of Pat's is almost too great a surprise. I wish there were not such inequality of rank, Babbie. But how cold your hands are!"

"It is very cold—outside this room where you are, little mother. Don't fret about Pat. When you see Don Alvarez you will trust him. I am not surprised Pat fell in love with him, though he is forty, and has no sense of humour, and wears a beard. But what will Lady Caird say?"

She laughed as she asked the question, but a sudden mist of tears swam into her eyes.

CHAPTER XXII.

DANGER.

LADY HARRIET, accompanied by Don Alvarez, came for Bab soon after breakfast.

"We are to lunch with the Squire," she said. "He made rather a point of it; and I thought it would be the kindest thing to our guest to leave him free to spend the morning with your sister. He is so courteous he would have waited for me if I had chosen to keep him late. So I just ordered the carriage for half-past ten. We shall get through the morning, you and I, on the ice till it is lunch-time."

"That will be nice," said Bab. "I hope mother won't be overwhelmed by the Don. He is rather a magnificent visitor to have in and out all hours of the day."

"He is simplicity itself. I hardly know anyone whom I should feel to be less of a burden. He is as simple as a child in many ways."

"I don't suppose Pat will let us feel him a burden. She will take him out walking now."

"I had no idea your sister was so beautiful," said Lady Harriet thoughtfully. "She always looked so cold. What a difference it makes. Babbie!"

"Pat was always the flower of the flock. Isn't it a strange happening?"

"I am glad to have had a share, however unimportant, in so romantic a story," Lady Harriet said. "Papa told me last night. It was odd that Don Alvarez should have come here, wasn't it? Papa knew him when he was an attaché at Madrid. He has an immense respect for him, and is as eager as any of us over his finding your sister, and so pleased that it was through us. Now, wasn't it strange, Babbie?"

"I suppose his faith guided him," Bab replied, laughing and yet serious. "Mother is rather overwhelmed by his rank. She had rather Pat had chosen a plain gentleman of no particular ancestry."

"What does it matter, Babbie? One cannot be more than a lady. Besides, the feeling is out of fashion. Everybody's blood is so mixed nowadays."

"Except the Santillanas."

"Except the Santillanas. I am glad Don Alvarez is going to break through the family traditions."

They went down to the lake, with only the terrier Rags for escort, and carrying their skates. Everything was quiet there, nothing living in sight, except the hungry birds who were picking up crumbs about the site of the tea tent. Bab stopped to feed them; she had carried a great paper of provisions. The crows whirled down in sooty black to dispute her benefactions with the little birds. From the far end of the lake, where the water was frozen about the tall spears of the reeds, came a loud quacking of the wild ducks who were frozen out of their usual habitation.

The air was very still. The frost was a white one, and every leaf, every spray, was outlined in frosted silver. The lake was a silver mirror.

Rags sat disconsolately at the edge of the ice while they donned their skates.

"It seems a shame to have brought him," said Lady Harriet, looking at the unhappiness of his face.

"He would follow us. Once we are on the ice he will amuse himself. Rags is not beyond such small game as birds, to say nothing of squirrels and rabbits and other inhabitants of the wood."

"By the way, Babbie, I was surprised at your intimacy with Don Alvarez last night. You see, I knew nothing about the romance. Papa knew, but said nothing. Men are better at keeping each other's secrets than we are."

"He did not leave me long in suspense," said Bab, laughing. "Don Alvarez, I mean. He told me the whole story before we had known each other a quarter of an hour."

"That explains your absorption, of course. It surprised me at the time. Miles and I almost brushed your elbow many times, but you neither felt nor saw us."

"I could think of nothing but Pat. We had been so unhappy about her."

"Do you suppose she will live in Spain?"

Bab became thoughtful.

"It is all too new for us to have considered Pat's future place of residence. He ought to live in Spain, I suppose. I am sure he will do what is best for her happiness."

"I should trust him, Babbie dear. Now, doesn't he look as if he could take care of a woman!"

"He is very courteous and careful; you need not be with him many minutes before discovering that. Yes, he certainly looks as if he might be trusted. I think mother feels that."

"I don't care for your young men, Babbie. I like someone grave and serious; someone who has known what trouble is, and is ripened by it, not soured; someone with knowledge in his eyes and patience on his lips. Silent, strong, quiet. I don't care for your golden youths, your debonair persons—not to marry. One has one's needs which they do not satisfy."

Bab looked at her curiously. Miles Chesilton was debonair, he was not the other thing. A memory came back to her of how Pat had said that Lady Harriet was in love with Captain Marsden. Impossible, she thought. He was quiet and pale and insignificant. He had only his sword; his regiment was going to India in the early days of the new year. There would be something almost incongruous in his marrying Lord Wivelsham's only child and heiress. Whereas Miles Chesilton seemed her natural mate. And, marrying him, she would be near her father, who could not have borne to lose her.

Lady Harriet blushed brightly under Bab's wondering look.

"Miles was out of sorts yesterday evening," she said, irrelevantly. "He was very good to me. When is Miles not good to me? But I think he was almost relieved when Captain Marsden came on the scene and took charge of me. I wonder what was the matter with Miles? He was certainly out of sorts."

She glanced at Bab with a sideways glance as though she were shy about something. It was not like Lady Harriet to be shy.

"I wish I saw my way more clearly, Bab," she said. "I have half a mind to take your advice. I have been drifting the way other people wished me to go, because the other people were very dear, and I had no very distinct choice of ways in my own mind. Now I begin, all of a sudden, to have a strong inclination in quite another direction. What am I to do? I have drifted a long way without giving any sign that the direction did not tally with my inclinations. Even now the one who should help me to turn round will not give me a finger tip. What am I to do, Babbie?"

"We are going too far in this direction," said Bab. "See, there is the board right in front of us. Let us turn, and I shall think about what you ask me. If you were quite, quite sure——"

There was a sharp crackle of the ice under their feet. Both girls darted away from the danger, but one was too late. The ice was cracking in many directions. Bab had sped a yard or two before a piercing shriek told her that Lady Harriet was not by her side. She turned round horror-stricken, and saw that the ice had broken up under Lady Harriet's feet, and that she was entangled.

Bab flung herself on her face, hoping the ice would bear her light weight. Even as she did so the ice parted, and the other girl was in the water. Fortunately the ice was very thick, even here, though there were flaws in it, and, catching wildly at the edges, Lady Harriet prevented herself for a moment from being drawn under. But how long would her numbed hands keep their hold? How long would it be before the weight of her sodden clothes would drag her down?

As Bab crept nearer the ice cracked ominously, but it bore her. Never had she been so grateful for her slightness and little weight. She saw in a flash what she had to do. Lady Harriet had walked with a little cane, which was her constant companion out of doors. While they skated she had thrust it through her muff and carried it in front of her. Now cane and muff both lay a little distance off on the ice, whither she had flung them when she threw up her hands despairingly.

Bab reached after the cane and recovered it. She laid it across the break in the ice.

"It will hold, I think, for a while," she said. "Can you grasp it? It will be better than the ice."

Lying on her face, she released the benumbed fingers of one hand, and placed it about the cane. Then the other. Lady Harriet's eyes, full of terror, gazed into hers. Lady Harriet's face was already pinched and blue, her teeth chattered. She did not seem capable of supporting herself for much longer.

"I am going," she sobbed through her teeth. "I feel myself going, Babbie. Can you help me? Oh, must I die, Babbie? Just when life seems so sweet!"

"There is a ladder over there on the shore, and a coil of rope. If I could leave you for a few minutes!"

"Don't leave me. Don't let me die alone. Oh, if God would send help! I am frozen, Babbie. I cannot hold on much longer."

Bab crept nearer, and laid firm hold of the collar of Lady Harriet's coat. Lying as she was she had no power, and she was conscious that if Lady Harriet sank she would almost certainly draw her down with her; but she wanted to give her some confidence, and she never thought of refusing her the comfort of her nearness. With her face close to her friend's face, she shrieked, hoping the cry would bring help. She could not even look to see if help were coming, and Lady Harriet was fast becoming benumbed into unconsciousness. She had a vague sense of the babel of noise among the wild ducks, broken by the barking of Rags, as he ran frantically up and down the bank. She tried to think of God. Was not He up there, looking down at them out of the hard sky? Could not He send help still to save them, whose loss would mean the breaking of hearts?

With another effort she shrieked again, and was answered by the quacking of the wild ducks. She began to feel Lady Harriet sinking from her hold. She was going with her, she could not let her go alone. She heard the ripping of the ice. She felt the deadly chill of the water against her face. Her eyes closed.

Then there was another sound, and something brushed her shoulder. She opened her eyes languidly and saw the rungs of a ladder. She felt the heavy burden drawn from her arms. Then

"'Let us get her to a fire, and we may save her life yet.'" she felt herself lifted, and life began to pour back into her veins.

"I shall have to leave you a second," said Miles Chesilton's voice at her ears, "while I get Lady Harriet to a place of safety. Can you help yourself? You are on the ladder. Can you work yourself forward along it?"

Without answering, Bab began to draw herself in the direction he had indicated. Even in those few minutes she had been half frozen, and the returning life was reluctant and painful.

Presently she had come to the end of the ladder, and found herself assisted to stand upright. Then she saw Lady Harriet lying on the bank.

"She is not dead!" she cried. There was no sign of life in the motionless figure.

"She is not dead," Miles Chesilton answered shortly, "but I don't know how long she will live if we cannot get her to warmth and a fire. Fortunately it is not far to a gamekeeper's cottage. I must carry her there. Come, let me assist you to the bank."

Then Bab remembered that her skates were on, but she was too numbed to use them. She let Miles Chesilton draw them off, and then cried to him to hasten: she could do very well. He assisted her to the bank, which was close at hand. She saw him stoop down and lift up the drowned girl, noticing for the first time consciously that he was without a coat. He had wrapped his about Lady Harriet.

"You will get your death," she said.

"There is no time to think of that," he replied, staggering under the weight of the tall girl with all her drenched clothing. "Let us get her to a fire, and we may save her life yet."

Bab never forgot that slow and painful progress up the sides of the ravine and then along the narrow path which led to the gamekeeper's cottage.

Fortunately Mrs. Vale, the gamekeeper's wife, who came out with her hands uplifted in horror as she saw young Mr. Chesilton and his burden, was a capable and housewifely person.

They watched her for a second, while she spread a mattress on the floor in front of the fire and laid a blanket upon it.

"We shall want cordial and hot-water bottles and all sorts of things," said Bab, collecting her senses. "Go now. Send a man for the doctor. And tell Mrs. Branscombe to have fires lit and blankets warmed."

"You are wet through yourself," he said anxiously.

"I shall run home as soon as I have seen her into the blankets."

Bab pushed him out of the little kitchen. She pulled off her own wet outer things as soon as she had seen Lady Harriet undressed and laid in front of the fire between the hot blankets. When Miles Chesilton returned with the housekeeper, Mrs. Branscombe, and the Squire, and bales of blankets and many other things, Bab was still there, wearing a chocolate-coloured loose wrapper with blue flowers on it belonging to Mrs. Vale, the gamekeeper's wife. And Lady Harriet was just opening her eyes.

Bab put a finger to her lip and signed for the cordial as they came in. Miles Chesilton poured some into a cup, and would have lifted Lady Harriet's head, but Bab did that herself with quiet dexterity, laying the head back softly on its pillow when she was done.

She had no time to think of the strange appearance she must present. As a matter of fact, she looked oddly brilliant, for two little fires had come into her usually pale cheeks, her eyes had fires in their soft depths, and her unmanageable hair flamed in the wildest of aureoles. The too ample gown accommodated itself to the soft curves of her slender figure in the most charming way.

They watched anxiously to see the medicine do its work. Lady Harriet opened her eyes again and smiled at them; then seemed to sink off asleep. Bab looked up triumphantly.

"How good it is to see her smile!" she said.

Mrs. Vale was heard to murmur to Mrs. Brans combe in the background that the young lady had the ways of a mother.

"I couldn't be handier myself," she said; "not though I reared eleven, and buried them too."

CHAPTER XXIII.

OLD FOLKS' PLANS.

HOWEVER, that was but the beginning of many weeks of anxiety, for while Bab and Miles Chesilton took no harm from their exposure, Lady Harriet's immersion in the icy water brought on pneumonia, and there was a long battle between life and death before they could be sure she was to be spared to them.

Once again Nurse Shaw's services were in requisition. She began to talk of setting up in Oakdene, since she had found so many patients there. Bab often wished that Sidney Le Mesurier too might have been with her. She could have wished for no more valiant fighters on the side of life than those two. But Sid was still abroad, and Dr. Vernon had the case in his hands.

When things had been at their very worst a great London specialist had come down for several days following each other. Nurse Shaw at that time shared the nursing with a very fine lady who had hardly ever nursed outside Park Lane. But the specialist had not been impressed by the results of her experience which she thought fit to impart to him. He had, on the other hand, looked kindly and shrewdly at the little grey-haired, brown-faced woman, who was so alert and so cheerful, and who had retired into the background saying nothing at all. He had made a point of asking for Nurse Shaw's address when he paid his last visit. That was when the patient had at long last turned into the right road.

Nurse Shaw was as much overwhelmed and surprised as Sister Priscilla was amazed and scornful.

"We shall have you with a Park Lane practice," said Bab, laughing, "and then we shall be sorry for your good luck, since you will never nurse any of us again."

"If Sir William remembers," answered the little woman, in an awe-struck tone, "it will be good luck. You don't know what it will mean to me, my dear."

Meanwhile, during that deadly danger to Lady Harriet, and afterwards while the result was in doubt, Miles Chesilton's demeanour had been something of a puzzle to Bab. He had done everything for Lady Harriet at the time; he waited, grave and quiet, while the issue of her terrible illness was in doubt; yet never, never did he seem like the man who sees his one ship going down before his eyes, never once did the final anguish look at Bab out of his face of grave and tender concern.

She had been thanked on all hands. Before Lady Harriet herself could give testimony, Miles Chesilton had told how he found Bab supporting her friend in such a position that she must certainly have died with her.

Lord Wivelsham had thanked her with tears in his eyes, which he tried in vain to blink away

"My one little girl," he said: "I couldn't have lived without her. A lifetime is not enough in which to thank you and Miles. And as for the dog, he shall have a golden collar. If he hadn't barked—the little beggar—so furiously that he drew Miles to the spot, then his help had come too late."

He turned away, choking.

The next person was the Squire. He took Bab in his arms and kissed her forehead.

"You don't know what it means to me," he said. "The boy's grief would be mine, and what would break him would break me. That very day he was to have asked Harriet to marry him. You have saved him his wife and me my daughter."

Bab kept this confidence to herself, but she marvelled more and more over Miles Chesilton's quiet gravity. It was not the demeanour of a lover. She was more in sympathy with Captain Marsden, who rode over from the barracks every day to ask for news, and looked as worn and pale as though his wound had reopened. Bab let him hold her two hands while he faltered his admiration of her courage. Her heart ached for him when the news was at its worst and she dared not soften it for him. When she could tell him, at last, that the illness had taken a favourable turn she looked away with compunction from the rush of joy to his face.

"I don't mind now how soon the route comes," he said, in an unsteady voice. "It would have been hard to go while her fate was in suspense."

May came in—the May of the poets that year. There was not a trace of the keen east wind, but soft breathings from the south, which brought all the gardens out in white and rosy beauty, and turned the country that heavenly green which is so fleeting. The young lambs bleated in their pastures. The nightingales sang against each other all night, and before the dawn silenced them thrush and blackbird were awake and ready for singing.

And at last Lady Harriet was well enough to lie on a sofa in the Manor House drawing-room, and to talk of the removal to Wivelsham, which presently was to come about.

When she was so well, Bab, who had hardly left the Manor House, even though Dolly's last days ran out and were done, even though preparations were a-making for Pat's wedding, began to absent herself, in spite of all the protests.

"I have my duty to my own folk," she said laughingly. "You are not my own folk. Why, I have hardly seen my babies since Christmas, and I am ceasing to be first with them."

It was on a morning of this May that Miles Chesilton sat with Lady Harriet, ready as ever to fetch and carry for her. They were likely to be undisturbed for a time. People seemed to take it for granted that they could spend any amount of time in each other's society.

Lady Harriet had been silent while the young man turned over the pages of an illustrated paper. At last she broke silence.

"Miles," she said, "I want to talk to you about something."

"Fire away, dear," he answered, looking up at her kindly.

"You know," she said, with a sudden blush, "that there has been an unspoken compact about us between the Squire and papa for a long time back?"

"Since we were babes and sucklings, to be correct, dear," he said.

"They never consulted us about it," she went on, "and you have never given me the opportunity of saying whether I agreed with the arrangement or not."

Miles Chesilton leant forward, and placed an affectionate hand on the soft lines of her loose gown.

"Time was," he said—"I beg your pardon, dear—when I was perfectly well satisfied with the arrangement. I did not think I should ever question it, in fact."

"Nor I," she answered demurely, "although it is very rude of you to suggest that your feelings have undergone a change."

"And yours. But it was too good of you ever to have been willing to take me. I am an unworthy fellow."

"You see, there is papa!" the girl went on.

"You would not have had to leave him? And the Squire. It would have made the Squire very happy."

Lady Harriet pretended offence.

"You are as good as telling me that you agreed because of your uncle."

"And you because of your father. We are quits, dear."

"Never mind. It is very rude of you, all the same."

Lady Harriet had taken on some of the pettishness and importance of the beloved invalid, and it did not make her less attractive in the young man's eyes.

"Never mind," he said. "You don't want me to break my heart over you, do you? And I should have been doing that only for——"

"Only for Bab," said Lady Harriet audaciously.

Miles Chesilton looked as though he might retaliate, but he did not.

"It's no use, Harriet," he said. "She won't look at me. She is kindness itself, but she keeps me off. She shelters herself from me behind you, behind those children—behind everybody."

"She misunderstands. She thinks that we are destined for each other, good, loyal little soul. Whereas you have passed me over for her."

"And you me for——"

"No, no," Lady Harriet exclaimed; "there is no one else, Miles."

"Isn't there, dear? Then there soon will be."

"I wanted to know because—because—the Squire told me that you had confessed to him your intention of asking me to marry you the very day the accident occurred."

She shivered a little as she spoke.

"I confess I told him as much. I should have been very fond of you."

She laughed, with a heightened colour.

"You must be very fond of Bab instead," she replied.

"I shall ask her this very day," he went on, standing up and walking about the room. "But how to reconcile the Squire and Lord Wivelsham?"

"I shall tell papa. He will not be angry with me; he cannot be angry with Bab. And he will reconcile the Squire. I don't think papa will be really sorry to know that he is going to keep his girl."

"How long, Harriet? Do you know that Marsden's regiment has got the route for India?"

Her face went red and pale.

"I did not know. Captain Marsden has not called. He would be busy, I suppose."

"He would be uncommonly busy. But I don't think that would keep him away. I should send for him, dear."

He walked up and down, while she sat with her gaze on the ground.

"I think I will take your advice," she said. "But first I must tell papa. I owe so much to papa."

"Make me useful. Let me take your message to Marsden," he pleaded. "He is frightfully in grim love with you, Harriet. If you could see his face these days! Give him a lead, dear girl."

"I think perhaps—if he does not come," she said, "that I shall ask you to help me, Miles. No brother was ever better or dearer. But I shall wait to see if he will come. And now, be off to Bab, since we are no longer even possible lovers. I shall do very well. Why, here is papa coming across the lawn. I shall not miss you, sir."

"Give me God-speed!" he whispered, stooping to kiss her hand while they were yet alone.

"God speed you!" she answered. "I am glad you did not want me, Miles. How could I have refused you, after you saving my life too, if you had wanted me? Ah, papa, dear, is it you?" as the door opened. "How lucky you should have come! Miles wants to go off guard."

"Then Miles is a dull fellow and an ungrateful fellow," he said, with tender gallantry, as the door closed behind Miles; and added, with sudden recollection: "But we must not talk of ingratitude where Miles is concerned, must we, darling? Why, no matter what Miles asked of us, we should have to give it him, shouldn't we?"

"Of course. And no matter what Bab asked."

"Why, yes: we are eternally grateful to the little girl, aren't we? What can we do for her, darling?"

"Supposing she wanted Miles?"

"Miles!" repeated Lord Wivelsham in stupefaction. "But she can't have Miles. Miles is——"

"No, he isn't. I can't say she wants Miles. It would be an impertinence till Miles has asked her. But I am quite sure that Miles wants her. You see, it was your arrangement, not ours at all—the other thing, I mean."

A shadow fell on Lord Wivelsham's face.

"I thought I was going to keep you near me for the rest of my days. But if you and Miles don't really care for each other, in that way, I must only be reconciled, I suppose."

"We look to you to reconcile the Squire."

"Chesilton? Oh! Chesilton will come round. He will always come round when he can't get his own way, if people only know how to treat him."

He stooped suddenly and kissed his daughter.

"There is no one else, Hal?" he asked fondly, averting his eyes from her face.

"Why, who should there be, except you? There never was a father like you."

She drew down the grey head to her, troubled at her own disingenuousness.

"And you don't mind about Miles's defection?"

She laughed a heart-whole laugh.

"It was never our arrangement—only yours, you dear old foolish persons."

"I have sometimes thought," he went on, blushing like a boy, "that you liked Marsden's society. Is that it, Hal?"

She rested her head against his shoulder.

"Captain Marsden has said nothing," she answered under her breath.

"If he were to say anything, dear, and you were ready to listen to him—I don't want to pry into your secrets—remember that you can trust your old father's love."

He stood up then, and, going away from her, petted a setter which lay stretched on the hearth-rug. His daughter's eyes looked after him through a sudden mist. Why, if she were to stay with him all her days, was that anything to grieve about? She remembered their old love, the days when she was a little child, and her father, very solitary for the young mother who had left him, haunted the nursery, to the mingled contempt and admiration of the nurses.

After a few minutes he came back to her side and talked about indifferent things, till the luncheon bell rang.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A SOLDIER'S DAUGHTER.

A MESSAGE was sent across from The Lawns that Mr. Miles Chesilton would not be home for lunch, and prayed Lady Harriet and his uncle to excuse him.

"We had better break it to the Squire," Lady Harriet said, smiling wistfully at her father. "Couldn't you give him a hint as you ride together this afternoon? Something to let poor Miles down easy?"

"We shall see," answered Lord Wivelsham. "But, by the way, are you to be left alone because this rude fellow has deserted you? I have a great mind to keep you company, darling."

"Oh! no, you mustn't do that. What would Sir George Bainbridge say? How disappointed he would be if he had not you and the Squire to display his Shorthorns to before he sends them to the county show. No, papa dear, a promise is a promise. Besides, see my box from Mudie's, hardly glanced at! I believe I am tired of your company, and shall enjoy an afternoon all to myself."

"Why, I believe it was a promise to Bainbridge," Lord Wivelsham said simply. "Poor Bainbridge! He is infatuated over those cattle. Yet he never will be a really distinguished breeder. There's some coarse strain in that herd of his, and the colour——"

Lord Wivelsham was off into a technical discussion on the merits of Shorthorns, the breeding of which was one of the country pursuits that had comforted him for the loss of his sword; and the discussion was continued hotly during lunch between him and the Squire, who was thus distracted from his little resentment over Miles absenting himself from Lady Harriet's side.

After lunch the two horses were brought round, and Lady Harriet from her sofa by the window saw the two elderly men mount and ride away. They took off their hats to her as they were in the saddle, and she waved her hand, smiling, to them as long as she could see them.

Her heart was a little heavy because she could not have pleased them, as well as for the news Miles had told her that morning of Captain Marsden's regiment having been ordered abroad.

She selected a novel with apparent care out of the pile by her side and began cutting the pages; but her mind was not in her book, and while she mechanically fingered it her thoughts kept debating about Captain Marsden's movements. Would he come? Would he not come? Surely his pride would not make him go without speaking! That would be too cruel. He might have heard something about her and Miles to mislead him. When she was so very ill she knew the Squire had talked to any sympathetic ear ready to listen to him of the trouble to him and his.

And yet, and yet—she had surely given Captain Marsden as much encouragement as any modest girl might, considering that she knew he loved her, and that he was only silent because of the difference in their positions; perhaps, too, because he believed she acquiesced in the Squire's and her father's plans for her future. Yet how could that be, seeing that she had so held him to her side; that often, when he would have kept away, she had called him back; that she had shown so plainly her pleasure, nay her delight, in his society; that she had put Miles aside for him as easily as though he were her own dear brother, and had let him—nay, invited him to absorb her to the exclusion of others?

Yet such things happened. Supposing already he were gone; supposing she should never see him any more; supposing he had placed himself beyond reach of her fascinations, holding them dangerous to honour. What should she do in that case? Would there be any use in trying to recall him? India was very far away, and the regiment would be there for some years. If she had the forlorn courage to write to him after he had gone without a word, would he come back?

She tortured herself with surmises. A footman came in and put coal on the fire, which was not oppressive in the great room, although the day was May's and lovely. Presently he brought a tray with her tea daintily set out on it. She looked with languid want of interest at the tiny delicacies which accompanied the tea to tempt her as yet poor appetite. Tea by one's self was not a very inspiriting meal.

Then she heard the tinkle of the hall door bell, and the rat-tat of the knocker, and her heart leaped up, although she said to herself that of course it was only an ordinary afternoon visitor. They had been coming in shoals lately to inquire about her health.

But it was not. It was Captain Marsden who was announced by the footman. As soon as she heard his name she acknowledged to herself that she had known all the time he would come.

She looked at him shyly and kindly. In his well-cut dark clothes he looked paler than ever. He was so quiet, so dark, so pale, as he sat there, holding his hat in his hands, who could have given him credit for the dashing courage which had won him his reputation? Lady Harriet winced a little as she noticed that he was thinner than of old. His lips had a set look. Unexpected lines had come out about the corners of his mouth and eyes, and surely the sprinkling of grey which was on his sleek, dark head since she had known him had become far more plentiful of late. Her heart began to ache over the change in him with a soft maternal ache of compassion.

"I am so glad, so rejoiced," he said, "that you are so much better. It is very good to see you back again in your place. The other things will follow."

She laughed and blushed. Now that he was here she felt unreasonably happy. The new lightness of heart made her bold.

"I know I have lost my good looks," she began.

"Hardly that," he put in, with a fervour that embarrassed her. "You are pale, of course."

"Till I can get out. I long for the air and the sun."

"You have all the summer before you to grow strong in."

She shivered.

"I wonder if I shall ever be quite the same?" she said. "I am still horribly nervous. I shall never see ice again without horror. That horrible sinking, the feeling of being dragged down, and the paralysis of the cold——"

"Don't!" he said, almost roughly. "I can't bear it."

She turned her soft cheek from him an instant.

"It is all over now," she went on; "and I am growing strong, thank God! What would my father have done without me?"

"Chesilton was a lucky fellow," he said, with energy, "to have been there. I shall envy him all my life. Of course—it was fitting—he had a right."

"He and Babbie together saved me. But for her I should have been under the ice. How glad I am that they will be happy together!"

"Together," he repeated stupidly. "What have they to do with each other?"

"I thought you must have known. It was obvious to the meanest intelligence that Miles was in love with Babbie."

"I have not the meanest intelligence."

A sudden smile broke over the sadness of his face, with the effect of the sun breaking over a cheerless winter landscape.

"I'm afraid my words are open to that interpretation"

Lady Harriet sent him a merry glance from those true brown eyes of hers, and then looked down, turning the rings about on her fingers.

"You have got the route," she said seriously.

"We sail from Tilbury on the 19th. How did you know?"

"Miles told me, only this morning. Do you know, before you came, I was thinking that perhaps you would forget to say good-bye to me? You were very good about calling when I was seriously ill. So they told me, and I must thank you for it. But since I have been convalescent you forgot."

"I did not forget," he said. "I confess I had it in my mind to go without seeing you."

"And I—I should have sent for you."

He started to his feet and walked away from her in great agitation. In a second he was back at her side.

"Why would you have sent for me, Lady Harriet?" he asked. "Why not let me go in peace?"

"I wanted to ask you to stay," she replied, putting her hand on his arm.

"Why, dear, why? Do you know what you are saying? what you are implying? Do you know what you are leading me to believe?"

"Everything," she said, throwing back her head, so that her face was uplifted to him; and never had she seemed so beautiful. "Give my words their full significance. You cannot imagine too much from them."

Then he stooped and kissed her with a quiet and sober rapture that had God knows how much of thanksgiving in it.

"If you have chosen me, Harriet, the least worthy of men," he whispered, "I must forget that you are Lord Wivelsham's daughter, and I a poor foot-soldier with nothing but a sword."

For a little while there was the broken talk of lovers which does not bear repeating. At last they could look their happiness in the face and believe in it.

"We must tell papa at once," she said. "You can stay for dinner, Hugh? I may take the liberty of asking you, I know. They will be back for dinner, papa and the Squire."

"I can stay, heart's delight. But will Lord Wivelsham welcome me?"

A spasm of misgiving crossed the immense happiness of his face, and she put up her hand and touched his cheek softly as though she would smooth it away.

"I can trust papa's love," she answered. "I could trust it in far more difficult circumstances than these. But, Hugh, need you go? Papa will want you to exchange into a better regiment, and stay at home."

"Why, so I should, dear. You can do with me what you will. But I am afraid you must let me go, beloved, for the present. There is fighting. I could not refuse to go. You would not ask me. Afterwards, in the mercy of God, I shall come back to you."

A sigh seemed to tremble through her being.

"I was afraid of it," she said, clinging to him, "but I am a soldier's daughter. I would not ask you to stay."

They were interrupted in their tender talk by the headlong entrance of Miles Chesilton, looking boyishly radiant.

"Wish me joy, Harriet!" he cried. "I wanted to bring Babbie, but she would stay with her mother. Oh, Marsden! I beg your pardon: I didn't see you."

"You have been in no hurry to bring me your news," said Lady Harriet, reaching a hand to him. "It is five hours since you left me."

"But you have not been lonely. So you are going off, Marsden; when?"

"He is off," said Lady Harriet "He will go, because there is fighting to be done. What obstinate notions of honour men have! But he is coming back, Miles—in the mercy of God, he is coming back."

"Why, Harriet! Marsden, old fellow! I am so glad. Not that you are going, of course. I don't know that I was ever so glad of anything in my life."

"It seems to be a very propitious day," said Lady Harriet, demurely.

The Squire and Lord Wivelsham came home punctually. As they rode beneath the window to the stable beyond they caught sight of Lady Harriet, and waved their hands to her. Presently Lord Wivelsham appeared alone.

"Ah, how d'ye do, Marsden?" he said. "Very glad to see you. You've been keeping this child company, I suppose? The Squire will be in directly. He's seeing a horse's foot poulticed. The poor beast got a nail in it."

Lady Harriet pulled the arm that rested on the back of her chair about her neck, and rubbed her soft cheek against her father's riding coat.

"What is it, darling?" he asked, looking down at the bronze head with an air of apprehension oddly mingled with resignation.

"You asked me a little while ago if there was anyone else," she whispered. "There is someone else now. There is Captain Marsden."

"I thought it would come to this," said Lord Wivelsham, holding out his hand. "You won't want to take her away from me, Marsden, not to the world's end? She is the only child I have."

"He goes alone," said Lady Harriet, "because there is fighting going on. He would not exchange now. Afterwards, when he comes back, in the mercy of God, he will place himself in your hands."

"My dear fellow," said Lord Wivelsham, "I should have been bitterly disappointed if you had come to any other decision. As it is, I think I may say that I don't know any man I would so willingly trust with my girl."

Then the Squire arrived, and had to be told.

"I'm angry with you, Harriet," he said, "really angry; and with Miles and that mim, Babbie, as well. Weren't my plans good enough for you? Still, after all, I can't be a curmudgeon and not wish you joy, since you have taken it out of my hands."

And then he very handsomely kissed Lady Harriet and shook hands with Captain Marsden.

So now there was much ado making ready for the two weddings, for it was arranged that Bab and Pat were to be married on the same day.

Phyllis shook her head when Bab insisted that they might make three brides, and said wisely that a fine wedding would not suit her and Sid at all, since they were going to be a working couple, and after a year or two in a tiny flat on the Boulevard Miche, while Sid walked the Paris hospitals, would have nothing to come back to but a little house with a red lamp outside it, somewhere in a dingy London street.

Of course, Bab had a tremendous fuss made over her, being the favourite of fortune she always was, and Miss Patty Selwood and Lady Caird had quite a set to about who was to provide her trousseau. It was compromised in the end by Lady Caird's providing trousseaux for Pat and Phyllis, while a slice of her savings went in a very handsome rivière of diamonds for Bab, who would now be quite beyond any necessity for money.

No one was more interested in all these preparations, not even the children and the brides-elect, than Lady Harriet Agnew, who kept a proud and cheerful face, and would not let anyone try to console her because her lover was at the world's end, and fighting in that little but deadly war, which seemed to carry off so many and such brilliant young lives.

"I shall be happier than any of you," she said once to Bab, "when my turn comes. Bah! what do you smugly prosperous people know of happiness?"

And that was the only time she confessed indirectly to any fear.

Bab would have had all the world share her happiness. This May month had been timed ever since they had left Malplaquet Gardens for a visit from the little tutor, Mr. Short, and his wife and some of the younger children. It may be remembered that when Bab was four the little Shorts were even then turning the garden of their house at Malplaquet Gardens into what Susan called a "glory hole." Those little Shorts were now grown up, and out in the world, some of them; but there were still little Shorts, and it seemed as if there always would be. Even kindly Mrs. Williamson suggested putting off the Shorts till the flurry of the weddings was over, but Bab would not hear of it.

"As though I could make anyone sorry and disappointed because of that," she said, with rosy indignation.

So Mr. and Mrs. Short and five young Shorts came. The little tutor was as small and anxious-looking as ever, and still wore the surprised look in the presence of his offspring which he had worn sixteen years ago. And Mrs. Short was rather more monumental, and as undisturbed as ever by the wild pranks which brought everybody else's hearts into their mouths.

The Shorts were certainly very little trouble. They were in the fields all day, Mr. Short lying on the grass, Mrs. Short in a chair with a pad on her knee engaged in writing stories for the Lady's Romancer while the young Shorts did their best to plough up the field and leave not a sod unturned.

"For the first time," said Mrs. Short, "the dear innocents have room. Oh, my dear Miss Barbara, how shall I thank you for such joy? They are energetic children, and when they had dug all over the garden at Malplaquet Gardens—and that took them but a short time—they proceeded to dig so deeply that I often thought they must come out on the other side of the world. The landlord was so annoyed when they stripped the drains. Room, room—there is nothing so beautiful as room."

There had been a business arrangement by which Mrs. Williamson was to occupy The Lawns for her lifetime, after which it was to revert to Bab and Bab's children, so that the Squire's desire for Naboth's vineyard would be realised some day, when The Lawns should be restored to the Manor House estate.

So the children were not to be evicted, and the delightful homely old house was still to be home to Mrs. Williamson's daughters and their husbands and children. It was not likely ever to be empty for long. Yet the mother looked ahead.

"Some day, Babbie," she said, "when these children are all reared and have no need for it, I should like to have some little London children here, and do just the same for them as we have done for our own."

"So you shall, dear," answered Babbie. "So you shall. The house shall be your own to do what you will with it so long as you stay in it, and, God willing, that will be for ever and a day."

There had been something of a gap in their letters from Paris. Quite three months had passed since they had heard anything from Aimée or Mrs. Patten; and Bab was promising herself to write them a long letter with all the wonderful news, when one day, as she went down the village street, she saw a lady and gentleman approaching her.

They were arm in arm. The lady was attired in the height of fashion, and even at a distance had a brilliant air, like a delightful grey bird with hints of peach-blossom on its head and wings. They came nearer, and the lady, without removing her arm from that of her companion, was displaying all her even white teeth in the most beaming smile. Why, it was Aimée, Aimée herself, though the old Aimée had worn a discontented expression, brilliant in flashes, but normally dissatisfied with herself and the world; and this Aimée looked so joyous. She was exquisitely attired and amazingly pretty, as she gazed at Monsieur with a pride impossible of description as she indicated him to Bab.

"We are here on our wedding journey, my friend," she cried out before she came up with Bab. "I would see you, and we are fascinated with your delightful inn. Gustave——"

Bab was holding both Aimée's hands, laughing with pleasure at seeing her.

"Gustave, M. de Courcel—you remember how I used to rave about his pictures. Well, I am Madame de Courcel since a fortnight last Friday. I am incredibly happy. Gustave, mon ami—you remember my picture of Mdlle. Babbie?"

"As though I could forget!" said Gustave, who had been bowing and smiling all the time, and staring hard at Bab.

"You will come back with us to the inn," Aimée went on. "Gustave is delighted with it. The unworldliness, the good temper, the plenty! The dear landlady, so fat and kindly. Gustave makes a picture of her for the Salon."

"I would paint Mademoiselle," said Gustave, speaking his English with difficulty, "if she will permit. She wears the colours of the spring. It is superb. Greuze would have loved her."

"Maman?" repeated Aimée, in reply to a question of Bab's. "She is dressing our little home for us in the forest of Fontainebleau. She is well. Has she not written? It is because of the disturbance of my marriage. It was so unexpected. I shall tell you some day, Babbie. It was romantic to the last degree. But you—you look radiant. What of the mother, the old woman who lived in the shoe, and the beautiful sisters? And how are Kate and Ada? Maman has charged me to see them."

Bab could not tell her own news under M. de Courcel's brilliant eyes; so she carried the two back to lunch, and found herself to her amazement consenting to sit to M. de Courcel while he remained at the inn.

Early in June—the marriages had been fixed for the fourteenth so as to include him—Sid came home. He and his charges arrived next door about eight o'clock of the summer evening, and the folk at The Lawns hardly knew that they were come before Sid was once more among them.

They—he and Phyllis—had Bab's little room to themselves for a while; but quite a long time before anyone looked to see them they presented themselves in the drawing-room.

Sid was looking sunburnt and comely, all the London pallor and shadows quite banished from his handsome face by the royal sun of the South.

"Wait till you see my patient," he said, laughing, when they talked about how well he looked. "I am really proud of my patient. She has lost twenty years off her age, and is as pretty as a picture."

"Mr. Grayson is satisfied?" asked Mrs. Williamson, smiling on her favourite, whom the other sons-in-law would never displace.

"More than satisfied." Sid laughed in an embarrassed way, and looked round the intimate circle, which was not yet supplemented by Don Alvarez and Miles Chesilton, who were attending a cricket match at some distance. "More than satisfied. In fact—it seems ridiculous for a grown man—they have adopted me. They would do it, and I believe they really care for me like a son. I could not refuse, not for wholly selfish reasons. They are the most lonely couple, and the world is full of people who would prey on them. I can save them from that——"

"But, my dear boy, what will you do? Live with them?" asked Mrs. Williamson when the buzz of surprise had subsided.

"They don't ask that. They treat me as though I were their own son whose place was in the world. I shall go and come, and they will not be unhappy, having each other. We are to go to Paris after our marriage, just as we had planned, but in very different circumstances. They are longing to see Phyllis. Of course, it's a fairy story, but it has been done with all the forms! If I had turned out a worthless fellow, after all, they would have had a good deal to undo to get rid of me. Can you come with me, Phyllis? I promised I would bring you back as soon as ever I could. They have forgotten to be timid now they have a son."

"Well," said Bab, when Sid and Phyllis had left them, "Lady Caird always says that I am a favourite of fortune. I know I am far happier than I deserve to be, thanks to the Giver of all good things! But it seems to me we Williamsons are all favourites of fortune."

FROM THE PAINTING BY W. H. MARGETSON.

"WE WOULD, IF NEED BE, GIVE OUR LIVES RATHER THAN FAIL."

("A Flame of Fire," p. 270.)

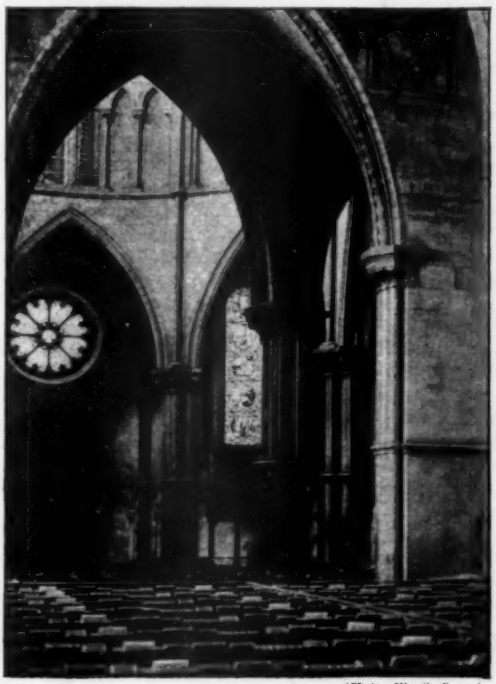
XUM

XUM

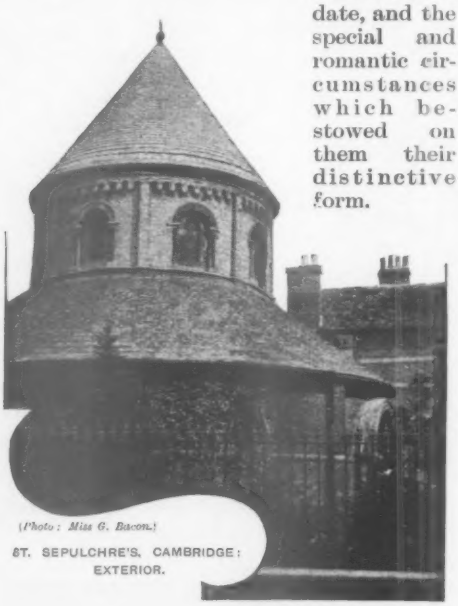


THE ROUND CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

By Gertrude Bacon.

AMONG the many beautiful and curious forms of ancient churches, still happily to be found in such abundance, scattered about our country, there are a few—a very few—of so remarkable and distinctive a character as to constitute a complete class by themselves. These are the round churches, built in circular shape in imitation of the shrine of the Holy Sepulchre on far-off Calvary, and carrying us back in memory to the wild days of the Crusades and the mighty brotherhoods of the Christian knights, once so great a power in the history of Christendom.

There are but four complete round churches at present existing in England: the well-known Temple Church in London, the almost equally famous example at Cambridge, St. Sepulchre's in Northampton, and the small church of Little Maplestead in Essex. Besides these there is the ruin of a fifth at Temple Bruer in Lincolnshire. Other specimens have no doubt at one time existed, and have since been entirely destroyed. Some short while ago when, in recent restoration, the crypt of St. John the Baptist's Church at Clerkenwell was opened out, the foundations of an ancient round structure were discovered. Another round church is also said to have stood in Ludlow Castle yard. Old writings tell us that Wilfred's church at Hexham and the old church of Wearmouth were built in circular plan; and it is evident that this enumeration by no means exhausts the list of round churches which England formerly possessed.



Before we examine in fuller detail the few precious relics yet remaining to us of this most interesting type of building, it might be well to recall to our minds the chief events of the period whence these churches date, and the special and romantic circumstances which bestowed on them their distinctive form.

(Photo: Miss G. Bacon.)

INTERIOR OF THE TEMPLE CHURCH, LONDON.

(Photo: Miss G. Bacon.)

ST. SEPULCHRE'S, CAMBRIDGE: EXTERIOR.

In the year 289 the Empress Helena, a British princess, mother of Constantine the Great, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the purpose of identifying the sacred spots made precious to her by the new religion she had lately embraced. Since the awful days of the siege of Jerusalem havoc and ruin had laid waste the once fertile scenes of the world's great tragedy. Only a few wretched huts, inhabited by a miserable remnant of Jews and Christians, lay round the hill of Zion, and on Calvary itself a temple of Venus, erected some while before in scornful contempt of the new teaching, was mouldering to decay.

But, fired with zeal, the aged Empress—she was then seventy-nine years of age—set forward with the task of excavation; and, assisted as she believed by divine agency, discovered, as was then universally held, not only the Holy Sepulchre itself but the actual tree on which the Saviour expiated the sins of the world. Full of joy and thankfulness, Helena upon the holy spot erected a church large enough to contain not only the Sepulchre but the place of Crucifixion beside, enriching it with gold and marble and precious stones; while she herself returned rejoicing to her own land.

This was the beginning of the great pilgrimage. Hereafter, for many generations, an ever increasing stream of pilgrims, moved by every sort of motive, pious and selfish, swept eastward to the Holy Land from every corner of Christendom. Some made the journey because they believed that by so doing they could atone for a life of misdeeds; others purely for the sake of travel and adventure; but most for the love of the Master they humbly served and followed, to trace His footsteps when He lived on earth.

And as time went on and the pilgrim bands increased, the circumstances of their journey altered. Ferocious Turcomans conquered Jerusalem, massacred the Christians residing there, and oppressed the travellers with every form of indignity and extortion. Year by year the evil grew, till at last there came a day when, stirred to wild enthusiasm by the preaching of Peter the Hermit, the mighty armies of the Crusaders, rich nobles and proud knights, the very flower of Western chivalry, started for Jerusalem; and soon the holy city was surrounded and captured, and through the blood of the Turks the captors fought their way to the sacred Shrine. Jerusalem was now in the hands of the Christians, and, once within its walls, the pilgrims were secure. Nevertheless, the journey thither was yet fraught with many perils. The country round was overrun with wild, marauding bands of robbers and murderers, who fell upon the defenceless travellers and plundered and slew them with impunity.

Matters at length reached such a pitch that nine French knights in Jerusalem, all of whom had distinguished themselves in the capture, agreed to band themselves together to espouse the cause of the pilgrims, and guide and protect them on their way to the city. This was at the commencement of the twelfth century, and the little brotherhood, who called themselves "The Poor Fellow Soldiers of Jesus Christ," possessed at first no recognised home of their own. But as time went on, and the order grew in numbers, King Baldwin II. of Jerusalem granted them a special residence on Mount Moriah, actually within the enclosure of the "Temple of the Lord."

Henceforward the brotherhood adopted a new name, "The Poor Soldiers of the Temple of Solomon," soon abbreviated into the proud title of the "Knights Templars."

The rules drawn up by the knights, and in the early days, at least, strictly adhered to, were rigorous and simple. Laymen of noble birth, they were to be distinguished for their purity of mind, obedience, piety, humility and diligence; and, bound together for the protection of the Holy Sepulchre and the safeguarding of the pilgrims, were "not to fear the fight but be prepared for the crown." They were to live together, eating in a common hall in silence, speaking only by signs or softly when necessary. Religious observances and fastings formed part of the daily rule, and, since poverty and self-denial were to be chief characteristics of the order, rich clothing, gold and silver trappings on bridle or spur, and hunting and fowling were all forbidden, while white cloaks, emblematic of chastity, on which the red Maltese cross was later emblazoned, were the distinctive dress.

Later years saw important modification of this code of rules. Many strict observances were relaxed, and the boast of poverty lost all its meaning as the Templars began to obtain wealth and possessions beyond all imagining. From the very first the order achieved the greatest renown, and quickly grew into a mighty power throughout all the West. Before half a century had passed the annual income of the Templars in Europe was estimated at the enormous total (in those days) of six million sterling, while in addition, great privileges, such as exemption from paying tithe, added indirectly to their wealth and influence.

Naturally the formation of this vast military religious body was quickly followed by others of a like nature. The great rivals of the Templars were the Knights Hospitallers, or Knights of St. John, and it is to these famous orders of the age of chivalry, more especially to the Templars, that we owe our round churches; to which we now return. The Knights of the Temple had been established but a few years when Hugh de Payens, their head and founder, came to London to enlist support for the cause. In this he succeeded marvellously, and in a very short while Templar establishments sprang up all over England, the chief and earliest being that established in London by Payens himself. The site of this was originally at Holborn, but as the English knights increased in numbers and wealth they purchased the ground where now stands the Temple to this very day, and set about constructing their magnificent church and other buildings.

Who does not know the Temple Church, and has not been impressed by the solemn splendour of its tall encircling pillars, and the glamour of long ago typified in the cross-legged warriors, mail clad, shield on arm and sword in hand, sleeping calmly side by side as they have for so many generations. The very names of these grim Crusaders, keeping silent watch in the church in which they worshipped, are now forgotten and lost; but one is supposed to be Geoffrey de Magnaville, the bold bad son of a Norman baron who fought at Hastings. After a life of wickedness he died excommunicated by the Church, and forsaken by all save the Templars, who, finding him repentant, put their habit on him and enrolled him in their order. Even then they dared not bury him in consecrated ground, but hung him in his leaden coffin on a tree in the gardens until, some years later, absolution was obtained for him. Another effigy is presumed to be that of Lord de Ros, one of the barons who wrested the Great Charter from the unwilling John. Another, the son of Protector Pembroke, represented in the act of drawing his sword, the gesture suggestive of great deeds intended but never executed, for this knight died of a fall from his horse on the eve of starting for the Holy Land. It may be here mentioned that when the bodies of these Crusaders were exhumed in the process of restoration they were found to be men of great stature, two at least of the skeletons measuring over six feet.

(Photo: Miss G. Bacon.)

ST. SEPULCHRE'S, CAMBRIDGE: INTERIOR.

(Photo: W. Mark, Northampton.)

ST. SEPULCHRE'S, NORTHAMPTON: INTERIOR.

Great changes have taken place in the buildings of the Temple and of its church, and most of the old relics have been swept away. There still remains, however, the narrow penitential cell, built in the thickness of the church wall, of such dimensions that the unhappy prisoner could not stretch his limbs, and where disobedient knights were confined. Dark deeds have been enacted in this dreary prison if tradition tells truly. Within its cramping walls, we are told, a Grand Preceptor of Ireland who had incurred the wrath of the order was left lying in chains until he starved to death.

Next in interest to the Temple Church comes St. Sepulchre's at Cambridge. The peculiar dedication, which is shared by all the round churches, is explained when we remember that, as already stated, the idea of the round form is an imitation of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the hill of Calvary. The Cambridge example was built in the preceding reign to the Temple Church, and is of smaller and more massive structure, with eight cylindrical pillars supporting the round-headed Norman arches.

The Northampton St. Sepulchre's has suffered greater vicissitudes perhaps than the rest. It has passed unscathed through a terrible fire which once destroyed the greater part of the town. Many alterations and restorations have changed its original form, and only the "round" is now left as it was in the days when the Templars at Northampton erected it for their daily worship.

Last and smallest of our examples, but, perhaps, most interesting of all, comes the church at Little Maplestead, a remote parish near Halstead in Essex. This beautiful little structure is later than the rest, being built in the Decorated style, and it has the unique peculiarity, that it is believed to be the only one built by the Templars' great rival, the Knights of St. John. The Hospitallers had their headquarters at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell, and with this Little Maplestead parish had connection. This sacred structure has also seen many changes, and at one time came into the hands of the Seventh Day Baptists.

A few words should be said of the ruined church at Temple Bruer, a most valuable old print of which, made in the year 1726, we are enabled to reproduce by the kindness of Mr. F. Godson in whose property the ruins now stand. Alas! time has wrought sad havoc with its already ravaged remains. The rounded portion, showing so clearly the old distinctive form, has almost completely disappeared, and only the tower now stands to mark the site of a once noble building. It is said that excavations made beneath the walls, in an absurd attempt to discover supposed hidden treasure, assisted in the downfall of the old structure.

(Photo: W. Mark, Northampton.)

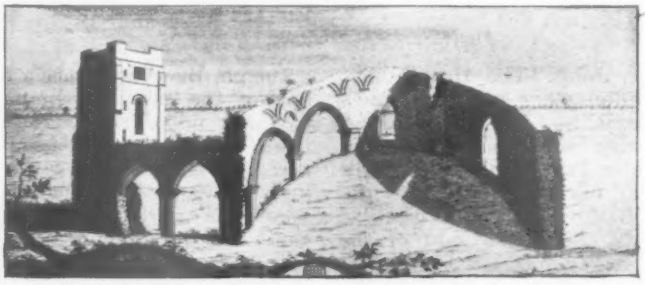
ST. SEPULCHRE'S, NORTHAMPTON: EXTERIOR.

Temple Bruer was once a famous stronghold of the Templars, built and endowed by many noble families in the reign of the third Henry. It possessed ten thousand acres of land, and great was its power and renown. But there came a time when the proud order of the Temple of the Lord fell upon evil days. Its very greatness and riches became its own undoing. Enemies arose, jealous of its powers and envious of its vast possessions.



LITTLE MAPLESTEAD

It may be that the wealth, formerly eschewed, bred in the knights luxury and arrogance, and gave a handle to the accusations that presently were made against them. It may be that the sins of a few were visited on the whole body. Certain it is that a great revulsion of feeling set in toward the once popular brotherhood. On the Continent the King of France and the Pope seized their estates and imprisoned and most cruelly tortured the knights; while in England, by command of Edward II., the Templars were arrested and their lands forfeited to the Crown.

Among the rest fell Temple Bruer. Suddenly and unexpectedly the sheriff of Lincoln, aided by twelve knights of the shire, fell upon the brotherhood and bore them to the Claxgate prison at Lincoln; their Preceptor, and also the last Grand Prior of England, William de la More, among the number.

A little while longer and the whole order, now crushed and fallen from its high estate, was suppressed by command of the Council of Vienne, and its property transferred to the Knights of St. John. Thus perished the proud brotherhood, founded on a high ideal, fostered by mighty deeds of arms, and containing much that is lofty and grand in its history as well as too much that is violent and debased. Gone now are nearly all the outward signs of the famous Red Cross Knights; but yet there are left to us the few sacred structures, still holy houses of prayer, reminding us by their symbolic shape and their carven monuments of the mighty men of old who fought for their faith around the walls of Jerusalem.

TEMPLE BRUER IN 1726.

A FLAME OF FIRE

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,

Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–VI.

In the year 1587, the year before the coming of the Great Armada to English shores, Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, near Barnet town, having returned wounded from the wars, and having spent some time at his father's house, hears, through John Trenoweth, of Cornwall, that an old friend of his mother's is in the power of the Inquisitors of Spain. Being also desirous of finding out the Spanish plots concerning England, he determines to go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, of Cornwall, and John Trenoweth, in order to rescue the unfortunate lady, and to discover Spanish secrets. He therefore starts for Cornwall with John Trenoweth, and on his journey falls into the hands of Jesuit spies. Rupert Hamstead and John Trenoweth are accused by their fellow-travellers as Jesuit spies, but afterwards discover that they themselves are agents of Father Parsons. They at length reach Cornwall, where they are met by Mawgan Killigrew. Here they also come into contact with two Spaniards, whose behaviour is so suspicious that they decide to start for Spain secretly and without delay.

CHAPTER VII.

WHY MAWGAN KILLIGREW AND I HASTED TO LEAVE ENGLAND.

"MAWGAN KILLIGREW, we must go to Spain,' I said, as presently we walked back to Arwenack together.

"It seems to me, you would rather stay in Falmouth," said Mawgan, a little moodily, I thought to myself.

"You say that neither Señor Gomez nor his daughter knows aught of me?" I said.

"No," he replied in the same tone.

"Mawgan," I said, "it is expedient that both you and I keep out of the señorita's way."

"What mean you?" he asked sharply.

"I mean it is dangerous to both of us. First of all, you and I must be friends, and, if we are much with her, we shall grow jealous of each other."

He nodded his head quietly.

"Moreover, she will make fools of us both."

"How?"

"She will make us open our mouths when we should keep them shut."

He nodded his head again; then, after a few seconds' silence, he said:

"And why, Master Rupert Hamstead?

"For one thing, I believe that neither she nor her father is of our faith."

"Nay, man, there you are wrong. I myself have seen the proofs that they are.'

"What proofs?"

"The parchments, attested by the faithful in Toledo"

"Who are the faithful in Toledo, Master Mawgan Killigrew? If they be spies, documents may be obtained easily."

"Spies?"

"Aye, spies. Have either of them in your hearing declared that the Mass is blasphemy?"

"Nay, but——"

"It is this which the Spanish Protestant always does," I interrupted; "and yet did you note the fact that when I asked her a question concerning this she looked towards her father, who said something in Spanish?"

"Aye, I noted that, but he appeared to speak to himself rather than to her."

"Aye, but do you know what he said?"

"Nay, I do not know their lingo."

"He said, 'Do not speak Arabic in a Moor's house!'"

Mawgan Killigrew was silent for a few seconds; then he said angrily, "I see, I see! By Cormoran's bones, but we have all been blind!"

"Nay," I replied, "it was because I know a little Spanish that my eyes were opened. Did you note that from that time they changed the topic?"

"Aye, I noted that."

"I may be mistaken," I went on, "I may have read meanings into his words which do but treat him wrongfully. But we must beware, Mawgan Killigrew. Señorita Gomez is very beautiful, and I could see that while we were with her we both forgot everything save the desire to win her smile. If either of us were with her half an hour alone, she would turn our heads, and make us tell her all we know."

"Ah! you feel that," he said; "but tell me, Rupert Hamstead, why, if they be spies, should they come here?"

"I know not," I said. "But think a minute. They come from Toledo, and Father Parsons is believed to be in Toledo; Señor Toledo is there also. Then again, is not your father governor of Pendennis Castle, which overlooks one of the best harbours in the land? May it not be the purpose of Philip that the Armada shall land in Falmouth rather than at Plymouth Hoe, where Drake and Grenville command a fleet of vessels? Thus would not Father Parsons and Philip believe that if they sent Señor Gomez and the señorita as believers in the Reformed religion, that they would be welcomed by Master Killigrew, as, in truth, hath been the case? Then would they not believe that in time they would win your father's confidence, and learn something of his plans, Señor Gomez dealing with the older men, and the señorita making fools of such as you and me? Father Parsons is deep as the sea, man, and he would move heaven and earth to carry out his cherished plans."

"Your invention runs away with your judgment, Master Hamstead," said Mawgan Killigrew, whereupon I told him of my experiences with Master Seyton and Master Belmont, which made him open his eyes wonderfully.

"Besides," I went on, "perchance Señor Gomez is only one of the many cards which Father Parsons is playing, for, as all the world knows, he is a man of many schemes, believing that where one fails another will succeed. Even to-night, Mawgan Killigrew, your heart grew bitter towards me, because you believed that the señorita smiled on me rather than on you; and such things must not be, if we are to fight together for our Queen and country."

"You be right, Rupert Hamstead," cried Mawgan, gripping my arm. "As I told you this night, I do not love this maid, and yet when I am with her I am not my own man. Tell me what you think we should do."

"We must have speech with your father straightway," I said, "and must learn whether he hath in aught told his mind to either of these Spaniards, and then we must act as necessity urges. Have you in your house a man, a watcher who can be vigilant and silent, who can see without being seen, and who is faithful?"

"John Trenoweth," cried Mawgan.

"Aye, John Trenoweth," I cried. "John Trenoweth will serve. Señor Gomez and his daughter, if she be his daughter, must be watched, Mawgan Killigrew. So far, we only suspect him, and we cannot act on bare suspicion. Then we must not give up our Spanish mission. Whether or no Sir John Tremayne's daughter hath forsaken her faith, we cannot accept it as gospel because this Spaniard hath so declared it. It may be that even now——"

"Aye, aye, I see," cried Killigrew; "but look you, man. If they be what you suspect, they will note our every movement, and if we sail for Spain they will send word before us, so that when we get there we shall be but as lambs in the jaws of hungry wolves."

"All the more reason for silence, Mawgan Killigrew," I cried, "and all the more reason for acting promptly and discreetly."

"Let us right away to my father," cried Mawgan. "Let us seek his counsel."

"If he be not a-bed——"

"No, he will not be a-bed yet," cried Mawgan; "he will want speech with you, and it is barely midnight. But you must be weary, man. You have been in the saddle since early morn."

"I know naught of weariness now," I cried. "Let us go straight to Master Killigrew"—which we did, and ere long found him seated with a cup of sack before him, and a pipe of tobacco in his mouth, which he smoked with evident enjoyment.

"Aye, lad," he cried with a laugh, "thou art like the rest. Even a long day's ride is not enough to keep thee from walking with a pretty maid. And a Spanish maid, too. But I do not blame thee. I should do the same, were I twenty-four, for she is beautiful beyond ordinary, and, although a Spaniard, a good Christian maid into the bargain. But see to it that you and Mawgan come to no broken heads over the business," and he laughed again in high good humour.

"As to that, Master Killigrew," I said, "both Master Mawgan and I have forsworn her company."

"Aye, and why?" he cried.

"First because she's not English," I said, "and second because I have a shrewd suspicion that she is not what she makes out to be."

"Go to, lad, go to. Do not, because she is a Spaniard, close your heart. All Spaniards are not bad."

"Not one Spaniard in a million loves anything English," I cried, whereupon I told him of what had come into my mind, which, when I had finished, made him silent for some time.

"It may be thou art right," he said, "but a Cornishman never suspects foul play without reason."

"I only ask for caution," I replied. "If Señor Gomez is what I suspect, he will have allies, to whom he will report. For this reason he should be watched, and John Trenoweth is the man to do it."

"He will never play the spy. A good open fight John loves, but——"

"He will watch them, because they have said his sweetheart hath forsworn her faith," I replied; "but pardon me, Master Killigrew, have you in any way revealed to Señor Gomez aught of your thoughts? Have you told him anything that will lead him to think anyone will go to Spain?"

Master Killigrew shook his head. "As to that, I am afraid I have been foolish," he said; "but when the man spoke as he did, when he spoke of his own sorrows, and the sorrows of others, when he told of what the Spaniards intended to do with England, I am afraid I did say more than was wise. But be of good cheer. I mentioned no name; I did not even say that Mawgan here would——"

"That will avail but little," I said. "If he is here as a spy, he will have found out more than you think, and he will have informed those who communicate direct with Spain. It makes our mission harder, but we go with our eyes open."

"Thou art a a sharp lad, Rupert," said Master Killigrew, "but we must not rush at things. Let us not judge before we hear evidence. But if you be right in your fears, what are your plans?"

In answer to this I walked quietly to the door and looked carefully into the hall, also I saw to it that the windows were closed.

"What would you, man?" cried Master Killigrew. "Do you think that I have listeners and tale-bearers in Arwenack?"

"Walter Raleigh hath this saying," I said: "'Where dogs lie down there are fleas, and where a Spaniard hath been there are spies. He may be right, or he may be wrong, but it is well to be careful. Besides, I remember that Master Seyton and Master Belmont could well be eight hours ahead of us in coming here; and it may be that they have already had audience with Señor Gomez."

"He got no word of their speech, for they spoke in low tones."—p. 266

"What! those fellows who accused thee and John Trenoweth of being Jesuits?" cried Master Killigrew, for I had told him of my experiences with these men. "I had not thought of that."

"It may be all foolishness on my part," I said, "but, as my father often says, a man never loses aught by taking precautions. This is what I planned after leaving Willacombe, and even now I cannot see how we can improve on it. Whether we find aught against Señor Gomez or no, we go to Spain. Even though Señora de Valencia and Esther Truscott have renounced their faith, we must still go. First, because if the report of Gomez be true, they have renounced it in fear of torture, and second because we have still our Queen and country to serve. Then comes this question: how can we get into Spain, and, what is of more importance still, how can we enter Toledo?"

"Easy, lad, easy," said Master Killigrew lightly, who had evidently given no thought to the matter.

"Not so easy," I answered. "Every port is guarded, and every English Protestant who tries to land on Spanish soil is taken and dragged before the Inquisitors. And, to be truthful, I do not wish to become acquainted with the Inquisitors, neither do I desire to be roasted for the glory of God."

'Well, what have you planned?" he asked.

"At present France is in many respects a neutral country," I replied. "We must therefore, as it seems to me, set sail for Bordeaux, and on arriving there buy horses, by means of which we must travel southward."

"Aye, but what about that great range of mountains?"

"That will be in our favour. From all I can learn, the mountains which divide Spain from France are bare and rugged. Moreover, the country is but thinly peopled for many miles."

"May God preserve you all!" said Master Killigrew fervently, after a few moments' deliberation.

"We must then ride southward until we reach Toledo," I said, "whereupon, after having gained entrance into the city, we must trust to God, and our own good wits."

"And you say Father Parsons is in Toledo?" he said.

"Aye, and Señor Toledo into the bargain. But then so is Sir John Tremayne's daughter, together with Esther Truscott. Moreover Toledo is governed by priests. Indeed, it is said that even Philip, ardent Catholic as he is, hath removed his Court from Toledo, because the priests make him do their bidding."

"May God preserve you!" said Master Killigrew, again sighing deeply. "This is not like ordinary fighting, my lad. It is not sword against sword, and pike against pike, or even one sword against three or four. If it were, I should have no fear. But it is three straightforward Englishmen against a set of Papist flesh-roasters."

"And what of that, Master Killigrew! We have still the mercy of God and our own good swords to trust in."

After this, late as it was, we stayed talking over our plans till far into the morning, after which I went to bed, and slept soundly. The following day I was aroused by a loud noise at the door, and the sound of Mawgan Killigrew's deep voice.

"God's grace be with you, Rupert Hamstead. It's nearly midday, a cloudless sky, and great news stirring."

"Ah!" I cried, "midday! Great news!"

"Open the door quick, man!"

A minute later Mawgan entered the room, his usually calm face flushed, his eyes burning with excitement.

"Rub the sleep out of your eyes, and listen," he said, for he saw that I was but half awake.

For answer I plunged my head into a basin of cold water, and then, having well rubbed myself, was ready for anything.

"You sleep well," said Mawgan.

"Fourteen hours in the saddle, with what followed, is enough to tire any man," I replied. "But your news, man, your news!"

"Directly you went to bed last night," said Mawgan, "John Trenoweth came to me, and wanted to fight me. The news that Esther had changed her religion had so wrought upon him that he could not contain himself. He must fight or go mad, he said. So, not feeling like either fencing or wrestling, I told him of Señor Gomez, and what we wanted him to do. The effect was wonderful; all his desire to fight died away, and he became as eager as a boy. He grasped the situation in a moment, and, without telling me his plans, rushed off to Falmouth as though the furies were behind him."

"Well!" I cried.

"Well, while it was yet dark this morning he saw Señor Gomez leave the Queen's Head, and make his way towards Pendennick woods, where he met your two old friends of Willacombe."

"What, Seyton and Belmont?"

"The very same. Still, he got no word of their speech, for they spoke in low tones, even to the very end of the time they were together, or nearly so."

"But did they see him? Did the Spaniard get wind of the fact that John Trenoweth was at his heels?"

"Trenoweth says no. Besides, he heard a few words at the end."

"Aye," I cried, all alert. "What?"

Mawgan Killigrew hesitated a second, and looked on the floor like one in doubt.

"You said you would not speak to the Spanish maid again?" he said.

"As to that I have no remembrance, but what said he?"

"The man Seyton told Gomez that you were a gay young spark, and that if the Lady Gomez were alone with you she could get all your plans from you."

"Was that all?"

"Trenoweth said they planned together how you might meet, and how the señorita was to learn what was in your heart."

By this time I was fully dressed.

"But you will not meet?" said Mawgan Killigrew, half pleadingly. "You know what we said last night; and look here, Rupert, the thought of that maid fairly makes me mad. Even though I know you—you will never—that is——" and the poor fellow stammered greatly, while his face became as red as the face of a turkey cock.

"Let us go to your father," I said.

"Nay, nay, he is of opinion that you should meet her. He says that you will get more out of her than she will get out of you. But he is mightily angered at being befooled so."

"Look here, Mawgan," I said; "I was not so carried away by this Spanish maid last night but that I saw through both her and her designs, and——"

"But let us be off, Rupert—let us be off. I know she cannot care for me, and, even if she did, I should be afraid to trust myself with her."

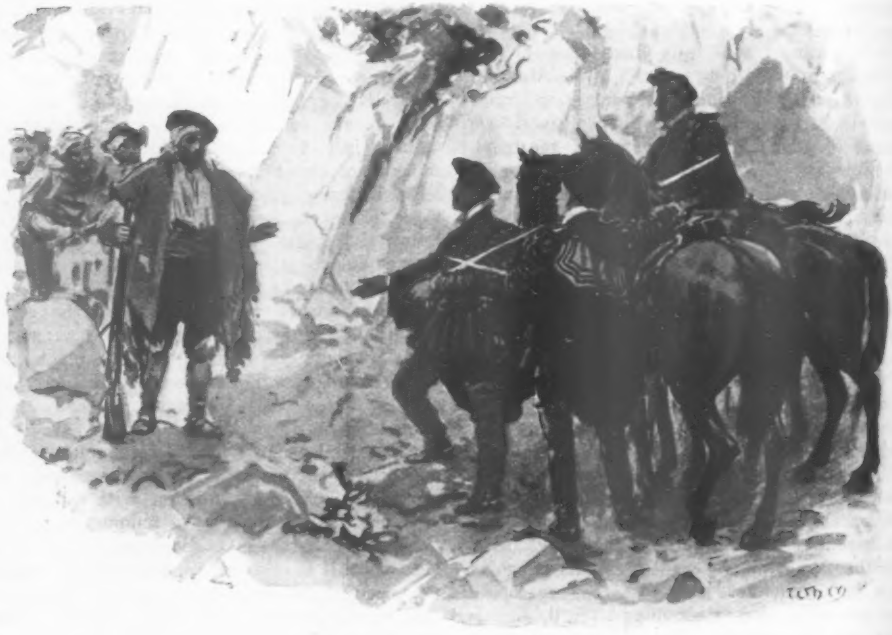
"Remember this," I said: "it is my belief that they have knowledge of what is going on in Spain; therefore it is wise that we should find out what is in their minds. Still, that is your father's business. He is not influenced by the black eyes and fair face of this beauty. Mayhap there is but little to learn from her that will advantage us. We will leave her with your father, to deal with as he thinks best, and we will away. For, by my faith, in spite of my brave words, I be afraid of her. 'If ever you do go upon a venture, never speak to a woman,' Drake saith. Besides, it seems to me that if we do not go at once, Belmont will devise some means to keep us here."

"Ah! think you so?" he cried, "think you so? Then let us away! I tell you, man, I long even now to rush to that maid's side."

"Let us to your father first," I said, which we did, and such was our speech with him that on that same night we put to sea in a small vessel which belonged to Master Killigrew, but which he never intended to be used for the purpose to which we devoted it.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FIRST SIGHT OF SPAIN.



I HAVE set down these things, not because they have much to do with my story, but because they tell of the state of the country at the time of which I am writing. Besides, the doings of such as Masters Belmont and Seyton, as well as those of Señor Gomez and his daughter, tell of the means that were used to thwart those of the Protestant faith and to forward the plans of Father Parsons, who had hundreds of agents all over England ever waiting to do his will. Moreover, I say it advisedly that, although hitherto I had not been given to much speech with women, neither had I completely lost my head, the thought of the Señorita Gomez set my heart all a-fluttering, and made me forgetful of the work I had in hand. For not only was she beautiful beyond the common, but she had a strange charm, which even at our first meeting was like to make a fool of me. Even now I ask myself what would have been the result had I allowed myself to wait at Arwenack a few days and been induced to spend much time in her company. For although I felt sure that she was but a tool of Parsons, she had a way of making me forget everything but a desire to win her smile. In truth, I believe it was the memory of my mother's words which made me decide to go on my mission with all speed, and so be out of the way of temptation.

Now of our voyage to Bordeaux there is no need that I should write. Nothing of import happened on the way, neither did our landing at that French harbour cause much attention. The men whom Master Killigrew had sent with us returned to England without spending any time in France, leaving us to continue our journey by land, as God should guide us. And I may say here that while we were in France we fared right royally, and that for several reasons. For one thing, we found that the French people were exceedingly friendly. They asked no troublesome questions, neither did they inquire very closely into our business. Moreover, both Mawgan Killigrew and I knew their language, and spoke it without difficulty. The reason for this can be quickly told. As my father, Sir Richard Hamstead, hath related in the history of his life, during the reign of Mary both he and Master Killigrew fled to the town of Rouen in France, where, with others, they remained many months in hiding from Stephen Gardiner and his minions. Here they learnt the French language, and, as was natural, both of them taught it to their children as soon as they were old enough to learn. This stood us in good stead now; for, although neither of us had ever before stood on French soil, we were able to make known our wants, and understand the answers of the people. It is true that John Trenoweth knew not a word outside his own tongue, but that did not trouble us at all, seeing he had neither to buy nor sell; neither was it his business to seek information.

about that while our horses carried us well enough during our journey across that wide and dreary plain between Bordeaux and the foot of the Pyrenees mountains, I was not long in discovering that, when climbing was expected of them, they were next to useless. In truth, we should have done much better had we bought some stout mules, and been content to make a less brave show. Still, experience had to be paid for, not only in this but in other matters, as we found to our cost before many weeks had passed away.

In spite of our good horses, moreover, it was "'Then we be friends.'"—p. 272.

Our first business was to buy three horses, the which, after some trouble, we did, and good horses they were, too, although of French breed; nevertheless, we made a mistake in buying them, because they were too slender of limb for the work required of them. For no one of us could be called light men. Both Mawgan Killigrew and myself, though barely twenty-four years of age, weighed nearly ten score pounds, and this without carrying an ounce too much of flesh, while John Trenoweth, though not above the average height of Englishmen, was, as I have said, a man of tremendous depth of chest and largeness of limb. Thus it came but a weary journey across this tremendous plain. At times we caught a glimpse of the sea, but mostly we rode mile after mile without seeing anything but endless pine trees and thick brushwood. We were a silent party, too, I remember, for, although no man spoke of fear, we knew that when we once crossed the Spanish border our lives would scarcely be worth a silver groat a-piece. Besides, I think that while men can be brave enough when they are actually in the midst of danger, they are not without fear when they think of the nearness of its approach. Anyhow, I speak for myself in this matter. When my sword is drawn and my enemy before me, I can fight as bravely as another, and never feel a single qualm of fear; but when I am alone, thinking of what danger may be near, and never knowing what form it may take, I am always ready to think the worst. Whether the others felt as I did I know not; but, at any rate, we were not a gay trio as we travelled towards the Spanish mountains. John Trenoweth looked troubled and apprehensive. In his large grey eyes was an expression of haunting fear, while often I saw his teeth set and his arms grow rigid, as though some great dread were upon him. And this was not because he was not a brave man, but rather, I think, because the fate of the woman he had loved for more than twenty long years was enshrouded in mystery, and because he did not know what might happen to her before he was able to strike a blow in her defence.

As for Mawgan Killigrew, I believe that his mind was much back in Arwenack. For I discovered that the Spanish maid had fascinated him more than he was willing to confess, and that, in spite of the fact that she was doubtless a tool of the Jesuits, he could not free himself from the spell she cast over him.

"What think you?" he said to me one day. "Will my father take these Spaniards, and put them in prison?"

"It is for him to decide," I replied; "but methinks, if he is wise, he will."

"If I thought that, I would go back and——" And then he stopped short, and swore a great oath.

I spoke no further to him, for I saw that the devil had got hold of him, and that it would be best for him to fight him in silence. For I knew his temptation. The mission on which we were engaged was desperate. We had to go to Toledo, where a Protestant's life was not valued at a pin's head, and where our chances of rescuing Sir John Tremayne's daughter were as slender as a gossamer thread, and where, in trying to discover what plans the Spaniard had made in order to conquer England, we placed ourselves in the direst peril.

And yet we hesitated not, for we were Englishmen. We knew that the Señora de Valencia was in dire danger, and that, only because of her late husband, had time been given to her to yield to the demands of the Church. This I had been assured of through my conversation with Master Killigrew, together with many other matters which I need not write down. To the report of Señor Gomez that both she and Esther Truscott had renounced the Reformed faith, we paid not a jot of attention, for his conversation with Seyton and Belmont showed that he was but a tool in the hands of the Jesuits. Moreover, the attention that they had bestowed on us assured me that they were deeply interested in our plans, and that more might depend on our efforts than we could well understand. Besides, a great desire possessed me to know what preparations the Spaniard had made to attack England, and my heart grew large at the thought that God might use me as an instrument to discover their purposes, and arouse our beloved Queen to a true sense of our danger.

And so we journeyed on until we came to the town of Bayonne, where we stayed for the night, and then the following morning, while it was yet dark, we started again, feeling that we were now nearing the land over which Philip reigned, and where such as ourselves were regarded as children of Belial.

We were riding, I remember, through a valley as the day broke, and so we could not see the country before us; but presently, when we reached the summit of a hill, the great mountain range burst upon our view as it were in a moment.

"Look!" cried Mawgan, "there is Spain, man, there is Spain!"

"Yes," said John Trenoweth, "and somewhere beyond those mountains my Esther is perhaps in prison, perhaps tortured. Let us on, my masters!"

Nevertheless, none of us moved. I think the great mountain range awed us by its wild yet solemn grandeur, for never had we seen the like before. To me they were enshrouded in mystery. The light clouds which hid some of their summits seemed to suggest the secrets which lay beyond, and in spite of myself I shuddered.

"In a few hours every man we meet will be an enemy," said Mawgan, with a laugh. Now that he was nearing the danger we had dreaded his spirits rose. "We shall have to fight in the dark, too," he continued; "only one of us can speak their tongue, while their cunning ways will baffle us at every step."

"Aye," said John Trenoweth, "and had we not better form some plan of action? For days we have hardly spoken, and thus no one of us knows what is in the mind of the other. Not that I care," he added, hastily. "It is for me to go to Toledo, where Esther is, and when there to save her. And I will, too, by God I will!" and, standing in his stirrups, he shook his fist at the great towering peaks in the distance. "But have a plan," he continued; "let us not go like three wild colts that have never been broken to saddle or bridle. Are you going as Frenchmen or Englishmen? Both of you speak the French lingo, while, as for me, it is not necessary that I shall open my mouth. It is said that Frenchmen can go without fear into Spain."

"No," cried Mawgan, "never will I pretend to be a Frenchman. It shall never be said that a Killigrew was willing to appear a Frenchman even to save his skin. No, by my grandfather's bones, no!"

To this we all agreed, as was natural we should, for who could dream of three Englishmen pretending to be of another country?

"Neither will I pretend to believe in their Popery," said John Trenoweth. "Even to save Esther I would not do that!"

Again we agreed, because we could not do otherwise, for although there was no need to tell the people in every town or village that we had given up their abominations, we could not, as those whose fathers had suffered perils and hardships in order to be free, deny our faith that Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ alone, could save men from their sins.

"But," said Mawgan presently, "shall we seek to outwit the Spaniards? Shall we match our wits with theirs? Remember we be but three in an enemy's country, and that the Spaniard knows not the meaning of mercy."

"Aye," I cried, "but if we try to match cunning with cunning they will beat us. We be not fools; but if it comes to plotting, we shall be but children to them. We must fight with our own weapons. We will either speak the truth or hold our peace. If we fight, we will fight as Englishmen, if needs be to the very death, but we will fight fairly. And this we must do. We must stand or fall together. If one be taken prisoner, then we must know no rest till the rest be taken prisoners also or our comrade set free."

"Amen to that!" said Mawgan; "that has been the pride of our fathers."

"And more," I went on; "we must never doubt each other's loyalty, no matter how black the evidence may be."

"Right again," said John Trenoweth, although I thought Mawgan cast his eyes on the ground.

"Then let us take an oath here and now that neither of us, either by word or deed, prove false to each other," I said. "That we will never, no matter what may happen, allow jealousy, or envy, or anger to keep us from standing by each other even to death."

Upon that we each dismounted, and we swore by Christ, who died for our sins, never to act unworthily to each other or to our cause, and, because we had sworn to do this, never to doubt each other, but to trust in one another's honour, although a thousand voices might be raised to prove otherwise.

I shall never forget that time, even though I live five times the age ordinary to man. There we stood, three men, one almost past mid-age, and the other two only on the threshold of our full manhood. Not a soul was near. Above was the great dome of God's blue sky, while in the east the sun rose, dispelling the white mists, and revealing more and more clearly the great silent tract of country, while there, right in front of us stood those giant mountains which hid the land beyond. Never, but once, do I remember a greater silence, for no birds sang. Perhaps this was because autumn was creeping on apace, or perhaps it was because birds were rare in that land where a man dared not pray save in the way appointed by the priests.

My heart I know grew hot within me, and a great joy, the joy which comes to every strong man in the face of danger, filled me.

"Let us think again of what we have to do, and the way we mean to do it," I said, for, although I was the youngest man there, I had seen service, and they looked to me as their leader. So there and then we sketched our plans anew, and not one of us hesitated or showed fear because of the danger that grew nearer and nearer. And this was how we made it out.

That we three, Rupert Hamstead, Mawgan Killigrew, and John Trenoweth, were by the grace of God going to Spain to rescue the daughter of Sir John Tremayne, now called the Señora de Valencia, and her waiting woman and friend, named Esther Truscott, from the terrors of the Inquisition; and that we would not give up our endeavours to do this while there remained any possibility of accomplishing our work. That no danger, difficulty, or hardship should hinder us, and that we would, if needs be, give our lives rather than fail.

Moreover, that we would seek to find out the plans and purposes of King Philip concerning the great fleet he was supposed to be sending to England, the strength of this fleet in ships, in guns, and in men, both from Spain and from other nations, and that we would find means to make known our discovery to our Queen, and so give her councillors additional grounds for persuading her to be liberal both of men, ammunition, and money, in order to meet the enemy.

That, remembering the greatness of our work, we would always bear in mind certain things:

First, that we were Christians, believing only in Christ for salvation, and having discarded all those errors which were not found in the Word of God, and which caused so much misery during the reign of Queen Mary. Moreover, that we would be true to our faith, both by word and deed, under every circumstance.

Second, that we were Englishmen, and loyal subjects of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth, and that we must never do aught unworthy of our Queen and country.

Third, that therefore we must never strike an unfair blow; nevertheless, we must fight, as occasion arose, in Christ's name, and in Christ's strength; that we must never tell a lie, but always act straightforwardly and honestly as became our faith and country; that we must be loyal to each other, and that each must stand by his comrades even unto death; that we must never doubt each other, and never believe a stranger's word which attested a comrade's guilt or unfaithfulness.

And all this, besides many other things, we vowed to do, as God gave us grace, and then each of us fell on his knees, and, while the morning sun shone upon our uncovered heads, we prayed to God in Christ's name to make us faithful to our promises, and to help us to finish the work He had given us to do.

After that we mounted our horses again, and rode towards the great mountain range, no man speaking a word, but each one gazing earnestly towards the land to which we went, and each man praying in silence for strength and grace. And presently, as I watched the faces of Mawgan Killigrew and John Trenoweth, I had no fear that any one of us would be faithless to the other, neither should we be easily turned aside from our purposes, for each man's eyes were lit up with the light of God, and on each man's face was a look which would defy St. Thomas himself to doubt, so full was it of courage and resolution.

No man met us, for we took good care not to keep too close to the sea where villages had grown up around the harbours, and strongly as we were tempted to stay at San Sebastian, the place so beguiling us by its beauteous bays and lovely surroundings, we kept straight on. For we had no time to bestow on beautiful places; all the same, we wondered why God had given so much loveliness to a people who were cruel as death, and who, in the name of Christ, had broken His commandments.

All around us hill and valley rose and fell, while scattered here and there were the houses of the people; poor and ill kept they seemed to us, so much so that they went far to make us think that the Spaniard's boasted wealth was a dream. But at that time we had only just entered the Spaniard's land, and knew nothing of what lay beyond the mountains.

We settled to go straight to Toledo, not so much as approaching Madrid, and for this reason we had no sooner passed the bay of San Sebastian than we turned somewhat westward. For had we taken a straight course we should have to pass straight through Madrid, which we not only considered unwise, but dangerous. And here our difficulties commenced, for we quickly reached the mountains, which were so steep and rough that our horses scarcely benefited us at all. In truth, we had not gone far into the mountainous country before two out of three were so badly lame that they could scarce hobble along.

"Here's a pretty mess," said Mawgan ruefully. "Here we be in as desolate a land as the sun ever shone upon; not a soul is near to wish us God speed, or give us aught to eat or drink, and, what is worse, night is coming on fast."

"As to that," said I, "we are thankful that no one is near, for while we are alone we are safe. As to getting food and drink, we have both. We can easily sleep beneath the rocks, for winter is not yet here, while a night's rest may set the horses right."

"You speak too fast about no one being near," said John Trenoweth, looking along the path which lay before us, and then we saw to our dismay that only a short distance away were a number of people whose appearance was so strange that we began to prepare for combat without more ado.

CHAPTER IX.

"LOS GITANOS."

"SPANISH soldiers!" said Mawgan quietly, as he saw whether his sword was loose in its scabbard.

"Seyton hath outwitted us and outtravelled us, after all,'" I cried impatiently.

"Nay, master," said John Trenoweth, "this cannot be. No ship could leave Falmouth harbour without my master's knowledge and consent; thus we could not be out-travelled so soon, even if Seyton and Gomez surmised what road we should take. Besides, they be not behind, but before us."

"That is true," I replied; nevertheless I was much disturbed at the ferocious aspect of the people we saw in our way.

"Besides, they cannot be Spanish soldiers," went on John Trenoweth, "unless they take their women folk with them."

"True, there are women," I said, "but the men carry swords, and every one of them looks a fighter."

"It may be they are peacefully inclined," said Mawgan; "but we had better go on slowly. That valley yonder will be a better place to spend the night than this."

While he spoke, I looked steadily towards the people who had so disturbed us, and as I saw the wild, unkempt appearance of the women I felt sure we had not to deal with enemies. These people were in danger like ourselves, for I believed them to be a party of vagrants, which the Spaniards called gitanos.

"Let us go towards them," I said; "I believe they be gipsies, and, if I am right, they are under the ban of the Spanish law. They are regarded as heretics, even as we are, and look upon the Spanish soldier as an enemy."

"There is sense in that," said Mawgan. "If they be Spaniards, we can fare no worse if we go to them, seeing they are watching us now, and if they are gipsies we need fear nothing."

"Except that they may steal our horses," said John Trenoweth.

Whereupon we went towards them as rapidly as the condition of our horses and the nature of the pathway would allow us. I noticed as we drew near that they looked upon us with some apprehension, and I thought I saw on the part of the women a desire to hasten away. As we came up to them a man spoke to us in a language which I could not understand, upon which I shook my head. He then turned to his companions and spoke to them with great rapidity, but in low tones. As far as I could judge they seemed relieved at his words, and I noticed that the women drew nearer to him as he parleyed further with us.

"Es usted Español?"

"No," I replied.

"Habla usted Español," he continued, keeping his eyes fixed steadily on me.

"Only a little," I replied.

My words gave him still more confidence, for he came up close to us, and said in Spanish:

"What would your honours, and where go my lords?"

"We go into Spain on our affairs," I replied.

"Do you know you are in great danger?"

"We are always in danger," I replied, "but we are not afraid."

"The Spaniards are very great and very cruel," he replied.

"But you are not Spaniards," I answered.

"The great spirits be praised, no."

"Then we be friends," I said.

"What would my lord?" he asked.

"I would that a wise farrier like you look at our horses' legs, for two are lame; I would also find safe shelter for the night, for although the winter is not yet come, it is cold among these mountains."

"As to the horses, I can cure them quickly," he replied, "but as to telling you where you may find shelter, that lies not in my power. There is a village five miles southward where is an inn; but a señor from another land will do well not to put his head under the thatch thereof."

"Why?" I asked.

"Because a traveller is ever compelled to swear by the Mass, and that my lord cannot do."

"How do you know?"

"Because I am the son of a wise mother, and watch the stars at night."

As I translated this into English, Mawgan became grave, but I noticed that John Trenoweth nodded his head solemnly as though he believed in the gipsy's wisdom.

"My lords come from over the seas, from a land which the great King desires," continued the gipsy. "And my lords go into great danger. Forward there is danger, and behind is danger."

At this I heard John Trenoweth say something about his mother, who, as Mawgan Killigrew had told me, was reported to understand the mysterious things of life and read the future.

"You think I will not swear by the Mass, because you will not swear by the Mass."

"My lord speaks truly," replied the gipsy; "therefore, if my lords will, they shall be lodged in safety, in a place not a mile from here towards the setting sun."

"And our horses?" I said questioningly.

"If the señors desire to travel through the Spaniard's land, they will do well to sell their horses, and obtain others thicker of body and stouter of limb. The señors be not slender maidens."

After this I asked other questions which the gipsy answered readily, his companions standing silently around the while.

Whether we should have accepted their invitation to pass the night with them but for John Trenoweth I know not, for they were, in truth, a motley crew, and as lawless as the wild beasts; but John pleaded so earnestly that we yielded.

"They be wise people, and they will not betray us," he said; "thieves they may be, but they will not steal from us."

"Why not from us?" I asked.

"Because I have a token which my mother gave me," he said. "Twice have I shown it to the gipsies who camped at Goonhilly Downs, near the Lizard, and twice have they fallen before me, pleading that they might be allowed to do me a service. I speak not of it, but I have gipsy blood in my veins, and my mother knew their secrets."

"The very sound of her voice held us spellbound."—p. 275.

"Let us see," I said, and thereupon I told the gipsy what John Trenoweth said.

"If your serving man hath our blood in his veins, and can show me the token, let him," said he.

Then John Trenoweth took from a pouch under his doublet a curiously shaped bit of ivory, on which were traced many characters which I could not understand, but which the gipsy scanned eagerly, and then, having spoken to his companions, came towards John, and showed him many signs of affection.

"We be your friends and servants," he said; "we will serve the señors faithfully, and may our fingers rot from our hands if we in aught do them harm. My lords can spend the night with us in warmth and safety, and to-morrow morn, at break of day, they will find their horses healed ready for their journey."

Although we followed them, it was with many misgivings on my part, for I cared not for their sudden friendship; but Mawgan Killigrew, who believed in what the old friend and servitor of the family had said, joined in his persuasions, and I could do nothing but yield.

A little later we came to a curiously formed place between two mountains. It was completely hidden from view, and could be only entered, as far as I could see, by the narrow gorge through which we passed. All around the mountains rose almost perpendicularly, and were to all appearances impassable either by man or beast.

"We have placed ourselves in a trap now," I said angrily. "There is no chance of going out save by that gap, which is no wider than a castle moat, and, if they will, they can rob us and murder us without any man being the wiser."

"But they will not," said John Trenoweth, confidently, while Mawgan Killigrew walked by his horse's head, gaily humming an old Cornish song.

"Here my lords be safe," said the gipsy who had done all the speaking. "There be but few who know of this place, and those who do avoid it after nightfall."

I looked around, and saw two tents, in addition to some caves which had evidently been dug out of the mountain side. Here, moreover, we were met by others of their party, but they were all old, and, save for one white-haired old man, women. At first these regarded us with peculiar looks, but after the others had spoken to them they treated us with much courtesy.

In a shorter time than it takes me to tell, our horses were placed beneath some overhanging rocks, which formed a complete shelter, and were provided with provender, while we with the others sat round a huge crock, which was placed over a fire, and from which our supper was taken. Wine also was provided, together with many luxuries which I thought not to find.

"Have my lords finished their suppers?" said the gipsy presently, and when we had nodded assent he gave orders that songs and dances should be given in our honour.

"The serving man of my lords is of our race," he explained, "and possesses that which we may not treat lightly."

I was about to thank him, when there emerged from a cave a gipsy maiden about eighteen years of age. She was younger than he by several years, who, as far as I could judge, was twenty-eight or thirty years of age, but she bore some slight resemblance to him. What drew my attention to her, however, was not only her youth and beauty, but the tastefulness and richness of her attire. All the other women, although attired in some gaily coloured costume, were ill kempt and dirty; but this maid evidently bestowed much attention on the cleanliness and beauty of her person. Her hair, instead of hanging down her shoulders in long, tangled locks, was arranged around her head in the shape of a crown, and fastened by quaint ornaments, while on her feet were daintily shaped slippers.

"By Tre, Pol, and Pen," I heard Mawgan say, "but she is a beauty."

"Is she your sister?" I asked.

"Yes, señor," he replied; "she was born after my mother had given up hopes of having another child."

"She might be a queen," I said.

"She is a queen," he replied, "or she will be when my mother departs to the great spaces."

"And you are the king?" I asked.

"I shall be when my father goes to the unknown," he replied. "Yonder old man is my father."

"And do many of you speak the Spanish tongue?"

"Only my sister and myself and two others," he replied. "We love neither the Spaniards nor their language. We speak our own tongue, and live our own lives. But my sister hath rare gifts, taught by an old man who once lived in England; she knows also many words used by those who live in the land which the Spaniard hath sworn to conquer."

"What is that?" asked Mawgan, who sat near.

"He saith that the gipsy maid yonder knows something of English," I replied.

"Good," said Mawgan again, but neither of us spoke further, for she began to sing, playing all the time upon a stringed instrument the like of which I had never seen before. I could not understand a word she said, and yet the very sound of her voice held us spell-bound. And this was not to be wondered at, for not only was it rich and sweet, but it was wild and plaintive. Sometimes she seemed to be pleading with passionate earnestness, and again her voice melted into sadness, so sad that she made me think of a mother crooning over a sick child.

"She is like the Señorita Gomez," said Mawgan presently; "only more beautiful."

When she had finished her song, four other gipsy maidens came forward. They were gaily attired, but looked squalid and dirty compared with the young queen. Each of them carried little pieces of wood, hollowed in the shape of a nut, and fastened together by means of gaily coloured string. Then another maiden took the stringed instrument and began to play, while the four beat time with the wooden things. These I afterwards learned were called castanets, a kind of musical instrument brought into Spain by the Moors. At first neither the music of the stringed instrument nor the castanets called forth our admiration, but presently it acted upon us as a charm. And this was scarcely to be wondered at, for the sound thereof seemed to fill the great amphitheatre in which we sat. Echo woke echo, and answered it back again in such a way that a thousand instruments might have been played, instead of five. Moreover, when presently the gipsy queen stepped into the circle and began to dance, I for one forgot where I was. For the time I ceased to think either of our work or our danger, so entranced was I by the grace of the young maid's movements. Moreover, the scene doubtless added to the charm of it all. Above the harvest moon sailed in a cloudless sky, while all around the giant mountains lifted their peaks heavenward. The strange look on the faces of the gipsies, too, made the scene more memorable.

For they did not seem like men and women at all. It is true that the ruddy glow of the fire, mingling with the rays of the moon, revealed their features in a strange light, but that was not all. Their eyes had an unearthly gleam, while on their faces was a look I had never seen before. Each one nodded his head as if to keep time to the music, while each one swayed his body as if to harmonise with the dancing of the gipsy maid.

Presently the music changed, and a different dance was commenced. Then it was that Mawgan, who had been watching in silence, burst forth with a glad cry.

"Good!" he shouted. "I know that dance."

"What saith my lord?" asked the gipsy of me.

"He says that he knows the dance," I replied.

"Will he do my sister the honour of dancing with her?" he asked.

I told Mawgan what he said, whereupon the young Cornishman sprang to his feet.

At a sign from our friend the music stopped, and then, having been told of what had been said, the young gipsy maid bowed to Mawgan, and when the music again commenced they began to dance together. A great silence fell upon the encampment as we watched, and presently when they saw that the dance was also a love story the interest grew. And this was no wonder, for a nobler couple would be difficult to find. Mawgan, strong and straight of limb, moved upon the grass with perfect ease, while the gipsy maid quickly told us that she was an actor as well as a singer.

This was the story that they told, while the sound of the stringed instrument echoed through the rocky ravine, and the motley crew watched with wild, gleaming eyes:

A gipsy maiden all forlorn, filled with strange longings and wild hopes, is wandering in the glades. Suddenly there comes to her a knight from a far-off land, who, fascinated by her beauty, seeks to gain speech with her. They fall in love with each other, and he pleads with her to fly with him. For a time she seems to yield, but presently remembers that her life is different from his; that she can never be happy away from the associations of her life. Thus the knight pleads in vain, and the gipsy, although longing to yield to his desires, elects to remain among her own people.

And this story they told, although they spoke no word. But their gestures were sufficient. You could see the love in the young maid's eyes; you could see her passion in the way she pointed to stars and mountains, and in the graceful gestures of her body. Mawgan, too, caught the spirit of the scene, and as he knelt before her it seemed as though he were not acting at all, but pleading with all the earnestness of his life.

"Where did my lord learn that dance?" asked the gipsy.

"Some of his people in Cornwall taught it me," replied Mawgan, when I put the question to him.

"It was well done," replied the gipsy, "and now my lords will desire to rest."

I was about to assent to this when the gipsy maid came to us, and asked, in broken English, if she should tell our fortunes.

"Aye," replied Mawgan, fairly carried away by the feelings of the moment.

The maid took his hand, and looked steadily at it for some seconds, then she dropped it with a sigh.

"I will not read my lord's fortune," she said.

"Why?" asked Mawgan.

"Because it is better he should not know. But my lord need not fear. He will never disgrace his name."

"As to that, I trust not," replied Mawgan, with a laugh. "But I pray you to tell me all my hand tells you."

"That I may not," she replied; "but will my lord remember one thing. When dangers overpower him, and all hope seems gone, will he utter one name?"

"Aye," said Mawgan, "if you will tell me the name."

At this she whispered a word in his ear, and if ever a man saw love in a woman's eye I saw love in the gipsy maid's eyes that night.

After this she looked at my hand, and at John Trenoweth's, but I could see that she was but playing at fortune-telling. She spoke not in the same tones as she spoke to Mawgan, neither did her eyes have the same look. Rather she told us a hackneyed story, and she laughed as she told it, as though she wanted us to see that she spoke in jest.

"My lords be safe," said the gipsy who had first spoken to us, and who led us to a cave in which lay a great heap of grass. "Watchful eyes will be open all the night, and hands will be ready at every moment to defend you."

"We be indeed grateful," I replied; "I shall ever speak well of the gipsies in the days to come."

"We cannot but show kindness to those who have with them one who has our blood and carries our token," he replied.

"But if we had neither of these things," I said curiously; "what would have happened to us?"

At this he laughed, but he made no other answer.

"What is your sister's name?" I asked.

"Inez," he replied in a low voice. As he spoke it sounded like Eeneth, but I had once before met a Spanish woman who bore the name, and so I recognised his pronunciation.

"And your name?" I asked.

"Gaspar," he replied.

"No other name?" I asked.

"No, Gaspar lo Gitano, solamente And yours, my lord?"

"Rupert Hamstead."

"Ruperto," he repeated, "I will remember. And the name of your friend, and serving man?"

When I had told him, he repeated our Christian names several times, as though he would impress them on his memory. "'Ruperto, Mawgan, Juan,'" he said, again and again. "I will remember, my lords, and whenever you hear the name 'Gaspar lo Gitano' you will remember that you have a friend near."

After this, and after again assuring us that we might lie in safety, he left us in the cave.

"This night hath been worth coming to Spain for," said Mawgan to me presently.

"Aye," I replied, and then I tried to go to sleep, but I could not, although John Trenoweth encouraged us in this by snoring loudly.

"Asleep, Rupert?" It was Mawgan who spoke.

"No, I cannot sleep."

"Neither can I. I wonder if I shall ever see her again?"

"Nay," I replied, "why should you?"

"I know not," he answered; then, after some minutes' silence, "I would I knew the meaning of the word she spoke to me."

"What was it?" I asked.

"Eeneth," he said, and then I knew that the gipsy maid had told him her own name.

For a long time we lay, and presently when I was falling asleep I heard the noise of voices outside.

I lifted my head and listened.

"We seek to do you no harm, neither will we unless you play us false," said a voice, "but if you do you shall suffer even as they do."

"Who sent you?" and I knew it was Gaspar who spoke.

"We seek three English spies," was the reply. "We have tracked them here, so tell us where we may find them."

At this I drew my sword, for I had not taken off my clothes, and listened again.

[END OF CHAPTER NINE.]

SUNDAY SCHOOL ENTERPRISE.

A TALK WITH THE REV. CAREY BONNER.

(Photo. Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. CAREY BONNER.

MY primary object in seeking an interview with Mr. Carey Bonner, the General Secretary of the Sunday School Union, was to obtain from him both information and suggestions which, because of his experience and position, would be of practical value to the tens of thousands of readers of THE QUIVER who are deeply concerned to promote the well-being and to extend the usefulness of the Sunday Schools of this country. But in view of the fact that the great organisation with which Mr. Bonner is associated will celebrate its Centenary in 1903, and that he is already preparing for the coming anniversary, which it is hoped to mark by the extension of the work of the Union in all directions, he naturally, at the outset of our interview, alluded to the event.

"Of course," he continued, "the roots of the Union are in the past, and date from the 13th of July, 1803, when about a dozen men, anxious to strengthen Sunday Schools, met in the vestry of Surrey Chapel. It was not a ministers' movement. Of the originators, only one, the Rev. Henry Althans, was a minister. This year's president, Mr. Meyer, is the first clerical president. The Sunday School Union was fundamentally a lay movement. Among the lay founders were Mr. James Nisbet, the publisher; Mr. W. H. Watson, Mr. William Groser, Mr. William Gover, Mr. Brodie Gurney, and Mr. Thomas Thompson, the father of the author of 'I think when I read that sweet story,' and they represented various religious bodies, including the Church of England. It was a point of the first importance with the founders that the Union should be inter-denominational, and that the co-operation of all Evangelical Churches should be sought."

"How did they, at the outset, propose to carry out their purpose?"

"The primary principle was to stimulate and encourage each other in the religious instruction of children and youths. Then it was resolved to aim at bettering the methods of instruction, and to promote the opening of new schools by personal influence and other means, including the publication of helpful literature."

"When was the Teachers' Training College set on foot?"

"About 1841 a training class for teachers, taught by men of experience in the best methods and institutions, was started, and that was the foundation of the college, the curriculum of which now embraces a very thorough course of Old and New Testament study, Evidences and Ethics, and a course in the Art of Teaching. If a teacher can pass an examination in each of those, he gets a diploma, and we think that he is well equipped as far as training is concerned."

"Was the personal influence exerted in a definite manner?"

"Yes, we had a Sunday School missionary, who went all through the country addressing meetings for the encouragement of teachers, and with the view of bringing about the general improvement of Sunday School work. In another way we afforded assistance in making grants of books on greatly reduced terms for libraries. I may say that all the profits on the sale of our books have always been devoted to the general extension of Sunday School work. Our output in one year was twelve million publications. These, and also separate examinations for teachers, have been invaluable aids in spreading Christian knowledge for many years. About 700,000 scholars and over 30,000 teachers have taken part in these examinations up to now. Our method of helping teachers connected with the Union is to supply them with the best Biblical books and books on teaching. As to building, we grant loans, free of interest, in cases where it is desired to build new Sunday Schools. During the last few years we have distributed upwards of £31,000 for this purpose to between three and four hundred schools. We employ an evangelist, who goes about conducting special services for the young. Conferences, which are held every week in different places, are very valuable. We have a staff of speakers who attend them, free of all expense, and deliver addresses on Sunday School work and methods. Attaching considerable importance to the improvement of singing, we have a choir meeting in our Union Lecture Hall week by week, and the members give help wherever they can, with the object of promoting better singing among schools."

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION: A PRESENTATION OF PRIZES IN THE LECTURE HALL.

"You have also strongly encouraged Bible reading?"

"Probably the best reply to that question is to mention that the number of members of the International Bible Reading Association, which had its birthplace here, has gradually increased until it now reaches 750,000 a year. Out of the halfpenny subscriptions of the scholars we support Sunday School missionaries in India and give frequent donations to various religious movements connected with Sunday School work.

"Perhaps you would like to know what we are doing on the Continent and in Greater Britain. We have twenty-one missionaries on the Continent, whose sole duty it is to establish and strengthen Sunday Schools. There are nearly two million scholars in Europe, and 99,000 teachers. We aim at instituting schools in all the Papist countries.

"In the British Empire beyond the seas we are also working hard. There is an Indian Sunday School Union, of which, until his resignation of the see of Calcutta, Bishop Welldon was president, our own missionary is the general secretary, and we are about to appoint a second secretary. The Union in India is subdivided into provinces, and it seeks to bring about the establishment of Sunday Schools wherever a religious work is carried on. It has its literature, and, generally speaking, is managed on similar lines to the Union in this country. There has been a steady increase in the number and the efficiency of schools in India during recent years.

"We have, too, branches in Australia, New Zealand, Queensland, and Victoria; also in South Africa. But there are a great many Unions in the colonies which are not affiliated to ours. If we could only afford a man to travel about and get in touch with them, we could strengthen them. There are new publications issued in the colonies in connection with us, and the publication department at home is already represented by an agent who supplies our literature."

"Reverting again to the work at home, it would be interesting to know how you consider the Evening Continuation Schools help the Sunday Schools."

"It is of vital consequence that religion should touch all sides of the being of the children, and we think that the Continuation Schools are an instrument in that direction. We are just developing, on the lines of the Boys' Life Brigade, a branch for the girls, to give them an interest in the same way. I may say that the whole of the sum of £100,000 which it was lately decided to endeavour to raise in commemoration of the Centenary is to be returned to the Sunday Schools of the country.'

"By what means will this be done?"

"First of all, it is intended to improve the educational advantages of teachers by means of travelling lecturers, who will give instruction on the most advanced methods of teaching; and by the formation, in the great towns, of evening classes to be held during the winter months, at which regular courses will be followed. While the spiritual side of the work will always be regarded as supreme, we think that the educational side is of the utmost importance. As essential to the development of the Sunday School, we propose to set apart a lecturer who will go through the colleges, wherever we can obtain admission, so that the ministers of the future shall be able to apprehend more clearly the needs of the work. The lecturer will be a University man, and a man who will be listened to as a professor, his subjects being the methods of study and teaching. The principals of all the Theological Colleges have already been approached on the subject, and most of the responses have been sympathetic. Another point we shall aim at is to render assistance to village schools by special grants of school requisites and up-to-date literature, and by prosecuting the systematic visitation of village schools, which hitherto have been so much left alone."

"What proportion of money is it in contemplation to spend in this direction?"

"We hope to set apart about £15,000 to increase our loan fund. Speaking of visitations, I maintain that a Sunday School ought to be aggressive, and we propose to promote a great systematic canvass of the country by means of the carefully arranged visitation of families in order to secure a million more scholars for the Sunday Schools of Great Britain. In many cases the schools are overcrowded, but, taking them as a whole, there is ample room for more scholars. I believe that if the Churches of the country can be brought face to face with the fact that a million boys and girls are waiting to be taught, both the necessary means and the necessary teachers would be forthcoming."

"Are you looking to the few or to the many for the sinews of war in your new project?"

"A few large sums have been promised to start with, but we look to Sunday School teachers and scholars to do the chief work: we want to raise a million shillings through the shillings of the teachers and the pennies of the scholars. On behalf of the extension movement we shall also hold special meetings and demonstrations, and advance the formation of local committees."

"Before we refer to the defects of existing Sunday Schools, you may care to say how far you think superintendents are responsible for them?"

UNDER A BAD SUPERINTENDENT.

"Certainly, the importance of the superintendent's duties and influence cannot be exaggerated. At our last Conference we organised, at my suggestion, a school of methods for superintendents, and men of great experience spoke on discipline, the minor duties, and the relations of the School to the Church. The discussion excited great interest, and orders for 5,000 copies of the papers read upon the occasion were received. This is a subject which we shall follow up in future conferences. As to how far I think the superintendent is responsible for existing defects, my answer is that he can make or he can mar a school. If the superintendent possesses education, tact, and enthusiasm, the school is sure to prosper; but if he be lacking in ability, and has no power of attracting, the school inevitably goes down. I am satisfied that when the Churches—using the word Churches in the widest sense—arrive at a true conception of the greatness of Sunday School work, their primary aim will be to get the best type of man as superintendent.

"What do you consider the principal defects of the schools?"

"Lack of discipline is a great defect. Nothing can be done in a school unless, or until, there is the sense of authority felt among the scholars. Lack of organisation is another serious defect. The scholars are not followed up as they should be, and the records are not kept up properly. A superintendent whom I know has a record of 1,300 scholars, with the birthday of each marked, and he sends a birthday card and message to each one of them. He tells me that this is one of his most valuable helps. As to the importance of following up the scholars and of the most careful attention to registration, I am sure that many hundreds are lost to us every year because superintendents and teachers do not take the trouble to go after them. We supply forms which one superintendent can send to another concerning a scholar who may have removed to his or her neighbourhood. A little trouble of this kind is greatly appreciated by the scholar and parents, and strengthens the bond which will hold the young life to the Church. A great need of to-day is the point of making the most of little things."

"You think that the little things are so much neglected?"

"Quite so. For example, want of punctuality in the teacher is one of the little things too often neglected. If the teacher does not come to time, the scholars will not. Then there is the lack of method in teaching. The child is taught Scripture on the week-day in an interesting manner. On Sunday the lesson is uninteresting, and it loses its power. This, however, is not a little matter, but a very great point indeed. So, also, is the want of close sympathy between the Church and the School. The ministers, as I have indicated, are not sufficiently in touch with the Schools. They set us a good example in America in this respect. At the American colleges special lectures are given on religious education, Sunday School teaching and management, so that the student goes out to his work thoroughly equipped and able to deal with the Sunday School problems which meet him. This is what we want to do here."

"Is it your experience that there is much difficulty in obtaining competent teachers?"

"There is a difficulty in obtaining educated teachers of both sexes. This is due to the disposition to look down upon Sunday School work which unhappily prevails. The difficulty will not be disposed of until there is a healthier opinion as to the work. As a matter of fact, it needs a man or a woman of the best intellect to teach successfully, and to make the teaching a force in the child's life."

"How, then, are Sunday School methods to be brought up to date on a line with those of day schools? You have, I know, adumbrated some which the Union has in view. But are there not others?"

"My belief is that each Church will ultimately have to train its own teachers, the clergyman or minister giving lectures on the lessons and courses on the principles and art of teaching. That local training is practicable I can vouch for, because I know of a school in Birmingham where the minister and superintendent co-operate, and induce some of the most capable educationalists in the district to give lectures to the teachers. Moreover, in the school a trained teacher takes a class of those who are willing to become teachers, and gives them practical instruction in the art of religious teaching Sunday by Sunday. Well, what is done in one case in Birmingham could also be done in other town churches.

UNDER A GOOD SUPERINTENDENT.

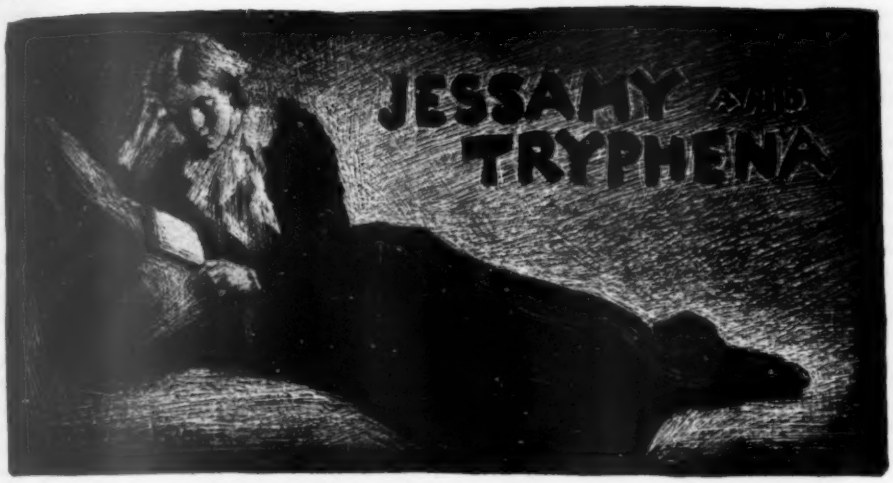
"Another interesting development which many have found useful is that of the 'larger class scheme,' the idea being that in a given church it may be possible to find only six or eight really efficient teachers. The plan is to use these teachers, giving them each classes of, say, forty or fifty, and getting younger or inexperienced teachers to act as their assistants. In this way a practical training and preparation for better work is given to teachers who otherwise might blunder on month after month without having any example of better methods. I am strongly of opinion that considerable improvement might be made in the opening and closing services of the school. They are far too stereotyped, and often lack any reverence. With a little care on the part of ministers and superintendents very much more variety could be introduced.

"Then there is the question of the building, to which I think much greater attention should be paid. Efficient teaching in a dull, underground room is impossible. You must brighten the surroundings, if you would awaken the interest and retain your hold of its scholars. The ideal school, in addition to being thoroughly sanitary and well ventilated, should have plenty of light and be as beautiful as possible. The educative influence of good pictures can hardly be over-estimated. Very fine Scripture cartoons are issued at low cost, which would almost transform any ordinary local schoolroom. Wherever it is practicable, each class should have its separate room. Otherwise the personal influence of the teacher, which is the great factor, is considerably hindered."

"As to the children themselves, can you offer any suggestions?"

"We have found that wherever the 'Star' class chart has been adopted it has resulted in a quickening of school life. Briefly, the method is this. The chart has spaces for the number of the class and the name of the teacher. In addition there are columns headed, respectively, Attendance, Bibles, Offerings, New Members, and Study. If the teacher and all members of the class are present—or only absent through illness—a red star is placed in the Attendance column. If the teacher and each member of the class bring their Bibles with them, a blue star is placed in the Bibles column. If each member makes an offering, however small, a silver star is placed in the Offerings column. If a new member is secured by any member of the class, a pink star goes in the Members' column; and a gilt star is secured for the Study column if each member of the class has read the lesson at home and written out the golden text. In connection with the chart are ten 'shields of honour,' which are awarded to the girls' and boys' classes that can show the greatest number of stars during the quarter."

"Do you think that, socially speaking, the class who attend the Sunday Schools is the same as it was some years ago?"



"The class of children attending school depends upon the locality. In some places the better class of children socially do not go to school at all. In such neighbourhoods we advise the formation of home classes, which should meet the objections of the public school boy, who almost invariably declines to go to the Sunday School. We have a home department in connection with the Union, and we reckon that all boys and girls who, whether because they are ill, lame, or for other reasons, go through the lesson with their parents at home are members. But, when all is said and done, it is true that the Sunday Schools have not kept pace with the growth of population. This, however, is only a conclusive proof of the need for the work and extension of the Union."

"Can you, in brief, outline the duty that lies before your Union?"

"Yes, broadly, it is concerned, first, with the Churches to urge upon their leaders that no church can afford to be half-hearted in its attitude towards the young, but must seriously address itself to the solution of a problem so vast and far-reaching in importance. Further, that the brightest intellect as well as the most zealous devotion of Christian people must be given to this work, and that the Churches have no finer investment for their wealth than is found in the better equipment of teachers of youth by means of higher training, more up-to-date machinery, and more suitable buildings.

"Then," concluded Mr. Bonner, "I would emphasise the fact that our work is also concerned with the schools. Perhaps the most immediate need is to bring about a crusade of conscience. I mean so to impress the teachers and workers with the supreme aim of their task that they shall be moved to covet earnestly the best gifts. Next, by literature and apparatus, I would enable them to apply the most advanced principles and methods of secular education to their religious instructions. I would urge also the grading of a school, dividing it into a junior department, a normal department, and an institute for young men and women; the teachers and the teaching being adapted to each department. Beyond all this, there is the need to realise responsibility for souls, and to see that these things are but means to an end—that end being the winning of the scholars to a definite dedication of powers and life to Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord."

ALFRED WILCOX.

A Complete Story by Katharine Tynan.

THE name Jessamy Truelove, above the little shop, had a suggestion of romance and the country, like the coster's "All a-blowin' and a-growin'," and the cry of "Sweet Lavender" that came along the hideous street in the summer of the year.

The shop was the tiniest possible, wedged between a prosperous pork-butcher's and a fried-fish shop. It had been a grief to Jessamy when the fried-fish became their neighbour, not so much on her own account as because it worried her delicate sister Tryphena, who presided over the millinery. You could not very well keep the smell of the fish out; not though you had wall-flowers in a jug on the counter, in which to bury your nose, and carried violets in your bosom, as Tryphena always did.

The perfume has not been invented which shall live down the fried-fish smell, the peculiar aroma of London's mean streets.

Jessamy had the baby-linen and haberdashery side of the shop; Tryphena the bonnets and hats and caps. The windows were the merest slits; the door could be blocked by a small child. When two little mother-girls of the slums, each carrying a wizened baby, stood outside to discuss the baby-clothes in Jessamy's window, there was no room for a third.

Tryphena's window was not so much in favour. She did not so very often sell a hat or a bonnet. Her taste was severe, too severe for the class she designed to please. Jessamy sometimes wished that Tryphena would put more colour and gaiety into her millinery. The things might be as pretty as a picture, and very often were; but they were not pictures suited to the taste of Islington Street. Jessamy had seen girls toss their heads and giggle as they turned away from Tryphena's window and went on to Wallaker's across the street, which looked a perfect flower bed from the distance. But she was too loyal to her sister, and too sure of Tryphena's taste, to ask her to lower her standard for those ignorant girls.

Tryphena had been crossed in love, and this fact gave a peculiar tenderness to her more robust sister's feeling for her. It was such a long time ago, long enough for anyone but Tryphena to have forgotten. But her faithfulness to the memory of Willie Draycott, who had given up Tryphena for another woman, was the one bit of romance in Jessamy's life.

It had been the reason for the transplantation to Islington Street from the country village where they had been born. Jessamy would never cease to be hungry for the little village, full of homeliness and fragrances, among its woods, with the church midway up the street, and the churchyard, whose stones bore the names of many Trueloves.

But at the moment of leaving her little shop in Knoll, Jessamy had not been conscious of the tearing up of the roots which the change really was to her. She was too much concerned about Tryphena for that.

Whatever had come over Willie Draycott, he had chosen a black-eyed, insolently handsome girl before Tryphena, who was languishing and delicate. Nancy was the very one to triumph over her dejected rival. Why, the joy-bells for Nancy's marriage would clang right into Tryphena's window in the gable above the shop. The sights and sounds of the festivities could not but reach her eyes and ears. Even the sympathy of the neighbours would be intolerable, although it was sympathy, and many reported that Willie Draycott looked like a man going to be hanged rather than a bridegroom. The condolences would kill Tryphena.

In Knoll they took a year to think over a journey into the next parish. Imagine their surprise, then, when the wedding-morning of Willie Draycott and Nancy Miller saw the shutters of Jessamy's shop up, and the rumour spread that the two sisters had gone. Jessamy's interest had been disposed of to a woman outside Knoll who was stone-deaf, and offered the curious neighbours tapes and sewing-cotton when they came for information. The sisters had buried themselves in London; and even the Vicar, to his grief, did not know their new address. Jessamy had done her wiping-out whole-heartedly for Tryphena's sake, since Tryphena took her jilting like a shame.

Twenty years had passed since they had left Knoll, although to Jessamy the wound of her separation from her old home seemed as fresh, nay, fresher than it had been the first day. Twenty years they had been shut up in Islington Street.

The comely brown and red of Jessamy's cheek was a bit withered, not from age, but from airlessness, and perhaps from the inward ache which she never said anything about, which she scarcely permitted herself to acknowledge. Certainly she did nothing to encourage it.

She did not talk of Knoll with her sister; for that would be to recall bitter memories. But she thought on it a good deal in the intervals of selling babies' pinafores and feeders, and tapes, and buttons, and braids across the counter. She suspected that Tryphena amid her slacker business thought also upon Knoll, and occasionally she would steal a wistful glance at her between the petticoats and overalls that fluttered from the ceiling.

Tryphena kept a delicate, old-maidish prettiness. She had her pale hair in bunches of ringlets behind her ears as she had been used to have it twenty years ago. She had never had a suitor since, nor had Jessamy. A greengrocer's manager had indeed once shown amorous tendencies with regard to Jessamy herself, but his aspirations had been quickly nipped in the bud. Tryphena had shrunk before a jest of his not in the best of taste. It was enough for Jessamy to show him the door.

Now and again in the hot summer the sisters had gone on the half-holiday to Richmond Park and Kew Gardens, or on a penny steamboat. But the outings were not many. Trams and 'buses cost money, and the sisters were very poor. More often they spent the half-holiday when the weather was fine in their little garden.

The houses in Islington Street had gardens stretching down to meet those of their more fortunate neighbours on the slope of the hill. All that quarter had once been a place of consideration. The dry-rot of decay had crept over one row of fine important-looking houses after another. The decay had crept quite up the hill from Islington Street at the foot to the Square at the top. But there was a good deal of open space to remind one of what the neighbourhood had once been.

Some previous tenant of the Islington Street shop had fenced the strip of garden in with a trellis. Over this Jessamy had induced creepers to grow, and in summer, when they were in leaf, it was possible to sit within the little square of greenery and see only the sky. It was not so easy to shut away the sounds of the cocks and hens in the next enclosure, or the children on the other side enjoying a dust-bath with equal zest; but after all cocks and hens are country creatures, and the shrill laughter of the children was bearable, and from the stable-yard a few gardens off there came a sound of horses' feet, and the friendly converse of the men with their horses, which, with a little make-believe and closed eyes, recalled a farmyard to Jessamy.

In these snatches of leisure Tryphena always read novels, while Jessamy made the tea, and prepared small dainties for the supper, and found a hundred things to do for which the daily life gave no room. Without her novels Tryphena would hardly have found life tolerable. In those imaginary lives she could forget the dreariness of life in Islington Street, the dull drab days with—what?—at the further end.

Tryphena was a creature of dreams. She dreamed over her novels. She dreamed as she made up her airy hats, and bonnets, and caps out of scraps of ribbon and chiffon and flowers left over from the big shops. She dreamed as she looked out between her stock at the squalid street outside and the vulgar faces that often enough grinned at her through the pane. Tryphena had no thoughts for them. The poppies had been shaken over her eyes. The life around her had little power to distress and disturb her, except in a negative way.

"Turning it round about while he uttered sounds of admiration."—p. 286.

But with Jessamy it was different. Jessamy was the one who considered ways and means. Jessamy looked beyond the long years of pinchings and contrivings and saw at the end—what but the poor-house? That was something to make even the stout heart of the little spinster contract with fear. If Tryphena had married, Jessamy would have been able to fend for herself. She need never have left the village where she was among friends. The delicate sister had always been a tie and a burden on her like a child: like a child, the burden was exquisite, not to be given up for any lonely freedom. If only Jessamy could see far down the dwindling years that she should be able to provide for Tryphena, to keep her from the harsh realities of life that would kill her!

Jessamy was four years older than Tryphena, and as strong as a little pony. Tryphena had her four years to the good, and was delicate, but on the other hand had learned to take care as the hardier Jessamy never would. There were nights when Jessamy lay awake and prayed that, if one of them were taken, it should be the beloved young sister who could not face the world alone. What matter if she, Jessamy, were to be desolate! She could not, could not think of a world in which Tryphena would have no one to love and protect her. That was something to make her heart beat, and the perspiration come in great beads on her brow, the thought of leaving Tryphena alone. God was too merciful, she said to herself in a panic-stricken way. He would never permit it.

One morning—it was a morning of June, and Islington Street had just been watered; it was Saturday morning, and so the street market was in full swing, and there was a stack of wall-flowers opposite the shop-door. The scent and the freshness were even in Islington Street this morning: and it made Jessamy more cheerful, while her heart ached for her unforgotten country: and it seemed to have clouded over Tryphena's eyes with more mists of unreality than usual.

Tryphena had just lost a customer. A girl, a servant apparently from one of the big houses, had taken a fancy to a hat with foamy twirls of white chiffon upon it, and a single white rose, with pink at the heart laid among the chiffon.

The girl wanted a little more gaiety, a greater lavishness as to roses, a fancy buckle, a couple of pearl pins. But Tryphena was immovable—"You would spoil it completely," she said. The end of it was that the girl in a pique flung herself out of the shop and across to Wallaker's.

"Oh, Tryphena!" Jessamy had said. "Couldn't you have pleased her? She would have brought other girls. You know the Grove generally takes them all. But they would have appreciated your pretty things better than the working-men's wives about here: and you might have made quite a little circle of customers."

"I am sorry," said Tryphena, with the hurt mouth of a child. "But the hat is so pretty as it is."

Jessamy sighed. It might rest in the window till all its beauty and freshness were gone, a fate which had overtaken so many of Tryphena's pretty creations.

Just then a shadow darkened the door. Looking through her window Jessamy caught sight of a great market-waggon with a tilt and a pair of large, placid horses, in front of her door.

It was the driver who entered; a large, placid man, not so unlike his horses, with a country freshness on his cheeks and in his blue eyes, and a rose in his coat.

He stared at Jessamy, but it was to Tryphena's counter he turned.

"What price is that?" he asked, pointing a huge index-finger towards the pretty hat.

His voice seemed to fill the little shop as his presence did. The horses rattled their harness outside, and he said 'woa' to them: it was a big deep sound, as full of soothing as of command, and Jessamy noticed that the great creatures turned their faces the way of the sound as though they liked it.

Tryphena named the price.

"'Tis for a little lass what's deaf and dumb," he said. "But bless you, she's as fond of a bit of finery as any woman."

Tryphena poised the hat on her hand for him to look at, turning it round about while he uttered sounds of admiration in a deep, quiet thunder.

He had his back to Jessamy, but she could see her sister's face. Two little withered roses of pleasure had come into Tryphena's cheeks, and a smile brightened on her soft, faded red mouth. It was the joy of the artist in having his work appreciated.

"Six-and-six," said Tryphena.

"Six-and-six, lass," he repeated—"Well, I wouldn't do it for twelve-and-six."

Then he laughed with a great musical bellow, and one of his horses whinnied outside.

He counted the money from a deep chamois bag he took out of his pocket, and having received the hat lifted it in his arms in a gingerly way as though he might crush the box. As he passed out of the little door he turned and lifted his wide straw hat. His gaze, as he steered his way carefully through the narrow door, was turned ever so slightly on Jessamy.

Afterwards the two sisters discussed him. Tryphena found him like the characters in her novels. She thought of this one and that. Finally she fixed on Mr. Van Brunt, in the ever fresh "Wide Wide World."

"He is plainly not a common person," she said. "Did you see how he lifted his hat? I shouldn't be surprised if the horses and the waggon are his own."

"I shouldn't either," said Jessamy. "They looked as though they had the master's hand over them. Great shining creatures, the horses. I should think you'd require a ladder to get on to their backs."

"How odd that he should have fancied that hat," said Tryphena. "That also proves him to be a superior person. And the child! I wonder who the child is."

"I daresay he has a houseful of them," said Jessamy.

The thing gave a little fillip to their thoughts that lasted throughout the day. Indeed, in the evening, as they sat in their arbour, while the last light died off the sky—nine o'clock was ordinary closing time in Islington Street, twelve on Saturdays—Tryphena found that the visit of the messenger from the country had stirred strange longings and desires in her heart.

"Couldn't we leave Islington Street, Jessamy?" she asked, "and go into the suburbs if we couldn't to a country town? And start a new kind of shop? Supposing you sold fresh butter and eggs at one side, and I had a circulating library at the other, with newspapers and cheap books and fancy stationery."

Jessamy shook her head. They were fast-bound in Islington Street. A ten-pound note might free them: but a ten-pound note was as much outside Jessamy's reach as the Koh-i-noor.

She shook her head again.

"There are free libraries everywhere now," she said, "and rent in the suburbs is high. To-morrow is the half day: let us go out on Hampstead Heath, and take the tea and the teapot, and bread and butter, and the spirit lamp and kettle."

She tried to distract Tryphena as she would a child, but Tryphena was not to be distracted. After her twenty years of Islington Street—she had seemed to notice the squalor less than Jessamy, being so taken up with dreams—something was stirring in her that called her back to the country.

If it had been Knoll now, Jessamy might have sold out her little interest and gone back. Knoll had been so friendly, and there must still be many of the old friends left, even if many had joined the quiet company of sleepers in the churchyard. It would not be the same thing to start newly in Knoll as in a strange place. There would be so many to help them, to give them custom at the start.

But she did not dare to speak of Knoll to Tryphena. She had no idea of how much or how little Tryphena remembered of Willie Draycott, and the old trouble that had gone near to killing her. For one second her heart leaped up at the thought of going back to Knoll, then fell again. Even now she could not think of Nancy Draycott's black eyes in their insolent triumph over Tryphena.

A few days later the waggoner again came into the shop. This time he took one of the flimsy little chairs which creaked and groaned beneath him alarmingly. He had put the nose-bags on the horses, and they were enjoying their oats.

He reported that the deaf and dumb child had been delighted with the hat.

"You should ha' seen her eyes," he said: and Tryphena blushed with the artist's pleasure.

"She sent you a posy," he went on, producing suddenly a cartwheel of flowers, which had been in paper on his knee. "And the old mother, she'd like a cap,—leastways I'd like to give her one. 'Tis to be a surprise."

Tryphena blushed with pleasure as she took the flowers, and Jessamy came from behind her side of the counter and smelt them, and the waggoner smiled at her.

There was a consultation over the cap, a consultation to which Tryphena listened absently, and then collected her materials and held them together as though the others had never spoken. Soft greyish white chiffon, and a peach-coloured bow.

"That's it, my girl," said the waggoner, delightedly; "the ribbon's the colour of the old mother's cheeks. You couldn't have matched her better, not if you knew her."

He called for the cap a few days later, and brought a couple of bouquets.

After that he seemed to call every time he passed, and that was about twice a week. It was surprising how many things his mother wanted from the little shop in Islington Street. Every time he brought flowers; presently a basket of fruit or a golden slab of honeycomb came with the flowers. Once the deaf and dumb child—they knew by this time that she was his niece, and that he had never been married—sent a shabby little bunch of field flowers. Jessamy pounced on them and drew out a bit of ground ivy.

"It brings the fields," she said, greedily. "I don't suppose love nor money can buy a bit of ground ivy in London."

The man looked at her sympathetically.

"I never can understand," he said, "how folks country born can live in a town."

The next time he came Jessamy led him out to the little garden to show him where she had planted the bit of ground ivy, which she had discovered possessed a root.

"You've made it real pretty," he said, looking admiringly at the trellis covered with scarlet runners. "But you ought to be in real country; that's what you ought to be."

Whitsuntide was late that year. The Wednesday before Whit-Sunday the waggoner—they knew him now as Mr. Vance—John Vance, a good, honest name Jessamy thought—came in with a startling proposal. It was no less than that Jessamy and Tryphena should spend the Whitsun holidays with his mother in Kent.

"She'd have come herself," he said, "but she's an old body. And she bids me say you'll be as welcome as flowers in May. Seems she knew some of your people in Knoll long ago. Her uncle, Samuel Witten, he had the Windmill Farm in Knoll. Many a pleasant day she had there; and thinks 'tis your mother she remembers."

Jessamy fairly gasped at the thought of a country holiday. Yet, as women who have lived so narrowly as she had will do, she was frightened and indeterminate. It was Tryphena who made up her mind for her.

"Why, we shall be delighted, Mr. Vance," said Tryphena. "Our compliments to your mother, and we shall be delighted. But how to get to Greenways, will you kindly advise us?"

"I thought upon that," replied John Vance, with something like a blush. "I thought if you would not mind for once shutting up on a Saturday afternoon, I'd fetch you in my waggon, and make you as comfortable as comfortable. You'd enjoy the drive maybe if the weather holds."

"But Saturday!" said Jessamy, "and Whit-Saturday."

"We often don't sell a shillingsworth," put in Tryphena, with that strange, new determination of hers. "We shall be delighted, Mr. Vance."

So it was settled; and through the hot nights of the week that followed Jessamy could not sleep for excitement.

Tryphena was much the calmer of the two. It was Tryphena who did wild, extravagant things, going off to one of the big shops in the Grove, and coming back with a pink print which Jessamy thought was for herself, but which Tryphena presently announced was for Jessamy.

Jessamy protested. Where was Tryphena's frock to come from? Tryphena had a blue muslin which was going to be clear-starched, and she would run herself up a hat for Saturday in no time.

Saturday afternoon came at last. The errand-boy who lived next door, who usually performed the duty for them, put up their shutters to the amazement of Islington Street, or as much of it as observed the strange fact in the babel of noise and hurry which Islington Street was on Saturday.

About four o'clock John Vance's waggon came slowly along through the costers' barrows and the booths. The horses had a flower at each ear. The driver had a flower in his coat, and was dressed in his best. There was not much delay in getting off. At the very last Jessamy ran back to give the bit of ground ivy enough water to last it till they returned on Tuesday. Then she climbed into the waggon after Tryphena, who was already up, and the company moved off.

The floor of the waggon was covered with clean straw. Placed quite far back were two old-fashioned wicker chairs covered in flowered chintz. Tryphena already occupied one, Jessamy took the other. John Vance walked by his horses' heads till they were clear of the crowded streets.

Jessamy felt like a lady in an opera-box who sees everything, yet leaning back behind her curtains has a delightful sense of privacy.

"I had no idea I could be so glad about anything," she said to Tryphena.

"You look very well," said Tryphena critically. "That pink is the very thing for your eyes, and hair, and complexion. And the brown hat with the pink lining. After all, you are not forty, Jessamy, and you don't look your age."

"I'm sure you're as pretty as a picture," said Jessamy, blushing like a girl.

Then John Vance joined them, and they drove faster, getting into the better streets and again plunging into the slums, and passing villas and suburban shops, and so on till at last they reached a fine, wide common, with only a house here and there tucked away among the trees.

"We're quit of the town now," John Vance announced to the two delighted faces that had peered out from the tilt of the waggon for the last hour and a half without showing the slightest sign of weariness. "After this we've nought but country."

True enough, henceforth the road wound by the side of one sloping valley after another, with hills on the further side, and the valleys filled in with trees.

"Hereabouts the nightingales call finely from hill to hill," said John Vance.

"And shall we hear them?" asked Jessamy.

"Oh, yes, you'll hear them, if you wake at nights," the man said, tolerantly. "I don't hear them myself unless I make an early start for the market. 'Tis bed-time before they begin."

After two or three miles of the green valleys, the waggon suddenly pulled up before a towering hedge with a little gateway cut in it, and a couple of steps leading up to a little iron gate. The gate was held open by a child, an angelic-looking child, with flaxen hair drooping about an oval face, and great blue eyes. She was beaming her welcome. Jessamy thought she had never seen anything so expressive as her face.

"That's our Lucy," said John Vance. "She'll ha' been waiting an hour, maybe. And there's Mother at the door."

Inside the iron gate was a perfect wilderness of flowers, stocks, pansies, clove-pinks, roses, all crowded together and exhaling the most delightful perfume. And beyond the flowers was a little house with a trellised porch, and a very old dog was standing in the middle of the path wagging his tail, and a rosy-cheeked old woman, wearing Tryphena's cap, was nodding and smiling her welcome.

After the travellers had washed their hands and faces in a little room in the roof, the lattice windows of which opened on fields of sainfoin and clover, they went down the steep stairs to the little boarded room below, where a delightful country tea was spread. Cold ham and eggs, crisp green lettuce, and honey, and home-made bread, and yellow butter, and cream, and raspberry jam. Jessamy had not dreamt of such a meal for nearly twenty years.

After tea they sat out among the flowers and talked, and Mrs Vance unpacked her old memories of Knoll, and the deaf and dumb child sat between Tryphena and Jessamy and stroked a hand of each. And the dog lay and looked at them with friendly eyes. And John Vance sat smoking and saying nothing, but seeming to diffuse an atmosphere of general benevolence and well-being all about him.

The next day they went to church across the fields of sainfoin and clover, and through a park, and found the church hidden in an oak-wood in the depths of a valley, where no one would ever look for it. And John Vance walking ahead with Tryphena seemed about two inches taller to Jessamy's eyes as she walked behind with Mrs. Vance and Lucy.

"Beaming her welcome."

As they came home from church the mother's talk was all of her son, and it was significant beyond the common fond talk of mothers.

"The woman who gets my John will be happy," she said, "and there'll be no cause to be jealous of me, for I'll never be jealous of John's wife, but will ask only a seat in the chimney corner, and to look on at the happiness of my boy."

Jessamy listened and thought she understood. What a happy thing it would be for Tryphena! Surely, Tryphena would be glad to accept this amazing, unexpected happiness which had come her way. Of course, she, Jessamy, would henceforth be alone. Well, she must bear that. After all, the terror of what was to become of Tryphena if she were taken first would be removed. The sudden consternation which filled her heart at the thought of life without Tryphena she turned her back upon. What was Mrs. Vance saying? That John had never been one for fancies; but now he had taken one his old mother wasn't going to stand in his way. And how odd that he should have found country girls in Islington Street, and from Knoll too. Nay, not odd, the old soul went on, talking to herself. Wasn't the finger of the Lord plainly in it? All the time the deaf and dumb child, smiling like a pale sunbeam, kept stroking Jessamy's hand, and making a way into her heart.

Another day of the exquisite country joys, and the last night was come. They were to be up early in the morning to go back to town with John Vance in the waggon.

It was no night for sleep, with the moonlight in the room and the air drenched with perfume. The nightingales were calling from hill to hill. Below their music you heard the sawing of the corncrake. Jessamy lying, staring at the moonlight, suddenly was aware of Tryphena's eyes upon her.

"You are heart-broken at going back," said Tryphena.

"Not that, my girl," answered Jessamy, "but I was ever one for the country."

"I should never have taken you from Knoll," said Tryphena penitently. "But now you can come back. . . here. . . don't you see it, Jessamy?"

So it had come so soon.

"Nay, nay," said Jessamy, pressing Tryphena's arm to her in love and gratitude. "I couldn't think of that, dearie; I shall do as I am."

"Why, I wasn't proposing to you!" said Tryphena with a laugh; and then turned over on the pillow and fell asleep.

The ride back was a silent one. They had promised to come again to Greenways very soon. The old mother had sent them off with significant looks, and kisses, and loaded with good things to eat and to look at. The waggon was a bower as they drove down Islington Street in the fresh morning, while all the shops were still shuttered, and there was no one to see them but the milkman.

Jessamy was glad to return so quietly. She wanted to slip back into the old work-aday Jessamy with the sober brown frock before any of the neighbours saw her. John Vance had said something of coming up on Thursday, and Jessamy was troubled. Why, what was going to happen if she were to feel that Thursday was a day full of bewildering joy because John Vance was coming? John Vance, who would marry Tryphena and take her out of the life she was so little fitted for. Tryphena watched her sister in wonder. She seemed to have put off the country happiness with the pink frock, and went about with lips tightly set, and a sternness in eyes that were usually only soft and kindly.

Thursday came. The hour for the waggoner's arrival was generally about eleven o'clock. Jessamy that morning had a great longing to get away somewhere and not look on at John Vance's meeting with Tryphena. Something would be said to-day, Jessamy was sure of it. There had been a significance in John Vance's manner when he spoke of coming that had made Jessamy's heart beat. As though she were anything to John Vance except Tryphena's elder sister. As though she would be anything else if she could, seeing that Tryphena had found the road to happiness.

At breakfast, which they took together, before opening the shop, Tryphena commented on her sister's looks. Tryphena had come out of her dreams lately, and had become uncomfortably observant.

"I should put on the pink frock if I were you," she said, "since we are expecting a visitor."

"He will not notice what I wear," answered Jessamy, with an attempt at lightness, which only succeeded in being rather grim.

"You are very sure about him," said Tryphena, looking at her in an odd way, Jessamy thought.

However, when the two were once more behind their respective counters, Tryphena, who had been rummaging in a box which contained her millinery snippets, came round to Jessamy's side.

"You shall wear this," she said, with determination, fixing on as she spoke a bow of the most dainty figured ribbon, pretty enough to make the fortune of any hat it adorned.

"You will have me do honour to the occasion," said Jessamy, with the oddest little flash of temper. But Tryphena did not seem to discover temper in the speech. She would hardly have recognised such a thing in Jessamy, who had petted her all her life.

"To do honour to the occasion," she repeated, and then kissed Jessamy.

Jessamy was ill at ease. She did not want even Tryphena's gaze on her between the moreen petticoats and servants' aprons which dangled above Tryphena's counter; and Tryphena would keep looking at her. Suddenly she remembered the ground ivy. Why, she had forgotten to water it since they came back from Greenways. Perhaps it was dead by this time, since the soil of the place was mainly dust.

With a hasty word to Tryphena, she went into the little parlour and closed the door behind her. She took a jug of water from the table, and went out into their little enclosure. The ground ivy was still alive, though rather dusty and depressed.

She soaked it with water, root and leaves. Then, having composed her face in the minute's respite she went back to the shop.

Or, at least, she went as far as the half-glass door with its spotted muslin blind, which opened upon the shop. Then she stood still, paralysed. She had seen Tryphena lean across the counter, over the boxes of ribbons and flowers, and clasp her arms about the neck of a somewhat melancholy-looking man who stood the other side of the counter. Why, half the street might have seen it; and at any moment John Vance might arrive. Had Tryphena gone stark, staring mad?

After the first shock Jessamy opened the door and went into the shop. Tryphena still leant over the counter. The stranger was holding her hand: He seemed to have a good deal to say to her.

"Who is this . . . ?" Jessamy began.

She had come in view of the stranger's face now, and felt some memory stirring in her of the amiable, indeterminate mouth, and blue eyes that looked at her with a half-ashamed air.

"Why, it's Willie," said Tryphena. "Don't you see it's Willie, Jessamy? He's been a widower these many years, and has only heard of us now through Mrs. Vance. I am going to marry him, Jessamy; he hasn't been very happy."

"Marry him!" repeated Jessamy. "And what about . . . ?"

"About you? Oh, I needn't trouble about you."

"I'm better off than ever I was," said Willie, who looked badly as though he needed a woman's care. "I won't deny that my marriage was a mistake, though I blame nobody but myself. Tryphena's going to make it up to me."

To think that Tryphena should choose Willie Draycott before John Vance! Jessamy gasped. The ways of women were past finding out. And Tryphena was gazing at Willie's week-old beard and disordered hair as though he were the sun-god.

There was a sudden rattle of harness and thudding of great hoofs outside. Jessamy turned and saw John Vance dismounting from the waggon.

"You'd better tell him yourself, Tryphena," she said, "for I shan't."

It was her second little flash of temper that day; and saying it she turned and went back the way she had come.

She was standing looking down at the ground ivy when a great hand covered hers. Looking up with a start, she met the gaze of John Vance's honest blue eyes.

"Well, Jessamy, lass," he said. "That pair inside seem to be enough for each other. Your sister just told me where I should find you. You know what I've come to ask, my girl?"

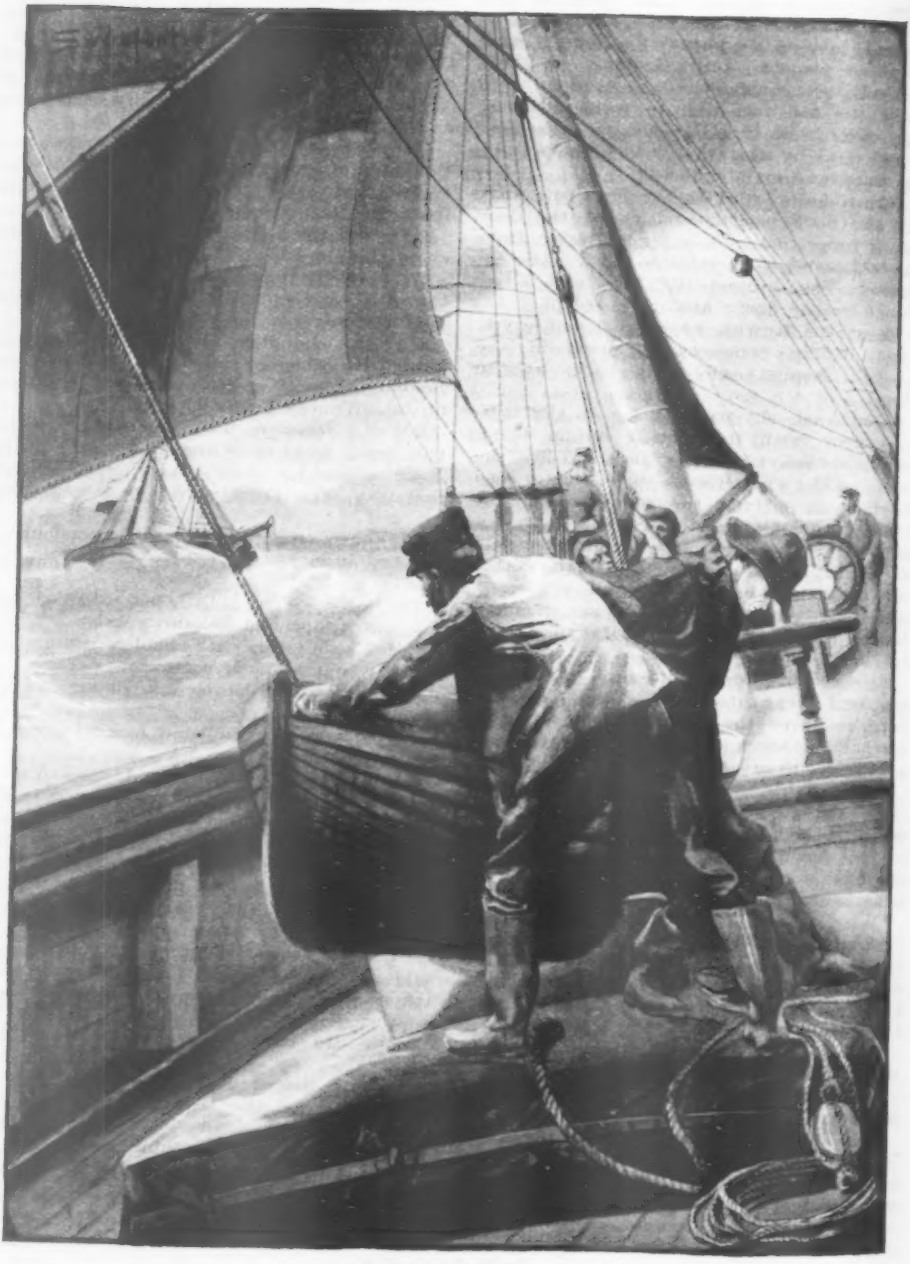
"I know," replied Jessamy, despondently.

"And it is yes, isn't it? Your eyes didn't deceive me?"

The lover looked a little bit ashamed, yet his arm was around Jessamy's waist

"Me?" she said, with sudden comprehension. "Is it me you want?"

"Who else? I never wanted anyone but thee."



They stood hand in hand looking down at the ground ivy.

"You were like that," said John Vance, with unexpected poetry, pointing to the dusty leaves with the little spike of purple blossom swathed in gray. "You were like that, but your place is in fields. And when will you come home? The old mother is ready for you. Lucy is ready for you; I am waiting. The house and all are yours."

"Let us take the ground ivy with us," said Jessamy. "Look, I do believe it has taken root. I wonder if it would bear another journey."

"We can but try, dear heart," said the man.

Jessamy looked around her with sudden, sharp pity for the scarlet-runners and the grass that she must leave behind. She wondered now how anything could bear to live in Islington Street, seeing there were such paradises in the world.

TO THE RESCUE.

CURRENT IRRELIGION.

NEGLECT OF SUNDAY.

By the Venerable W. M. Sinclair, D.D., Archdeacon of London.

"I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day."—REVELATION i. 10.

THERE can be no doubt that there is a wave of unbelief and indifference passing over this country. It is shown in four distinct ways: neglect of family prayer, neglect of the observance of the day of rest, neglect of Holy Scripture, and neglect of duty of parents to their children. With regard to this wave of indifference, it is, I think, owing to several causes: (1) the enormous spread of moderate wealth, and the consequent taste for luxury and self-indulgence; (2) the creation of a prodigious mass of newly rich people, who have no family traditions of religious influence behind them; (3) the unsettlement of men's minds from the wide spread of German views as to the authority and authorship of the Old Testament—people have thought that if the books were not by the traditional authors, then they had lost all truth and interest, which of course is not the case; (4) the utter weariness in men's minds as to all religion in consequence of the ceaseless public disputes during the last fifty years on questions of faith and practice; and (5) the natural reaction which always follows when any particular religious movement, whatever its character may be and in whatever direction it may be turned, is strongly pushed. All these causes have combined to lessen the influence of religion at the present moment in this country.

I wish now to appeal to you on the subject of the day of rest.

Very serious inroads are being made on its character as such in many ways. I preached on this subject nine years ago, and quoted the warning of Bishop Thorold. The facts of which he spoke are much more noticeable to-day. Among fashionable people Sunday gives no break or respite to the gaieties of the week. Large parties for luncheon and dinner are becoming common in great houses, in utter disregard of the servants. Sunday driving, which twenty years ago was almost unknown, is becoming frequent. The River Thames on Sunday is as crowded as a fair—you have only to look at the well-known picture of "Boulter's Lock on a Sunday Afternoon." Sunday is a favourite day with fashionable people for starting on long journeys; railway travelling has greatly increased, to the distress of the railway servants. Clubs meet every Sunday evening for dancing, others for a performance of operatic music. Forty-one thousand postal employees have to work on Sunday, and facilities for postal deliveries on the day of rest are widely advertised. There is a general rush on the part of speculators for the public amusement to get what gain they can out of the day when none are supposed to work. Vast Sunday excursions disturb the peace of hundreds of quiet villages. At sixty-seven theatres and halls in the metropolitan area the holiday of thousands of persons is destroyed by having to provide concerts and amusements. Cricket matches are being encouraged. All this means a combined attack on the day of rest as a national institution, and the growth of a spirit which, if it receives no check, will spread more and more widely, till that inestimable heritage of the English people has disappeared as completely as it has on the Continent.

It is indeed an invaluable boon that the Church has given to the world.

Why do we Christians consecrate one day in the week, and that the first?

The principle of one day in seven being devoted to rest and worship was one of the cardinal parts of God's revelation to the chosen people. So conspicuous was it in the Jewish system, it came so high in the table of the Ten Commandments, that, although it was long before the Gentile Christians had any opportunity of maintaining it in its first aspect as a day of rest, from the beginning they observed the first day of the week as a day of special worship. As soon as they were free to do it, they began to observe it also as a day of rest.

The intention of our Lord's teaching was that the Gospel should be the spiritual development of the Law. He came not to destroy the Law, but to fulfil it; to crown and complete its provisions by giving them their true spiritual meaning. Judaising is, of course, contrary to His spirit; but the Judaising temper, as opposed to the mind of the Gospel, is shown, not by recognising that the various points of the Christian revelation were prefigured by the Law and the Prophets, but by foolishly insisting on retaining some Hebrew enactment in literal fact, instead of in spiritual interpretation. So important and predominant an institution as the Jewish rest day was absolutely certain to have its spiritual representation in the Christian system.

Now we must remember that the establishment of the spiritual representation of the rest day was a gradual growth. There was never any formal transference of the severe rules of the one day to the natural and spontaneous happiness of the other. In primitive apostolical times two things are abundantly clear. On the one hand, among the Christians who had been Jews there continued a lingering and legitimate devotion to the memories and associations of their childhood at the very time when, in consequence of the Resurrection of our Lord, they were beginning to have peculiar affection for the first day of the week. On the other hand, the Christians who had been Gentiles never thought of observing the seventh day at all, but in the times of their obscurity and oppression found all that they wanted in the religious meetings, the meeting for the breaking of bread, the meeting for edification, on the Lord's day.

It was at the time when the Church was first recognised by the State, in the year 321, that the growing practice of all Christians of observing the first day of the week as a day of rest as well as a day of worship received formal and legal sanction. The idea of labour was formally dissociated from the Lord's day in that year by the famous Edict of Constantine. You may like to hear its memorable words once more, for we cannot be too thankful for its initiative: "On the venerable Day of the Sun let the magistrates and people residing in cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, persons engaged in the work of cultivation may freely and lawfully continue their pursuits; because it often happens that another day is not so fitted for grain-sowing or for vine-planting; lest by neglecting the proper moment for such operations the bounty of Heaven should be lost."

So at last the spiritual importance of the Fourth Commandment in securing to Christian people a day of rest and a day of worship was, by the practice of the Church and the law of the Emperor, enshrined in the economy of Christendom. It had come gradually, but it came surely. Just as the Christian ministry are chosen out, not on account of their own special merits, but because all the Lord's people are holy, and some must minister to them in holy things; so the first day of the week was adopted, not because all the days of our lives are not dedicated to God, but because by hallowing one day more we may hallow the others better and more perfectly. We cannot but rejoice that, by analogy, something of the ancient Hebrew day of rest grew slowly in the conscience of the Christian Church as the Hebrew day receded. The Christians in early days had not been able to make regulations about work, for a very large proportion of the whole population, especially of the Christian population, were slaves. We need not be surprised to find that the early spirit of the Lord's day was not so much one of abstinence from work as a readiness for spiritual activity; but the consciousness which gradually assimilated what was best in the Hebrew obedience to the Fourth Commandment recognised a truth of universal importance for Christians.

And it is an entire mistake to sneer at the observance of Sunday as a Puritan invention. The language of the Fathers shows that this was the way in which they looked at it. Sunday is styled by them "a solemn and venerable day," "the first and chief of days," "the first-fruits of the week," "better than all the festivals, new moons, or sabbaths of the Mosaic Law," "higher than the highest, and to be held in admiration above all other days"; "the queen," "the princess," or (as an old translator quaintly expresses it) "the lady paramount of days, clearly and pre-eminently the first"; "the day which the Lord hath made that we may be glad and rejoice in it, and which" (to use the strong words of St. Augustine) "if we are Christians we shall observe.'

Now, we in this country have the extraordinary privilege, which we do not sufficiently value because we are so accustomed to it, of living under laws the principles of which were settled when Secularism was unknown, and when all the nation was united in, at any rate outward, respect for the Christian faith. Amongst these principles we find that the observance of the first day of the week as a time for rest and worship is protected by the ancient law of the land. King Alfred himself enrolled the Ten Commandments at the head of his "Book of Dooms," and they have remained part of the statute law ever since. On the first day of the week no place of public amusement may be open for payment; against all trading on the first day of the week that is not absolutely necessary there are public enactments. The consequent quiet calm, over both town and country, must be recognised even by Secularists as an indisputable boon both to the minds and bodies of the people, in contrast to the busy and pressing operations of other days.

And this has been strongly felt by some of the greatest men of the age. Let me give you a picture of the English Sunday by one of the most eloquent modern French preachers, the Abbé Loyson, Père Hyacinthe. He is lecturing to a French audience on the education of working men:

"I have had the pleasure of visiting London. I never shall forget the emotion which filled me at the sight of that city. Like the ancient metropolis of which the prophet speaks, there she sat, the great empress of the seas, giving law to isles and continents, stretching afar over kings and peoples, not like those of old, the rod of oppression, but the beneficent sceptre of her riches and her liberty. And I heard the hum of her vast industry, and through the streets there poured the living sea of men and vehicles; then, by-and-by, there dawned a day which was like the days of my childhood—a day such as public life in my own land has not now to show—a day which was not like other days; no noisy waggons now in the streets, no throngs hurrying to business; the giant machine that had been roaring and thundering the day before had suddenly stood still as if before the vision of God. The great movement of British industry was hushed, and in the streets I saw naught but families going their way, calm and cheerful, to the place of prayer; I heard naught but the sweet chiming of Protestant bells. I look across the ocean, and there again I find this same Anglo-Saxon race clad in like grandeur under forms the most unlike. This time there is neither mediævalism nor aristocracy. It is, I love to think, the people chosen of God to renew the face of the earth, and to prepare for those old truths and institutions which cannot pass away newer and more enduring garments. Now the United States keeps holy the Lord's day, just the same as England, and sends back to us across the ocean that same answer of God's silence to man's profanations."

That is a beautiful and memorable tribute. And now hear what Mr. Gladstone thought of it:

In 1869, in reply to a deputation, Mr. Gladstone, then Prime Minister, said:

"The religious observance of Sunday is a main prop to the religious character of the country; from a moral, social, and physical point of view the observance of Sunday is a duty of absolute consequence."

In a letter in 1876 he clearly expressed his views as follows:

"Believing in the authority of the Lord's day as a religious institution, I must, as a matter of course, desire the recognition of that authority by others. But over and above this, I have myself, in the course of a laborious life, signally experienced both its mental and its physical benefits. I can hardly overstate its value in this view, and for the interest of the working men of this country, alike in these and in other yet higher respects, there is nothing I more anxiously desire than that they should more and more highly appreciate the Christian day of rest."

And so late as 1897 he wrote:

"I adhere with ever-growing strength to the opinions I have many times expressed on the subject of the Lord's day rest."

Lord Beaconsfield held the same view. When opposing the opening of museums on Sundays, on May 5, 1879, he uttered the following words:

"Of all Divine institutions the most Divine is that which secures a day of rest for man. I hold it to be the most valuable blessing ever conceded to man. It is the corner-stone of civilisation, and its removal might even affect the health of the people. It (the Sunday opening of museums) is a great change, and those who suppose for a moment that it could be limited to museums will find they are mistaken."

If we turn to science, we get the same answer.

Most interesting experiments have been made by scientific men in France, showing how the strength of a workman gradually fell day by day for six days, and how his energies were restored by the rest of the seventh day.

The late Mr. Frank Buckland, the distinguished naturalist, puts his view of the Sunday question very clearly. Writing in March, 1886, he said:—

"I am now working from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., and then a bit in the evening, fourteen hours a day; but, thank God, it does not hurt me. I should, however, collapse if it were not for Sunday. The machinery has time to cool. The mill-wheel ceases to patter the water, the mill-head is ponded up, and the superfluous water let off by an easy, quiet current which leads to things above."

If we turn to the leaders of labour we get the same strong evidence.

Mr. Broadhurst, M.P., in his able speech on this question from his seat in Parliament, spoke as follows in 1882:

"To those who lead a ceaseless life of toil this Sunday is that which the cooling stream in the desert is to the weary travellers. The thoughtful workman regards his ever and sure recurring Sunday as the symbol of his future, as it is the blessed day of his present rest. In these twenty-four hours of each week he seems to have the foretaste of that future in which he shall share with all mortals the advantages and the results of a life of labour. You rich men have your recess—your periods of relaxation. The workmen have nothing except this day. This is their autumn, as it is their springtime and summer. I ask Parliament, who did not confer the boon, not for a moment to think of taking it from the people. The gift was anterior to Parliament—it is a greater gift than Parliament ever made. I ask you, in the interests of those who toil, to retain this boon for them, and not to play fast and loose with such a sacred—with such a priceless—gift as this which they enjoy, but to hand down to them and to those who come after them this pearl beyond price, this joy without description, this day of rest."

Another leader, Mr. John Jenkins, J.P., secretary of the Shipwrights' Associated Society and president of the 1895 Trades Union Congress, said in 1896:

"I do not hesitate to say that, of the many privileges enjoyed by our country, no single one is more cherished, more dear to the hearts, consciences, and bodies of working men and working women, than the weekly day of rest. The association, by preserving, protecting, and extending this privilege, is doing a noble work for thousands of the industrial classes, and also, I firmly believe, for the maintenance of Britain's industrial supremacy among the nations of the world. I know from my own personal experience, and from the testimony of my fellow workmen, that Sunday's rest is the sweetest, most refreshing break in the monotony of manual labour. To me Sunday ever seems a bright recurring oasis in 'time's desert of toil,' to which I look longingly forward. It is a sheltering haven wherein, after six days of hard buffeting with life's storms, I can anchor in peace and safety, and there recuperate my strength and refit myself the better to renew life's arduous voyage on the morrow. Apart from its blessed religious uses, I have ever found that a 'Sunday well spent' strengthens me in mind and body, gives vigour to the intellect and muscles, and hardens my moral fibre, the better to resist evil influences and to absorb what is purest and best."

Mr. Benjamin Pickard, M.P., the leader and president of the great Miners' Federation, said:

"As far as the working man is concerned, I believe it would be a serious matter for him if the days of labour were increased to seven. The seventh day is a day set apart by no human being, but by the great God, the Creator and Preserver of men, given to us wherein to rest. One of the speakers put it that it was a mere physical question. It is a great physical question, and a great sanitary question as well. But to the working man, as to all, it implies considerations not merely of a physical nature, but of a social, a mental, and a moral also."

Lastly, I will set before you the evidence of the dramatic profession. Upwards of 500,000 persons are employed in the amusement industry. Between 700 and 800 of them, many leaders of the profession included, signed the declaration I am about to quote:

"We, the undersigned members of the dramatic and musical professions, and managers of halls, theatres, entertainments, concerts, etc., desire to express the hope that the law which prohibits the opening of places of amusement and entertainment for money payment on the Sunday may be upheld, so that the 500,000 persons employed in the amusement industry may be protected from the burden of Sunday labour."

An actor accompanied his signature with the following significant letter:

"I now take the opportunity of thanking you for your kindness in looking after the interests of members of one of the most hard-worked and tiring professions there possibly is. I notice with fear how every year our only day of rest is gradually being encroached upon, and can only suggest that if tip-top artists would refuse to take less than their ordinary fees the evil would soon be stopped. If it were not for Sundays we should have no day of rest at all, as, when other people are enjoying and resting themselves on an occasional bank holiday, we are always as a rule, unless out of an engagement, more hardly worked, sometimes having two rehearsals before the evening performances, and if not, a matinée in the afternoon."

Now, what we say is that just in proportion as Sunday is made a day of amusement so, as on the Continent, it will become a day of labour. The caterers, the railway men, the steamboat men, the carmen and drivers, the attendants on music-halls, galleries, and museums, the domestic servants who have to provide for the parties, are already a vast army. But other labour is absolutely certain to follow, and already the building trade is seen, in the hurry of the contractors, encroaching on the privilege of the workmen. We appeal to the Secularists to realise that if the character of Sunday is altered the guarantee of that absence of labour which they cannot help valuing is removed.

We appeal to the men and women of pleasure to respect, at any rate, a great characteristic national institution, and to have some pity on those who have to minister to their selfishness. The broad principle of the whole people in this critical matter should be not to employ any single person unnecessarily on the day of rest. Each encroachment seems small in itself, but it is an encouragement to others to follow on, and the aggregate soon becomes startling and revolutionary.

We implore them not to give up the habit of worshipping God, at any rate once, on the Lord's day, whether in town or country.

We implore them not to encourage amusements in their homes, which cause scandal to the serious and impel the irreligious to greater and more general invasion of the rest day.

If they have their friends to see them on Sundays, as is very natural, we implore them, for the sake of their servants, to have plain and simple fare, few courses, and as little trouble as possible. We are told that our late beloved and revered Queen grieved that Sunday was now so much less carefully observed than in early Victorian days, and would gladly have issued, were she able, a condemnation of Sunday dinner-parties.

We entreat them to give up the practice of using Sunday for starting on their journeys. Let them have some consideration for that admirable class of men the railway servants.

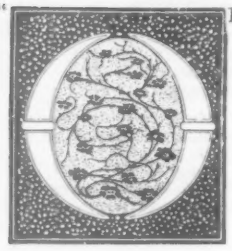
The hundreds of thousands of cyclists we urge, for the sake of their own souls, to worship God, at any rate, once in the day, if possible in their own church, or at least in some church which they may be passing. If they neglect the day altogether, they will soon lose all sense of religion.

And to all who are Christians not in name only, but in reality, I commend the words of St. John, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." I ask you to make the most of this happy opportunity of rest, meditation, worship, and self-recollection. Let no Sunday go by without receiving some distinct refreshment and help to your souls. Do not merely think what you may do, but what is best for you to do for your spiritual health. I can hardly conclude better than in the words of George Herbert:—

"O Day most calm, most bright,
The fruit of this, the next world's bud,
The indorsement of supreme delight,
Writ by a Friend, and with His blood;
The couch of Time, Care's balm and bay:
The week were dark but for thy light:
Thy torch doth show the way.

"The Sundays of man's life,
Threaded together on one string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the eternal glorious King.
On Sunday Heaven's gate stands ope,
Blessings are plentiful and rife,
More plentiful than hope.

"Thou art a day of mirth:
And where the week-days trail on ground,
Thy flight is higher, as thy birth.
O let me take thee at the bound,
Leaping with thee from seven to seven,
Till that we both, being tossed from earth,
Fly hand in hand to Heaven!"



A Christmas Sketch by Amy Le Feuvre.

CHAPTER IV.

MISS CRAY'S CHRISTMAS.

"OH, mother, don't ask cousin Jessie to come. She's such a miserable old thing, ugly and shabby and always whining over her poverty. I'm sure she'll cast a shadow over it all, and I do want my wedding to be as bright as ever it can be. I am so happy. I don't believe there could be a happier girl in the world!"

It would have been difficult to find a brighter, prettier bride than Dorothy Cray. She stood on this June morning in her mother's dainty boudoir overlooking the sunny flower garden. In the distance the old park of Sunnycroft Hall stretched away down to the river, with its grassy glades and avenues of elms and beeches. Roses tapped against the window panes, and scented the room with their fragrance, bowls of heliotrope and rare hot-house flowers filled the room; but Dorothy with her laughing eyes, her bewitching dimples and smiles, and her curly golden head, was surely the fairest flower of all.

Mrs. Cray looked at her radiant young daughter, and sighed.

"My darling," she said, "I sometimes wonder whether prosperity has spoiled you. Your father and I have shielded you from every trouble or care, you have had a sunny girlhood, and every wish of your heart gratified. Do not let it make you indifferent and careless to the sorrows of others. Can you not let a little sunshine fall on your poor little cousin who has so few pleasures now?"

"She's such an old maid, mother! And I can't bear old maids, they're always so snappy and cross. I think I should die if I were Cousin Jessie. What is the good of her? She does no good to anyone, except snap their heads off when they go to see her. I won't be selfish; you can ask her to come, but I shall try to keep out of her way!"

Dorothy danced off, and her mother, with another smile and sigh, turned to her letters. How little she thought that she had seen her daughter for the last time in all the joyousness and thoughtless gaiety of youth.

But so it was. The girl had run off to invade her father's study, and to coax him to leave his business papers that had been so engrossing him lately, and come for a ride with her. She found him leaning forward on his writing-table, and when she touched him, her terrified scream brought her mother and servants in alarm to her side.

Mr. Cray was dead, owing to failure of his heart, and his death was due to the news he had received that morning. A gold mine in which he had foolishly invested most of his income had collapsed, and Mrs. Cray and her daughter were left practically penniless.

Dorothy was stunned at first. Her marriage was postponed, and she had to devote herself to her mother, who never got over the shock, but became a paralysed invalid. But the girl bore up bravely. Youth and health was hers, and she felt secure in the love of her fiancé.

When he failed her, and she learnt that her money and not herself was his chief attraction, she lost her trust in God and man. The sudden sharp blows of misfortune crushed her, and Dorothy Cray lived her life in bitter discontent and misery. She moved into lodgings with her mother, and for ten years nursed and cared for her with gloomy fortitude. Then she found herself alone in the world, with just enough money to keep off starvation, but little for comfort and luxuries. She moved up to London, and after many fruitless efforts, at length got taken on a staff of writers for some cheap and popular magazine. Year after year found her in the same groove, making no friends, for she was entirely self-centred, and drifting into the once-despised spinster's lot.

Sometimes as she looked at her faded features, and shabby attire in her glass, she wondered if her youth with all its beauty and gladness was but a dream. This Christmas season was indeed mockery to her. She sat in her room and tried to shut out all sounds and reminders that it had come round again.

"I hate to see the joyful faces about the streets. It is only the children that can be happy. Their time will come as they grow older, to see everything turned into dust and ashes before their eyes. Oh, what a pretence it all is! What a ridiculous farce to set apart a season when everyone is supposed to rejoice!"

She paced her room in impatience and scorn.

And then a strange impulse moved her to take out of her writing-desk some old letters, letters that had been returned to her by her faithless lover, and which letters from sheer indifference had remained untouched in the packet in which they arrived there many years.

She looked at the girlish writing with pathetic interest. Then slowly and deliberately she sat down by her fire and read them steadily through.

They struck her now as very crude and childish, very self-absorbed, and indifferent to anyone's likes and dislikes but her own.

"I was a spoilt child," she mused. "Spoilt by indulgence and prosperity for the first twenty years of my life, and spoiled by cruel adversity for the last thirty years. Well, I have tasted of the two extremes. I am now living an aimless, monotonous life, and don't think I have any feeling left, for possible chances or changes. Time will drag on as it has dragged, until I go the way of most men and women, and my non-existence will affect no human being, any more than my present existence does."

Then she began to cry softly over her own fate. The happy girlish letters in her hand had touched and softened her.

"How little I thought when I wrote these what the future held for me. I wonder if things had gone differently, whether my marriage would have been a happy one. I hardly think it could have been. He broke his wife's heart years ago, people say, by his treatment of her, and she was another poor dupe—married for her money. I was saved that misery. I wonder if there is anything on earth that will make a woman happy, independent of a husband and a home! I despise myself for thinking them necessary, but a single woman's lot is not enviable when she has no one belonging to her. I can't conceive of any possible gift in life that would bring me happiness now. Money, influence, position would not—I have proved their hollowness."

These thoughts kept her awake most of the night, and when Christmas Day dawned, she rose unrefreshed by quiet slumber.

"Now how shall I get through this horrid day? A blank day, indeed, for me—almost like a Sunday. What can I do? Where can I go? I hate the sound of church bells. How sick I am of myself and my surroundings! I don't want to be reminded that this is a joyful day. What happiness, what joy can it bring to me?" She started. Who was that outside her door? She watched the envelope being pushed underneath, and picked it up with uneasy curiosity.

"The Christmas Angels' Message," she read with a short laugh. "Now has anyone been sending me a Christmas Card, or is it a tract in disguise?"

She opened it.

"I bring you . . . great joy.
For unto you this day is born . . .
a Saviour!"

Here was the answer to her unspoken question. "What joy can this day bring to me?"

She was struck with the coincidence. Could "Great Joy" ever come to such as she?

She gazed at the little card in wonder.

Womanlike, her first thought was, who had sent it to her! "It looks like a child's doing. Can it be that little boy downstairs who has picked up my glasses for me more than once? And yet I have hardly spoken to him, he would never take any interest in me! I must find out from Jennie when she brings me in my breakfast. The words are peculiarly appropriate to my frame of mind, but what a mockery to talk about 'great joy' to me. I must look the words up in my Bible, if I can find it. I believe I have one somewhere. It will give me something to do after breakfast."

Jennie came in rosy and smiling.

"'Appy Christmas, mum!"

Miss Cray smiled, and was conscious that smiling was an unusual experience.

"Someone else has been trying to wish me that in a different way, Jennie. Did you push an envelope under my bedroom door just now?"

"Oh no, mum," said Jennie breathlessly, "but Master Maurice did. He were up afore 'twas light, and he giv' me a card 'e did 'isself, it ain't got much on but words, but 'twas the angels' message he said! But bless 'is 'eart, I says to misses 'tis the thought one likes, not so much the gift!"

Miss Cray said no more. She ate her solitary breakfast with the card lying before her, and her eyes rested upon it with wistful perplexity. She got her unused Bible out of a top shelf in her bookcase, and sat down to study the Christmas story for herself. And as she read on into the Gospels she dimly began to perceive that the sad and sorrowful ones on earth were the ones for whom the Saviour came, that they were specially the objects of His love and care.

Great joy did not flood her soul all at once, but a gleam of sunshine stole in that morning and sent her to church wondering why she had never seen that Christmas joy was not meant to be confined to the young and lighthearted, but to the old and lonely and friendless ones.

"Unto you this day is born . . . a Saviour."

The words never left her, and when the clergyman took them for his text she was not a bit surprised. She listened as she had never listened before, and the old, old story quickened and stirred to life her sleeping, apathetic soul.

As she walked home she raised her face to the wintry sky.

"I did not think," were her unspoken words, "that there could be a good time coming for me. If the Saviour was born to bring it to me, I do not see why I should not have it in this life as well as in the next. Our vicar says it is all wrapped up in Him, and that His hands are stretching out to save and bless. I wish——" here a little choke came in her throat—"I think I must try and get within reach of Him!"

CHAPTER V.

MRS. CALMEON'S CHRISTMAS.

"NOW, Barton, you needn't talk to me of Christmas cheer and goodwill, and all the rest of that jargon! If you are dying to go and enjoy yourself, I'll give you the day off, and you can hunt up that extravagant sister-in-law of yours who has brought your brother into the Bankruptcy Court. Leave me alone, that is all I ask of you, and if a letter comes to me from Calmeon Court, put it straight into the fire. Don't dare to bring it to me!"

Mrs. Calmeon settled herself back in her easy chair with an angry jerk. She was a stout, pleasant-faced woman, but a pair of flashing black eyes showed that within her placid frame there dwelt an evil temper.

Mrs. Calmeon's fiery temper had been her curse through life. She had never learnt to control it, and it was the cause of perpetual discord in her family. She had two married sisters, with whom she was not on speaking terms, and two years previously had quarrelled so violently with her husband that she had left him; and taking her confidential maid with her, had travelled through the Riviera, declaring that she would never go back to her home.

Admiral Calmeon had only enjoyed his wife's society at rare and short intervals for many years. He was necessarily away at sea for the greater part of the time, and perhaps he was content to be so; for Mrs. Calmeon's temper did not improve with age. When he at length retired from the service and settled down in his family place, he found that his wife expected still to be the ruling spirit there. He was not a man who would submit to this, and then began a long and bitter struggle between two arbitrary and self-willed people. It ended in Mrs. Calmeon packing up her belongings and taking her departure. The admiral made the best of it, and informed his friends that her health required a long sojourn in a warm climate, but when he heard she had returned to London, he began to think it would be best to make peace, and he accordingly wrote to her. Mrs. Calmeon by this time was heartily tired of travelling. She had spent a great deal more money than she had expected to do, and she was longing to be in her own home again.

But her husband's letter did not improve matters. He was a thoroughly good-hearted, high-principled man, but singularly devoid of tact, and he wrote as he might to one of his junior officers in the service who had committed a breach of discipline. Mrs. Calmeon's hot temper rose again, and she wrote more unwisely than she had ever spoken. He retaliated in the same spirit, and then she wrote to him that she would never communicate with him or see him again. The next letter that came from him she burnt; the next she returned unopened. And now on this Christmas morning she found herself sadly crippled in means, and miserable in spirit, established in a quiet, unpretentious lodging-house.

Barton looked at her mistress rather wistfully. She was a good, faithful servant, and desired nothing better than to see her master and mistress reconciled.

"I don't want to go away from you, ma'am," she said straightening herself for a last effort, and speaking fast and nervously. "And there won't be any letters from Calmeon Court, ma'am, for the Admiral is very ill, ma'am. I heard last night from Jane to tell me so."

"Bring up my breakfast, Barton, and hold your tongue!"

Barton sighed and left the room. Mrs. Calmeon settled herself afresh in her chair, and toasted her feet at the blazing fire.

"It's a miserable day," she said with an impatient little shiver. "I always did dislike Christmas. I wish it was over. As soon as I can I shall leave London; it is too noisy. I think I shall try Malvern. I hardly had any sleep last night, and everyone in the house seems to have been stirring since daybreak. I have heard that child racing up and down stairs for hours. His mother ought to keep him quiet. I'm thankful he keeps away from my passage. It reminds me of when I spent a Christmas with Maria. How boisterous her boys were! But they used to be very fond of me. If it had not been for Maria's temper I would have liked to have adopted one of them. They always liked visiting me. And Rudolf was a fine little fellow. I suppose he must be quite a young man now. Ah! if I had only had a son, I would not be now so friendless and forlorn! All my life long I have had to go without affection. I should have been a better, a happier woman if I had had children. And that is the want in our home. Henry would never have dared to treat me so if I had had children to stand up and defend me. I don't wish him ill. I wonder what is the matter with him—touch of gout, perhaps; that is what makes his temper so unbearable. Shouldn't be surprised if Caroline has gone to him. She was always so infatuated over her 'darling brother.' I hate to think of her there, and what must she think of me? Everything evil, I suppose. Henry told me once he would rather have me nurse him than anyone else. That was long ago, but I know I am a good hand at it. If he is very seriously ill, there is no competent doctor. Old Forster is a fool! He kills more patients than he cures. I should think Henry must feel sorry now that he has driven me away by his cruelty. I wonder he doesn't write and beg me to come to him; perhaps that last letter of his was to express sorrow for his behaviour. Now I come to think of it, the writing looked very queer and shaky. But I won't go to him till he entreats me to do so. I couldn't; it would be placing myself in a false position. He always was such a helpless man when he was ill. Well, he will be having as miserable a Christmas as I am having—it is his own fault, not mine."

"'Can you not let a little sunshine fall on your poor little cousin?'"—p. 298.

Mrs. Calmeon brushed away some glittering drops from her eyelashes. She began to pity herself extremely. Barton came in with her breakfast, and on the tray was a white envelope.

"I found it outside the door, ma'am. I don't know who left it, but it is addressed to you."

"I'll send for you when I want you, Barton."

The maid withdrew. Mrs. Calmeon adjusted her glasses, and looked at the envelope curiously. "The Christmas Angels' Message," she read. She opened it. A red and white lettered card met her eyes.

"On earth peace.
For unto you is born this day . . . a Saviour."

"Now what has this been sent to me for?" she exclaimed, pushing it from her impatiently. "A message, indeed! I think it is an exceedingly impertinent one! Peace! I'm sure I want peace as much as anyone, but no one will let me have it."

She drank a cup of tea hastily, then pushed it away from her with a little sob. Leaning her elbows on the table she put down her face into her hands, and began to cry.

"I'm getting a soured, miserable old woman. Everyone has quarrelled with me, and even my husband turns me out of doors. Peace! It is a mockery. No one has any right to send me such a card! I'm sure I'd give worlds to live at peace with my husband. I used to look forward to the time when he would retire and come home for good. I thought that we should be so happy together. He used to be fond of me. But it all turned out a miserable failure. He has lost all affection for me; I care much more for him, in spite of all his overbearing ways. If he would try to be different, I would go to him to-morrow. I may have been to blame. I wish I could control my quick temper. I am willing to make peace with him, I am sure I am!"

She dried her tears and tried to continue her breakfast. But her eyes, in spite of herself, kept wandering to the card.

"For unto you this day is born . . . a Saviour."

She mused over the words. Mrs. Calmeon was not an irreligious woman. At one time she had very earnestly sought the Saviour, and had found Him; but after a time her unbridled temper, like the thorns, had choked the good seed, and her life had been unfruitful for many a year. The verse brought back to her all the old sweetness and rest associated with the One Who had laid His hands upon her sin-burdened soul, and bid her go in peace.

"It is my temper," she sobbed. "Even Christ has cast me off. I have driven God and man away from me!"

She rose from the table and paced the room.

"'This day a Saviour . . . on earth peace.'"

And the words ran through her heart and brain with persistent force.

"I don't know who sent me this card," she said to herself at length, "but I believe the hand of God is in it. I am longing to be at peace with my husband, and Christmas is the time for it. I shall go straight back to Calmeon Court this afternoon and Barton shall pack our things. I shall try and never say an angry word again. I will let Henry do and say what he likes. A man ought to be master in his own house. I always felt it, though I fought hard against it. I should despise him if he could not get the better of me, I know I should! And, oh, I wonder if Christ will receive me back again and forgive me! I wonder if He will come into my heart and take charge of me and my temper! A Saviour! 'He shall save His people from their sins!' I do believe He could save me from my temper, if I were to trust it to Him!"

A long time elapsed before Mrs. Calmeon rang her bell for Barton. She was having a very important and close interview with the only One who could give her Christmas "peace." It was an interview that altered her whole life from that day forward.

When Barton came in, her mistress had moved her chair to the window, and was looking out above the tiled and slated roofs into the grey sky.

Barton looked out too.

"I think it will be a fine day, ma'am. Will you be going to church?"

"I don't think so. Have you a Bradshaw? Do you know how the trains are running to-day?"

Barton looked as surprised as if her mistress had proposed travelling on Sunday.

"I can find out, ma'am, if you wish."

"Do so. Did you hear, Barton, what was the matter with the Admiral?"

Barton's dismayed face brightened at once.

"It was a very bad cold, ma'am, Jane said. Jane said he hadn't been well for a long time, and didn't seem to wish to take any care of himself. She said he seemed to be failing—and, excuse me, ma'am, Jane said before he took to his bed, he said to her that he would like her to write to you acquainting you with his state."

"'If your mistress's health is better, she may be coming home,' he said. 'I've written once or twice to ask her how soon I may expect her.' And Jane said, ma'am, he just lies quiet, eating nothing, and only looking towards the door as if he's expecting you!"

"Go and find out about the trains, Barton."

Mrs. Calmeon's quiet manner hid an anxious heart. She was touched by her husband's loyalty to her. He never by word or sign allowed his servants to think that there had been any serious breach between them. And he was sick and lonely, and he was expecting her! She could not wait for her maid's return, but went to her bedroom, and with feverish, eager haste, began to stow away her possessions in her travelling trunks.

When Barton appeared, all she said was:

"We must be as quick as we can, Barton, or we shall not reach Calmeon Court to-night."

And twelve hours later the Admiral's grey head was pillowed on his wife's shoulder, and she was whispering in his ear:

"You must get well, Henry, for I can't live without you, and I mean to be a better wife in future. This Christmas will be the beginning of happier times, I am sure."

"'I found it outside the door, ma'am.'"

CHAPTER VI.

MAURICE'S CHRISTMAS.

"A HAPPY Christmas, mummie! I've been as quiet as ever I could, but it's Christmas Day, and I really think it is quite time for you to get up."

This was the little voice that roused Mrs. Dacombe from her dreams.

She drew her boy close to her.

"Dressed already, darling? I have overslept myself. It will be nice to have a real holiday to-day."

"Yes, it has stopped raining, mummie, and Jenny has given me a beautiful piece of holly for my buttonhole. And I've slipped my Christmas cards under all the doors. Isn't it fun?

Do you think they will like them when they open them, mummie?"

"I'm sure they will, my boy. Now run away, and stay quietly in the next room till breakfast comes."

Away scampered Maurice. He had quite changed his mind about Christmas—so many nice things had happened during the past twenty-four hours that he began to look at life quite differently. The day before his mother had heard from an old friend who had lately returned from India. He was a widower with one little girl, and he had written asking her to bring her boy and dine with them at a private hotel in town.

Maurice had never seen his mother look happier than when she told him this.

"This Mr. Gordon used to spend his holidays with us when I was a little girl. We grew up together, and then he went abroad, and I heard of his marriage afterwards. He was like a brother to me, and he has been staying with your Aunt Lettice in India."

"The Aunt Lettice who won't write to you, mummie?"

"Hush, dear, it was a misunderstanding. Mr. Gordon has made it clear to me, and she has written, Maurice. I have heard from her, too: it makes me very glad."

"I shall be very glad to dine at an hotel," said Maurice thoughtfully, "because they always look like the King's palace, the stairs are so big and wide. And I shall have a little girl to play with, too. Why, mummie, we shall have a lovely Christmas—quite as nice as when you were a little girl, don't you think so?"

That was one of the surprises that Christmas Eve brought him; but a parcel brought in by smiling Jenny was another, and when it proved to be a book of fairy stories, a gift from the landlady, Mrs. Trelawney, Maurice's joy overflowed.

"It's such a lovely book," he assured the landlady, with radiant eyes. "I always think fairies come next to angels, don't you? I love them next best. And I didn't think I would ever have a Christmas present from anybody!"

The afternoon of Christmas Eve was a very happy one. His mother seemed to rouse herself from her weary apathy and took him out to see the shops. She even invested in one or two trifles that seemed to the boy the height of extravagance. A packet of almonds and raisins, a pair of kid gloves, and a new tie for him, and a collar and pair of white muslin cuffs for herself.

"We must smarten ourselves up for our dinner, Maurice," she said, and she laughed as he had not heard her laugh before.

The boy stood at the window looking out and thinking over these things. When his mother came in, he sprang into her arms.

"Mummie, I want to tell you something. You won't laugh, will you, because it was really true?"

"I promise not to laugh, dear."

"Well, mummie, I woke up in the middle of the night, quite wide awake I was, and I was thinking about the Christmas Angels and wondering if they would really come down from the sky and sing about Jesus, when I heard them—I really did. It was lovely! I never heard any music like it before."

Mrs. Dacombe smiled. She had been awakened by some waits—a church choir close by—and had listened with pleasure to their trained voices, but she did not know that her little boy had been awake, too. She had not the heart to dispel this child's fancy.

"What did they sing?" she asked.

"They sang one very pretty song. I heard 'Glory to God in the highest,' but Mother there was only one song they could sing—the one in the Bible."

He paused, then added with kindling eyes: "Mummie, I think it was so very kind of God to send them to me. Because you see I'm the only one that hasn't got an Angels' message this morning. I mean a written one. I sent one to everybody in the house, but I couldn't send one to myself, could I? And I got the best of all."

"You did, indeed, darling."

There were tears in Mrs. Dacombe's eyes as she kissed her boy.

"And now," said Maurice, throwing back his golden head with a happy laugh, Christmas Day has begun, and I think it will be the very best day in my life!"

But Maurice never knew how busy his "Christmas angels" had been, how many hearts had heard and rejoiced in their message, and how the music that came down from heaven to earth so many years ago was sounding afresh in the ears of those who had forgotten the true meaning of Christmas.

"FRUIT—AN HUNDREDFOLD."

AMONG THE LEPERS.

LEPERS' TEMPORARY HUTS AT NASIK.

AT Tarn Taran, in the Punjab, there is a large sacred tank, credited with healing properties, round which enormous crowds gather at the time of the annual festival. The legend connected with these supposed-to-be miraculous waters runs as follows.

Once upon a time a poor leper wandered here with his wife. She left him, resting by a pool, while she went to beg for bread in the neighbouring town, and during her absence the hopeless misery of his condition so oppressed the man that he determined to end his life and his sufferings together.

No sooner, however, had he cast himself into the waters than renewed strength and health thrilled in every vein, and, instead of being drowned, he became "perfectly whole." The poor, weary wife did not at first recognise him on her return, but inquired of the noble-looking youth who sat by the pool what had become of her miserable husband. When she learned the truth, it was speedily "noised abroad," and others quickly came to partake of the same benefits.

This legend is itself a type of the blessing conveyed to lepers by the special Mission which seeks their bodily and spiritual welfare,* and which has for many years carried on Christian work at Tarn Taran.

The outcast leper—than whom there is no more miserable being on God's fair earth—comes to one of the Homes maintained by the Mission, often in fear and trembling, but, instead of the painful death anticipated, finds in them the water of life—the "fountain opened for sin and uncleanness."

Although no ultimate cure for the terrible disease itself has yet been found, proper treatment allows many of the afflicted ones to pass years of comparative comfort, and once and again they have been heard to thank God for the suffering without which they would probably never have learned to know the Saviour.

No pressure of any kind as regards their religion is brought to bear upon the lepers admitted to such asylums; but, as darkness cannot co-exist with light, so does heathenism vanish when brought into hourly contact with Christianity displayed in the loving-kindness of those who minister to their unhappy fellow-creatures, dressing their loathsome sores, comforting their misery, cheering their dark hours of agonising pain.

* The Mission to Lepers in India and the East, 17, Greenhill Place, Edinburgh.

The Mission to Lepers is an object-lesson which cannot be ignored. "We don't mind what you say, but we must mind what you do," was the observation of a Hindoo gentleman to one of the workers. No mission is so fruitful in its results, both as regards the alleviation of suffering and the conversion of souls. These utterly hopeless ones turn thankfully to Him Who "brought life and immortality to light."

One of the most remarkable of recently published missionary books is "In Leper Land," * an account of twenty weeks spent by its author—Mr. John Jackson—in India, and of his visits to twenty-seven asylums and settlements of lepers.

Works on India and its missions are common enough, but this touches on a side of life seldom brought before the notice of the reading public, and is of unique interest; the many illustrations from photographs make us realise the shadow and sunshine of a leper's existence better than any words can do, although Mr. Jackson's pen-pictures are also very graphic.

Here, at Saharanpur, are ten women, inmates of a small home, a careful inspection of whose hands shows that they do not possess one whole finger among them. One is poor Nagree, who has been a leper for thirty years; her toes are all gone, so that she has great difficulty in moving, but is very happy when her son pays her a visit. Three men in the asylum for males cannot walk at all, but drag themselves painfully forward in a sitting posture. In another place terrible sores are the result of some poor sufferer having thrust his stumps of feet into the fire for warmth, not feeling that they were being burned—so utterly is sensation lost in anæsthetic leprosy.

But if bodily nerves are dead, spiritual perceptions grow more keen when the leper is led into the light of God. Reuben, a young man who inhabits Parulia Asylum, has been a victim to the disease since his eighth year. "Despised and mocked by everyone, I had much sorrow and heart's distress," he says; "but now (within the home) I have long ago forgotten all my trials, and am happy. Here I have learned to know the Lord."

(Photo: J. Jackson.)

IN THE BAZAAR, ALMOSA: NATIVE HAIRDRESSER AT WORK.

* Marshall Brothers, London.

(Photo: J. Jackson.)

GROUP OF LEPERS AT CHANDAG HEIGHTS, HIMALAYAS.

Rupwa, who suffers much, and is nearly deaf, when asked for a message for his supporters in England, replies—"I send many thanks; I am happy in my heart, and very grateful."

Ilahi Bakhsh lived for twenty years in the Ambala Asylum. Leprosy deprived him of sight, and gradually of almost all that makes life bearable; his whole body was a tomb of corruption, in which the immortal soul was imprisoned — but victorious. "No, sahib, no," were some of his words when pity was expressed for his terrible condition; "since I trusted Christ nineteen years ago I have known neither pain of body nor pain of mind."

We might multiply such records indefinitely, but perhaps enough has been said to show the power of life over death, of love over despair, in the Christian leper. Many are definitely supported by friends at home—their adopted "fathers and mothers"—and surely the sum of five pounds yearly could not be better spent.

(Photo: J. Jackson.)

COMPOUNDER GIVING MEDICINE TO LEPERS, BHAGALPUR ASYLUM.

The largest asylum provided for by the mission is that at Parulia, inhabited by about five hundred lepers. "Many of the faces here were bright and happy," Mr. Jackson tells us, "though several were already sadly affected and prematurely aged, looking more like the faces of women of fifty than girls of ten or fifteen." This home has lately lost its beloved superintendent, Mr. Uffmann.

The numbers of healthy children now owing their safety to the fourteen homes for untainted offspring of the leprous parents are a living witness to the fact that the disease is not hereditary. If these little ones remain with their parents, the result is often fatal, so that the need of rescuing them from an awful fate is very urgent.

At Chandag, in the Himalayas, the asylum is superintended by Miss Mary Reed, herself a victim to the same disease as those to whom she unweariedly ministers. Her pathetic story has already been told by Mr. Jackson in a little biography, which has now reached its fourth edition, and is probably known to many of our readers.

We trust this more important work, "In Leper Land," will be equally popular. It can hardly fail to awaken sympathy and interest in these "most miserable of all human beings," and to stir the hearts of many who "sit at home at ease" to take some practical share in the work carried on for their relief.

One of the buildings at Asansol is the result of a wonderful quilt, wrought by a bedridden invalid in Canada, which realised £80 when finally sold after being often exhibited. A well at Sholapur was "dug by knitting needles." Mrs. Gates, having laboured with her hands when laid aside from active work, succeeded in earning sufficient money to provide this very necessary comfort for the asylum. So the loving toil of the lepers' friends "blesseth him that gives, and him that takes," and will surely earn the Master's assurance, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of one of these My brethren, ye did it unto Me."

VIEW FROM ASYLUM GROUND, CHANDAG.

GEORGE VICKERS' MINISTRY.

A Complete Story by Bryant Ray.

I.

I KNEW George Vickers well. He was a native of one of the many little villages on the western coast which, of late years, have become prosperous towns and popular resorts. The place was obscure enough when he was born, some ninety-odd years ago. In the days of our first acquaintance he was worn and feeble. An accident in childhood had made him permanently lame, and a painful internal complaint had rendered him prematurely old. His face was drawn, his teeth few, his hair white and thin, and, except for his piercing dark-brown eyes, which all but proclaimed him a gipsy, he had few attractions for a stranger. But those wonderful eyes arrested me at once; and many and many an hour did I afterwards fall under their strange magnetic force.

I am not quite sure, but I fancy his parents were poor and illiterate, for George carried the marks of it. Some would have it that he had been taught the art of bootmaking, but I very much question it; this, however, I will vouch for — he could cobble and mend. Yet, poor and uneducated, and unskilled in the higher mysteries of the craft of St. Crispin as he was, there could be no doubt of this: that, for an unlettered man, he had a grand grip of the saving verities of Scripture; that, for at least thirty years, he had been in lowly ways "cultivating the presence of God"; and that he knew for himself the omnipotence of prayer.

This wizened cobbler, it seemed to me, could actually see God. The soul and inner man that looked out of those eyes taught me that the blessed Master did not intend the sixth beatitude to apply exclusively to the future: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." George Vickers saw God here and now, even while his whole frame trembled with ecstasy as he talked of that further vision of "the King in His beauty" in "the land that is very far off."

For a long time this man was a beautiful mystery to me. He had not, so far as I could learn, one earthly relative. His spirit, although by no means "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," found its true home entirely in the invisible. His weakness of body and precariousness of livelihood never seemed to dim his outlook or damp his joy. Prayer about everything and anxiety about nothing brought most surely to him the peace "which passeth all understanding," and which "garrisoned" his heart. His was the most blessed hand-to-mouth existence I have ever seen, and sufficient for the hour was the evil thereof. As a motherless child will leave his toys and run to his father—now for a loving talk when his heart is full; now for a slice of bread when hungry, and now for a draught of water when thirsty; and now for the strong embrace which shall carry him in his weariness: so did George Vickers appear literally to live with God. I once ventured to ask him whether he actually prayed about every pair of shoes he mended? His reply — after a moment's thought, and with a smile which he never intended, but which I received as a rebuke —was simply this; "Yes, indeed, I should be sorry to miss the blessing it means. God loves me to speak to Him about all the work He pleases to send me. Why, He and I goes share and share over every bit on't. The Christmas time before this last He seemed to say to me, 'George, ask what I shall gi'e thee.' I thought a bit. Now, there was a good work goin' on that I knew abaat; and if He'd only give me a thousan' pair during the year to mend, and I gave to that work a thousan' farthings, that would be grand! Maybe, you think it wor a bold thing to do, but I went on my knees there and then, and asked Him to help my faith; and I says, 'Lord, give me next year a thousan' pair o' shoes to mend, and I'll give Thee for this good work a farthing a pair.' The year is just up, and here's the book where I set all down. A friend has counted it over, and he says it's all right. The Lord gave me a thousan' and three. And three, you mind; for, depend upon't, in some way or other, our Heavenly Father is allus better than our prayers."

This saintly old man, somehow, never could see any difficulties in the way of prayers being answered. He might have been one of the eleven of the Upper Room, to whom Jesus said: "If a man love Me he will keep My words; and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make Our abode with him. If ye shall ask anything in My name, I will do it." He lived so nearly to the unseen Presence, and submitted himself so absolutely to the supreme Will, as to know instinctively what to pray for, and how. At least so it appeared to me.

One illustration of this I should like to put down. It occurred some thirty years ago, and although the younger of the actors in it has probably passed to the better land as well as George, the dew of its freshness remains. There are parents whose hearts are breaking over wayward, wandering children; there are Sabbath school teachers sighing over the triflers in their classes; there are toilers in missions of philanthropy and rescue work tempted to pessimism; there are thousands of earnest men and women under their "juniper trees" in the desert, and in "doleful dumps" by the wayside, during seasons of reaction. Why, then, should this incident be unrecorded? "A cup of cold water given in the name of this disciple shall not lose its reward."

II.

GEORGE had been, for years before I knew him, a pillar of strength to his pastor. No prayer-meeting was dull or profitless where he lifted up his voice; a voice which often reminded me of that memorable harvest-day at Mizpeh, where the piercing cry of Samuel led to God's answering thunder and the rearing of the pillar of Ebenezer. If the history of that pastor's pulpit were written, the record of its power would not be complete, unless something of its inspiration were traced to the shoe-maker's bench, where the two often held converse on things "touching the Kingdom." To that pastor I am indebted for some of the details of the story about to be recounted; for the modest reserve of George left blanks scarcely to be tolerated, not only in this episode but in many others. He shrank from giving prominence to self. "The glitter of a poor glow-worm," he used to say, "must never take off our eyes from the glory of its Maker."

The place of worship George attended was a somewhat large mission hall, large, that is, for the village then emerging into a town. As seasons came and went, an increasing number of visitors served to augment the number of the worshippers, to the intense delight of the poor cobbler, whose seat was near the left-hand gangway, a few paces from the lobby door. That seat, as I can testify, was one of the earliest filled, and many a strong, silent petition went up to the throne from its occupant for blessing, specially for the unsaved.

It was a lovely Sunday evening, late in August, when there swept by that seat a fair young lady of some nineteen summers, attired in the height of the prevailing fashion. Her dress of rustling silk, her slim, tall, graceful figure and carriage would have rendered her conspicuous in any circle; in the midst of the quietly dressed audience familiar to George, she became at once an object of interest to his sharp eyes. Conducted to a seat where the line of vision was clear, she stirred his soul to the depths. Her mobile face from the beginning of the service to the very end revealed but too clearly her want of sympathy with the proceedings. She took no pains whatever, as George divined, to conceal the sense of the mistake she had made in being there at all. The prayers, the lessons, the solemn address, the interspersed hymns seemed to be to her an utter waste of weariness, and no sooner was the benediction given than she rose and hurried down the aisle as one glad to escape.

There was at least one—the farthest, surely, from her thoughts—whom she could not escape. An all but uncontrollable feeling of pity and Christian solicitude burned as a fire within him. During that service of little more than an hour, ejaculatory intercession, after his manner, burst from his heart of hearts for her salvation; but it was not until he had reached home, nor until a day or so had passed, that her welfare became the centre of a consuming passion; and he found himself praying for some special opportunity to be given him for a personal appeal.

This man, be it noted, was the very soul of modesty. There was, moreover, a courtesy beyond the teaching of art that disarmed those who listened to the outpourings of his simple, unaffected faithfulness. In this case, that modesty and courtesy took the form of an importunate cry of this kind:—

"Lord Jesus, I mind myself, and I now mind Thee of Thy own blessed words: 'All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth'; and Thou knows Thou tellt Thy disciples to speak of Thy gospel to every creature; and, lest they should be frightened, Thou did say: 'Lo I am with you all the days to the very end.' I do want to speak to this young leddy somehow; dear Lord, bring her to this quiet little place of mine, and if I tell her how Thou saved me, she will hear Thy gospel so, and won't tak offence."

With George Vickers, as with many of the godly, whose annals have never yet been written, there were, as I have already said, no difficulties in the way of prayers being answered. Such questions as, "Where was this maiden? Had she visited the town only for the week-end, or was she a visitor for the season? What possible circumstances would permit on the one hand, or absolutely prevent on the other hand, the prayed-for interview?" never once crossed Vickers' brain. "It was borne in upon my mind," he would have said, "that it was to be."

III.

COOL reasoners by the score—ay, and professed Christians by the church-roll—looking carefully at the antecedent circumstances, would have declared this to be absurdly impossible. The town, to begin with, consisted of two distinct parts built on two far different levels. The upper portion of the town was almost cut off from the lower; and George lived almost in utter obscurity at an extreme end of the latter. It is true that a tiny strip of board, bearing his name and that of his business in small, ill-shaped letters, was visible from the road to keen eyes looking for it; but it is certain that none reading that board would have surmised that the owner could be found only by their passing down a long, narrow passage at the side of the house where the board was affixed to a yard behind, and then to an outhouse of two stories, in the upper of which was his loft reached by wooden steps and entered by a trap-door! If one may speak for others, that loft was discovered with very much difficulty when I first made his acquaintance.

"That cobbler," it would be averred, "is a visionary indeed"—not a few would think it somewhat smart to call him "'a cobbler not sticking to his last.' Here, on the one hand, is a sprightly child of fashion, one of the butterflies of society, with at best a short, temporary residence in the upper part of the town, near to houses of tradesmen far more likely to please her fastidious taste, if she needs their skill; on the other hand, far out of the way, among cottages of the poor and in a neighbourhood of unsavoury slums, lives this old man, evidently in his second childhood, sighing day after day for an opportunity to intrude upon her the story of his past; the thing is beyond discussion."

Possibly, it is beyond discussion. George most certainly would have said so, discussion being rarely an experience with him. The days, and even the weeks, passed by. No second visit did the young stranger pay to that place of worship, so far as he knew. Not a sight of her was afforded him in rambles made short by his lameness. The month of September was drawing to a close; but George still prayed on, mingling with his petitions the clear-cut assurances: "With God all things are possible." "Is there anything too hard for the Lord?" For many years now he had prayed over issues far more unlikely from the human standpoint, and God had not despised his importunity. Would he fail him now? He couldn't believe in failure, or bate one jot of hope.

Two hours or so before noon, after a bright, warm season and an almost rainless harvest, the old cobbler was working at his little bench. He never forgot the day; it was the last Monday before October set in. For some little time there had been a rapping, he thought, which had not sufficiently aroused him; and then a sharp, impatient tattoo sounded up from his outhouse door. His opportunity had come. Lifting the trap-door, his heart gave a bound, for his eyes were gazing on the very maiden of his prayers!

"Is your name Vickers?" was her question.

"Yes, madam," was his quick reply.

"Can you mend these shoes for me to-day?" she continued, as George, striving to suppress his agitation, slowly descended to the opening where she stood, and tremblingly received them from her hands.

"Yes, madam, and most gladly, for my Heavenly Father sent you to me"; and after a hasty glance at the repairs needed, the cobbler placed the shoes beside him as if at once to show her that they held a secondary place in his thoughts. The young lady flushed and was silent, as if for an explanation.

"For several weeks, now, my leddy, if I may tell you so without offence, I've been praying for you, many and many a time since the evenin' you paid a visit to our mission room where I worships," said the old man, his face lit up with keen interest.

A look of utter bewilderment on her part and further silence loosened his tongue a little more. At first—so the sharp eyes of George led him to think—she was on the point of keenly resenting the great liberty he was taking with a stranger; but her darkening brow grew lighter as he threw the entire responsibility upon himself and quietly added: "I have been asking the dear Lord for this, my leddy, that He would in some way lead you to my door, and give me an opportunity of tellin' you what He has done for my soul; and He has seemed to say to me over and over again that you wouldn't be offended."

What exactly was said on that day before midday cannot be set down here. Let it suffice, that George was somehow permitted to tell that story to his fashionably dressed visitor; he, sitting down on one of the broad steps of his ladder, and she, on a small bench he had dusted for her near the open door; so adroitly had he succeeded in making an extension of the interview endurable if not acceptable.

The story, as I can testify—for he favoured me with it in the after days—was no common one, and, told with a rustic eloquence palpitating with the strength of a personality strong and intense such as his, it proved a subduing one. He told her of his youth of carelessness, his arrest, his conviction, his conversion, as heaven-born in his own eyes as that of Saul of Tarsus. He told her of his opened mind, and opened heart, and opened future till he could dare to say what that Saul said when he became Paul: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me."

"'He loved me, and gave Himself for me.'"

"Think of that, my dear leddy," said George again and again, as of a mystery that he would never be able to clear up: "'He loved me, and gave Himself for me!'"

The natural winsomeness of the man, when dilating on that crisis of his being, told upon the listener; till her silence was broken by a question here and a question there: and then, at a fitting moment, the poor cobbler with streaming face cried out:

"And do you think it possible, my leddy, that George Vickers can help praying in his little loft for others; that they, too, may know his blessed Saviour, and have his hope which is an anchor to the soul sure and steadfast?

That interview ended with a keen interest on both sides. It led also to other interviews at her special request, under far other circumstances, with interchanges of thought and prayer equally sacred to them. I know not that lady's name. I know not for a certainty whether she has passed into the unseen land whither her faithful monitor has gone. Her eyes may or may not rest on this feeble attempt to record—with as much accuracy as the intervening years have allowed—her conversion to God through this unique and strange instrumentality. But of this I am perfectly sure: she would be the last to deem the sight of that narrow board announcing the name of George Vickers "a coincidence." It was something infinitely more. It was nothing less and nothing other than the "Finger of the Most High"; a leading, if ever there was one, of that Divine Spirit "Who bloweth where He listeth," and all of Whose ways "are past finding out!"

"More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day:
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands in prayer,
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?"

READY FOR THE LORD.

By the Rev. J. H. Jowett, M.A., Carr's Lane, Birmingham.

"The end of all things is at hand."—1 Peter iv. 7—11.

HAT is a momentous conviction which is expressed in these words: "The end of all things is at hand." What kind of conduct will it determine? And to what kind of counsel will it lead? Here is an apostle, deeply possessed by the solemn conviction that the great Consummation is approaching, that the glorified Christ is returning, that the judgment is impending, and that "the end of all things is at hand." In the looming presence of so urgent and so commanding an event, how will the apostle shape his message? What kind of counsel will he give to his readers? What manner of preparation will he constrain them to make? It matters little or nothing to my purpose that the apostle's anticipations of the second advent were premature, and that the stupendous consummation was delayed. For you and for me the instructive and all-absorbing conjunction remains the same. Here is the Apostle Peter, sharing with his fellow-Christians the expectation of an immediate end. The Judge is at the door! What will be the manner of their behaviour? If we knew that within a year or two the Master would reappear as the august and sovereign Judge, how ought we to pass the intervening days? We know from the letters of the Apostle Paul, how the urgent expectancy influenced some of the early Christians. Some were thrown into panic. Others were despoiled of their spiritual collectedness by the invasion of unreasonable excitement. Others abandoned their ordinary employment, and lapsed into an indolence in which they might find more leisure to wait and watch for the King's appearing. And we know with what severity the apostle denounced these perilous and irrational excesses. "Study to be quiet and do your own business." "Be not shaken in mind." "We command that with quietness ye work and eat your own bread." "Let us watch and be sober." All this dangerous sensationalism was combated and subdued by the cool self-possession of this man's healthy and imperial mind.

And now here is the Apostle Peter confronted by the same prevailing and insidious inclinations. What will be the character of his message? Let us make the matter directly pertinent to our own condition that we may appreciate the strong, cooling, controlling influence of the apostle's counsel. For us, too, "the end" may be at hand. Death looms on the not-distant horizon. The King is at the gate! What shall be the nature of our preparations and the character of our behaviour?

"The end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore of sound mind." Sound mind! Life is to be characterised by reasonableness and sanity. There is to be nothing morbid about our mental state, nothing melancholy or diseased. We are to be mentally "sound," emancipated from distraction and panic. We may enter into the content of the descriptive word by watching its usage in our common speech. We are familiar with the phrase, "as sound as a bell," and the usage will act as part-interpreter of the apostle's thought. "Sound as a bell!" There is no break in the metal, no severance in the elements; it holds together in compact and undivided unity. "Sound mind," as sound as a bell; no break in the mind, no division, no distraction, but a wonderful collectedness, issuing in the definite tone of clear and decisive purpose. We are also familiar with another application of the word, as in the usage, "sound" and "unsound" meat, where the significance is indicative of health and disease. And this too may guide us into the content of the apostle's thought, for when he counsels "sound-mindedness" he unquestionably refers to a mental condition which is freed from all morbidity, defilement, taint and disease. "The end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore of sound mind," delivered on the one hand from the mental distraction that destroys life's music, and on the other hand from the morbid depression which so frequently opens the gate for the invasion of death.

"And be sober." That is the second note of the apostle's counsel. "And be sober." It is a warning against all kinds of intoxication, but especially against the intoxication of excited and tumultuous emotion. There are stimulants other than those of intoxicating drinks; and there is a sensationalism to be found elsewhere than in carnal gratification. Excessive stimulants may be found in the revival meeting, and men may revel in intoxicated emotionalism even in the sanctuary. Men may "lose their heads" in many more ways than by the excessive imbibing of strong drink. "Be sober." Do not give way to any excitement which will make life grotesque and foolish! Beware of the sensationalism which is so often the minister of sin. "Be sober." It is an appeal for the culture and discipline of emotion. "Be sober unto prayer"; preserve that calmness of life which is consistent with steady aspiration and fruitful supplication; maintain a quiet "watching unto prayer." Here, then, are two of the features which characterise a life possessed by a healthy expectancy of the Lord's appearing—sound-mindedness and sobriety. We are to await the coming of the King with mind and heart delivered from the distractions of panic, from the taint of corruption, and from a feverish sensationalism which is destructive of the higher ministries of fellowship and prayer.

And now the apostle proceeds to add a third element to those already mentioned. "Above all things being fervent in your love among yourselves." To "sound-mindedness" and "sobriety" he adds the ministry of "love." Now the apostle is at some pains to make it clear to us what is the quality of this love which should characterise the life that expects the King's appearing. In the first place, it is to be "fervent." Now the significance of our English word "fervour" scarcely unveils to us the contents of the apostle's mind. He did not so much suggest a love that is ardent as a love that is tense. This very word "tense" is almost the original word. The love has to be "tense," stretched out, extended to the utmost limit of a grand comprehensiveness. The New Testament recognises different types and qualities of love, and there is no counsel in which it is more abounding than just in this counsel to push back the boundaries of a circumscribed affection so that it be characterised by a more spacious inclusiveness. There is love whose measure is that of an umbrella. There is love whose inclusiveness is that of a great marquee. And there is love whose comprehension is that of the immeasurable sky. The aim of the New Testament is the conversion of the umbrella into a tent, and the merging of a tent into the glorious canopy of the all-enfolding heavens. Therefore does the writer of this very letter, in a second letter which he has written, give this very suggestive counsel, "Add to brotherly love, love." Which just means this, make your love more tense; push back the walls of family love until they include the neighbour; again push back the walls until they include the stranger; again push back the walls until they comprehend the foe. The quality of our love is determined by its inclusiveness. At the one extreme there is self-love, at the other extreme there is philanthropy! What is the "tense," the stretch, of my love? What is its covering power? I do not wonder that the apostle proceeds to indicate the magnificent "cover" afforded by a magnificent love. "Love covereth a multitude of sins." Not the sins of the lover, but the sins of the loved! Love is willing to forget as well as to forgive! Love does not keep hinting at past failures and past revolts. Love is willing to hide them, to bury them in a nameless grave. When a man whose life has been strained and blackened by "a multitude of sins" turns over a new leaf, love will never hint at the old leaf, but will rather seek to cover in deep and healing oblivion. Love is so busy unveiling the promises and allurements of the morrow that she has little time and still less desire to stir up the choking dust on the blasted and desolate fields of yesterday. "Then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners." There's a cover for you! "And behold, a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew . . . stood at His feet behind Him weeping!" There's a cover for you! "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." There's a cover for you! I do not wonder that the great evangelical prophet of the Old Testament, in heralding the event of the Saviour, should proclaim Him as "an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." "Love covereth all things."

But we have not yet done with the apostle's characterisation of the qualities of love He adds a third word which confirms and enriches the other two. True love, "stretched-out" love, all-sheltering love, "uses hospitality without grudging." True love is a splendid host, a veritable Gaius in the lavish entertainment which it offers to weary and footsore pilgrims. In the primitive Christian day, the apostolic days, love opened the door and gave hospitality to the itinerant preachers as they went from place to place proclaiming the message of the Cross. Love opened the door to the persecuted refugees, driven from their homesteads because of their devotion to the Lord. There were many of them about, and the love-children were to keep an open door and a sharp look-out, and offer them welcome entertainment. Love is the very genius of hospitality: it opens the "hospice" on the stormy and perilous heights, and provides a travellers' rest. Wherever love is, the hospice may be found. "Love never faileth." And the gracious ministry is all discharged so graciously, "without murmuring!" There is no frown upon the face, no sense of "put-out-ness" in the attention. It is all done, as Matthew Henry says, "in a kind, easy, handsome manner," as though the host had been almost impatiently waiting for the privilege, and yearning for its speedy approach.

Now, the King is at the gate! Soon His hand will be upon the latch! How shall we prepare for Him? In sound-mindedness, in spiritual sobriety, and in a love which is ever straining after more and more spacious breadth of gracious and generous hospitality. How shall these dispositions express themselves? What shall be the medium of affection? What shall be the line of our ministry? The apostle provides the answer: "According as each hath received a gift." We must work through what we have received, "What hast thou that thou hast not received?" Our members, our senses, our mental aptitudes, our spiritual endowments! They are all gifts of the King! We must use them all in the ministry of love. But beyond all these there is the mysterious and indescribable gift of our own individuality. We are each as unique in personality as we are each as distinctive in face. Individuality is a unique gift and is divinely purposed for unique service. We must reverently consecrate our individuality to the King's use, that it may become the minister of His own "manifold grace" and "strength." In this subordination the individuality is preserved intact and unimpaired. Working through us, the Holy Ghost will, shall I say, impinge upon the world in a somewhat different form than from the life of any of our fellows. If an electric current be led through a series of several different materials, its appearance in the outer world will vary with each wire. "In a platinum wire it may appear as light, in an iron one as heat, round a bar of soft iron as magnetic energy, led into a solution as a power that decomposes and recombines." So in many individualities are there "diversities of operations, but one spirit." What we have to do is to take our individualities, "according as each hath received the gift," and so reverently consecrate it that "the manifold grace" may work a unique ministry, and by "the strength which God supplieth," we may manifest a daily salvation which shall be to the glory of God.

Here, then, I conclude. I think that no one can be made to stumble by any narrowness and irrelevancy in the apostle's counsel. His commandment is exceeding broad. How shall we prepare for the coming of the King? What can be more reasonable than the response I have attempted to expound? In sound-mindedness, in spiritual sobriety, in an affection which is ever seeking greater inclusiveness, and working through the distinctive gifts of the consecrated individual life. I tell you, if this be my condition, I shall not be afraid "at His coming." He may come in a moment, and very suddenly, in the noontide, or the midnight, or at the cock-crow; come when He may, I shall "love His appearing." Living calmly, in the atmosphere of affection, and in the mystic strength of consecration, I shall know him as my friend. The present Bishop of Durham has told us of a beloved friend of his who narrated to him a strangely vivid dream which he had long, long years ago. Let me tell it in the Bishop's words: "Through the bed-chamber seemed to shine in a sudden an indescribable light, the dreamer seemed to run, to look, and there, in the depths above, were beheld three forms. One was unknown, one, the Archangel, one the Lord Jesus Christ. And at this most sudden sight that soul, the soul of one whom, to my knowledge, the unutterable solemnities of the unseen are wont to brood with almost painful power, was instantaneously thrilled with a rapturous joy, unspeakable and full of glory: 'My Saviour, O my Saviour!'"

I pray that when that light breaks upon us, not in the ministry of a dream, but in the veritable coming of the Lord, when for you and for me "the end of all things is at hand," may we so have brooded on "the solemnities," and so laboured in the gracious ministry of affection, that we, too, "when He cometh," shall be "instantaneously thrilled with rapturous joy, unspeakable and full of glory: 'My Saviour, O my Saviour!'"

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—VIII.

Basil Pierpoint, curate-in-charge of Lynton St. Maurice, visiting his church one evening with a friend, discovers a girl, a stranger, writing in the parvise chamber. His peremptory manner of requesting her departure rouses her wrath. The girl, Evelyn Retallack, a high school mistress, out on a holiday with two friends, is engaged in writing a story. She now resolves to pillory Pierpoint therein. As all Lynton St. Maurice is Retallack property, the girl's name rouses interest in Pierpoint and others. Claude Winwood, his friend, visiting Lyntonstowe, meets Snell, the old librarian. From him he learns that Colonel Retallack had two sons: John, who, by refusal to obey his father's wishes, had been disinherited, and Arthur, who had obeyed, had married the heiress of the neighbouring parish of Lynton St. Mary, and died, leaving one daughter, Elinor. Almost immediately afterwards, Colonel Retallack was killed in a carriage accident, and the property devolved on Elinor. Evelyn's refusal to visit Lyntonstowe (the Retallacks' place), as well as some other incidents, incline Winwood to suspect her near relationship to Colonel Retallack. Meanwhile Evelyn, the Mistress of the Second Form, pursues her study of Pierpoint's character, with a view to her story and his place therein.

CHAPTER IX.

"MISS RETALLACK."

EVELYN RETALLACK walked slowly along the village street where it turned towards the church. Her head was bent, and she was thinking deeply. She had come to a crisis in her story and it took some thought. From meditating on her literary efforts her mind went on to dwell on the two young men recently added to her acquaintance. If the truth were told, Evelyn's knowledge of the male sex was extremely limited. This, added to the fact that she had a conscientious desire to transcribe life into her pages as close to the original as possible, impelled her in her own words to study the living specimen. Biology, she told Judith, not palæontology, was her forte.

Winwood pleased her. This especially she liked in him: he never treated her under his manner, so to speak. She, living in this haphazard, if not Bohemian, way with two other young women, felt herself approached by him as punctiliously as if she were surrounded by chaperones and all the fences which society raises between men and maidens. She would enjoy his acquaintance, she concluded. He generally lit on something interesting in their conversation. As for Pierpoint—well, of him she would make her own use. She could not quite understand him yet; which rendered him more interesting, but kept him longer under the microscope.

Her story was increasing in volume. Every time she met Pierpoint, and it was not seldom, she gained a little fresh material. The earlier plan of a melodramatic tale with a villain and the appurtenances thereof had been discarded and consigned to her manuscript strong-box. Now she had an ambition to attain to something better. A close study of the curate set against a background of village life, that was her present aim; and after every meeting with her unconscious hero the little manuscript pile received an addition. The moral aspect of her action, it must be owned, had never struck her. She could not, however, as yet quite wrap a story round him. A heroine had to be found, of course, and a love-story evolved. Evelyn was rather contemptuous of love, whether in fiction or otherwise; but, as she put it, she was not yet strong enough to correct the taste of the age.

Pierpoint's impatience, his tactlessness, his faults of domineering, of interfering—these were the qualities his amiable biographer writ large in her presentation of his character.

"I must bring him to a bad end," she said to herself serenely, as she turned down the lane that led by the church. "He is just the kind of man to want to marry for money and to push himself on in the world. Yes, I'll bring him in the rich lady, to whom he will pay his addresses for the sake of her rank and wealth, while all the time he really prefers some quite, poor girl—a girl like Alice, good and gentle. Being so fond of his own way he will, of course, like best a cushiony kind of woman. It wouldn't be a bad plan to make both the girls good and nice, so that all sympathy will be with them. He is a wretch," she went on, quite forgetting that her mind was not now dwelling on the real Basil Pierpoint, but on the figure her imagination had conjured up; "a wretch. However, I must be careful not to make him too bad. I must turn my attention to his good qualities. I suppose he has some."

"How do you do, Miss Retallack?" broke in on her musing. She turned to see Winwood, and greeted him with a sudden smile. "You were so deep in thought I hardly dared to interrupt you," he continued.

"Yes; I was thinking, and my thoughts——" she paused.

"Were worth, no doubt, much more than the customary sum?"

"That is for you to decide. I was thinking of Mr. Pierpoint's good qualities, cataloguing them, in fact."

Winwood's eyebrows went up a moment, but he answered gaily, "I could offer a silver penny to hear that list."

"It is difficult," she replied in a meditative tone; "of course he must have some——"

"Yes."

"Only, I don't know what they are exactly."

"A good way to find out," said Winwood, falling in with her mood, "is to enumerate first the bad qualities. If any vice is conspicuous by its absence you can deduce the corresponding virtue."

"Take a kind of spectrum analysis of his character? That is a good idea. All vices are, I suppose, the back of virtues, so to speak."

"Their opposites, at all events. Psychological problems interest you, Miss Retallack?"

But Evelyn had not done with the curate yet. To discuss him frankly with his friend seemed to her a most natural thing to do.

"Mr. Pierpoint interests me," she replied, calmly.

"He would be flattered if he knew."

"Oh, no; he wouldn't. One can be interested in various ways. I don't think Mr. Pierpoint would be best pleased if he knew how he interests me."

The meaning of her smile remained elusive to her companion's attentive gaze.

"Are you a detective?" he asked at last, lightly. "Has my friend committed a crime?"

"No; not that I know of, at least. In fact, I am sure he will never do anything so interesting as that. His character is all on small lines, punctilios, proprieties, love of self——"

"Oh, come," cried Winwood, who began not to like the seriousness of her tone. "You certainly know very little about Basil Pierpoint. Love of self is not one of his characteristics. I know him for many years and very well; for he is such a transparent sort of fellow, all he is comes out quite easily. He magnifies his office, perhaps, but that, if rightly viewed, is often a generous fault, a merging of the individual in the order, if it have not, as in his case, a much deeper and worthier origin. But of himself, as himself, Basil Pierpoint thinks very little."

Winwood spoke gravely. Evelyn felt rebuked but not convinced.

"Well!" she returned lightly, "our friends always see us at our best, of course. But have I not taken you a long way out of your course, Mr. Winwood?"

"Am I dismissed?" he asked, his usual look of quiet amusement meeting hers. "Thy servant went no whither when we met. Only, I did mean to find you somewhere soon to tell you that I have discovered an interesting work on brasses amongst the books in the church, and I thought you might like to come and see it. Rubbing these things for another makes one take a fictitious interest in them, I find. Will you come? See, here is the church stile inviting ascent."

"Thank you; I shall like to see it. But where is the book?"

"In the parvise chamber."

"Oh!"—she withdrew her foot from the stile—"but you know I am not sure if I dare enter that parvise chamber."

"Why not? I can bring you the book, of course, if you prefer it; but it is a huge tome, and I think it is that kind of book which requires surroundings to make it appreciated. Small, leaded lattice-panes form just the proper kind of window to throw light on its pages. Do come! And," he added, nodding his head as to a child, "there are pictures, and some of them are coloured!"

"Oh!" she drew in her breath, "do I dare?"

"You do!"

He held out his hand to aid her over the stile.

"But your friend's—ah—good qualities?"

"I will protect you."

They had laughingly wandered to other topics by the time the narrow stair leading to the parvise chamber was reached.

Winwood threw open the door of the room, and Evelyn entered, then stopped short on the threshold, just as Pierpoint had done some weeks before. Winwood looked over her shoulder. Standing at the window were Pierpoint and a lady. Winwood knew her: Elinor Retallack.

A moment of embarrassment for all, except the last-named lady. Then Pierpoint on the one hand extricated himself by advancing to greet Evelyn, while Winwood for his part went up to Elinor Retallack.

The latter entered at once into an animated conversation with the lady of the Manor about the church, its architecture, age, etc. The girl smiled a little and answered in a hesitating way.

Pierpoint meanwhile was saying to Evelyn, "I am so glad to see you here again. I—you have not been here lately."

The maladroitness of his unfortunate remark struck him immediately. But she gave him no room for repentance.

"You could scarcely have expected me to intrude again, Mr. Pierpoint, after ordering me out of the room. And, indeed, I feel I owe you an apology for my presence now. I do not want to throw the blame on Mr. Winwood, but I fear I allowed him to tempt me."

"Oh! you came together."

For the first time a feeling, to which he had hitherto been quite a stranger, surged up in Basil's mind. It gave him a sensation as if he had eaten dust.

"Yes; we have come together. That is obvious, I think."

On her part she perceived his evident embarrassment, attributed it to entirely wrong motives—as was her custom—and grew frigid as an icicle, dropping little shots on him, while her real attention was directed to the other two.

A moment's pause fell on all four. Winwood glanced at Pierpoint, who returned his gaze blankly. The elder man thereupon stepped into the breach and at the same time made a bold shot. Looking at Evelyn, he said easily:

"Miss Retallack, may I introduce to you Miss Elinor Retallack?"

"Right!" He almost cried the word aloud. The quick glance Evelyn bestowed on him was so bright, so grateful, so full for him of meaning, that in a moment he knew his reading of her past history was the true one. Neither of the other two noted the little punctilio, the point of precedence conceded.

Elinor started at the name, then timidly, yet with a certain eagerness, extended her hand, to withdraw it again in some confusion; for Evelyn merely bowed.

"I feared, for the moment," continued the Master of the Ceremonies, "that, perhaps, I had made a mistake, and that you ladies had met before. These things are so awkward, are they not? And they do happen sometimes to helpless man, when the normally errant is drawn into a fixed orbit."

Evelyn smiled again. She knew he addressed her when he couched his remarks in this fantastic vein.

"Of course you hold that we poor women are doomed everlastingly to move in ellipses!"

"Thank you for that word. I had so dreaded 'circles.'"

"Surely," cried Pierpoint, recovering and entering the fray, "surely some women move in parabolas, shoot like meteors into our lives and out again, leaving us nothing to do for the rest of existence but sweep the heavens for their return?"

"That is pretty," nodded Evelyn. "May I have that idea?"

He flushed.

"Yes, if you mean it; no, if you don't."

"That reminds me of a naughty nursery saying," she laughed. "But I accept, and you shall have it back cut into anapæsts when you give me that Pilgrim's——"

She stopped abruptly, and, as suddenly, both men, remembering their manners, turned to the pale silent girl, who gazed from one to the other.

"Would you like to see the other parvise chamber, Miss Retallack?" Pierpoint hastened to ask, and, as if explanatory to the general public, "It is very good of you to interest yourself in the few reforms—charing, perhaps I should rather say—that I have been able to institute."

"He has cleaned places that never were cleaned before, Miss Retallack," added Winwood. "For my part I doubt his right to do so. When cobwebs have lain in undisturbed possession of corners and ledges for generations, don't you think they have a prescriptive right to remain there? Why should a handful of militant dust dispel dust quiescent, if not triumphant?"

"I don't know. Dust is so dirty, is it not?" Her sweet, hesitating voice had an appeal in it.

Evelyn threw back her proud little head, but her eyes were still troubled.

"She had her whole life to think over."

Winwood made a mental note that the two Misses Retallack should be addressed in different tongues; but the appealing note in Elinor's voice struck him. He remembered her mother, and pitied her.

"You are right," he replied, smiling, adding as his eyes fell on her pretty, dainty attire, "and indeed even after all the 'chores' I cannot advise the second parvise chamber. The mortar has a trick of falling which is unpleasant."

"Thank you. Perhaps, Mr. Pierpoint, I had better rejoin my mother. She does not like waiting so long in the carriage. Good-bye, Mr. Winwood." She turned from him to Evelyn, looked at the haughty little face and felt her courage ooze; but, with a great effort, said, "I am so glad to meet you—Miss Retallack. It is so interesting, our names being the same. I—I am sure I should like to know you, if you will let me. I know someone—someone like you."

A quick change passed over Evelyn's face. Her lips trembled. But she steadied herself, and, looking into the appealing eyes bent on her, said quickly:

"And I—should like it too."

The pressure of Evelyn's warm little hand was firm on the slender fingers placed in hers.

CHAPTER X.

HER FURTHER ADVENTURES.

EVELYN turned to the window as Pierpoint and Elinor left the parvise chamber to join Mrs. Retallack, who sat passively impatient in the carriage at the church gate.

There was silence for a little space. Winwood spent it apparently looking for the book on brasses, really to give his companion time to recover herself, for he saw she was struggling with some emotion.

"Here it is," he exclaimed at last, and brought the book to the desk in the window. "Shall I show you the plain pictures first or the coloured ones?"

Looking round for an answer, he was startled to see her eyes were brimming with tears. She looked at him through them as a child might.

"Do you mind, Mr. Winwood? I am afraid I don't care for any pictures now."

"I understand," he said gravely, forgetting she had not yet verified his theories concerning her. "It—such meetings are trying. Of course, I did not know she was here."

"Is she not sweet? But I suppose it is easy to be sweet when life is smooth for one. I know I am all moods and prickles and disagreeablenesses. Don't you think so?"

Winwood did not answer. But the question was merely rhetorical, as indeed he knew.

Evelyn wiped away the tears, turned to look at him, and said simply:

"Elinor Retallack is my first cousin."

"I know," he answered quietly.

She felt his sympathy, and did not stay to ask him how he knew.

"And you were right; I am Miss Retallack. Oh, it was sweet of you: it helped so much."

She put her two hands impulsively in his, and he held them firmly.

"I am glad," he said in a low voice, "very glad, if I can help you in any way."

"Yes; and don't please think it silly. I know I should say it of another girl; but we never really understand things until we have been through them ourselves, do we?"

The trite remark sounded unlike her, but Winwood only thought of that afterwards. Still holding her hands, his mind was busy with her fate. Why should he, a man, lead a life of careless ease, and she, so sensitive, so girlish, have to work so hard?

With a little sigh, Evelyn withdrew her hands. He let them go.

"Do you mind leaving me alone here, Mr. Winwood? I should like to think a little."

He acquiesced, smiling gravely at her. Later he would annul some of his thoughts. For the moment all he felt for her was an immense pity, rendered more vivid by the contrast between the lot of the two girls so closely connected, a pity that was like a caress.

At the door he turned back with the practical intention of reminding her to leave the church before locking-up time.

Secure at his departure, she had thrown herself into a chair and hidden her face on her arms outstretched on the table.

Winwood went out silently and closed the door.

Evelyn remained in that posture longer than she had any account of. She had her whole life to think over. First she remembered the house where she as a baby played with another baby, her little brother, and then a sad day when the little boy disappeared and came no more to play. Of her father she had many recollections, but all of them in the early, happy days. The house was small, she remembered now, and the means always straitened, but things were still more straitened when her father died. Nevertheless, chiefly by her mother's self-denying efforts, it had been possible to give her a good education, culminating in a London degree. At the beginning Evelyn's grandfather, Dr. Meredith, had helped his daughter and her somewhat visionary husband, At his death he left Mrs. Retallack a little money, enough to give her bread, if not butter. A year or two more and Evelyn's father, worn out by the hard life he had chosen as editor of a Socialist newspaper, died and left widow and child nothing but his library and his writings. Mrs. Retallack struggled on, and her brother helped her to the goal she had set herself—to make Evelyn self-supporting.

This end was now gained, Evelyn remembered, and yet it seemed but a beginning. Giving rein to her fancy, she reminded herself how all ends are but beginnings of a future, all beginnings but ends of a past. Was it worth while to struggle so hard for so little?

Then she recalled more about her father. From reading his essays she had made out something of his thoughts, and her mother had told her a little more. Colonel Retallack's son's "dreadful" opinions were found, when coherently defined, to be first a wild and afterwards a misty Socialism, ending at last in fervent but vague desires for the amelioration of mankind. His ethical studies were brilliant and widely read; they brought him a ready welcome into those circles which were all in all to him. A soldier? A dull country squire? Perish the thought! This life, where wit struck wit, where brains grew keener and the mental vision strained to see before and after, this was the life that Evelyn John Retallack delighted in. His wife, too, was in close touch with many of his beliefs and ambitions, and a tolerant sympathy hid the rest from him; where her more practical mind refused to adopt his sweeping theories, she was too good a wife and too wise a woman to let him know. His life was neither long nor successful, as the world counts success; but it was happy, for he ever followed his ideals, and fate added the final grace in that he died before the ideals faded in the night of age.

From thinking of her father the girl passed on to think of herself and the newly found cousin. In a few minutes she had built up all Elinor Retallack's history. A word, a look was enough for Evelyn as foundation for a whole story. Soon she had built up a past for her cousin which would have greatly astonished that young lady. Thence Elinor Retallack wandered on in her cousin's thoughts, until she became transmuted into the heroine of Evelyn's story, and got mixed up in the scenes with Pierpoint, which gradually became more and more extravagant, and further removed from ordinary life.

A sudden glare flashed upon Evelyn's eyes and woke her.

She started up.

A roll of thunder explained the flash of light. Evelyn glanced hurriedly round. It had grown quite dusk. With a sudden horror she saw what had befallen her: she had dropped asleep there, with her head on the table, shut into the church!

A cry broke from her, and she darted to the door, only to shrink back in yet more shuddering dread. Swift footsteps sounded on the winding stair.

Grasping the edge of the table, she waited that moment, breathless, numb with fear.

The door was flung open and—oh joy! no sheeted ghost, no church robber—Basil Pierpoint stood before her.

So great was the revulsion of feeling, so overwhelming the relief, that she ran forward and seized his arm.

"Oh, don't go, Mr. Pierpoint! Don't leave me here——Oh!" as another blinding flash lit up his pale face looking down on her.

"Leave you, Miss Retallack? Why, I have been waiting for you for ever so long."

"Have you? Where? What has happened to me?"

Was she still dreaming about him.

"Downstairs, in the church. I did not like to disturb you."

"And—how long have I been here?"

"More than an hour, I should say."

Evelyn turned crimson. She was suddenly aware that her hand still grasped his arm. The lightning flashed again and the thunder rolled round the church.

"How good of you to wait—oh, that dreadful lightning! I am not afraid, you know, only—only I hate it!"

"Do you? I should have thought that you would have exulted in it."

"No, no. Let us come away. It is so late, is it not? But," drawing back, "I dare not go out in that storm."

"Shall we come downstairs?" he said gently. "It seems more vivid, perhaps, in a small room. We can leave the church the moment you wish."

She consented, and they descended the steep stairs into the church.

Pierpoint found a dark corner at the far west end, and they sat down side, by side, in the shadow of the font.

CHAPTER XI.

WHILE THE LIGHTNING FLASHED.

THE storm seemed to draw nearer and nearer, one of those sudden, devastating Devonshire storms. The lightning flashes were more incessant, the thunder louder and sharper. One terrible peal rattled over the church like a Maxim gun; the rain fell in sheets, and the wind howled with the thunder. At every flash Evelyn started, even while she held her hand over her eyes.

Her companion watched her, now vivid in the glare of the lightning, now sunk in the gloom that succeeded.

He sat back a little, silent for a time, until it struck him he ought to say something consoling to his charge. His remark was commonplace.

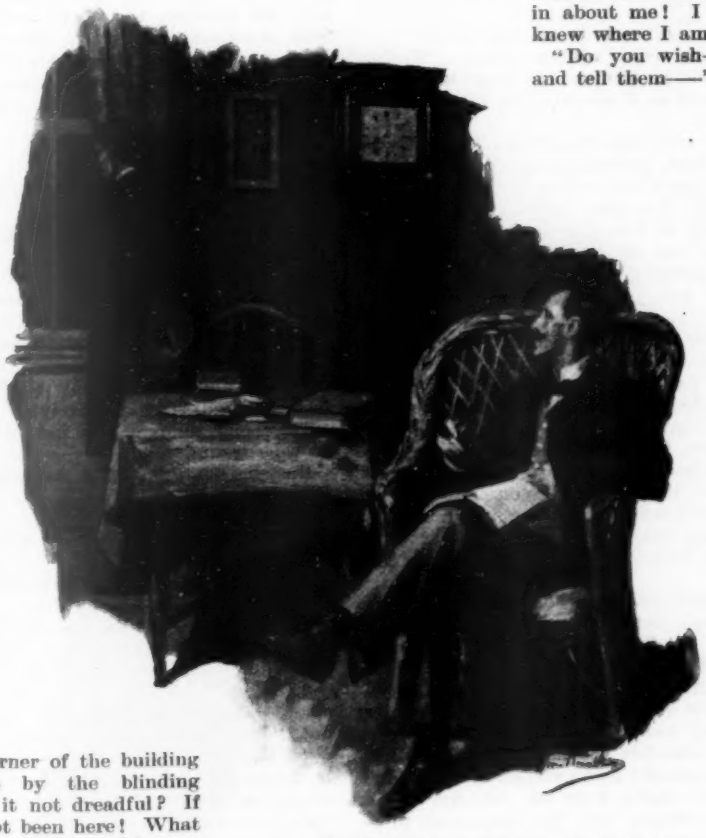
"I think it is getting lighter—passing away, I mean."

"Do you?" She glanced up. "Oh, look!"



"I could not wake you, Miss Retallack, could I?"

"I—oh dear—how deafening! Will it ever be over, Mr. Pierpoint?"

"The storms here are very sudden, I believe, but pass away as quickly."

"Alice and Judith! What a state of mind they will be in about me! I wish they knew where I am."

"Do you wish—I can go and tell them——"

"Basil was at the window now."—p. 325.

as every corner of the building was swept by the blinding light. "Is it not dreadful? If you had not been here! What made you wait for me?"

Her voice was almost lost in the echoing thunder peal.

"When Winwood left the church, he told me you were here. I feared Mrs. Hill might lock you in, and so I came to see."

"And why did you not tell me?"

Simple wonderment was in her tone, though the inquiry seemed magisterial.

"I did—I went up to the room, but——" He paused. "You were asleep," he went on, desperately.

She coloured again. By what fatality did he always discover her doing what she ought not to do?

As she did not reply, he spoke again, deprecatingly.

"Mr. Pierpoint!"

A gleam of the lightning showed him the nervous hand again on his coat sleeve. Their eyes met a moment in the unearthly light. He laid his fingers softly on hers. The touch reassured her, even while she withdrew her hand.

But he said nothing for a moment. He had gained a sudden knowledge, and it was very hard to remember and answer in an ordinary way.

She laughed nervously.

"Do you think I should dare stay here by myself? Please don't laugh at me. I know

I am idiotic and—I do not always mind lightning like this—only—to-day——"

"It is quite natural," he returned, as her voice fell. His tones sounded cold and far away to her. "But—laugh at you! I never could do so. How could you think it?"

"I don't know," she said, penitently. "I'm afraid I—sometimes—am given to mockery of others."

"But you will not do so any more."

The storm was rolling away. Evelyn bristled a little, though his tone was new, for he seemed as if speaking to himself.

"Why?"

"Forgive me, Miss Retallack; I fear I was thinking aloud, perhaps uttering a desire. I—oh! you must forgive me. I cannot talk here—I mean I cannot explain myself——"

She looked at him in wonder. His voice was pained, but she could not see his face.

"I have nothing to forgive," she answered gently. "I feel you have been very kind in taking such care of me."

"Kind! to take care of you!"

He stood up and moved down the aisle. The storm had diminished, though its echoes still resounded from the hills, and the rain still fell in torrents.

She waited, in a little wonder.

He came back.

"Do you think—would you like to go now? It is much lighter," he began.

She sprang up.

"I am so sorry to have detained you, Mr. Pierpoint."

The thunder had gone deep into the hills. Her courage returned. She bit her lip. How could she have been so foolish as to get herself into this situation? What would not Alice and Judith say! And, then, she was now decidedly in his debt. He must be so bored, too.

Suddenly she felt her hands caught in his.

"Miss Retallack! Don't you know I shouldn't care if that storm went on for ever?" A momentary pause, and his vehement tones fell. "I cannot help it. I suppose you will always misunderstand me." The depression in his voice hurt her. It was almost a sob that rose in her throat, instead of a laugh, when he said next, "Where is your hat?"

"My hat?" Her hand went up to her head. "I am afraid—it must have fallen off, upstairs."

"May I go for it?"

"Please do. I will wait in the porch."

Each spoke now in a studiously quiet way. Evelyn meditated while Pierpoint ran up to the parvise chamber. Soon he came down, bearing the missing hat.

"Oh, thank you. But—where are my hat-pins?"

"Hat-pins," he answered vaguely. "I didn't know——"

He turned to go up again.

"Don't—don't mind," she went on, in that matter-of-fact voice. "I'll keep it on somehow."

"We must leave by the vestry," he said. "I have only the key of that door."

At length they were out in the churchyard. The lightning now came but seldom, and the thunder was faint and far away. Still it rained as it can in Devonshire alone. It was so dark too, though only a little after eight o'clock, that Evelyn stumbled as she walked. Basil proffered his arm, and they made better progress.

"You will be wet through," he said, in anxious tones.

"It doesn't matter. They will cosset me directly I get in, I am sure. The strayed lamb, you know, has always the best of it in the flock!"

He did not reply immediately.

Not much else passed between them on the short homeward journey.

As Mrs. Hill's door was thrown open, all the inmates of the house were discovered in the hall, and exclamations of delight burst from each at sight of Evelyn.

They had thought her lost—dead—as they crowded round her.

But she put them off a moment to turn to Pierpoint.

"Good-night. I——"

"Don't say 'Thank you!' Good-night."

And he was gone.

Winwood, hearing Pierpoint enter the house, opened the library door and stood on the threshold. As he beheld his dripping friend he removed his pipe to remark coolly:

"Where have you been? You seem wet."

"Soaked!" Then, as he ran upstairs to change his sodden garments, Pierpoint called out, "Don't wait dinner for me."

"I didn't," returned Winwood, turning back into the library and to Mistral's "Mireio," which he continued to read until, sometime later, a clean, dry, nourished Pierpoint entered upon his peace. Winwood looked up.

"Been to see a parishioner?" he asked.

"No."

"Oh—constitutional. Nice storm, that."

It would have to come out some time, at least. Pierpoint was not the man to keep such events untold. He stated the argument briefly:

"I have been in the church, with Miss Retallack. She fell asleep. I had to wait until she woke. The storm burst on us. She was too frightened to leave the church until it passed off. I have just now seen her safe home."

Winwood laid down his book and took out his pipe to look at the speaker, who stood at the mantelpiece fingering some ornament.

"Well!" was all he said.

Pierpoint went on playing with his bit of Benares ware and made no remark. After a moment Winwood began again.

"Do you know who she is?"

"Miss Retallack?"

"She is Miss Retallack, as it happens. Evelyn Retallack is first cousin to the other, the pale one."

Pierpoint looked round in surprise.

"First cousin?"

"Fathers were brothers. Evelyn's father was the eldest son." And Winwood proceeded to relate all he had learnt from Miss Baird, all Evelyn said, and his own summing up of the case.

Pierpoint walked up and down the room. Suddenly he stopped.

"Why, then, she is the proper owner of Lyntonstowe?"

"So she should be, but for her father, as I told you. It is hard on her. Poor little girl, I am sorry for her."

Basil was at the window now, looking out into the black night.

"Do you like her?" he asked abruptly.

"Like her? Of course I do. She is excellent company, very responsive."

"'I found them this morning,' he explained."—p. 327.

Silence from Pierpoint.

"I know you don't find her so," continued Winwood with an involuntary smile as he remembered his conversation with Evelyn that afternoon. "But never mind. I hope you will be good friends someday."

A pause, and Winwood resumed his book.

"I meant—do you care for her," came Basil's level voice, relentlessly.

Winwood, deep again in "Mireio," lifted his head a moment and looked round, but he could see Pierpoint's back only.

"If you mean," he began slowly and judicially, "do I like her: I do, enormously. If you mean am I in love with her: I think not. My ideal is more the domestic hearth than a small pocket Etna."

Pierpoint laughed. Sitting down to the table, he took up yesterday's paper, and read the advertisements diligently. Winwood returned to "Mireio."

CHAPTER XII.

ON THE MORROW.

ON the morrow, Evelyn, most becomingly attired and with all the air of a good child going down for dessert about her, sat in the little sitting-room at Mrs. Hill's, and contemplated her friends. She had been scolded and petted, and had endured and welcomed each treatment.

"There is nothing in the world more satisfactory," she remarked in a final voice, "than to be scolded well—slated, in fact, if you will pardon the slang—when one has done what one shouldn't; for then one at once begins to exonerate oneself. Now had you, Judith, resisted your innate desire to improve the occasion, I at this moment might have been repenting in dust and ashes. Since, on the contrary, you have pointed out to me how reprehensible my conduct was in yielding to sleep, I naturally take the other side, count up the losses incurred—which I find to be one silver hat-pin, value one shilling, item two black-headed ones price one farthing each, and stand on the defence."

"You are a goose," said Judith shortly.

"Alice! as chairwoman of this committee, I beg to call your attention to this breach of order."

"What is the motion before the meeting?" laughed Alice.

"Why, me."

"Oh! and am I to put you to the vote?"

"Please. And I propose that I be passed as I am. Judith is bringing forward amendments to me."

"I do—and many."

"You cannot apply the closure like that. I may remark, Madam Chairwoman, that there being no one here to second these proposals, except the sofa cushion and the poker, we will take it that the sofa cushion, being comforting, represents Mr. Winwood and the poker, for equally obvious reasons, Mr. Pierpoint. The former will, I know, second the resolution to pass me as I am. I make no doubt the latter will outdo Judith in amendments."

"Poor man!" muttered Judith.

"Yes, poor fellow," murmured Alice, "he must have been wet through."

"I don't blame you," the more incisive voice maintained, "for waiting in church until the storm grew less—that was only sensible; but how you could have been afraid of the lightning——"

Evelyn started up. Her brow clouded.

"I must get my work," she said, and left the room.

"She does feel that," Alice said. "Don't you think we had better say no more about it?"

Not long afterwards Mrs. Hill toiled, panting, into Evelyn's room to summon her down. A visitor had arrived for her: no less a person than Miss Retallack of Lyntonstowe.

Evelyn started.

Mrs. Hill, much impressed, exclaimed, "There, now, miss! See that now! An' they folk so proud-like!"

Could Mrs. Hill have read character, she would have seen that the bright-cheeked Miss Retallack who descended the stairs was much more "proud-like" than the pale-faced one who awaited her below.

Elinor rose as Evelyn entered the little room, and hastened towards her.

"I am—so glad to see you," she began, in her hesitating way. "I have only just heard. I—told my mother all about meeting you in the church yesterday, and how much I would like to know you, and she let me come this afternoon and see you. But I did not know until just now, when I chanced to meet Miss Baird, and—and she told me all about you."

"Won't you sit down?" Evelyn said with outward composure. "And—may I introduce my friends?" Then to them, "Miss Retallack and I—are cousins."

The deep colour burned in her cheek.

The friends received the communication after their manner: Judith in frigid silence and with a stiff bow. Alice sympathetically and cordially.

"How very interesting! We did not know you were cousins."

"Yes; is it not? I am so glad to have found my cousin—very glad."

"Cousin" is an elastic relationship and, though Alice inwardly desired to further unravel the Retallack connection, she instinctively felt that Evelyn wished to avoid the subject. She began at once, therefore, a conversation on ordinary topics. The Thursday class she had been teaching was a good one to start on. But for Alice, indeed, the interview would have been distinctly difficult. Judith was absolutely silent; Evelyn alternately expansive and on her guard; Elinor always shy, with little trills of impulsiveness. The strictest commonplaces prevailed.

Evelyn had time to observe her new cousin now. She was tall and slight, pale and dark-haired; not pretty, but possessed of beautiful,. wistful grey eyes, a sweet expression, and a very gentle voice which came out in little hesitating nothings.

"Do you like Devonshire?"

"Yes; we like it much."

"It is very hilly, is it not?"

"Very," and so on.

Alice, indeed, tried to make capital out of each subject started, but not with much success. In the midst of this, the door opened, and Mrs. Hill's voice observed—she never could be said to announce visitors—"Mr. Pierpoint, miss, yes, now."

He looked troubled and ill-at-ease as he greeted the four ladies present. If he was surprised at seeing Elinor Retallack there, it did not appear; perhaps he was too much preoccupied.

"I have come," he said to Alice, "for—several things. One is to ask you if you can go and see Bessie Carew. She is very ill, I fear, and she has asked if you would go and see her. It is nothing infectious," he hastened to add, as he saw Judith rise in protest.

"But Alice cannot stand much fatigue."

"It will not fatigue Miss Kenyon, I know," he answered, his glance meeting Alice's. These two understood each other from the first. "It is a sad case."

"What has happened to her?" asked Elinor, wide-eyed. "She—was in my class."

"Yes. It is a case of shock. Her father"—Pierpoint turned his back directly to Evelyn—"her father was killed by lightning last night."

"How dreadful! Where did it happen?"

"On the moors. They found him a few hours ago. The Carews are very poor——"

"But one can do something for them, can one not?" cried Elinor, in a distressed way.

"I will go at once," said Alice.

"No, not just at once, please. Miss Baird is there. Give her time to get away."

Here a pony carriage drew up before the house, and Elinor rose to leave.

"I—you will tell me if I can do anything?"

"Yes; if there is anything."

His tone was cold. Elinor shrank back a little.

Evelyn accompanied her visitor to the door. At the threshold Elinor turned impulsively.

"I hope you will come and see us. Mother—I think she would like to see you, too. Will you come to-morrow? We can send the carriage, if you like."

Evelyn hesitated.

"Do come," Elinor urged again. "I have so wished to know you."

"How did you come to know I was—your cousin?" asked Evelyn gravely.

"From Miss Baird. I met her just at the little bridge, and she came some way with me in the carriage and—told me everything."

"How did she know? Who told her?"

"I am not quite sure, but I think she said it was that gentleman who is staying at the Rectory."

"Mr. Winwood?"

"Yes; that was the name. And do come to-morrow—cousin Evelyn."

Evelyn smiled, then accepted quietly.

As she closed the door she was aware of Judith in the hall. Miss Kyle turned and went up the staircase. Evelyn, after a second's hesitation, went out into the garden.

In the sitting-room Pierpoint threw himself into a chair beside Alice and pushed back his hair.

"You are troubled," she said gently.

"Yes. That poor man! He was a dreadful sight."

"I am so sorry." Her eyes were full of sympathy.

"It is so strange to think of the different things that go on at the same time in the world. I know," he added ruefully, "it is a commonplace. I should not dare to say it to Miss Retallack, for instance; but you understand. What were you doing about eight o'clock last night?"

"Nothing grander, I fear, than looking out anxiously for Evelyn."

"And I was with her." He leant his chin on his hand and looked on the floor. "I suppose the realities of life are mercifully shrouded from us—clothed in flesh, as it were, for our touch. But while we—I was thinking only of myself in that church, poor Carew—I knew him well: I spoke to him only yesterday afternoon—met with that terrible death."

"I don't believe you were thinking only of yourself. You forget your care for Evelyn."

"You mistake. Death, when we really feel it, makes all things seem so small, even the greatest thing that may happen to a man."

At this moment Evelyn re-entered the room. She had said to herself, after a few turns in the garden, "That curate must have gone by now." So she named him even to herself; but at the back of her mind she knew she wanted to see him again, and that for reasons she could not even define to herself. Perhaps to brave it out would best express them.

"That curate" rose as she entered and approached her gravely, producing from somewhere—three hat-pins.

"I found them this morning," he explained. "You said you wanted them."

Evelyn flushed. She had intended a graceful speech of thanks for his care of the evening before. This blunt action of his irritated her. She wished herself to be the one to approach the subject. She took the pins.

"Thank you."

"I hope you did not leave anything else in the parvise chamber."

"I sincerely trust not," she replied, throwing back her head. "I also apologise for being there at all. It was unwarrantable, I acknowledge."

In a moment her quick temper had suggested what right had he to wait in the porch for her, as he had done, and make her ridiculous.

"Not unwarrantable, surely—only unwise."

"I accept the correction."

"Unwise, I mean, to have fallen asleep."

Alice noticed Evelyn's anger rising, and once again, as so often before, regretted Pierpoint's unfortunate speeches.

"Evelyn is really very grateful to you——" she began.

"Thank you, Alice, for reminding me of my debt. I am under a deep obligation to you, Mr. Pierpoint, for having taken care of me last night. I was, as you are pleased to remark, extremely foolish to fall asleep, and still more foolish to detain you in the church because I was — afraid — of the lightning."

"I never said you were foolish," he cried, hotly, his colour as high as her own. "I did not even think it. It is not generous of you, Miss Retallack, to—to—— And as for obligation"—his voice took a sudden and deeper tone—"that is all on my side. It is I who must thank you."

She clasped her fingers and said nothing, her lashes resting on her cheek. He looked again at the haughty little face. Evelyn had remained standing all the time and so, naturally, had he. It flashed into his mind now that perhaps she desired his departure. He turned to go.

"Just wait for me one moment, Mr. Pierpoint," said Alice, rising quickly, "and you can take me to poor Bessie."

Evelyn looked up as if to follow her as the door closed, then, with a kind of determination, turned to Pierpoint.

"I really mean to thank you, Mr. Pierpoint."

"I asked you not to do so," he interposed.

"Why?"

She looked straight at him. His eyes met her fully. He drew a deep breath.

"I—we never thank our friends."

"Oh!" She raised her brows with a comic expression that saved the situation. "Well, if ever we are friends, Mr. Pierpoint, I hope you will understand I expect to be thanked for anything I may do for you."

"That is different," he said quickly. "I am in your debt for more than——"

Alice's entrance brought him suddenly back to Lynton St. Maurice.

Nothing remained but to say good-bye and go. The hand he held for a moment was cold, but the eyes that met his had regained a kindly expression.

[END OF CHAPTER TWELVE.]

"Lord, from Whom all Blessings Flow."

Words by CHARLES WESLEY, 1740.

Music by the REV. W. J. FOXELL, M.A., B.Mus.
(Minor Canon of Canterbury Cathedral.)

2. Move and actuate and guide;
Divers gifts to each divide;
Placed according to Thy will,
Let us all our work fulfil:
Never from our office move;
Needful to each other prove;
Use the grace on each bestowed,
Tempered by the art of God.

3. Sweetly may we all agree,
Touched with softest sympathy;
There is neither bond nor free,
Great nor servile, Lord, in Thee.
Love, like death, hath all destroyed,
Rendered all distinctions void;
Names and sects and parties fall—
Thou, O Christ, art All in all!

SCRIPTURE Illustrations & Anecdotes

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JANUARY 18TH.—St. Paul at Thessalonica and Berea.

Passage for reading—Acts xvii. 1—12.

POINTS. 1. Christ to be preached to men.
2. Christians to be prepared for persecution.
3. The Scriptures to be studied.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Christ must be God. The commencement of Christian work in Japan happened thus. An American lady named Prince interested herself in the country, and five missionaries were sent out, who at first only occupied themselves in the translation of the Scriptures. After some time this lady offered to teach English to a young Japanese, and gave him the Gospel of St. John to translate. Shortly afterwards it was noticed that he became very restless and agitated, walking constantly up and down the room. At last he could contain himself no longer, and burst out with the question, "Who is this Man about Whom I am reading—this Jesus? You call Him a man, but He must be God! Thus the simple Word of God had forced on him the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed God.

Persecution a Stimulus. A certain amount of persecution arouses a man's defiance, stirs his blood for magnificent battle, and makes him fifty times more a man than he would have been without it. So it was with a great reformer when he said, "I will not be put down: I will be heard." And so it was with Millard, the great preacher in the time of Louis XI. When the King sent word to him that unless he stopped preaching in that style he would throw him into the river, he replied, "Tell the King that I will reach heaven sooner by water than he will reach it by fast horses." We must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God.

Reverence for the Bible. It is told of Sir Walter Scott, poet and novelist, that in the feebleness of his last hours, when the pen had dropped from his nerveless fingers, and his mind had felt the shock of exhausting labours, he asked his son-in-law to read to him. "What shall I read?" he asked. "Need you ask?" said Sir Walter. "There is but one book." Surrounded by a vast library of books in many languages, he yet felt in his dying hours that there was but one book worth listening to. The fourteenth chapter of St. John's Gospel was read to him, and he was comforted.

JANUARY 25TH.—St. Paul's Counsel to the Thessalonians.

Passage for reading—1 Thessalonians v. 14—28.

POINTS. CHRISTIAN PERFECTION. 1. Sympathy and help to those in need.
2. Prayer and praise without ceasing.
3. Personal sanctification.

ILLUSTRATIONS. A French Story. A boy of thirteen, with a milk-can in his hand and a basket on his head full of eggs and butter, was coming back from market when a dog ran against him and made him stumble. The basket rolled into the gutter, while the butter mixing with the eggs and mud made a huge omelette on the pavement. The poor boy was struck dumb with dismay, and tears ran down his cheeks, for he expected to be scolded, beaten, and perhaps dismissed, by his master, and anyhow he must make the loss good. A gardener had seen the accident, and, putting a franc (tenpence) into the boy's hand, said to the crowd which had assembled, "If everyone would give a small sum, the mischief would soon be remedied. We are not worthy to be men if we are not willing to help each other." His example and words had a good effect. Coins fell quickly into the boy's lap, and when he reckoned them up there were twenty-five francs (over £1). They expected he would thank them and go away quite happy. But they were mistaken. He took out of his pocket the bill of what he had bought, and found it amounted to thirteen francs. Putting that sum carefully aside, he went up to a very poor-looking woman in the crowd with a child in her arms, and gave her the other twelve francs, saying, "I am sure you want it more than I do." He then hurried away amid the cheers of the crowd. Actions speak louder than words.

Coldness in Praise. "Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice." It is the gloomy Christians who do so much harm to religion. A melancholy spirit is ungrateful to God. I would rather dance and sing like David than keep still like some professing Christians. I remember being once in a church in America. The church certainly was warm, and that was pleasant; but in one sense it was a fine ice-house, for nobody seemed to feel any joy. When we came out I was asked what I thought of the service. I said that if some negro had come in and shouted out an "Hallelujah!" it would have been a joy; but nobody had shown anything but conceit. It was a service for the intellect, but not the heart.—George Dawson.

The Perfect Man. There are two classes of excellence. There are men whose lives are full of moral principle, and there are others whose feelings are strongly devotional. Strange to say, each of these is at times disjointed from the other—men of almost spotless earthly honour who scarcely seem to know what reverence towards things heavenly and devout aspirations towards God mean; men who have the religious instinct, pray with fervour, kindle with spiritual raptures, and yet are impure in their feelings, and fail in matters of common truth and honesty. Each of these is but a half-man; his whole spirit, soul, and body are not sanctified. The perfect man, who has grown to the "measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," is he who has united these two things—who to the high Roman virtues which adorn this earth has added the sublimer feelings which are the investiture of heaven; in whom "justice, mercy, truth" are but the body, of which the soul is faith and love.—F. W. Robertson.

FEBRUARY 1ST.—St. Paul at Athens.

Passage for reading—Acts xvii. 22—31.

POINTS. 1. God the Creator calls all to worship.
2. God the Upholder calls all to prayer.
3. God the Judge calls all to repent.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Reverence for the Divine. The celebrated French preacher Massillon, at the beginning of an address, wishing to get his audience into a right frame of mind for appreciating what he was going to say, told them to imagine the roof of the lofty cathedral in which they were seated to be removed, and that in the depths of the sky above they saw all the countless hosts of the stars, and high above these the great white throne of God, while an angel song rang in their ears, "Glory to God in the highest!" and then, with the hush of awe upon their minds which such a vision was fitted to bring, to listen to what he had to say. It is with such reverence, and in such a spirit, that we ought to treat every footprint of God, every revelation of His nature, every instinct of intuition which speaks unmistakably of the Divine.

A Battle Prayer. Sir Jacob Astley was present at the battle of Edgehill, 1642, and his name has been handed down to posterity as having uttered this prayer before the fight began: "O Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me." And then, advancing with the men to the charge, he cried out in cheerful tones, "Come on, boys!"—which they did, and with an enthusiasm which their opponents severely felt.

Repentance or Change of Mind. "Burn the bridge behind you," was the command of a general once, when his soldiers had marched over a bridge beneath which a deep and swift river rushed. Then he pointed to the foe. "Yonder," he said "is the enemy. Behind you is death; there is no retreat—you must either conquer or die." And so to those who desire to give their lives to Christ I say: "Burn the bridge behind you. Do something to break with your past. Do something definite, commit yourself in some way; give up that bad habit or that bad friend. Show to others that you are really changed, and leave no way of retreat open."

FEBRUARY 8TH.—The Church at Corinth Founded.

Passage for reading—Acts viii. 1—11.

POINTS. ST. PAUL AN EXAMPLE TO CHRISTIANS OF—
1. Diligence in work.
2. Earnestness in preaching Christ.
3. Success in bringing in unbelievers.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Action. It is a good policy to strike while the iron is hot; it is still better to adopt Cromwell's plan, and make the iron hot by striking. The master spirit who can rule the storm is great, but he is much greater who can both raise and rule it. To attain that great power we must possess the brave and indomitable soul of activity which prompted Edmund Burke to exclaim to his supporters in his famous speech at Bristol, "Applaud us when we run, console us when we fall, cheer us when we recover; but let us pass on—for God's sake, let us pass on!" St. Paul spoke of the motive power when he wrote in the midst of his extraordinarily active life, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me."

Subjects for Preaching. An eminent preacher in New York said to another minister not long ago, "I have a large audience, but they are all Christians. I can't get the worldly people to come in and listen to me. I hear that a good many worldly people do come to hear you. You must preach some very strange things. What did you preach about yesterday?" "Well," said the other, "I preached in the morning on, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me,' and in the evening on, 'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.'" "Was that all?" said he. "Yes, brother, that was all, and quite enough too."

Livingstone's Success. Sir Henry Stanley, who found Livingstone, once told this story of his conversion. "In 1871 I went to Africa as prejudiced against religion as the worst infidel in London. To a reporter like myself, who had only to deal with wars, mass meetings, and political gatherings, sentimental matters were quite out of my province. But there came to me a long time for reflection. I was out there away from a worldly world. I saw this solitary old man there, and I asked myself, 'Why does he stop here? What is it that inspires him?' For months after we met I found myself listening to him, wondering at the old man carrying out the words 'Leave all, and follow Me.' But little by little, seeing his piety, his gentleness, his zeal, his earnestness, and how he went quietly about his business, I was converted by him, although he had not tried to do it."

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE.

TIME, passing from the pool of dreams,
Has cast his robe around him;
Of new-spun day his vesture gleams,
With gold the East has crowned him.
And I am here to see the light
Make every dewdrop pearly,
For—"Where the heart has spent the night
The feet will travel early!"*

A moment past, a little life
By every leaf-bough slumbered,
But now the merry air is rife
With notes untaught, unnumbered;
A thousand birds are on their flight,
A thousand bees are humming,
And where their hearts have spent the night
Themselves are surely coming.

The world to all its joyous ways,
And I to wistful pleasure;
For singing birds their songs of praise,
But mine a softer measure.
Ah! drooping head of my delight,
Ah! voice too sweet for speaking,
You know where it has spent the night—
That heart that I am seeking!

EVA CHADWICK.

* Uganda proverb.

GOD'S BEAUTIFUL CREATURES.

SOME BEAUTIFUL FISHES OF THE BRITISH SEAS.

By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

(Illustrated from Photographs by R. Thiele and Co., Chancery Lane, W.C.)

"SO is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts"; so sang the Psalmist in extolling the power and goodness of God as displayed in the works of Nature. But it was a very small portion of the mighty waters covering the earth that was known to him; and of the creatures that inhabited these waters he had only the most meagre ideas. Since his days our knowledge of the grandeur of the seas, and of their marvellous fulness of life, has been vastly extended. The discovery of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans made the Mediterranean, that seemed to him a "great and wide sea," a little inland lake. Modern science has explored all the waters of the earth, and revealed to us the wonderful forms that exist even at the most enormous depths in the sunless abysses. The last great Challenger Expedition round the globe brought home treasures of knowledge, and opened up new fields of speculation, which have engaged the profound interest of naturalists ever since. Recent years have made us almost as familiar with the productions of the deep as with those of the dry land, and have taught us that there is no field so rich in illustrations of the Divine wisdom and power as the "great and wide sea."

The sea is the home of all kinds of creatures—"creeping things innumerable, both small and great beasts." It possesses some of the most uncouth, and also many of the most elegant forms of life. Indeed, it has a far larger variety of beautiful creatures than the dry land. I need hardly mention the sea anemones that make the pools on the rocky coast like gardens of flowers, the corals and madrepores that transform the ocean flood into fairy bowers, the star-fishes and sea urchins (see illustration) that are washed ashore by the waves, and fill the mind of the youthful finder with strange imaginings. It is a most interesting thought that everywhere God's world has been growing during the ages in beauty and fitness for use. Just as on the dry land the monstrous primeval reptiles and beasts of prey have, by slow succession of higher forms, given place to the mild-mannered sheep and cattle which are the objects of the shepherd's and the husbandman's care; so in the seas the fierce gigantic dragons of the prime passed away, leaving their places to be occupied by shoals of graceful fishes of the latest geological periods, not only harmless, but excellent for food. How much more beautiful, for instance, are the salmon and the mackerel, with their shapely forms and graceful tails, introduced for the first time in the tertiary era, than the shark and the dog-fish, whose deformed mouths and tails speak of the

PURPLE SEA URCHIN.

They share the flowing lines and the easy motions of its own currents and ripples. The sea-weed and the fresh-water alga are shaped by the transparent element in which they grow, and yield to its slightest impulse. In the hand the sea anemone is a shapeless lump of jelly; but in the lustrous water it puts forth its bright-rayed tentacles like the petals of a flower; while the green gleet, that seems a mere mass of ugly slime when exposed on a dry surface, floats from primitive type upon which they are constructed, and still remain with us as survivors of an old chaotic state of things when the sea was first inhabited. God, on sea and land, made a magnificent Nature contemporaneous with human nature. The dressing and keeping of the Garden of Eden on dry land made man a gardener and tiller of the ground; the harvests of the sea greatly enriched and enlarged his stores of food and made him a fisherman, and thus prepared the way in later ages, in the wonderful cycle of Divine Providence, for that toilful and precarious craft, from the members of which our Lord chose His Apostles—that they might go to the ends of the earth, and proclaim to every creature the blessed Gospel which is the bread of life to perishing souls.

BALAN WRASSE.

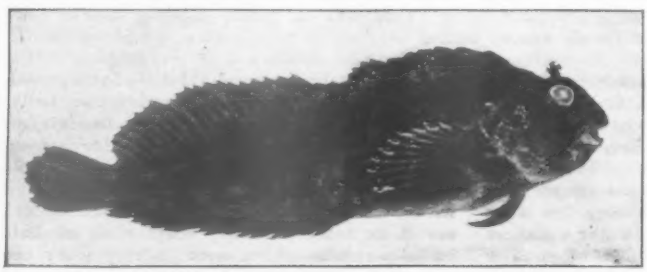
My subject is a boundless one; but I have only to survey a very small corner of it. I might speak of the beauty of the dolphin, whose unfortunately fugitive colours have ever been a subject of greatest admiration. I might draw attention to the scales of fishes, which, under the microscope, exhibit the most marvellous forms of loveliness. I might show the wonderful harmony between the shapes of fishes and the element in which they live. Indeed, the quality which characterises all the productions of water is gracefulness.

the stone to which it adheres, in the bed of a stream, with the crystal wavelets that form folds of liquid drapery, like the luxuriant hair of the Nereids and water nymphs. Fishes as a class partake of the grace of the waters. They are adapted to its motions. They are moulded by its requirements. A ship is built to suit the conditions of its home on the mighty deep, and is therefore the most compact and well-ordered of man's works. There is nothing useless or superfluous about it. And so a fish has the same exquisite adaptation and concentration. Fishes are in the sea what birds are in the air, amongst the most elegant of God's creatures. They have similar beauty of colour and shape, and exhibit the same wonderful provisions and contrivances of Divine skill. I might go on in the same strain to describe the radiant beauties of the translucent waters around the coral islands of the South Seas, over which the boatman rows and gazes down into an inverted world of indescribable witchery—rainbow hues and crystal bowers—and snow-white groves through which fishes of strangest forms and brightest colours flash in and out like jewels. But it will better serve my purpose if, in this paper, I forego all the foreign romance of the subject, and speak only of a few of the beautiful fishes which frequent our own seas.

In the British waters there are some fishes remarkable for their brilliant hues. Among them may be mentioned the different species of the Wrasse family. The Balan Wrasse, of which our illustration (p. 334) is an example, is of a bright red colour, shading to a pale orange on the underside. The body has bluish-green oval spots, which contrast harmoniously with the red, while the fins and tail are green mixed with red. Though this is the typical arrangement of colouring, the fish is liable to great variations of hue, but in every case the red, green, and orange tints are predominant. The kind inhabiting the northern waters, such as Orkney, Denmark, and Norway, has more of the orange-red than the variety from the south of England, and the hues are always brightest when newly taken out of the sea, fading considerably in the course of a few hours' exposure. The size of the fish is generally from a foot to eighteen inches in length, and it weighs between two and four pounds. It is often called the rock-fish, because it is found principally in deep gullies, among the seaweed-covered rocks round our coasts, and spawns in the late spring or early summer, its colours coming out in the highest perfection at this season, as a brighter crimson comes upon the robin's breast during the nesting time. It has an elegant shape as well as brilliant colours, but its value as a food-fish is not in proportion to the beauty of its appearance, for its flesh is soft and tasteless, and fishermen do not hold it in much estimation, although it takes the bait freely, and is often caught in great numbers. When fishing for it only a few are brought up at first, generally of large size; but after a few days the angler who tries the same water manages to secure a much larger number of smaller size; and from this circumstance the fishermen have a theory that the older fish hold exclusive sway over a region within which the younger are kept in a subordinate position.

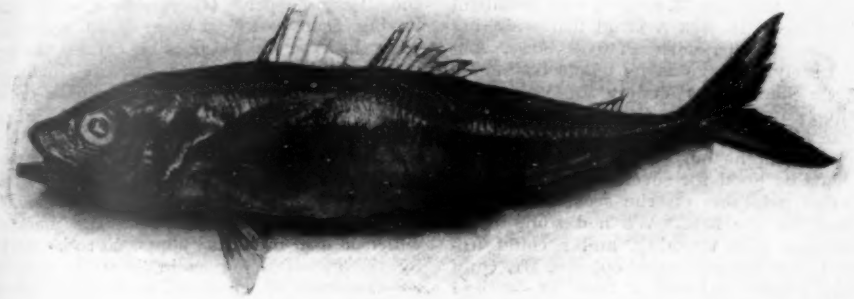
Another very beautiful species of the Labrus or Wrasse family is the Rainbow Wrasse. It has long been one of the familiar fishes of the Mediterranean, but it has been occasionally caught off the Cornish coast. It is not more than seven or eight inches long, of a slender, elongated form, but it has a most brilliant appearance. The back is greenish-blue, with a broad orange stripe extending along its side from the head almost to the tail, underneath which are lilac-coloured bands on a silvery ground. The head is adorned with a mixture of brown, yellow, blue, and silvery colours, and the dorsal fin is orange with a purple spot on the membrane. The general effect of this rainbow radiance is singularly beautiful and harmonious. When seen among the large brown sea-weeds on the rocks it is one of the loveliest objects upon which the eye can rest. Unfortunately, like many of the gorgeous fishes of the tropics, its flesh is poisonous.

Another species of this beautiful family is not uncommon on the southern coast of England, and occasionally puts in an appearance in the London market. It is called the Cook Wrasse, Labrus coquus (below), and is always conspicuous by its brilliant hues, though it is liable to considerable variation in its markings. Its general tint is orange-red, darkest on the back and lightest on the belly, while the sides are marked with fine stripes of blue and orange. It seeks shelter among the larger sea-weeds that fringe the rocks near the shore, and migrates in autumn and winter into deeper water. Fishermen do not use it as food, but they employ it as bait for other fish—which seems a very sorry use for a creature so resplendent.



COOK WRASSE

The picture given of the Gattorugine below in the text does not strike one as either graceful in form or beautiful in colour, but it must have been taken from a preserved specimen; for the fish, when fresh and newly taken out of the water, is both elegantly shaped and has a rich dark purple hue clouded with a reddish-brown which is exceedingly striking, and fairly entitles it to be enrolled among beautiful fishes. This fish is common in the Mediterranean, and is often seen in the Adriatic around Venice. It is a rare visitant of our shores, being almost entirely confined to Devonshire and Cornwall, where it rarely exceeds half a foot in length. It is usually caught in spring and summer in the crab-pots that are then employed, and is known to the Cornish fishermen as the Tompot. This curious species is a Blenny, and belongs to a very interesting class of fishes. The British species of the genus are destitute of the peculiar tufted appendage which appears on the head of the Gattorugine, although this is a characteristic trait of foreign species. The genus comprehends such remarkable forms as the Shanny which is so tenacious of life that it may be kept in a damp place or in moist grass for several days, and when restored to water swims about as if nothing had happened; the Greenbone, so called because its bones when boiled become green, which brings forth its young alive, whose vitality is such that they are able to provide for themselves immediately after they are excluded; and the Wolf-fish or Sea-cat, which is often six or seven feet long, and has the appearance of a ferocious cat armed with most formidable teeth, which inflict severe wounds, and often tear the nets in which it is caught.



The Gattorugine is allied to a very lovely fish which Linnæus called Callionymus, which signifies "beautiful name." Its common name is Gemmeous Dragonet, derived from its brilliant gem-like colours. In Scotland it is called the Gowdie, from goud, which means golden, owing to its rich golden-yellow colour, spotted and striped with blue. This most charming species reminds us of the flying-fishes of the tropics, by its remarkably long wing-like pectoral and ventral fins which give it a look somewhat like the dragon-fly. These extraordinary fins must serve some useful purpose in its own economy, but it does not utilise them to flee from its enemies, above the surface of the water, like the tropical flying-fishes, and it very frequently becomes the prey of other fishes. The Gattorugine is also allied to a still more singular fish, the Angler or Fishing Frog, which is not uncommon in all the seas of Europe, and is a frequent inhabitant of the deep Scottish salt-water lochs. It is a striking example of Nature's compensations, for being a slow swimmer, and having a voracious appetite, it is furnished with the capacity to catch its prey by artifice. It confines itself to the bottom, and by its ventral and pectoral fins it stirs up the mud, so as to make a cloud, within which it hides its head and body, only elevating two curious long appendages above it, one of which terminates in a knob with a shining silvery appearance, and looking exactly like the bait at the end of a line. These shafts are delicate organs of touch, and are waved backwards and forwards by the concealed angler, so as to attract the curiosity of the small fish swimming near, which approach closely to examine the baited line, and are immediately seized by the huge mouth and devoured. The cunning displayed by the angler in this singular habit raises it above the level of the class to which it belongs, and makes it in the sea what the spider is on dry land, catching the insects on which it feeds by means of its web.

Another of the illustrations (p. 337) represents the Scad or Horse Mackerel, so called on account of its coarseness and inferiority as a food-fish in comparison with the true Mackerel. It is about the same size, and has an even finer appearance, its colour being a dark olive on the back, changing to a lustrous green with a bluish wavy gloss on the sides, while the head is silvery with waved reflections. It is a very elegant fish, and its movements are graceful and swift. Its forked tail resembles that of the swallow, and makes the fish to be in the water what the swallow is in the sky—distinguished for its rapid powers of flight; and, like the swallow, it is almost cosmopolitan within the temperate and tropical zones of the northern and southern hemispheres. On our own coasts it often appears in large schools, and is so keen in pursuit of the herring, which is usually its prey, that by its impetus it often thrusts its companions in heaps on the sand. Off the shores of Norway the waters are sometimes in a state of seething foam with the vast multitudes of Scad. It is possible to stand on a rock that juts into the sea and jerk up three or four of them at a time upon the dry land with the hand. I have seen them coming so near the shore that there was no difficulty in catching any number of them in this easy manner.

GATTORUGINE.

SCAD, OR HORSE MACKEREL.

Closely allied to the Scad is the well-known Pilot Fish, which is marked by fine dark blue transverse bands passing round the whole of its mackerel-like body, which contrasts finely with the general silvery greyish-blue colour of its sides. This beautiful fish, belonging to temperate and tropical seas, has been often seen and occasionally taken on our southern coasts. It is supposed to guide the shark to its prey, though probably the true motive for the strange association is that the Pilot obtains its food from the parasitic crustaceans with which the shark, in common with other large fish, is infested. Another reason for the habit may be that the Pilot feels in greater safety when in company with the shark, which scares away all its enemies, and is not active enough to catch itself. It has also a curious instinct to follow a ship sometimes for weeks and months together during its course at sea. The ancients held the belief that it pointed the way to sailors in unknown seas, and indicated the neighbourhood of land by its sudden disappearance. They therefore regarded it as a sacred fish under the protection of Castor and Pollux, the divinities of mariners. In summer, when the temperature of the water is warmer, Pilot Fish have not infrequently followed ships from the Mediterranean to harbours on the south coast of England, and been afterwards caught. Two Pilots made their appearance on one occasion alongside a ship at Alexandria, and were constantly seen for eighty-two days during the homeward voyage, until she arrived at Plymouth, when they were both taken and dressed for food. The fish is never longer than a foot, but its flesh is said to be excellent eating.

The true Mackerel is well known for the beauty and brilliancy of its colours, the elegance of its form, and its excellence as food. It is one of the most useful fishes to man, and is at the same time one of the most lovely. It seems to belong to a higher type of life, and to approximate to the condition of mammals on land, having, like them, blood-vessels and nerves of a red colour, and a greater supply of them than other fishes, and a temperature of blood several degrees higher. Owing to this peculiar physiology and its forked tail, this "swallow of the sea," as it is called, is ceaselessly active and exceedingly rapid in its motions, and it has great powers of endurance in swimming. As a fish of prey it follows the shoals of pilchards and herring in their periodical migrations. "Thou hast put all things under his feet . . . the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." This is particularly true of the Mackerel. It obeys a law of Nature in visiting at a certain time each year the shallow water of the shore, and thus by a wise providence a fish that might otherwise by its swift movements roam over the whole surface of the sea, or frequent deep, inaccessible waters only, is placed in immense shoals within easy reach of man as food. The Mackerel should be eaten soon after being taken out of the water, for it very quickly decomposes and becomes unfit for food. Indeed, many cases of poisoning have occurred on account of this dangerous peculiarity of rapid perishableness. At one time, owing to this circumstance, it was the only fish that could be sold and cried in the streets on Sunday; the strictness of the Sabbath law having been relaxed in its favour.

I remember, when sailing in a yacht between the Island of Arran and Skye, the seamen on board, trying their luck one afternoon at fishing, catching a large specimen of a fish which I had never seen before, the John Dory (below). When it appeared above water varying tints of blue and gold and white passed over its body like shot-silk in different lights, and it seemed a very brilliant creature; and when landed on deck its whole surface settled down into an olive brown, tinged with yellow, very beautiful and striking. It was a large fish weighing about nine pounds, with an oval body, and a head nearly as large as its whole body. Its dorsal fin had spines ending in very long filaments. Living near the bottom of the sea, the John Dory takes a long time to die when brought out of the water, and its flesh remains good for several days. Indeed, it is more palatable on the second or third day than on the first. We had some of it at breakfast next morning, and I could understand how the celebrated epicure, Mr. Quin of Bath, greatly enjoyed a feast of it, and brought it into high general estimation. So greatly valued as a food-fish was the John Dory considered by the ancients that they gave it the great name of Jupiter, the chief of the gods, and the genus to which it belongs is called by marine zoologists by the name of Zeus. Its common English name is supposed to be a corruption of the French dorée, or jaune dorée, derived from its peculiar golden-yellow colour; while others, again, regard it as a modification of the Gascon "jan," which means cock, and dorée the French word meaning "golden," so that the whole word signifies "golden cock." In some parts of the Mediterranean it is known as the Gallo or cock, and in the Adriatic as the "gate-keeper" (Il janitore), this name having been bestowed upon it in connection with the Apostle Peter, who carries the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. A fond and foolish tradition says that he took the tribute money out of the mouth of this fish at the Saviour's command, and left upon its body on that miraculous occasion the impression of his finger and thumb, as still shown by the characteristic black round spot on its side. In this respect it contends with the haddock, which is also fancifully supposed to be marked by the apostle's fingers in the same way, for the reverence of fishermen in Roman Catholic countries.

JOHN DORY

TALKS TO MEN.

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A., Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

1.—AS MEN OF BUSINESS.

"Be ye like approved money changers."—Traditional Saying of Our Lord.

DURING Mr. Spurgeon's later years at the Metropolitan Tabernacle the great preacher, then in failing health, would occasionally accept help from his officials in the conduct of the services. One evening, when he was crippled with rheumatism, I heard him ask a deacon to pray before the sermon. This venerable supplicator, every inch a man of commerce, used a phrase which I have never forgotten. The petition rang not quite sympathetically upon unaccustomed ears, but it evidently had a meaning, true and solemn, for many of its hearers. "Grant, O Lord," prayed the speaker, "that to-night each one of us may do business with his God." The quaint words certainly expressed the concern of the human soul with its Creator as no namby-pamby sentiment, but as a real live thing. To this practical deacon of South London, I take it, his daily business was the most important matter outside his religion, and he therefore alluded to the one, quite naturally, in the terms of the other. To him it did not seem incongruous to use the language of the counting-house in his communings with the Eternal. To many business men, who yet desire, with more or less earnestness, to live as Christians, such incongruity would be painfully manifest. They are scared by the chasm which yawns, as they fancy, between the precepts of the Gospel and the demands of the work by which their bread is earned. So, as they honourably decline to be hypocrites, they are content with a negative attitude towards Christianity. They prefer to be vicariously religious through their wives and children. They would never "do business" with their God.

Such honest waverers confuse the needful and legitimate pursuit of money with the unessential and illegitimate methods imported into it by the customs of each evil generation. The distinction is often difficult, but it is just the power of making it which is the unique opportunity and glory of the man of business who is absolutely determined to live to God. In simple commerce there can be nothing inherently wicked. Because they were largely addressed to business men, many of Christ's parables and aphorisms deal with business transactions. In that Galilean gallery of imperishable pictures we see the patient pearl merchant securing the one prize of his life at the fishery. From the curious story of the unjust steward we gather the lesson that, if we would be live Christians, we should be wise to emulate the energy and the thoroughness which the children of the world put into their earthly aims. It is scarcely straining a point to say that there is a suggestion of certain prominent business virtues in well-known expressions of our Lord. Promptitude and punctuality are commercial pivots. "Agree with thine adversary quickly"—i.e. if merely from prudential motives. Industry is more needed in this age than ever it was. "Work while it is day." Caution is wanted. The man who means to get on is careful how he reveals a trade secret to the first comer. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents." The maxim that "nothing succeeds like success" is being continually proved. "To him that hath shall be given." No slighting word is ever recorded as spoken against commerce in itself, and the race from which He came (according to the flesh) has always been supreme for its business capacities among the nations of the world.

But if we have assured ourselves that there is nothing in the teaching of our Master which conflicts with our belief that the career of business may be the path of righteousness, there is abundant reason that we should go on to show how easily a lofty ideal may be marred. To allow that there is one standard of conduct for private and another for public life—one method of dealing for the family at the fireside, and another for the customer in the counting-house—is surely to give the lie to Christianity. It may be sound naval science to build some vessels in watertight compartments, but that man will make shipwreck of his voyage of life who regulates his business transactions by an absolutely separate code of morality. There are persons, unhappily for every country and century, who are such rogues in grain that they would do their utmost to effect a mean advantage in any human relationship. It is not with the iniquity of such that we are concerned, but with the strange moral obliquity of men and women who are often irreproachable in their domestic and friendly relations. We speak of that we do know. One of the most kind-hearted men I ever came across, a devoted husband, a fond father, a beloved citizen, was suddenly discovered to have been in the habit of appropriating moneys entrusted to him, of robbing one client to pay another; and it was only by a legal quibble that he escaped penal servitude. It is an emphatic tribute to his local popularity to add that, by a sort of perverted sentiment, it partially persisted after the discovery of his crimes.

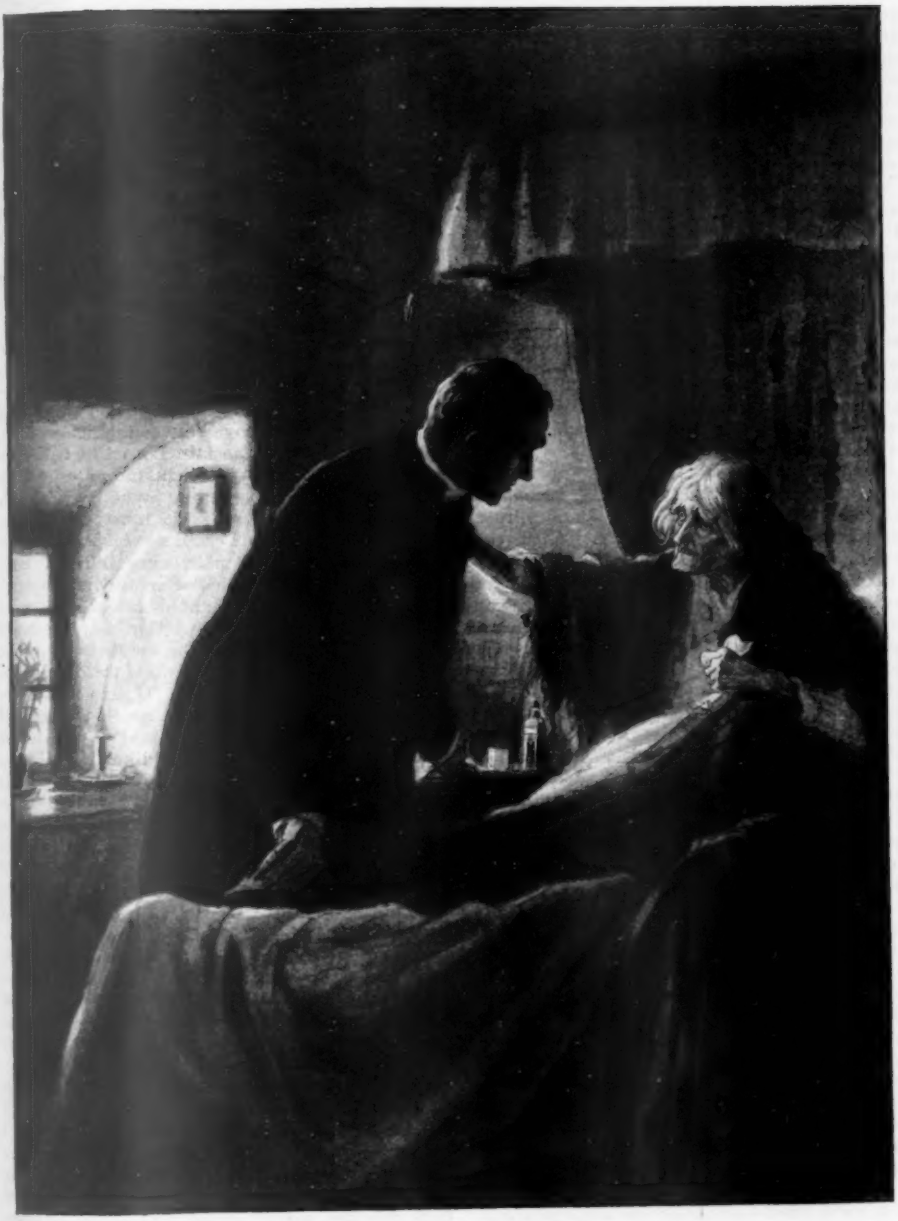
Let us notice another paradox. In this era of company flotation men are continually guilty, as companies, of sins of commission and omission from which they would often shrink as individuals. It has become a proverb of the market place that a company has no conscience. The individual may consider that he has some responsibilities in the way of alms-giving. He is not deaf to all calls of charity. But he "goes into" a company, and he joins quite cheerfully with his co-directors in cutting off the firm's subscriptions right and left, nor do subsidies from his private purse take their place. As an individual employer, a man would have some hesitation in turning off a clerk at a fortnight's notice after years of service simply on the score of retrenchment or rearrangement. Many companies have no such scruples, and the thing is being done every day. The policy which regards humanity as a mere money-making machine is indefensible, though a hundred pairs of shoulders bear the guilt.

We are told that we must be content with a standard lower for public than for private life. "Allow for friction" is a favourite phrase. This sophism sounds much like saying that it needs a certain amount of rascality to make the wheels of God's universe go round. Nasty things are called by nice names. Cant terms, such as "the custom of this house," are used to cover questionable methods.



We willingly allow that, in most trades and professions, there are practices which lie on a well-nigh indefinable borderland between honesty and dishonesty, and with regard to which each Christian must be his own judge.

Take, among a score of examples which could readily be adduced, the single question of adulteration. When you want an extra big stick of chocolate for your penny, you are foolish if you do not expect a proportion of harmless farina, but how obviously wicked is the dangerous deterioration of food and drink. "I do my best business in lemonade and ginger pop when yon public-house closes," said an old lady to me in a certain Midland village. "The publican puts so much salt or summat in his beer." The disguise is usually thin which greed spreads over the stern face of the eighth commandment.

There is one broad and unmistakable distinction to be drawn between business which Christ might approve and the reverse. Whether Dr. Johnson was right or not when he said that a man was never more usefully occupied than in making money, it is a fact of experience that, in the case of money won without labour, there is usually something wrong. It is not within our present province to do more than lament the degradation, through the betting ring, of more than one noble British sport; but it is our opinion that the Christian must fight shy of those gamblings in stocks and shares, those dabblings in doubtful enterprises, which are begotten of a horrid haste to grow rich lazily at the expense of somebody else. If men would confine their profits to money which they had honestly worked for, and the acquisition of which involved no unfair advantage, all difficulty of squaring a business life with genuine religious professions would disappear.

The constant drip, drip of the dream of gold upon the heart has the effect, in the gradual ossification of the finer feelings, of a petrifying spring. I knew a young man with whom the desire of speedy and easy wealth was a craze. Despising the modest returns of a slowly increasing business, he plunged into speculation, and netted several hundreds on his first venture. But he never won again. Drunk with success, he gambled wildly, and within a few months he had brought himself, and some who had trusted him, to penury. Few realise how inherently ugly is the lust for gold. I saw its foulness once in a humble, but horrible, way. I was standing by the bedside of a very old woman, who was almost at her last gasp. I tried to minister to her, but she only raved to me again and again of five pounds which she feared to lose, and she died with the bank-note clutched desperately within her withered hand.

Business men, especially young business men, will say things to a parson whom they like and trust which sometimes set him pondering. "A kind-hearted master is no good for business nowadays—he will never do more than pay his way," a rising tradesman remarked to me. The assertion at first gave me a sort of shudder: one had a faithless, haunting dread lest it might be true. But I remembered that at least my friend's practice must be better than his theory, for I had previously heard of him as being considerate to those whom he employed. But his dictum does suggest another doubtful question. We have spoken of conscienceless companies; but in business relationships, what should be the Christian man's treatment of irregularity or of incompetency? Is he to filch the bread remorselessly, and at the first offence, from a poor and a dependent mouth, or is he to forgive until seventy times seven? No simple answer can be stated, but the truth, as usual, will probably lie between the extremes. A distracted widow calls upon her clergyman and tells him that her only son, who was a clerk, with twenty others, under the manager of a counting-house, has just been dismissed. The boy "borrowed" five shillings from the till early one Saturday morning, meaning to replace it at noon out of his week's salary, but the accounts chanced to be made up three-quarters of an hour sooner than usual that day, and the pitiful deficit was discovered. The manager says he has his firm to think about, and the lad has been flighty before. Given certain conditions, it is impossible to say that the severity is unwarranted. The clergyman watches the autocrat in his pew next Sunday, and is thankful that his was not the burden of decision. "Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all." When mercy can be reconciled with duty, the Christian will, at any rate, lean towards the side of mercy. With this proviso, we fail to see that the conscientious man of business is bound, in a strenuous and competitive century, to put up with slackness and incompetency. If we read the ethics of Christianity correctly, they have a rigorous side. Everywhere our Lord lays tremendous stress upon every sort of efficiency. The unprofitable servant in the parable had committed no sin, save that he had been too indifferent and idle to increase the money put into his hands. And yet few words from the lips of Him Who said, "Blessed are the merciful," ring more austère than those which announce this fainéant's doom. It was a case of firing out the worst sort of fool.

"'I tried to minister to her, but she would only rave.'"

Some departments of business life are more severely competitive than others, and in them there will be the keenest conflict between honesty and dishonesty, between justice and mercy. This tremendous competition on so many sides was lately described to me, by one who knew what he was talking about, as being pre-eminently the special curse of the commerce of the new century. "It begets," said my informant, "a constant feeling of suspicion and unrest; each party to a bargain is too apt to believe that the one is endeavouring financially to cut the other's throat." He told me how he had been invited to tender for a certain contract, which he knew could not honestly be fulfilled for less than the sum he mentioned —£100. The successful competitor consented to carry the contract through for £75, and it chanced that within twelve months the identical work came into my friend's hands for repair, and he could see its rottenness and inadequacy. In times so perilous and so full of temptation there is, as we have said, at least all the greater honour in behaving as a Christian. Men of business have now occasions to "hold fast their profession" hardly afforded to those of us whose lot lies along the safer and more guarded ways of life. The Christian, according to the light given him, will always take his own line.

The same solution applies to the question of harshness versus kindness. "In journalism," a responsible writer has stated, "the competition now is too keen for philanthropy." The conditions, for aught I know to the contrary, may be grimmer in journalism than anywhere else, but they must never be hard enough to kill the love between man and man.

An utterance of the late Lord Chief Justice Coleridge has always struck me as especially weighty. We may agree wholly with it, or not, as we please. "It must be remembered that all trade is, and must be, in a sense selfish. Trade not being infinite, nay, the trade of a particular place or district being possibly very limited, what one man gains another loses. In the hand-to-hand war of commerce, as in the conflicts of public life, whether at the bar, in Parliament, in medicine, in engineering (I give examples only), man fights on without much thought of others, except a desire to excel or to defeat them. Very lofty minds, like Sir Philip Sidney's, with his cup of water, will not stoop to take an advantage if they think another wants it more. Our age, in spite of high authority to the contrary, is not without its Sir Philip Sidneys; but these are counsels of perfection which it would be silly indeed to make the measure of the rough business of the world."

The religious life and the life of commerce, then, need not be incompatibles, if the man of business will be content to keep one sacred code of morality, to forego unjust and unkind profits, to live like the "approved money changers" who were perhaps described by Christ. "Thank God," said that selfless statesman and stainless gentleman, Lord Iddesleigh, to his wife before he died, "I have left no arrears." And it is the man who has ordered his business most fruitfully and faithfully in this world as God's steward who has the surest stake in the eternal treasures of God's Kingdom which is to come.

A Story for the Little Ones.

KING FIRLA really did a very unwise thing when he decided to invite only ordinary, every-day mortals to the birthday party of his daughter, the little Princess Nerpont, and to leave the fairies out of the festive gathering altogether. Of course, he hurt their feelings dreadfully; for, though he did not believe it, they had done a great deal for him during his reign, and it was entirely owing to their influence that Her Royal Highness was growing up such a nice, well-behaved child. Indeed, if you did not ruffle her curls and discover the tiny gold crown that was beginning to grow on her head, you would never suspect she had royal blood in her veins, or was different in any way from the many children you can see about—no matter where you live. But His Majesty was mean. That was the truth, and that, therefore, began all the trouble. He was afraid, if he asked one fairy, he would have to ask all of them, which would mean putting an extra leaf in the dining-room table, buying a great deal more food, and perhaps giving extra help to the cook; and, if there was one thing the King disliked more than the other, it was making the work any easier for the cook, or indeed for anyone who served him.

"Pooh!" he would say, if one of the over-worked domestics ventured to grumble, "I had no help when I was your age. I never heard of such a request. Go away, and don't let it be mentioned in my presence again," and he would look so aggrieved that nothing more was said about it.

All the fairies were convinced they would receive their invitations in due course, so they daily watched for the postman as he drove to the fairy palace in his cart drawn by a white mouse; but though he delivered many letters to them, there never came a line concerning the big party they heard so much about. Some of these little people began to look out their best wings and dresses, so as to be quite ready when the invitations arrived, and one or two of the most venturesome appeared in court with their hair in curl papers, until the Fairy Queen objected to it, as being both unnecessary and untidy.

But not a sign from His Majesty did they receive, and when they realised it was too late their wrath was terrifying to see. They tore up the beautiful flowers and trampled beneath their feet the innocent ferns that grew in the royal forests, and would have done a great deal more harm had not the Fairy Queen interfered and stopped it. And then one naughty little fairy, still anxious for her revenge, thought out a splendid way by which she could make the King suffer for the slight he had shown them. She went to the Well of Gloom, and as she lowered her bucket she stooped over and called out what she wanted sent up in it.

"Witch, Witch," she cried, "let me have a fine black Frown, please—the best you have."

"What size is it to be?" queried the Witch, as she reclined on her couch of grumbles.

"It is to fit the brow of a royal Princess," said the spiteful fairy; and as she remembered the sunshine which generally surrounds only children, she bent her head lower. "Let it be very strong," she cried, "and quite, quite black."

And then she turned the handle of the windlass and wound it round and round until the bucket came slowly to the surface once more, and there fell out what she required.

The fairy raised the Frown in her hand, and looked at it critically to see what she thought of it. She noted with approval that it was black and heavy, and from its shape and size she was sure it would answer its purpose. So she trudged away towards the King's residence, and when she caught sight of the Royal Family sitting in the garden she tossed the Frown high into the air, and then wickedly blew a kiss after it.

"Good-bye, Frown," she cried. "Remember, I bid you fly until you find a resting place. Good-bye."

So the Frown flew across the garden, and when he drew near the tea-party he hovered in the air, feeling most uncertain whom to select, as everybody he inspected looked so happy and content that there was no room on their faces for even a tiny wee frown. Of course, the Frown was quite invisible while he was in the air, but the odd part about him was that directly he settled upon a brow he could easily be seen by anybody who cared to look.

The Frown tried the King's brow at first, but he could not stop there a second, as His Majesty was in such a good temper that he was laughing and smiling to everybody, and on a smiling face no respectable Frown cares to venture.

"That won't do," sighed the Frown as he flew off again. "However, I will try this old man." But the Lord Chamberlain, though very busy, had never been known to look cross, so, of course, he was quite hopeless. Again he flew away, and this time tried to settle upon the brows of all the maids-of-honour, but they were all too happy to find a place for him, and so it was with all the busy, hard-worked people he tested. But just as he was about to go away in despair, he caught sight of the little Princess, who was sitting in her high chair close to the tea-table and making a very big meal.

As the Frown approached, Her Royal Highness was demanding her third plate of strawberries and cream, and when her nurse, in her endeavours to do her duty by looking after her charge, firmly shook her head at such a request, the Frown saw his opportunity. In a minute he was perched on the brow of the little Princess, and directly he found there was room for him he began to settle down, and so well did he succeed that in a short time he was quite at home and began to make his presence felt. What an uproar there was in the royal garden! The little Princess ceased to be good and tractable; she struck her father and tried to bite her nurse, and when the ladies-in-waiting attempted to soothe her she made savage grabs at their hair until they rushed away in consternation, for not even people in high life enjoy having their hair pulled out by the roots.

But the most terrible thing of all was that Her Royal Highness was never seen without the Frown upon her face, and while it remained there nothing was right. When she awoke in the morning she would greet her nurse with an expression of ill-temper which gradually became worse as the day advanced. The King was most unhappy about the change in his daughter, and was really seriously considering whether he had not better postpone his party until her temper improved, when he suddenly remembered that the fairies were reported to be always ready to help distressed mortals. But for an instant His Majesty hesitated, as he recollected how ungraciously he had treated them in the past. "I don't expect they have heard of my party at all," he muttered. "How could they know anything of the doings of the court?" he foolishly argued to himself. "Anyhow, I will risk it."

The Queen of the Fairies, however, received him very coldly, and showed at once that she was not inclined to do anything to assist him, until, in describing the change that had come over his child, he happened to mention the ugly Frown she always appeared with. And then Her Majesty blushed and looked most abashed, for she realised that one of her subjects had let the Frown loose in the palace grounds without her permission; therefore she felt the only thing she could do was to help him get rid of it again.

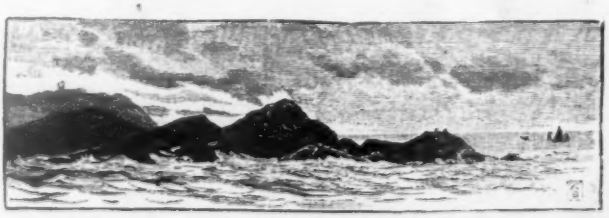
"I will come up to the palace this afternoon," she declared, "to cure your daughter. Don't tell her the motive of my visit, but let me meet her accidentally in the grounds. I shall be accompanied by some of my suite, who will carry with them the means I intend to employ. No, it will not hurt Her Royal Highness, and it will be a very speedy method. Good-morning."

So His Majesty led his small daughter into the garden as soon as she had eaten her dinner, and then patiently tried to keep her amused until the Fairy Queen arrived. But Princess Nerpont was really crosser than ever. She kicked and screamed and frowned at everybody so darkly that there was no bearing with her, and when her parent caught a glimpse of the fairies arriving he felt more inclined to ask them to remove Her Royal Highness altogether, as he was beginning to feel he never wished to see her again.

The Queen of the Fairies looked seriously at the ill-tempered child, and then she signed to one of her attendants to advance and open the golden casket she carried.

"Ah!" said the Queen, after a careful search, "here it is at last"; and then, as His Majesty exclaimed at the beautiful thing she produced from the box, she began to explain. "It is a sweet-tempered Smile," she told him, "and one of the rarest things in the world. That is why I keep them locked up in this golden casket. They are too precious to be lost. See. I throw it into the air, and it will fly on to the Princess's forehead, where it will fight the Frown that is so snugly settled there, and let us hope it will be victorious. Watch Her Royal Highness's face, and you will soon tell by the expression of it which has won."



For a few minutes there was not a sound in the garden, and the King grew pale with anxiety, and placed his hand over his eyes in case he should see the Frown was still remaining. But at last a merry laugh startled him considerably, and when he looked up there was his little daughter as pretty and bright as she had ever been.

His Majesty was so grateful that for a second he wavered in his determination not to ask the Queen of the Fairies and all her subjects to come to his big party the following day, when he suddenly remembered he had already invited enough guests to make it very expensive, so he decided not to bother. Besides, the Queen was preparing to go, so there was no time to say anything about it.

But the mean King had forgotten his little daughter, who, as she saw the Queen was leaving them so soon, rushed after her, and, using her new smile to its best advantage, held up her face to beg a kiss.

"Good-bye, dear Queen," she said. "I will never let the Frown come to me again. I did not like having it at all, really. It made me feel so bad." And then she hurried to His Majesty, who stood near. "Dear papa, won't you ask the Queen and all her fairies to come to our party to-morrow? I want them to be here so very much, and I am sure you do also. So please ask them now."

And as the King stepped forward to speak he realised how rudely he had behaved, and he was so pressing in his invitation that the Queen, being of a very kind, forgiving nature, accepted for herself and her subjects, who, when the party was over, said it had been the most delightful one they had ever been to. They discussed it for days, and soon began to hope that His Majesty would speedily invite them to another—as, indeed, he did, for the King realised, as many had done before him, that no party was complete without the presence of those who could bring with them a winning smile.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

Dust and Ashes.

WHAT could be more suggestive of the end of all things perishable than the words "dust and ashes"? But on visiting the dust sifters in South London we find that the odds and ends of our discarded rubbish are the beginnings of new and great things. The fine ash which is sifted carefully helps to make bricks for our new buildings. Our roads are repaired and hardened with the fragments of china and tin which the women carefully sort into baskets. New glass and iron rise phœnix-like out of the molten remains of the old. Our fields are enriched with the manure separated from these. All that is left over is cast into the fire of the great destructor, and the cinders are again used in the furnace for baking the bricks. And so the work goes on, day in, day out. The women sort and sift the dust, whilst the men unload the carts and fill the baskets. The former are repaid for their daily toil in the open air in all weathers by a grand physique, by immunity from illness, and the unconscious picturesqueness of coloured handkerchief and looped-up skirt, enhanced by the smoke and vapour of the two great purifiers, fire and water. Treasures in the dust are sometimes found and become in time, if unclaimed, the property of the finder; but the treasure of health and a cheerful spirit seems theirs by right of the diligence with which they work. Smiling faces and cheerful repartee are the order of the day, for there is no time for boredom in the dustyard.

"The Least of These."

IN days when the privations of the East End of London were not as well known as they are now we have heard a clergyman, who laboured before the era of Model Dwellings and People's Palaces, tell of an old woman whom he used to visit, who was helpless in her entire body, save for one thumb, of which she, curiously, still retained the use. With this small remnant of vitality, she was incredibly ingenious in performing small offices of comfort for herself. "Ah, sir," she would say, "you, who have got the full use of your limbs, little know how thankful I am to the Almighty for sparing me the use of this one thumb." It was not long before her death that her pastor called upon her one Good Friday afternoon, and read to her, out of the Gospels, the story of the Passion. "And to think," she sighed, pointing to the cup of cold water (her only luxury), which stood by her side, "He had not even that!"

(Photo: V. Jensen.)

WOMEN ON DUST HEAPS.

"Dare to be a Daniel."

A BOY of our acquaintance, between five and six years of age, was missing from breakfast one morning last summer. His father called him, but received no reply. "I believe the child is in the garden," said the mother; "he must have heard you through the open door." The father went out, and greeted his son with a degree of asperity as he saw him, oblivious of the parental summons, walking up and down the path with his hands clasped, and with a very serious face. "Oh, father," exclaimed the little lad, "mother was reading to me yesterday, how Daniel prayed to God three times a day with his face towards Jerusalem. I want to be like him, and I have been looking towards the church while I said my prayers. Don't be cross with me, as the cruel men were with poor Daniel!"

Some New Books.

UNDER the title of "His Majesty Baby, and some Common People," Ian Maclaren has collected two-and-twenty of his charming sketches into a volume, which is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton in time to serve as a welcome Christmas or New Year's gift in many a home. We have been much struck by what the well-known author and lecturer says in a chapter headed "Upon the Lecture Platform." Speaking of that platform, he says it "does many good things for a lecturer; for one thing, it strengthens his voice, it brings him into contact with large bodies of his fellow-men, and it inspires him with humanity. Upon the platform he learns to command himself, to take disappointments like a man; and, above all, he gains a new conviction of the kindness and goodwill of large bodies of people whom he has never seen before and may never see again, and of whom he will ever think with a grateful heart."—Mr. Elliot Stock has just published "An Officer's Letters to his Wife during the Crimean War," the officer being the late General Sir R. D. Kelly, K.C.B., and the interest of the letters to the general reader lying in their revelation of the fact that all the complaints which were made by critics of those in authority during the recent war seem to have been anticipated half a century ago by the men at the front in the Crimea.—Messrs. Morgan and Scott send us a little volume of thoughtful and pleasant "Five-Minute Talks with Young People," under the general title of "In School and Playground," by Mr. G. E. Morgan.—From Messrs. Marshall Brothers we have to acknowledge the receipt of a useful book by the Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, B.D., on "Methods of Bible Study"; and from the Church Missionary Society, "Sea-girt Yezo," a book of glimpses of missionary work in North Japan, by the Rev. John Batchelor.—Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster send us two more volumes of sermons by the late C. H. Spurgeon, "Twelve Sermons on the Doctrines of Grace" and "Twelve Sermons on Precious Promises."

A Life of Dr. Parker.

THE death of Dr. Joseph Parker, for nearly thirty years pastor of the City Temple, London, has not only removed a strong individuality from the ranks of Protestant preachers of the day, but has deprived THE QUIVER of one who was a frequent and valued contributor to its pages. Such a life as his is not lost. His voice is, indeed, stilled; but his words remain with us, and will, we believe, be a power for good in countless lives and hearts for many years to come. The largest congregation ever addressed by mortal preacher is nothing by the side of the vast multitudes who may be, and are, reached through the press, and no man knew the value of the press to present-day Christianity better than Joseph Parker. During recent weeks the main incidents in his career of useful and strenuous service have been recounted in nearly every newspaper, but many readers demand a fuller and more intimate sketch of his life, and this is to be found in the new edition of "The Life of Dr. Parker," by the Rev. William Adamson, D.D., which is published in London by Messrs. Cassell, and in Glasgow by Messrs. Inglis Ker and Co. Even the last sad "closing scenes" are dealt with in this new edition; and Dr. Adamson writes with authority, for he not only knew Dr. Parker well, but was, we believe, a connection of his by marriage.

Mr. Tinworth's New Work.

A BEAUTIFUL panel in terra-cotta, representing the entrance of the Apostle Paul into Rome, has recently been executed by Mr. George Tinworth, the well-known artist in clay. The Apostle is portrayed standing in a cart hauled by patient oxen, and is outstretching his hands to his friends who have come to greet him. Chains depend from his wrists, for, of course, he is a prisoner, while the boughs of leafy horse-chestnuts hang overhead. On the left of the panel stands a statue of Mercury, and, as the god was supposed to benefit flocks and herds, the artist has modelled a shepherd bowing before the statue with a dead lamb in his hands. In the background are seen Roman temples, and also a Roman funeral proceeding to the catacombs hard by. Mr. Tinworth saw a bust of the Apostle Paul in these catacombs, and in modelling his figure in the panel he has borne that bust in mind. He has certainly produced a noble representation of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, and has given him a fine head, the head of a strong man. Mr. Tinworth was visiting Rome some three or four years ago, and the thought of designing the panel came to him as he was proceeding along the Appian Way. His first thought was to name his work "The Two Messengers," Mercury being the messenger of the gods, and St. Paul the messenger of Christianity; and in the panel on the outside, yet near the statue, the artist has depicted a balance in which the old heathen gods are weighed and found wanting. On the other side of the panel—which extends to some nine feet in length—on the outer edge of the work Mr. Tinworth has etched his monogram and a little picture of himself as a boy in the wheelwright's shop. The panel has occupied the artist a considerable time in execution, and the result is very dignified and striking, and the piece is likely to rank with the noblest of the artist's works.

MR. TINWORTH'S NEW WORK.

(By permission of Messrs. Doulton and Co., Ltd.)

Only Tied to the Stick.

A FRIEND sent us a pot of tulips in flower from a florist's. Three blooms were in the pot. Each flower rose on its smooth stem from its grey-green pointed leaves, and was tied neatly to a stick. Next day, however, one of the three flowers drooped and withered, while the other two were full of freshness and beauty. It was only a close examination which revealed the reason. The withered flower was not vitally on the root. Its stem was broken across, though it rose from amongst its leaves and was skilfully supported by the stick. We could do nothing with it but throw it away, while the other two made day after day a warm bit of red colour in the room. Christians need to be on the Root, Christ. The ordinances of the Church are admirable for the outward support and ordering of the life, but it must draw its real support from the Root Himself. Nor must the link with Christ be a slight attachment, but a union of will and affection, so that His life may go full and without hindrance to the believing soul. The link of a small riband of the stem-skin had not helped the withered tulip at all.

Small Traits of a Great Character.

"Do not cut that fine piece of cord." The speaker was Sir James Paget, who one evening during the closing years of his useful life came into Holy Trinity School, Marylebone, to distribute the Sunday scholars' prizes. He arrived early enough to be at the opening of the parcels of books, and at once offered his help in untying the knots, and in the practical work of unpacking and arranging them. After distributing the rewards, he closed with some encouraging words of fatherly advice to all the children. He told them of nobler prizes, in this world and the next, that were within their grasp, and asked if they would resolve to gain them. "I do not want you to answer me 'I will, if I can,'" he continued kindly; "say, 'I can, if I will,'" and he tried to make all understand how much lay within their own power. After a long life of service to humanity, the eminent surgeon could look back and see from his own experience that almost unlimited possibilities are hidden in strong will and brave purpose. With the addition of habits of punctuality and attention to details, evident in the small affairs of life, a strong character possesses the chief elements of success.

"The Quiver" Waifs' Fund.

A YOUNG reader, seeing the reference in the November number of THE QUIVER to THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund, sent two of her own dolls, with which, at fifteen, she was palpably reluctant to part, for our little girl protegée. Here is a copy of the letter which Rosie Heelis sent to the Editor to be forwarded to her friend:—

"Orphans' Home,
Upper Grosvenor Road,
Tunbridge Wells,
November 24, 1902.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—Thank you very much for the two lovely dolls you sent me; it was so kind of you. I will take great care of them. I shall take them out with me when I go for a walk; we go for such lovely runs on the common, and I am sure my dollies will enjoy it. I have got a little mail-cart, so that when Rosie and Reenie—those are my dollies' names—get tired, I can give them a ride. I must say good-bye now. Thank you very, very much. From your loving little friend,

"(Signed) ROSIE HEELIS."

The Divine Love of Beauty.

HAVE you ever seen a case arranged to exhibit the crystalline sponges? What is called Venus's Watering Pot is not uncommon even in drawing-rooms. Have you ever seen the new glass models to illustrate the structure of these sponges, the microscopic structure of their skeletons, their zooids, or organised points of clustered animal life, which are arranged on the crystalline skeleton, of their spicules or crystal defences and extra supports? The beauty of all these far surpasses that of the finest Venetian glass. No one knew this or saw it until comparatively lately. So it is with the myriads of Foraminifera which are found in every sea, the lovely houses or supports of animals for the most part every minute. So it is with the Diatoms, which are the flinty supports of microscopic vegetable life. It requires the highest powers of the best microscope to make out the detail of the sculpture of a Diatom frustule. So it is with Topaza Pella, a semi-nocturnal hummingbird in Surinam. And when we remember that the beauty which man has as yet seen is but a small part of that which still remains, and which has never been seen, and never will be seen, by mortal eye, we cannot resist the conclusion that God loves beauty for its own sake. Grace is infinitely higher than Nature, high and wonderful as Nature is. God has done far more to secure the beauty of the human soul than the beauty of the most perfect of His works. The gift of His Son to save the lost, and in saving them to make them like Himself, was the gift of Love, and God loves the image of His heart far more than the image of His intellect. Let us take courage, then, and use patience. God will have His way, and perfect that which concerneth us. We shall not always be what we are. Only let us see to it that we care intensely for that for which God cares.

SORTING REFUSE. (Photo: V. Jensen.)

(See "Dust and Ashes," p. 346.)

Ebal and Gerizim.

THERE are glorious sunsets to be witnessed, on occasion, even in London. Have you ever stood on Westminster Bridge when the air is luminous, and the very horizon seems aflame, and the western heaven is like a tender rose leaf melting into gold? In the forefront of the picture, more sombre, colossal and forbidding, by reason of the very radiancy of the background stands the great clock tower of the Houses of Parliament, the home of the Legislature of the vast Anglo-Saxon race. It is thus sombre and forbidding, that Law, even God's Law, looks, unless the eye of faith can pierce beyond it, to the vision of unspeakable glory, to the land of eternal calm. "Do the thing which is right; for that shall bring a man peace at the last."

The Power of Gentleness.

ON the south coast there is a small deep bay, with a precipitous pebbly beach. The water is deep up to the shingle, and there is a tremendous "under tow," as it is called, a current which would carry the body of anyone sucked down by it miles out to sea. An escape has hardly ever been known from this weird pool of danger and of death. But in the early part of the last century two ladies were walking along the shifting, slippery beach, and one of them fell into the water. For an instant she floated, before the awful "under tow" began its suction, and the corner of her Paisley shawl, which was fastened, in the early Victorian fashion, by a brooch, drifted towards the shore. Her companion could just reach the corner of the shawl. Had she pulled sharply, all must have been lost. Very gently, with a woman's life depending upon whether or no a fragile brooch pin would hold, she drew her friend to shore. The "under tow" was baulked of its victim. It is often thus in life. Not the most violent measures have the surest and swiftest result. In quietness and in confidence shines forth the hero's true strength.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from November 1st up to and including November 29th, 1902. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs' Fund: A CONSTANT READER of THE QUIVER, Brighton, 3s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: An Irish Girl, £1 1s., &c.; L. R., Newcastle, 5s.; Mrs. L., 5s. The following amounts have been sent direct: "Non Nobis, Domine," 10s.; J. S., 7s. 6d.; Lochalsh, 3s.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

25. In what manner did St. Paul commence his mission work in the various towns he visited?

26. What charge was brought against St. Paul at Thessalonica?

27. What is known of the Jews at Berea?

28. In what words does St. Paul set before the Thessalonian Christians the duties of prayer and thankfulness?

29. What ground have we for supposing that St. Paul intended his Epistles to be read in all the Churches?

30. Quote passage in which St. Paul shows how careful the Christian should always be in his daily conduct.

31. In what way did St. Paul prove to the Athenians that their idols could not represent the true God?

32. How does St. Paul refer to the origin of man in Adam?

33. What was the great difficulty which prevented the Athenians accepting the teaching of St. Paul?

34. What very important person was converted to Christianity by St. Paul at Corinth?

35. How did St. Paul at Corinth show his indignation against the Jews for their blasphemy and opposition to the Gospel?

36. What reason have we to suppose that Silas, the companion of St. Paul, died at Corinth?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 184.

13. Bethlehem, in Judæa, where Jesus was born (St. Luke ii. 11).

14. They sang and praised God because of the glory which such an event brought to God both in heaven and earth (St. Luke ii. 13, 14).

15. The shepherds were the first to proclaim the glad tidings of Christ's birth to the world (St. Luke ii. 17).

16. He was to be found wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger (St. Luke ii. 12).

17. "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live" (Is. xxxviii. 1).

18. God caused the shadow on the sun-dial of Ahaz to return ten degrees (Is. xxxviii. 8).

19. Hezekiah became proud and forgot all God's kindness to him, and thus brought down punishment both upon himself and his country (2 Chron. xxxii. 25).

20. The Jews were not allowed to give more than thirty-nine stripes (forty save one); but among the Romans there was no limit (Acts xvi. 23; 2 Cor. xi. 23, 24).

21. The law which commanded that no Roman citizen should be bound or scourged, and that no one should be punished without a trial (Acts xvi. 37).

22. Because, if a prisoner escaped, he would be put to death, and among the Romans it was considered braver to die by one's own hand (Acts xvi. 27).

23. That of joy. "Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice" (Phil. iv. 4).

24. "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God. . . shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 6, 7).

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A VENERABLE SOCIETY.

FEW Temperance Societies in the Midlands, if any, surpass the well-known Leicester Temperance Society in the extent and variety of the operations so successfully carried on. This historic association was founded so far back as October, 1836, and owes its origin in the main to the labours of that enthusiastic worker, John Hockings, "The Birmingham Blacksmith." He was most heartily supported by Mr. Thomas Cook, who subsequently became world-famous as the founder and organiser of "Cook's Excursions"; indeed, it is not too much to say that to Thomas Cook, his son, Mr. James M. Cook, and the members of their family, the Temperance movement in Leicester is under a debt of gratitude which can never be fully told.

AFTER SIXTY-SIX YEARS.

After sixty-six years one might be prepared to learn that things were getting a bit rusty. But the last annual report of the Society shows that this is far from being the case. The office-bearers to-day are Mr. John E. Faire, J.P., President; the Treasurer, Mr. Councillor W. Smith; the Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. Beckwith, and the Organising Secretary, Mr. J. Matson. The Society owns a very handsome and commodious Temperance hall, and during the year registered upwards of one thousand pledges, apart from the three thousand pledges taken in Leicester during the "Million Pledge Signing Crusade." Pleasant Saturday Evenings are a popular feature of the work, and the usual propaganda of conferences, public meetings, and open-air gatherings has been well maintained. Brewster sessions work and a watchful supervision of legislative enactments also claimed attention, and the circulation of Temperance literature, particularly at Christmas and the New Year's season, deserves to be mentioned.

A MODEL SECRETARY.

In Mr. H. Beckwith the Society has a most devoted Hon. Secretary. He has now been resident in Leicester about twenty-one years. He is the representative of the well-known firm of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons, of the railway bookstalls, in whose service he has been for forty-one years. He signed the pledge in 1868, and in 1870 he became Secretary of the Bournemouth Temperance Society. Upon his removal to Southampton in 1871 he became prominently associated with the Good Templar body, and instituted "The Dawn of Hope" lodge. Mr. Beckwith was associated in the arrangements for the first Temperance meeting under the Independent Order of Good Templars, in which Canon (now Archdeacon) Wilberforce took part. The Canon was not then an abstainer, but three weeks later he and his four curates also signed the pledge, and Mr. Beckwith became Secretary of St. Mary's, Southampton, Church of England Temperance Society. From Southampton Mr. Beckwith removed to Torquay, and he was the recipient of many parting gifts. Canon Wilberforce truly said: "One gallant worker, one indefatigable bearer of the standard for the people, we shall grievously miss. The calling of Mr. Beckwith to another sphere of work sensibly weakens us." At Torquay he was soon in harness again as Secretary of the Ellacombe branch of the Church of England Temperance Society. In 1881 he removed to Leicester, and it was not long before his energetic enthusiasm made a deep impression on the Temperance forces of the town. For nineteen years he has been Secretary of the Holy Trinity branch of the Church of England Temperance Society; he has been Secretary of the Leicester

(Photo: Walker & Harris, Leicester.)
MR. H. BECKWITH.

Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance; District Chief Templar for Leicestershire; and for eighteen years the President of the Leicester Convention of the Independent Order of Good Templars. Mr. Beckwith is a ready and able speaker. From the varied stores of his wide experience he is able to illuminate his addresses with many apt illustrations, and it need scarcely be said that his services are very much in request in the town and neighbourhood. One only marvels how he can sustain the constant wear and tear which his many engagements obviously entail.

A CAPABLE ORGANISER.

Mr. J. Matson, the Organising Secretary of the Society, has been connected with the association since 1889. He is a teacher by profession, and commenced his Temperance work as an agent of the well-known Leeds Temperance Society. From Leeds he removed to the south as a lecturer for the Southern Counties Temperance Association. His next appointment was as Organising Secretary for the Manchester Wesleyan District, and finally, as we have said, in 1889 he commenced his useful labours in Leicester. Mr. Matson's qualifications for his onerous work are of no mean order. He holds a first-class advanced certificate (South Kensington) in chemistry, physiology, magnetism and electricity, acoustics, light and heat, and hygiene. He is a very happy speaker and an ardent believer in open-air work. As a Wesleyan local preacher he is widely known and much respected, and in the ranks of the Good Templar Order (with which he has been connected for nearly thirty years) he is held in high estimation. The venerable Leicester Society is indeed fortunate in having two such earnest executive officers as Messrs. H. Beckwith and J. Matson.

(Photo: Saville & Co., Leicester.)

MR. J. MATSON.

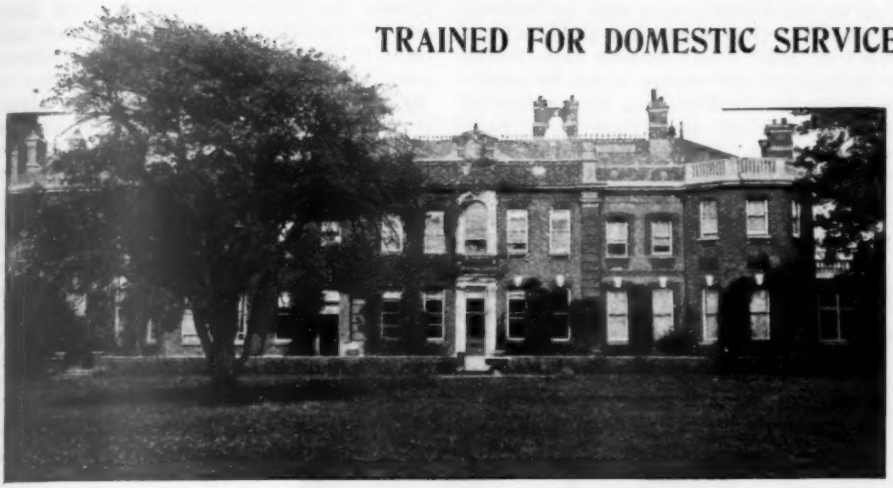
A CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

Our next selection of testimonies shall be culled from the opinions of some famous soldiers. Long before Temperance work had been organised in the Army, or before even the Army Temperance Association had been thought of, there were leading military men who enthusiastically advocated the claims of the Temperance movement. For example, General Sir Richard Dacres, K.C.B., in writing from the Crimea, January 17, 1855, said: "Since I became a teetotaller I have gone through great fatigues in hot climates. I have crossed the Atlantic, come here, been exposed to disease and some discomfort (not much, from my rank and situation), and I have never been sick or had even a short attack of diarrhœa. I ascribe this to water; but, mind, I am a temperate eater also; never eat animal food more than once a day; no lunch but a piece of biscuit; am a very early man. Now all these things combined enable me to do as much hard work at fifty-five as many ten or fifteen years younger. What I began with, as an example I now continue, as I consider I am much better without wine, beer, etc., both in a religious and worldly point of view. I shall continue as I am, please God, to my life's end." In the American Civil War General "Stonewall" Jackson was remarkable for his habits of strict abstinence. On one occasion, when very much exhausted, he was asked by a brother officer to join him in a glass of brandy and water. "No," said he, "I never use it: I am more afraid of it than of Yankee bullets!" Sir William Fenwick Williams, the heroic defender of Kars during the Crimean War, placed on record the following emphatic testimony: "I am indebted to a gracious Providence for preservation in very unhealthy climates; but I am satisfied that a resolution, early formed and steadily persevered in, never to take spirituous liquors has been a means of my escaping diseases by which multitudes have fallen around me. Had not the Turkish army at Kars been literally 'a cold-water army,' I am persuaded they would never have performed the achievements which crowned them with glory." When a soldier was brought before Sir Henry Havelock charged with drunkenness, the great general exclaimed, "You cannot be a good soldier and drink intoxicating liquor." Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, the present Commander-in-Chief, says: "From what has come under my own notice, as a commanding officer, I consider nothing is so advantageous for the well-being of a battalion, both morally and physically, as the establishment of a total abstinence society. Most of the crimes in the Army in India result from drinking to excess. Since the Temperance movement commenced the reduction of offences has been remarkable and the health of the regiment much improved."

XUM



"THE FAIREST FLOWER."

FROM THE PICTURE BY J. DOYLE PENROSE.

(See p. 446)

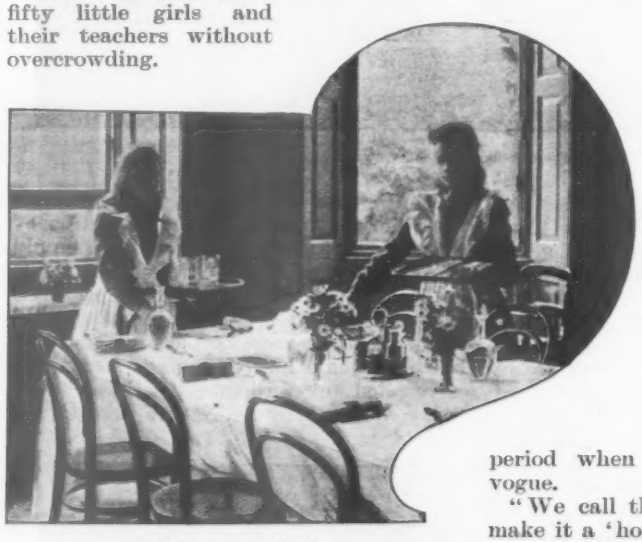
TRAINED FOR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

GORDON HOUSE SCHOOL, ISLEWORTH.

"SHE had tramped all the six years of her little life. She had never known the meaning of home."

The wanderings of the tiny tramp referred to came to an end when she reached the Gordon House School, Isleworth. The strong hand of the State arrested her and placed her under the legal control of the School Board. She happened to be one of a number of typical cases cited by the Lady Superintendent when describing the class of children in her charge. It is interesting to know what is the immediate result of bringing a young nomad of the town under domestication.

"For three weeks this little girl slept almost continually," the Superintendent said. "We tried to make her smile; but in all that time nothing—not even the sight of bright-coloured flowers that we brought to her—awoke any response. We have generally to teach the children who come here to laugh and to play. Their only idea of a game is the play they have seen between their fathers and mothers, which consists in knocking one another about, perhaps with a poker."



It is not surprising that weary little pilgrims, dragged from one common lodging house to another, always under the order that poor Joe, of "Bleak House" celebrity, dreaded, to "Move on," should want a long rest when they are made at last to lie down in green pastures. They require to lay aside premature old age with their rags of clothing and the burdens that hardship and starvation have piled upon them. A visible change comes over them as Nature asserts her right to childhood's rest and recreation, and they develop a distinct tendency to grow younger. Their former experiences are calculated to reduce them to impassive or sullen submission to authority. They imagine at first that they have been brought to the palace of the King or Queen. Their ideas can rise no higher. The great gate at the lodge is not locked, so they have no reason to suspect that they are being enticed into a gilded prison. Their education must proceed farther before they take in the history of the long red two-storeyed house which accommodates fifty little girls and their teachers without overcrowding.

(Photo: Byrne and Co., Richmond.)

"BABS," THE FIRST BABY RECEIVED INTO THE GORDON HOUSE SCHOOL.

FUTURE PARLOURMAIDS.

It was originally the home of Lady Augusta Gordon, from whom it takes its name. It became subsequently the residence of the Earl of Kilmorie. After his death it came into the market, and in November, 1897, it was opened by the London School Board as a Home for girls taken from dangerous surroundings. Up to this time the Board had no place for girls to correspond with the Shaftesbury training ship already in their possession for rescued boys. Old or middle age is very becoming to red brick, and the walls have gained the subdued ruddy complexion that Time imparts, and all hard outlines are softened by creepers. Never has the venerable building been so replete with vigorous youth. It has, indeed, overflowed, and a second house, known as "The Cottage," but large enough to take in twenty girls, has been built in the grounds. A large conservatory has been transformed into a schoolroom for those in the higher standards, and their lessons are favoured by light, air and warmth. A path leading from the outside door of this conservatory to the principal entrance looks down on an expanse of water flowing between low green banks. Rowing boats and steam launches give life and movement, and are bright spots of scarlet, white and other colours, against a background of grass and shady trees. The river Thames bends and branches gracefully at this point and gives an impression of a lake. The other side of the house turns its face on a terrace leading to a green lawn with a stone basin and fountain in the centre. Beyond is a park shaded by old trees, all looking well fed, well watered, and well loved, a tall velvety cedar towering above his fairer comrades. A stone alcove links the grounds to a period when classical objects were in vogue.

"We call this school a Home, and we make it a 'home' for the children as far as possible," the Superintendent said. "Very few of them have known any other. The parents of some are in prison. One of our little girls had been thrown down a staircase by her own mother. The stories connected with many of them are too horrible to tell you."

It is a wonder that so many little actors in the tragedies that are being continually dragged out in the ranks of crime should live to tell the tale. A large percentage die; but who knows for what useful purpose God has preserved the survivors, who are probably the strongest, and certainly the fittest, or they would not have been spared, for the battle of life? The new and original buildings together are supposed to take in seventy children; at the present time the rule has been stretched for them to receive seventy-

two. London has no lack of little citizens before whom lie the three great scientific possibilities—balance, elaboration and degeneration. Left to themselves, nothing but degeneration from the comparative innocence of childhood to the criminality of their parents must await them. Questions will arise whether such material is worth the cost of elaboration, and if children whose antecedents are bad must not succumb to the law of reversion to type when they leave the institution. The best reply is practical proof. The experiment of training them for domestic service in the Gordon House School and establishing them in situations has been tried, and has so far met with success. During the five years that have elapsed since the Home was founded there has been time to test the result of training on fifteen girls. Their photographs hang in the room of the Superintendent, who has been in the Home since its early days. Not one of them has failed, and not one has exercised her right at the age of eighteen to return to her former guardians, or, whatever the temptation may have been, to relapse into a life of freedom from restraint. Nearly all have gained the prize offered by the school to any ex-pupil who keeps her situation for a year and whose employer recommends her as bearing an excellent character. From necessity, the first to be equipped and sent out at the age of fifteen are amongst the number taken from dangerous associations at a more advanced age of childhood, and are therefore not the most promising subjects.

LESSON-TIME.

There are other natural laws as strong as heredity and reversion to type. Here is an opportunity for observing the variation produced by environment and domestication. Above all, here is the visible working of a Power higher than all Nature's forces. Religion is at the foundation of the education. There is every reason to hope that children trained in the love and fear of God will know how to choose the good and refuse the evil when the time comes for deliberate decision of their path through life. The vicar of the parish visits the school and gives them religious instruction. Half the number attend the parish church; the rest go to St. Margaret's. It is very probable that some pupils will never be molested by unsatisfactory relations. Two little sisters have been in the Home for two years without any visit or note of inquiry from outside. When they were admitted, the elder, a child of seven, was asked about her father's occupation. The information she was able to give went to show that he belonged to a contemplative order. She said that he divided his time between the "Eagle" and hanging over the parapet of various bridges.

The talk in the Superintendent's room was interrupted by an announcement that the doctor had called to see a sick baby. The poor little patient was discovered to have been suffering from tuberculosis before its admission, and was subject to frequent attacks of illness. The story of many such short lives possesses a serious moral and warning. To search the pedigree of inmates of the Gordon Home and of kindred institutions brings out the fact that intemperance is the most fruitful source of England's crime, and that this sin is visited on the descendants of drunkards in a tendency to disease. The younger the children who are removed to fresh air and wholesome surroundings, the greater the promise that care may build up their constitutions and wipe away all trace of the bad dreams of a past life from their memories. They are admitted between the ages of two and fourteen or fifteen years old. The Home Office makes a grant for the maintenance of each child over six; those under this age are supported by the London School Board, and at the present time there are seven little girls under its supreme paternal care in the Home. Mrs. Homan, daughter of Sir Sydney Waterlow, is the lady member of the London School Board who has made the Home the object of her interest and large-hearted practical sympathy from the very beginning.

MAY DAY AT GORDON HOUSE.

"You would like to see the babies? I will send for them," the Superintendent said, and within two minutes of the summons three trotted into the room together, with every sign of having great pleasure in accepting the invitation. The eldest, who had reached the mature age of three, was the first baby admitted, and the prerogative of seniority allowed her to retain the title of "Babs." She introduced the two others as Lalla and Mary. They were as friendly and kittenish as herself, but Mary had suffered from rickets, and had been quite unable to stand when her feet first touched the floor of the institution. Lingering wistfulness as well as confidence shone in her blue eyes. "Babs" took the younger child under her protection, and placed her dimpled hand under the little chin and gently raised the face when it drooped shyly. The present business in life of these babies was to learn the meaning of being cared for and the gladness of loving obedience. They were too young yet to adopt a more respectful title than "Auntie" for the Superintendent. At four years of age they would enter upon the dignity of school life. The code of lessons is the same as that used in all schools under the Elementary Education Act; but the ultimate object of fitting the girls for domestic service is always kept in view. It is there when morning breaks.

Six o'clock strikes, and the dormitories are astir. Several little faces beamed in assent to the remark that it must be very pleasant to look out of the windows on first awakening. They see the grand river flowing past at a stage of its career before being blackened by contact with the murky town. The elders breakfast at a quarter to seven; then, for the time being, all are parlourmaids or housemaids. The Home must be treated with the tender care that such a place deserves. A square hall with a marble pavement and an oak staircase pay for attention. Girls who have daily studied the fine art of brandishing a broom or flourishing a duster amongst highly polished surroundings will not feel like Newfoundland puppies in a china shop when they enter upon a superior class of service. Even their play-room, with its vaulted roof and ecclesiastical columns, shows no sign of suffering from rough usage. Quietly and surely, environment influences habits, and habits form character. The same little children who in slum life would acquire the method of using up the wainscoting and wooden banisters of their lodgings for fuel, or of breaking off water taps to sell as old metal, and the multifarious acts of destruction that starvation in unlovable shelters and the nearness of a pawnshop inspire, absorb, in new surroundings, a love and respect for objects that make a home and that smile under their care. They learn even to trip about noiselessly in their light strap shoes. Boots and shoes, by the way, are the only articles of clothing which are not made at home or in the day schools of the Board. They also learn how to get up their blue-and-white cotton dresses and the mysteries of the laundry generally.

(Photo: Byrne and Co., Richmond.)

READY FOR SERVICE: PUPIL IN GORDON HOUSE SCHOOL.

A COOKERY LESSON.

Autumn had already given a sharp but friendly warning of departure, and winter dresses of red, blue and green serge were ready to meet the cold weather. What would Mr. Brocklehurst, the Governor of Lowood, have said if he could have foreseen school girls of this class exempt from the mortification of a disfiguring uniform? What would he have thought of modern rules respecting hungry, underfed children?

"They are quite ravenous when they come in," the Superintendent remarks, "but the Board requires no stint of food. We use twenty-six quarts of milk a day."

She leads the way into the doctor's room, and points to various jars and bottles containing materials required to build up constitutions and repair the ravages occasioned by neglect. Cod-liver oil, lime water and chemical food are conspicuous amongst them. Pitiful stories might be gathered from the pathetic faces of children too recently received to have lost the effects of ill usage and shock. A little cot in the Superintendent's bedroom belongs to a baby whose nerves will not let her sleep well without the reassuring sense of her protection. The sigh or scream of the wind awakens the child; perhaps it recalls cries of human misery to her memory. A scared look or an expression of settled gravity in the eyes of one or two of the little ones in the garden who obey the summons of the dinner bell marks them as newcomers. They pass as we walk down the path to "The Cottage," from which a girl of eleven or twelve emerges. She is drawn up to her full height and carries a cake on a plate with an air of gratification.

"What are you going to do with that cake, Jane?"

"I have made it all myself," she replies, "and the teacher says I may take it up to the house to show."

She displays a cornflour cake, so professional in shape and colour that, as she turns it round to exhibit it from every point of view, it resembles a gigantic cork with an ornamental top. A lesson in scientific cookery has just come to an end. This morning girls in the fourth and fifth standards have formed the class, and with the legend, "Waste not, want not," staring them in the face from the kitchen mantelpiece, they are about to ensure the roast beef and Yorkshire pudding that they have been cooking against being thrown away.

"Whose turn was it to lay the table to-day?" the teacher inquired.

Two hands were raised.

"You two girls may take these ladies to see it."

IRONING.

They lead the way into "The Cottage" dining room. The table shines with highly polished spoons and forks, and is decorated with bunches of marigolds. Late autumn is not the best time for flowers, but the children's own garden plots can still boast of spots of flaming colour where the last dahlias of the season and their companions are just considering the propriety of giving place to the first chrysanthemums.

"These gardens are a great delight to the children," the Superintendent says. "They are eager to run out the first thing in the morning to see if a new bud has opened."

The opening of even the smallest flower is of interest in the little world to which it belongs. How much more the unfolding of infancy's bud as elder girls pass out into independent life! In the workroom they are just completing an outfit. The neat dark serge coat and skirt are not calculated to stamp the wearer as belonging to an institution. If dress has its influence on mind as well as body, it ought to contribute to self-respect. A girl for whom the outfit is designed looks up with a smile of intense satisfaction as she hears the remark that what seems to be a good situation has been found for her and she has been engaged at a wage of £10 a year.

(Photo: Byrne and Co., Richmond.)

A FORMER PUPIL OF GORDON HOUSE SCHOOL, NOW IN SERVICE.

THEIR OWN ROOM.

"That is very good for a girl of sixteen."

"Yes; but we think that the training given here makes her worth it. We have generally about thirty applications for one girl that we are able to send out, so there is no difficulty in finding places for them."

BUSY LITTLE HOUSEMAIDS.

Is the demand for servants to be always so far in advance of the supply? The material of which they may be moulded is not far to seek. It lies beneath the surface of the strata of London's respectability. The poet Rogers regards the Chinese as an amazing race partly because they are

> "From age to age resolved to cultivate
> Peace and the arts of Peace, turning to gold
> The very ground they walk on, and the leaves
> They gather from their trees year after year."

The Chinaman is, no doubt, an adept in economy, and is equal to teaching a native of a more up-to-date country how to turn material within his grasp to good account. Tea cultivators know that the young and tender buds and leaves which shoot out in the spring are of higher marketable value than any others. It is not as fully realised that London's streets yield a young and tender growth of human life worth cultivating and bringing under domestication. Hidden beneath the surface of society lies wealth which may be transformed into treasure in almost as great demand as tea and porcelain. For its own sake, the State has done well to follow the example of charities which have rescued thousands of little children likely to become a danger to the community at large. For their own sake, they ought to be saved from preventible suffering and from sinking into utter destruction. For the sake of God's glory, in Whose likeness they have been created, they must be sought out before His image is utterly defaced.

D. L. WOOLMER.

A FLAME OF FIRE

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,

Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–IX.

In the year 1587, the year before the coming of the Great Armada to English shores, Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, near Barnet town, having returned wounded from the wars, and having spent some time at his father's house, hears, through John Trenoweth, of Cornwall, that an old friend of his mother's is in the power of the Inquisitors of Spain. Being also desirous of finding out the Spanish plots concerning England, he determines to go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, of Cornwall, and John Trenoweth, in order to rescue the unfortunate lady, and to discover Spanish secrets. He therefore starts for Cornwall with John Trenoweth, and on his journey falls into the hands of Jesuit spies. Rupert Hamstead and John Trenoweth are accused by their fellow-travellers as Jesuit spies, but afterwards discover that they themselves are agents of Father Parsons. They at length reach Cornwall, where they are met by Mawgan Killigrew. Here they also come into contact with two Spaniards, whose behaviour is so suspicious that they decide to start for Spain secretly and without delay. The Englishmen leave England, and on first seeing the Spanish hills enter into a solemn covenant concerning their mission. They afterwards fall in with some Spanish gipsies, the young queen of whom greatly impresses Killigrew. She afterwards rescues them from Spanish officials, and gives them directions how to reach Toledo.

CHAPTER X.

THE EYES OF A GIPSY.

"ENGLISH spies, excellencies?" I heard the gipsy repeat.

"Aye, English spies. Do not try to deceive us. We know your tricks. You have them safe enough, for Pedro the shepherd saw three men come to you, and saw you guide them here. Well, we do not desire your booty, but we must have the men. Take all their possessions, if you will, but deliver the men up to us."

"But who be they, excellencies? I have but lately come to the camp, for I have been to Catalonia. Therefore what hath happened I may not know. Be they young or old, caballeros or rusticos? Be they men of the sword or baratilleros?"

"Nay, waste not time, nor seek vain parleying. They cannot escape, for we have men guarding the only entrance to this devil's kitchen. Neither think that you can charm us with your witcheries. We have two holy men here, who, if you seek to do us harm, have power to curse, by bell, book and candle."

"Far be it from me to oppose the will of my lords," replied Gaspar, with apparent humility. "As for the holy men, I pray them not to curse los pobre gitanos."

"Then do our bidding," replied another, in harsh, guttural tones, "for these men be not only spies, but heretics; aye, and heretics of the worst kind. The Holy Church can forgive poor heathens like thee, for neither thou nor thy people have yet been fully instructed in the one true faith. Wandering Ishmaelites as thou art, we may be lenient with thee until thou hast had more time for repentance. But these men come from a land where the light of the Gospel hath shone, and where a Christian Queen married our gracious King Philip. But they have departed from the faith, and have taken a usurping she-wolf to be their Queen."

"To work, to work, Santa Padre," said the one whose voice I had first heard. "This is no time for preaching."

"Nay, but I must to mine office," was the reply. "Besides, hath not our King given special command that every heretic Englishman shall be taken and tried, and, if unrepentant, burned, according to the laws of the Holy Inquisition, and for the glory of God?"

"Aye, but the fellows be spies."

"And heretics," was the rejoinder.

By this time both Mawgan Killigrew and John Trenoweth were awake, and at a sign from me each had drawn his sword and stood ready for action. Not that there seemed any hope of doing aught, for we were like rabbits in a hole. The cave in which we had entered to sleep was in no part more than ten feet across, neither was there height enough for a man to stretch himself. I had heard that the one means of escape was guarded, and therefore, as the hollow was filled with King's men, there was nothing for it but to be led prisoners whither they would. Not that I purposed giving in without a struggle. As Mawgan whispered to me, "Be they ten or be they fifty, we will give a good account of some of them before they take our swords."

Nevertheless, our case was desperate. We could not go out of the cave without walking into their arms, while, if we remained there, they would sooner or later find us out, and then we should be as helpless as a rabbit when a weazel gets him by the throat. Our only hope was in Gaspar the gipsy, and so I continued to listen, giving as well as I was able, the purport of their speech to my companions.

"What will you, excellencies?" I heard Gaspar say, presently.

"We will that thou bring them to us," said the man who was evidently a priest. "The night is clear, so we can watch that they do not escape; but mind, if thou in aught betray us, thy soul shall go unshriven to the fiends."

"Bring them to you, excellencies!" said Gaspar; "that I dare not. First, I have but just returned from Catalonia, and therefore, if they be here, I know not where they be lodged. Then, if they be such fellows as your excellencies describe, they will make short work of me."

"Besides," said the first speaker, "we will not let you out of our sight, for there is money in this night's work. So take us straightway to them."

"That I cannot do without first consulting my father, who—that is, if they be here—hath led them to their beds; follow me, excellencies," and with that I heard the sound of retreating footsteps. At this my heart beat loud with hope, for I believed that Gaspar had a purpose in doing this.

I was on the point of creeping out of the cave when I heard a low, warning sound.

"Eeneth," said Mawgan; "that is what the maid bid me say."

"Aye, my lord, but not aloud," said a voice, and I perceived that it was the gipsy who spoke. "But come quickly; the black crows called priests are near."

"But whither?" I asked.

At this she made no reply, save to take Mawgan's left hand, and lead him out of the cave.

"Follow!" she whispered.

We obeyed blindly, for we knew not what else to do, but each of us held his naked sword in his right hand.

A few seconds later we were groping along a dark passage, which, as far as I could judge, was cut out of the mountains. How long we were in this passage I know not, for I was too much wrought upon to take note of the time. Neither did we see aught, for we were in Pharaoh's darkness, and nothing could we hear but our own footsteps, and an occasional whisper as the gipsy maid spoke to Mawgan.

Presently a light appeared; not bright, it is true, although it seemed bright to us, and then we breathed freely again, for we saw the moon shining in the heavens.

"My lord hath gone by a way known only to my people," said the maid, looking at Mawgan, "and he is now safe."

We all looked around, and saw that we must have passed into another valley, for an entirely different scene presented itself. It is true the mountains still towered, but they were not precipitous; so sloping were they, indeed, that a sure-footed man might dare venture to climb.

"It grieves me much that my lord could not spend his night in peace," said the gipsy, and I noted that she paid no heed to anyone save Mawgan, "but we could not hinder the disturbers. His horse also he cannot have, for it could not bear him; but, if my lord will wait until the cloud passes over the moon, I will return."

With that she moved away from us, and a minute later was hidden by the great rocks which abounded everywhere.

"Said I not that the gipsies would befriend us?" said John Trenoweth. "I knew how they would regard that token."

And, in truth, it seemed that Gaspar had paid much heed to it; and yet, for the life of me, I could not help believing that Inëz thought not of John Trenoweth's token, but of Mawgan. However, I said naught, for the time was not for such thoughts.

"What shall we do without horses?" I said presently. "It is many a long mile to Toledo across the mountains, and without horses we shall be like a boatman without oars or sail."

Scarcely had I spoken than I heard the sound of footsteps, and in the light of the moon I saw three animals of some sort coming towards us; a minute later the gipsy maid appeared again.

"My lord must follow me until he reaches the top of the mountain," she said, and, still without giving heed to us, she led one of the animals up a steep, rugged pathway.

For my own part I seemed like one that dreamed, yet, standing before us were two mules, which, as far as I could judge in the moonlight, were in fair condition, and looked strong and enduring. So without ado we followed, leading the mules, and never a man speaking a word until we had reached the mountain ridge, where we saw a broad valley before us, and what seemed to us a track through it.

"Is my lord content?" said the gipsy, looking towards Mawgan.

"We owe our lives to you," said Mawgan, "and we thank you. But we must pay for these horses—that is——"

"If the stars tell their tale truly, my lord will reach Torrijos in safety," replied the maid, "and there he will find some of my people. If he will seek the chief, and show him what I will give my lord, he will give him good value for these animals, which he must leave with him. More I cannot do at present, but the moons rise and set again, and the moons also grow large and then become small again, so it may be that when my lord needs help, and he will cry aloud the word I have spoken to him, then may I be near. If that time comes, the horses which my lord leaves behind shall be bought for the sum which the gipsy chief shall give him."

And this the maid said slowly, and with much hesitation, for her knowledge of the English tongue was but small. Yet she spoke it prettily, while all the time she kept glancing shyly at the young Cornishman.

"And is Torrijos far from Toledo?" asked Mawgan.

"It is but a morning's journey," she replied, "and I pray my lord be full of caution, for my lord is what the priests call a heretic. Neither will it be well for him to ride a horse through the Wamba Gate, for by so doing he will attract watchful eyes."

At this she put a packet in Mawgan's hand, and turned as if to leave us.

"And will your friends be safe? Will the Spaniards not know that you have aided our escape, and take vengeance?" said Mawgan.

"Gaspar is not an unweaned child," she replied, with a touch of scorn, "and we do not live among these mountains for naught. The priests and the soldiers will rave, and tear their hair, but what of that? Gaspar will mourn with them, and laugh in his heart. He will arouse all our people, and give orders that search be made everywhere; but what then? The caballeros will threaten, and the priests will curse, and my people will pretend to tremble. But the nights pass, and the morrow always comes, and naught will happen save what must happen."

"And there is no reward we can give you?" I interposed.

"Yo no estoy una mendigo," she said haughtily, "and yet I would beg something of my lord," and again she turned to Mawgan: "some recordador, that, if the time comes when I can help him, I may send it to him, that he may know that a friend is near."

Whereupon Mawgan took a gold chain which he wore, and this he placed round the gipsy's neck, while I could swear that I saw the blood rush into her cheeks and her eyes burn like live coals.

"Adios," said Mawgan, using one of the very few Spanish words he had learned, and holding out his hand. "Adios, and may God reward you."

The maid knelt on one knee and kissed his hand.

"Va usted con Dios," she said, and I thought I detected a sob in her throat; then she added, as if doubting, "Si hay Dios." Then she turned to us. "Adios, señors," she said coldly, and turned away.

"Some time I hope to reward you for this," said Mawgan.

"I seek not reward," she replied, "that is——" and then she hesitated. "Keep always towards the midday sun," she said; "trust no man, and, still more, trust no woman." Then she left us, while we stood still, watching her, as she descended the mountain side. Once she stopped and looked back, and, seeing us, she waved her hand.

"Hasta lo vista," we heard her say, and then she was lost to sight.

For some time neither of us spoke nor made movement. In truth, I think each one felt as though he walked in his sleep, the which, I think, was no wonder, for the night had been a strange one. The time must be now early morning, and the moon was beginning to lower itself beyond the mountains which hid us from San Sebastian. Not a breath of wind stirred, and nothing could be seen save that vast range of mountain land which rose and fell like a great sea. Such a silence, too, as men seldom experience reigned over us, a silence which seemed to make a noise. Moreover, in the light of the moon the mountains looked ghostly, as though, indeed, they were not solid rock at all, and might presently melt away, like wind clouds, or the vapours which sometimes appear when the sun first peeps over the eastern hills. Everything was unreal. The evening among the gipsies, the dance, and the song seemed only phantom memories, while the coming of the King's men and the walk through the long passage seemed, as Will Shakespeare says, like that stuff of which dreams are made.

Presently Mawgan aroused himself.

"What said she?" he asked. "I did not understand her."

"She said, when going down the mountain side, 'Until we see each other again,'" I said.

"Yes, but before that, when I bade her good-bye?"

"She said, 'Go with God,'" I made answer.

"Aye, that is well. 'Go with God.' Let us thank God for delivering us."

The which we did, and afterwards we rode on in silence for many a long mile; in truth, scarce a word was spoken until daybreak, and then I noted, while John Trenoweth and I rode mules, Mawgan Killigrew rode a fine young horse. But neither did John nor I make remark, for, after all, it was not for us to raise a laugh because the gipsy maid had looked on him with love-lit eyes, and as a consequence regarded us as mere serving men.

I reckon that the clock of Hamstead Manor House must have struck eight, when presently we drew near a small hamlet, where we were met by a crowd of dirty children and ragged, ill-fed-looking men. To my surprise and delight, we attracted but little notice, and this I attributed to the fact that our saddles and trappings had a Spanish appearance. Neither did the way in which I spoke their tongue seem to arouse their suspicions. And the reason for this, as I afterwards discovered, was because the country hath many dialects. Thus a man living in the Basque hills, or in Catalonia, hath a speech which is strange to those who dwell in Andalusia.

Here we found an inn where we obtained not only food and wine for ourselves, but fodder for our beasts, and that without being asked awkward questions. I discovered, moreover, that there were many travellers who called at the village inns among the mountains, concerning whose business the people knew nothing.

I would gladly have remained here and rested after our experiences, but we reflected that the men who had been in search of us would naturally follow us, and it was our desire to keep free from them. We accordingly kept well to the west, so as to give them no clue to our whereabouts, and so good was the fortune that attended us that day followed day and night followed night without mishap of any sort befalling us.

Moreover, after we left the great range of mountains we found travelling easier, although perhaps less pleasant. In truth, the great plains were sad and weary beyond words. We never heard the birds sing, while laughter among the people was rare. Still, we had naught of which we could complain; especially when, at the end of the sixth day, a passer-by told us that we were no great distance from Toledo. We were in a valley at the time, I remember, and, the man seeming friendly, I asked him what kind of a city Toledo was.

"It is one of God's wonders," he replied. "Wait till you get to the top of yonder hill, and look: then you will know what I mean."

"And Torrijos?" I asked; "is that far away?"

"Torrijos is but an hour's journey,' he said; "a place of sties fit only for pigs and gitanos, but Toledo is the home of kings."

At this he passed on, never smiling nor looking back, while we climbed the hill before us. When we reached the top we stopped, and looked, but neither of us spoke a word. Beneath us but a little distance lay a squalid village, but away in the distance was the city which we sought to enter, and in which, although we knew it not then, God had willed us to have experiences which surely never happened to other men.

CHAPTER XI.

TOLEDO.

"FROM here Toledo seems but a castle,' said Mawgan, after we had looked at it some time.

"Aye, but it is many miles away," I replied. "When we draw nearer, it will reveal itself in its true proportions."

"It seems like a great prison," said John

Trenoweth. "But what of that? Esther is there, and something tells me she is yet alive. Let us hasten on, my masters, let us hasten on," and I saw by the glitter of his eyes that he could scarcely restrain his passion from bursting forth.

But we moved not. Somehow, the sight of the city held us as by a spell, for there was that about it which was strange. Aye, and more than strange: it was awe-inspiring. Perhaps this was because the shadows of the coming events had already fallen upon us, but more, I think, because Toledo is a place which, when once seen, can never be forgotten.

It stands on a great, rugged eminence, so rugged and so steep that ten men could forbid fifty an entrance thereto. Nearly surrounding it, moreover, is a great river, the waters of which are brown and fast moving, as though eager to get away into the broad plains, but which cannot for the great rocky gorges which form its banks. I was told afterwards that this same river, the Tagus, which empties itself into the sea at Lisbon, had in the past been coloured by the blood of those who had been killed within Toledo's walls, and that, although the great palace on the top is hundreds of feet above the bridge which spans it, the blood of slain victims ran into it like water rushes into a valley after a thunderstorm.

But at that time we knew naught of this. Stern and forbidding as the great grey walls looked that day, they bore rather an aspect of peace than of storm. The waters of the Tagus, which well nigh girded its base, shone like a streak of silver light, and the edge of the ravine on which the city walls were built told us of strength and security. That day, too, the palace called the Alcazar shone in the sunlight, while the spire of the great cathedral, surmounted by a cross, would have given us a feeling of confidence, did we not remember that the Spaniards had in the name of the Cross done deeds at which devils might tremble.

On the eastern side of Toledo we saw great,

"This he placed round the gipsy's neck."—p. 363.

broad plains, broken by hillocks, but on its west was fine and undulating country covered with olive-trees.

"Well, what think you?" said Mawgan, at length.

"Think?" I made answer. "I think that ere nightfall we must be behind those walls."

"Aye, and, once there, shall we ever get out again?" he said, like one musing.

"That's as God wills," I replied; "but remember Sir John Tremayne's daughter is there, and remember, too, that she is in the power of such as Señor Toledo. It's no child's game we have to play, Mawgan, especially when her own daughter is of another faith."

"Aye, and Esther is there," cried John Trenoweth. "Let us hasten on, my masters!"

Without further parley we descended the slopes of the hills towards Torrijos, which, as the passer-by had said, was but a squalid hole, the houses of which were no better than sties. Here, after some inquiry, we found the gipsy encampment, and presently we were led to the chief, who greeted us surlily, like a man in grave doubt as to our right to speak to him.

I discovered afterwards that he took us for King's spies, and for that reason the other gipsies kept their hands on the handles of the ugly knives they wore, as though determined to defend themselves to the very last. But all these disappeared when Mawgan showed him that which Inez had given him, and after we had haggled some little time about the worth of the animals we had ridden, and finally settled the matter, he became communicative.

"For some reason we have not been much troubled of late," he said, "but one never knows what may happen before the sun goes down. Sometimes the priests regard us as Moors, and then we be hunted like rats; then again they remember that we be gitanos, and they do naught but threaten. For some time now the Inquisition hath done but little, but report hath it that, because of this, infidels have become loud of speech, and as a consequence the Holy Church is taking steps to search them out, and bring them to their knees. But yesterday was Butuccio, my son, near Toledo, where he heard great news."

"What news?" I asked.

"It is said the Council of the Inquisition hath met at the church of El Cristo de la Vega, and have decided that some notorious heretics be burned before many suns have set."

"This may be but idle gossip," I made answer.

"True," he replied, "but when your excellency remembers that Butuccio saw men fixing stakes on the spot where the old Roman circus used to stand, and where all the Toledo heretics have been burned, it seems as though there may be truth in it."

This I told to Mawgan Killigrew and John Trenoweth, both of whom looked grave, but who, nevertheless, never dreamed of abandoning our project.

"We expected this," said John Trenoweth; "but by the mercy of God we have been protected so far, and it may be that He Who feeds the ravens may see to allow us to go back to England again when our work is done. Let us hasten on, my masters."

And this was his constant plea whenever we stopped at any place. "I tell you," he repeated again and again, "my Esther needs me, and if we do but loiter we may be too late. Ah! woe is me for leaving her uncared for all these years!"

"Doubtless," said the gipsy, "my lords have friends in Toledo, or they would never dare resort hither, especially as I am told that nearly all Englishmen are in danger of their lives in Spain. Perchance, excellencies, you know the English priest who, report says, hath great power in Toledo, and whose will is obeyed even by the Archbishop."

"What Englishman?" I asked; "what is his name?"

"Padre Parsons," replied he; "a man, I am told, much beloved by the King."

At this my heart felt as though a cold hand were upon it, for I knew that, should we but fall into his power, we were lost indeed.

"Moreover, if my lords would enter Toledo to-day," went on the gipsy, "it will be well for them to go quickly. For the Wamba Gate and the Puerta del Sol, by which they must enter, be closed at sundown, and it would go hard with any man who sought to enter afterwards."

Accordingly, we made our way to Toledo with all speed, no one of us speaking much, for men who know that they go to danger spend but little time in speech. Not that I think one of us shrank from our work. John Trenoweth's eyes still shone with that steely light which told me he would stop at nothing, while I knew by the way that Mawgan Killigrew pressed his lips together that not only did he expect danger, but he was prepared to meet it.

As we presently descended a hill which led to the river, the sight that impressed us most was the great cathedral, whose high tower hid even the Alcazar, the royal palace, built on the summit of the great rock on which Toledo stands. A little later one of the bells in the tower gave forth a death gong, which fairly made me shiver.

"By our Virgin Queen," said Mawgan, "but that is not a cheerful welcome."

"It is death, death, everywhere," said John Trenoweth; "but what of that, my masters? We must on!"

No sooner had we crossed the bridge than we saw how impregnable Toledo was. We now realised that the Tagus was far down below the city walls, while its banks were a mass of jagged rocks, which no man could climb, even although the city walls were not built upon them. The river, too, was deep, and its dark brown waters, now that we stood by them, did not shine as when we looked from the distance, but seemed sullen and forbidding, as though to tell us that the city was cruel, even as they were.

No man gave us speech as we climbed the hill towards the Puerta del Sol, which was the Spaniard's way for saying "The Gate of the Sun," neither did we notice aught that need disturb us. It is true that both men and women turned and looked after us, as though our appearance were strange; but of that we recked nothing. But when we came to the great wooden doorway our troubles began.

"Who goes?" asked the sentinel, who stood erect, holding his pike before him.

"Travellers, señor."

"From where?"

"San Sebastian," I made answer.

"You are not Spaniards?"

"No, señor, but we be men of quality, like yourself, and we seek to have affairs with men of quality."

He looked at us suspiciously, but I had spoken to him as though he were a caballero, instead of a simple soldier, and my courtesy pleased him, and he allowed us to pass.

"Now," said Mawgan, "we are in, and that right easily. I did not think we should be able to enter with so little ado."

"Evidently there be many travellers," I replied; "moreover, no one seems to look upon us as Englishmen. I verily believe that our boldness in making entry into Toledo, where we are hated so much, stands us in good stead."

"But we must never deny that we are English; mind that," said John Trenoweth sternly.

"That was our compact," replied Mawgan, "but, surely, there seems no need to deny anything. The streets are full of men who look as though they might be of different nationalities, and so we pass unnoticed."

And in this he spoke the truth, for the narrow streets were so crowded that, had we not kept close to each other, we should have surely lost one another; and this was to be avoided, for in such an event, ignorant of the city as we were, it would be no easy matter to discover the others' whereabouts. For the streets formed a perfect network, and were nothing more nor less than a mere maze, which curious men sometimes have made in their gardens to give entertainment to their visitors.

"And now to work," said John Trenoweth. "Near us is my Esther. My God! think of it! She whom I have loved for more than twenty long years, and whom I have not seen since that day that she left with Mistress Tremayne and Señor de Valencia, may be within a stone's throw of me now. Think of it, my masters!"

But, as may easily be seen, we could not set to work with the speed that John Trenoweth desired. Of necessity we were ignorant of all things in Toledo. No man knew us, nor had we an inkling of an idea where this or that man lodged. During our journey from San Sebastian we had not dared to ask questions. We knew that we were followed by those whose duty it was to take us prisoners. Evidently Señor Gomez and Masters Seyton and Belmont had discovered our departure from Falmouth harbour, and had sailed after us. By some means they had divined our road from France, and had come near to running us down. And this was not such a difficult matter as at first appeared, for there was scarcely another way by which an Englishman dared to enter Spain. Every Spanish port was closely guarded, and, as Englishmen were taken and dragged before the Inquisitors without parley, they knew we should not dare to enter by one of their harbours.

As matters stood, therefore, we had come to Toledo knowing but little, save that the Señora de Valencia and her daughter lived there, and that Esther Truscott had some little time before been with them as serving woman. That the Señora de Valencia and Esther Truscott were in danger of the Inquisition we also knew, for the story of Señor Gomez that both had embraced the Romish faith we had discarded. Moreover, before we left Arwenack Master Killigrew told us many things which to my mind destroyed for ever the thought they had so quickly changed their views.

Our first business, as I understood it, was to find a quiet house where we could lodge in peace, and then, as best we could, obtain information concerning the abode of the Señora de Valencia. But here I saw that we should be much handicapped. If the señora and her serving woman were known as English, and under the ban of the Church, the fact of strangers asking questions concerning them might easily arouse suspicion. And this we did not desire to do, for by that means we should be clapped into prison before you might count fifty. We must, therefore, go to work with great caution, and discover by roundabout means that which we desired to know.

"When we came to the great wooden doorway our troubles began."—p. 367.

It is true John Trenoweth's patience was much put to the test, but we made him see the reason of it all, and so, although he chafed like a young colt first broken to the bit, he settled down to our plans without more ado.

Now the matter of lodgings was a sore difficulty. If we went to an inn, we should naturally be exposed to the gaze of any who might be staying there. An inn is a gossip shop, no matter what country one may be in; and although one might learn the news of the city by mixing freely with men, the danger was too great. The other alternative was to seek shelter in some poor man's house, where we might have much privacy and yet ask many questions. But to find such a place was not easy, for, as is well known, the whole of Toledo was full of priests and priests' minions. They, indeed, ruled the city: so much so, that even Philip the King declared he was not King in Toledo, and moved his Court accordingly. But this I had heard. Many of the inhabitants of Toledo were Moors, and still hated the Spaniard and all his ways, although, in order to save their lives, they had disavowed their Mohammedan faith and accepted Christianity. It is true they were a lying, cruel people, but I reflected that we should be more likely to find shelter in one of their houses than by seeking to live with a Christian. In addition to all this, moreover, no Moor was allowed to be a servant of the Church, and thus would not be in communication with any who would give their thumbs to drag us to the stake.

After walking about the city some time, I spied a man, who, I was sure, was of Moorish descent, and who, by the pannier of food which he carried, I judged to be the father of a family. Without ado, therefore, I accosted him and asked him if he could direct me to the Calle del Pozo Amargo. This street I had seen near the cathedral, and which I knew was some distance from where we stood.

"It is not easy to find, señor," replied the man. "Still, if you go to the cathedral, and ask there, you can find a boy who will guide you thither."

"Ah, then, it is far," I replied. "I am sorry for that, for it is now well nigh dark, and I seek a place of lodging for me and my friends, and I do not wish to be far away from the Calle del Refugio"

This street I mentioned because it looked quiet, and because it was close to where we stood.

"You wish for lodgings?" said the man, looking at us steadily.

"Aye, good and quiet," I replied.

"In the Calle del Refugio?"

"Aye, if it be possible."

"And my lords would pay well?"

I shrugged my shoulders, after the manner of the Spaniards, and smiled.

"My lords be not Spaniards?"

"We have come here from France," I replied.

"In France a man doth not suffer because of his religion." This he said like one asking a question.

"Neither doth everyone swear by the Mass," I answered at a venture.

"Ah!" he cried eagerly. "But there is danger."

"Why?"

"The woman is my own sister, and although she hath so far escaped the Inquisition, it may be that a new search will begin any day. I have heard that the priests commence again, and that right soon. I am a Moor," he continued, after a pause.

After some amount of parley with the man, we agreed to let him take us to his sister's house, which he did; and although the place was poor enough, it suited our purpose, for no one asked us questions, while food and drink were provided without grumbling.

Here we stayed three days without aught happening. We asked as many questions as we dared, but nothing did we discover concerning the Señora de Valencia or her tiring woman Esther Truscott. It is true we learnt that many heretics would soon suffer the penalty of their sins, if they did not at once repent and believe, and that among those who would die "for the glory of God" were certain English, who had long been obdurate; but beyond that we could learn nothing of importance. I say we had asked as many questions as we dared, but this was not many, for the reasons which I have given.

This, however, we had done, and to it we owed, I think, something of our safety. We had each clothed ourselves in Spanish attire, and could thus walk abroad without attracting attention. It was long before I could persuade John Trenoweth to do this; but, our apparel being much soiled during our journey, we were obliged to obtain new, and, as that in the Spanish fashion was all that was available, we had to be content.

At the close of the third day the brother of the woman with whom we had lodged came to us much excited.

"Dark days are coming to us," he said.

"Why?" I asked.

"The Inquisition is to be in force again," he replied. "To-morrow the Archbishop is to preach in the cathedral, and it is freely said that he will proclaim against unbelievers."

"But thou art a believer," I said.

"I may not speak as to that," he replied. "But this I know: heretics are to be searched out, and the movement is to begin by a sermon to-morrow."

I had noticed during the day that a number of priests had come as if from long journeys, and that a look of great eagerness was on nearly every man's face. I said nothing to the Moor, however, although he remained long, telling me scraps of news he had heard. When he had gone, and we were alone, I told Mawgan and John what he had said, which, as may be imagined, excited them much.

"I will go to the cathedral," I said.

"So will I," said Mawgan.

"But not I," said John Trenoweth. "I will not be a witness to blasphemy."

The next morning Mawgan and I found our way to the great church, where we saw that a great multitude had gathered, and where the air seemed heavy with the atmosphere of momentous deeds.

CHAPTER XII.

I HEAR THE ARCHBISHOP'S SERMON AND SEE SEÑOR TOLEDO.

I SAY a vast multitude had gathered in the cathedral, while a steady stream of people kept entering on every side, so that we were steadily forced towards the high altar. And this in spite of the fact that it was yet early. No preacher had as yet entered the pulpit, although prayers were being said, and the sound of chanting was heard in various parts of the building. Although the weather was warm outside, and a great concourse of people had gathered within, the cathedral was very cold, so that I gladly gathered my cloak around me. And here let me say that, for pure grandeur, I have never seen this cathedral surpassed. That which may be seen in Seville is larger, but for perfect harmony of proportion and colouring, the cathedral at Toledo surpasses almost anything I have ever set my eyes upon. Our St. Paul's, in London, is but poor when compared with it, neither does it possess the power to create that atmosphere of awe and mystery which pervades this great building in Spain. Especially did we feel this when at length we found ourselves, as it were, in the very centre of the building, in full view of the high altar on the one hand, and the stalls which contained the choir on the other.

Here, moreover, most of the people were kneeling, though not all. For this I was thankful; otherwise Mawgan and I would have been singled out, and regarded with suspicion. As we became accustomed to our surroundings we were able to take particular note of those amongst whom we stood, and presently I saw, kneeling close beside me, one who chained my attention from the first. This was a young woman who, as I judged, could not be more than twenty years of age. What drew my attention to her was, I think, the fact that she was different from the rest who kneeled around. Her face was not cast in the Spanish mould, although she was evidently a Spaniard. I noticed, in spite of the fact that her head was partially covered by a peculiar kind of lace headgear, that her hair was not coarse and black like that of other Spanish women; rather it was fine and glossy, and, although it was very dark, there was a golden gleam in it. Her face, too, was not large and fleshy like those of the others, but of a more delicate nature, more like our high-born English women. And this was not all. Although she was kneeling, I judged she was taller and more slender than her fellow-worshippers.

I stood some time watching her, while Mawgan gazed round the great church. Presently she looked up, and our eyes met, and it was at that moment that I saw a face, the memory of which will never pass from me, even though I live to the age which the Bible hath it men lived before the great flood. And yet I cannot describe it, for it was, as it seemed to me, full of contradictions. That it was beautiful no man could deny, and yet it was the beauty of pride and disdain, rather than of sweetness and tenderness. But here again my pen falters, for while I write the words I remember that she made me think of my mother. And how could that be, if there were not in her heart something akin to the heart of the woman who had sent me away with her blessing? For their faces were not alike. My mother's eyes were grey and soft as those of a dove, while the eyes of this maid were well-nigh black, and flashed into mine with a suggestion of passion.

As our eyes met, too, I saw the blood mount her cheeks, which added to her charm, and made my heart flutter somewhat, although I could not tell why. It was only a single glance we gave each other, but I knew then that I should know her again—aye, and I was sure, too, that I had seen one I could never forget. Not that she made me feel kindly towards her. Rather my heart grew hard and bitter. Although I thought of her and my mother together, she made me feel that she was my enemy, and that at no time could she be my friend.

Presently she, with the other worshippers, stood up, and then I saw that she was much taller than the ordinary Spanish women, who for the most part are short and thick-set, moving somewhat clumsily, and with heavy footsteps. She, I say, was taller than the rest; moreover, she was more finely formed, and as she looked round she seemed like a queen, so stately and commanding was she.

She did not turn her eyes towards me again, although I could swear she looked at me from time to time out of the corners of her eyes, as though I interested her more than the crowd of Spanish caballeros by which we were surrounded. In truth, I was vain enough to think that this was owing to my great height (for I could give six inches to any man I saw there), or perhaps it might have been that my face was fresh and ruddy, and my brown hair was fine and curly, rather than stiff and straight like the Spaniards.

A little later, however, my attention was diverted from her, for the Archbishop entered the pulpit and began to preach, and, as the occasion was big with importance, I listened with all the ears I had. And this it was necessary for me to do, for, although I knew the Spanish tongue enough to converse therein, I found that listening to a discourse was a different matter. Many strange words were used, and because the sentences were long and involved, I had to pay great heed or I should have missed their meaning.

He began, I remember, by glorifying what he called "the one true Church," and spoke both in sorrow and anger of the heresy which had crept into her. He said that the Church had been kind and tender towards unbelievers, and not until heretics had refused to listen to reason had she exercised her power and used stronger means. From time to time, moreover, even in the midst of these acts, she had relaxed her severity and given sinners every opportunity to repent. But he grieved that this had been in vain; nay, the very gentleness of the Church had been used as an excuse for disobedience, and heretics had become day by day more stubborn. He grieved that one whole nation had gone away into lasciviousness and debauchery, even in spite of the fact that the Pope had during the reign of a gentle daughter of Christ and most Christian Queen taken his curse of excommunication from her, and given her his blessing. He referred to Mary, the late beloved wife of His Most Gracious Majesty Philip II.

"And now," he said, his voice swelling with passion, "that nation hath become apostate. She hath resisted all those efforts of Mary, and her faithful ministers, Bishop Gardiner and Bishop Bonner, to bring them back to the faith; nay, her people have even called these men by vile and hateful names. And, still worse, for more than twenty years she hath allowed herself to be governed by a she-wolf, a spawn of that vile Henry VIII., who sold his soul to gratify his carnal passions. But this must not be. Spain, the faithful child of the Church, must restore England to her rightful King, our own sovereign King Philip; she must cast that she-wolf into her filthy den, and bring back the people to those loving arms, without which England must be for ever accursed. Already hath his Holiness the Pope made that faithful and devoted churchman Father Allen a cardinal, and promised him the see of Canterbury. Cardinal Allen is also named Legate for England, and hath written his pastoral letter, which I will proceed to read to you."

Thereupon he read a letter which was written to the English people. This purported that retribution was not to fall so much upon the English people as upon the usurping heretic Elizabeth, the bane of Christendom, and the murderess of the souls of her subjects. Henry VIII., tyrant as he was, had fallen short in atrocity of his infamous daughter. Vengeance would fall on her at last. Ruin was now to overwhelm her, and the just of the earth would say, "Lo! this is she who took not God for her strength, and was struck down by the hand of the Most High." Elizabeth had overthrown the Church, profaned the sacraments, and torn God's priests from the altars in the very act of celebrating the holy mysteries. She had made England a sanctuary of atheists and rebels, and vampire-like she had enriched herself by sucking the blood of afflicted Catholics. Her chief favourite had murdered his wife, and him she had made her principal Minister.

After this the letter went on to call her the foulest of reprobates, and her Court the vilest of hells. The Church had excommunicated her, but she had despised correction, and now the time had come for vengeance. She must be overthrown, and the sty which England had become must be purified.*

"And who is to do this?" said the Archbishop. "It is we, my children; it is we who must hurl this infamous creature from her high place. We, the children of Spain, must rid the people of England from this great tyrant!"

As he said these things, my heart became more and more aflame with anger. I found my hand on my sword hilt, and had not Mawgan spoken to me I believe I should have cried out.

"What is the matter?" said Mawgan Killigrew in a low voice. "You look as though you are going mad!"

"Mad!" I cried. "The man is blaspheming; he is calling our Queen vile names; he says our English Court is a hell."

"Then cry against him!" said Mawgan. "As sure as I am a Killigrew I will stand by thee!"

But at this time I looked and saw that the Spanish maid, of whom I have been telling, was watching us, and I could swear by the look on her face that she understood what we had said. This moved me to caution, and, pressing Mawgan's arm, I bade him be silent.

As far as I could judge, no one else regarded us, so, turning towards the pulpit, I again listened to the sermon.

"Not only is the true faith being destroyed in England," he said, "but it is threatened in Spain. Even our own city of Toledo, beloved of God as she is, is the home of heresy. From time to time we have put down unbelief with a firm hand, but the vipers of unfaith have bred other vipers, until we can do no other than seek to destroy them all. The Holy Inquisition hath in these days been given power, and we must use it. To-day I give solemn warning from this sacred place that no unbelievers shall live in our see; the faith of every man and woman shall be inquired into, and the unrepentant shall suffer the penalty of their sins. Already is the Holy Council dealing with those who persist in the sin of unbelief, and we must continue our work until it is destroyed root and branch. And think not, my brethren, that we act in anger or in harshness. Nay, we act in love and pity. The Lord loveth whom He chasteneth, and the fires of the Church are lit in holy faith and tenderness. The body is nothing—the soul is all; therefore must we, if there be need, destroy the body that the soul may be saved."

This was in substance the sermon that I heard that Sabbath morning beneath the cathedral roof, and, as I have said, it aroused me to a mighty anger, and I had to strive with myself that I might be kept from proclaiming this man a liar and a false prophet.

But I did not speak, for as he finished his sermon I again looked towards the Spanish maid, and saw that her eyes were fixed on me.

*This is a correct summary of Cardinal Allen's letter, much of which is unfit for publication.—J. H.

I believed, too, that she read what was in my mind, and was angry with me.

"Let us go out," I whispered to Mawgan, "Presently there will be the elevation of the Host, at which every Catholic will kneel, and, if we do not kneel with the rest, attention will be drawn to us."

So we found our way with others out of the cathedral, and presently stood in the Plaza de Ayuntamiento, which was a small square, and where we could speak together freely. As well as I could I told Mawgan what the Archbishop had said, and watched him while his face grew redder and redder with anger.

"And we can do nothing!" he cried. "Oh, God, nothing!"

"We have come here to save the Señora de Valencia," I said, "and we will!"

"Give me your hand on that," cried Mawgan. "But we must fight warily. It is a marvel to me that we have not already been haled before these fellows."

As we stood there two Spaniards passed us, and as they passed we heard one say:

"The Council meets to-morrow, I hear."

"Aye, at El Cristo de la Vega. Methinks the Christ's arm will not move."

"Nay, that it will not. Even though it moved for a Jew, it will not for an Englishwoman, and a serving woman to boot. Why, report hath it she hath called the Inquisitors devils."

"Aye, I can well believe it. These English, since the she-wolf cub, Elizabeth, hath been Queen, care for naught, and believe in naught. Still the priests be getting mighty arrogant. It is said that even the King is afraid of them."

"Tush, man! and speak not loud. The search begins to-morrow, and every idle word will be remembered."

"Rupert Hamstead," said Mawgan, when I told him what they had said, "three days have we been in Toledo, and yet have we done naught. We have not yet discovered the señora's dwelling-place."

"Aye, but no harm is happening to her," I replied; "when heretics suffer they suffer in public."

"When they be burnt, aye; but what of their imprisonment—what of torture?"

"Let us move on," I whispered. "I believe we be watched."

Accordingly we walked slowly across the square, I looking furtively on the man who, as I believed, was keeping near to us. And what aroused my suspicions about him was, not so much the fact that he kept near to us, as the man's appearance. I remembered my father's description of Señor Toledo, and thought I recognised him. It is true nearly thirty years must have passed since my father saw him; nevertheless, what he wrote held good even then. The closely placed eyes, the narrow shoulders, the thin legs, the nervous springy movement—all corresponded with what my father had written concerning him.

"Who watches us?" asked Mawgan.

"I believe it is Señor Toledo," I replied.

I saw Mawgan's lips close as if by a snap, but he kept himself from doing aught rash, and presently, as the man walked away, I breathed again.

"He looks well nigh seventy," said Mawgan.

"No bite is as bad as an old dog's bite," I said.

"And he looks as though his fangs are sharp," replied Mawgan; "but let us get back to Trenoweth, and, by Cormoran, we must be careful we be not followed."

"Not yet," I replied. "Look, the people be coming out"; and I made my way towards the great door at the western end.

For some minutes I watched, but no one interested me; presently, however, my heart leaped within me, for, passing through the doorway, I saw the maid whom I had noticed during the sermon.

Whether she saw us or no, I cannot tell, for although she looked not towards me, I thought I saw her eyes flash, and her face flush as if with anger.

"Who is that beauteous lady?" I said to a young Spaniard who stood by my side, nodding towards her.

"The Señorita de Valencia," he replied.

"Ah! she comes from Valencia?" I said, carelessly, although God knows I spoke with a fast-beating heart.

"Aye, and no," he replied. "Her father's family were of Valencia originally, but the lands came not to him. He was of Toledo, and lived here."

"Does he not live here now?"

"You cannot know Toledo, señor," he replied, "or you would have heard of his death, some little time ago. He married an English heretic, who was forgiven her heresy for his sake, but now that he is dead she hath fallen under suspicion. Indeed, report hath it that she is closely imprisoned, and her time of repentance is fast coming to an end.

"And the señorita, is she a heretic?"

"Nay, by the Mass, no. She hateth her mother's sin, and some say her mother also. But that may not be. She hath but lately come from a convent, and since her father's death hath but seldom seen the señora. But "Whether she saw us or no, I cannot tell."

the señorita is as much a Catholic as the Queen after whom she is named."

"What, Isabella?"

"Aye, Isabella, that is her name, and report hath it that she abets the priests in their determination to bring her mother to the stake if she will not repent. It is hard to believe, but she is half English, and hath a temper."

"Lives she with her mother?"

"Nay, since her father's death she hath been placed in charge of the Archbishop's counsellor and his secretary, Señor Toledo."

"And he is, of course, a strong supporter of the Church?"

The young Spaniard shrugged his shoulders.

"Sabe Dios," he replied. "This, I know: Señor Toledo is for himself. He hath great power, and so men fear him, but no man loveth him."

"What is he like?"

"Like an eel, señor, long and narrow; aye, but a serpent would be a better simile, for he hath the tooth of one—aye, and the strength of one, too."

"And lives he near the Archbishop's palace?"

"Nay, but in the white palace at the east of the Alcazar."

"Come," said I to Mawgan, when the young Spaniard had departed, "let us hie to our lodging-place. But we must watch, man, we must watch."

"Have you heard aught?"

"Much," I replied, "but we must be wary."

We made our way through the crowd, and for the first time in my life I grieved because of my height; for, being of great stature, I could be singled out with ease. And this was also true of Mawgan, and especially was it true among the Spaniards. For they be a short, squat race, very few of them rising to anywhere near six feet in height. Still, we mingled freely with them, and when presently we left the open space we took as many turns as a hunted fox, darting up one narrow street and down another, and thus going a long distance before we reached the Calle del Refugio.

Arrived there, we had a long council of war, for I told John Trenoweth and Mawgan Killigrew all I had heard.

"As for this Isabella, we have naught to do with her," said John Trenoweth. "Sir John Tremayne's daughter we will save, if God gives us grace, and my Esther must be saved, too. Remember that, my masters!"

This he had said many times, and became half-mazed because we had not yet discovered where she was.

Our dangers, too, were increased—or, at least, so I feared. For I could not help believing that the man I had seen was Señor Toledo; and, if that were so, we walked on a sword edge. Men told me I bore a strong likeness to my father; indeed, some went so far as to say that I was the exact image of what Sir Richard Hamstead had been when he was twenty-four. If that were so, Señor Toledo would have recognised me in spite of my Spanish attire, and would make his plans accordingly.

But we had not come to Spain without counting on this, and we walked Toledo streets both that day and the next, seeking as best we could to find the prison of the Señora de Valencia. In this, however, we were unsuccessful; but on the Tuesday morning the Moor came to us, his eyes fairly ablaze with excitement.

"It hath begun, my lords!" he cried.

"What hath begun?"

"The Inquisition. To-day at noon, in the Circo Romano, an Englishwoman is to be burned."

"Who? The Señora de Valencia?"

"Nay, that is not her name. She hath been her tiring woman."

But this I did not tell John Trenoweth, for, in truth, I was afraid to do so.

"It was so decided at El Cristo de la Vega yesterday, and even now the people have gathered in the Church of San Juan de los Reyes."

"Come," I said to my companions, "it is said that an English heretic is to be burned. Come!"

"Where?" cried Mawgan and Trenoweth in the same breath.

"At the Circo Romano," I replied, "but they are even now in the Church of St. John of the Kings."

At this, both Mawgan and John Trenoweth looked to their weapons, and then we three walked away together. No word spoke we, for I believe that their mouths were hot and dry, even as mine was. And yet my heart beat not more quickly than was its wont, while my sinews seemed like steel.

But I did not know then of what I should see and hear before the sun went down.

[END OF CHAPTER TWELVE.]

PICTURES OF THE PARABLES.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

By Arthur Fish.

(Photo: X., Paris.)

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(From the Painting by Rembrandt van Rijn, in the Musée du Louvre.)

THE story of the Good Samaritan, one of the most beautiful, most pathetic, and most "telling" of the Gospel stories, has been the source of universal inspiration to artists. It contains so much incident, movement, and force that it affords full opportunity for the display of artistic skill in its pictorial treatment. It was one of the first of the parables to be illustrated by the early painters of Italy, and it has appealed for treatment to many of the great artists of subsequent periods. The illustrations to this article show the range of its pictorial history: the earliest—that by Ponte—dates from the beginning of the sixteenth century; and the painter of another, Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., is still living. Each is different from the other, and yet each is illustrative of the story: painted in different lands, under different artistic influences, in different ages, and in different methods, yet each inspired from the same source. Each artist, indeed, was under the charm of the wonderful story told in response to the would-be justifier of self who propounded the question, "And who is

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(From the Painting by Jacopo da Ponte, in the National Gallery.)

to-day, all appeal universally. Each was executed in its day for local purposes and appreciation, but all the civilised nations of the world make treasures of the work of old-time artists, and vie with each other for the possession of the work of each other's master painters. Michelangelo, Raphael, Rembrandt, Velasquez: does it matter what they were—Italians, Dutchmen, or Spaniards? They were artists, and as such find appreciation all the world over. Their nationality attaches honour to the land of their birth, but lends no additional glory to their names.

The painting by Jacopo da Ponte—or, as he is called, de Bassano, after the city of his birth—hangs in our National Gallery, for which it was purchased in 1856 for £241. Arrayed in a crimson dress, the Good Samaritan is raising the wounded man to place him on his mule, which is standing in the immediate background. On the ground stands a silver flask from which refreshment has already been administered. In my neighbour?" Told to the Jews of Palestine, who appreciated to the full the distinction between themselves and the Samaritans, it has lost its local application, and has become universal in its appeal and influence. And so in its pictorial treatment: locality is not a necessity for its illustration. Not one of the artists whose work is given here ever saw the road between Jerusalem and Jericho: in some cases they have not bothered about Eastern costumes and environments; in one at least—that of Rembrandt—the whole story is transferred to the artist's own country and time; but we feel no sense of anachronism—it is the story of the Good Samaritan still. It is testimony at once to the universal power of the story and to its universal adaptability.

Art, too, has no nationality, and is for all time, as these pictures sufficiently testify. The work of the sixteenth century Italian, of the old Netherlandish painter, of the English and German artists of

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(From the Picture by W. M. Craig, in the City of Nottingham Art Gallery.)

XUM

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(From the Picture by B. Plockhorst. By permission of the Berlin Photographic Co.)

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(By Sir John E. Millais, P.R.A. By permission of H. Virtue and Co., Ltd.)

the immediate background is the figure of the Levite, busily engaged in prayer; further away in the distance is the receding priest. Beyond them both is a beautiful Italian landscape, stretching away to a far distant range of hills. It is the earliest picture of our series, but by no means the least beautiful.

The artist was born in the city of Bassano in 1510, and was educated by his father, himself an artist. But it was in Venice that he learned most of his art—Venice, the home of the greatest school of colourists. He was contemporary with Titian and Tintoretto, two of the greatest of the Venetian school of painters. When his father died Ponte returned to his native village, and it was there that he painted most of his pictures. He painted his finest work—a "Nativity"—for the church there; but the greater number of his pictures are representations of village life, and he was the first Italian artist of note to deal with such subjects. The illustration of New Testament incidents and stories afforded him subjects in which to introduce his local models and studies. The other picture by him in the National Gallery, "Christ Driving the Money-changers Out of the Temple," contains a crowd of figures, most of which are evidently painted from the people living near the artist. Animals, too, he loved to paint, and it will be seen that two dogs are introduced into the picture of "The Good Samaritan." Ponte died in 1592, at the good old age of eighty-two.

Next in order of date comes the great picture by Rembrandt, the original of which hangs in the Louvre. Painted in 1648, it must be esteemed one of the finest examples of the great Dutchman's work. Original in everything he executed, Rembrandt's rendering of this subject is totally different from that essayed by any other artist. He has chosen the moment of the arrival at the inn of the Samaritan and his helpless charge as the subject of his picture. Full of movement and life and colour, it yet contains passages which reveal the power of Rembrandt as one of the greatest painters of all time. The wounded man is being borne into the house by two servants—his attitude one of suffering and quiet endurance. On the steps of the inn, clad in a garment of yellow, stands the Samaritan in the act of handing his purse to the hostess. The whole is a wonderful illustration of the passage, "Brought him to an inn, and took care of him." The curiosity of the boy standing on tip-toe, the interest of the onlookers, the pathos of the central group, all testify to the skill of the painter in his rendering of the scene. It is evident that Rembrandt himself loved the subject, for this is but one of three pictures he painted of it—one of the others is in the Wallace Collection—besides several drawings.

The life of Rembrandt is a romance, as full of vivid lights and dark shadows as are his pictures. Born at Leyden in 1605, he was the son of Harmen Gerritz, a miller, known as Harmen van Rÿn (of the Rhine). The determination to become a painter was early fixed in his mind, and, his father consenting, he was placed first with Swanenburch, and then with Lastman of Amsterdam. His early efforts were all centred on depicting the life around him. His favourite model was his mother, of whom he left countless representations in etchings and paintings. When he was twenty-six he was so far advanced that he established himself in Amsterdam, where the remainder of his life was spent. Success was rapid, and he became a rich man. In 1634 he married Saskia van Uylenborch, who brought a considerable fortune with her. Their life was happy and successful until, in 1642, Saskia died, leaving her infant son Titus. It was at this time, and during the years immediately following, that Rembrandt painted the greatest of his religious pictures. In 1656 he was declared a bankrupt, and evil days set in for the artist. He wandered about Amsterdam, obtaining temporary quarters in inns and lodging-houses—and yet he worked the whole time—until 1661, when he once again had a house of his own. In 1668 his son died, and the next year Rembrandt himself, poor and old, was carried to the grave, leaving nothing but "his clothes of wool and linen, and his working instruments." Unappreciated and unnoticed at his death, his fame has passed down to us in his work, and among the painters of the world his is one of the foremost names.

Of the four modern pictures little need be said. The drawing by W. M. Craig, in the Nottingham Museum, is one of a series of Biblical subjects executed by this artist. The drawing by Sir John E. Millais is one of "The Parables of our Lord" series to which full reference was made in a recent issue of THE QUIVER; and the picture by Herr Plockhorst, a modern German painter, needs no comment.

There remains but the picture by Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., the noblest of the modern representations of the subject. The position held by Mr. Watts in English art is unique. The wonderful sermons in paint—for he is as great a preacher as painter—which he has bestowed so generously upon the nation will take rank among the great pictures of all ages. "The Good Samaritan" is one of his early pictures, and was presented by him to the Manchester Art Gallery as long ago as 1852.

(Photo: Manchester Wood Engraving Co., Ltd.)

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

(From the Painting by G. F. Watts, R.A. By permission, from the Picture in the City of Manchester Art Gallery.)

DANIEL: THE GREAT STATESMAN

By the Rev. Canon J. McCormick, D.D., Rector of St. James's, Piccadilly, and Hon. Chaplain to the King.

"O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yea, be strong."—DANIEL x. 19.

TWICE over Daniel, the statesman, is called "greatly beloved"—called by one who is thus described: "A certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz: his body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude." If it be asked, "By whom is the statesman loved?" the answer must be, God, the great Creator and Ruler of the universe. How delightful! Surely it should be the high ambition of every statesman to gain such a title, to win such an approval. God's favour is better than life.

And yet it may be that there are statesmen who do not go to God's Book to know what ought to be the principles, the policy and the becoming and necessary features of their own characters.

Charles Kingsley would take them to Daniel. He says: "I would advise all of you who wish to understand God's dealings with mankind to study the book of Daniel, and especially at this present time." Bishop Wordsworth writes concerning Daniel: "He teaches men how to read aright the history of the past, and to interpret the great events which are passing before their eyes, and prepares them for greater things to come, even to the end of time. He also instructs them, by precept and example, how to live and move even midst the active business of public affairs so as not to be distracted by it, but to cherish an inner, hidden, spiritual life; even in the thickest crowds of this world, and in its most stirring strifes and struggles, to preserve calmness and quietness, and to hold communion with the Unseen; to remain steadfast and unmoved amidst the shocks of political revolutions, and to have the windows of the heart ever open to the far-off peace and glory of the Jerusalem that is above, and, while still sojourning as exiles and captives upon earth, to have their conversation in heaven."

Now I boldly assert that Daniel's is not a cleverly invented character, nor is his book a fascinating piece of fiction. His principles and conduct are too grand and resplendent to be the concoctions of some deceitful and dishonest mind. You and I would think it strange to represent God as loving a speculation or a phantom. What sort of a man, then, was this who received the stamp of Heaven's favour, and who is considered the model statesman?

I. I lightly touch on his training.

By birth he was an aristocrat; and this is no slight circumstance, for in our own country to-day many who occupy the highest ranks of life devote their talents, energy, and wealth to those political and philanthropic measures which have to do with the national welfare. No nation is so distinguished and prolific in voluntary service. And, without directly or by innuendo, disparaging other persons or classes, it is a matter of history that the greatest philanthropist our country has ever produced, who did most for the alleviation of suffering and for the social, moral, and religious welfare of the working classes, was an aristocrat of aristocrats—the late Earl of Shaftesbury.

Though Daniel was an aristocrat in his own country, he was now a slave at a foreign court. He was carried off to Babylon when only fourteen years of age, and he rose to the position of prime minister of the then greatest kingdom on earth. Over that kingdom he exercised an influence, off and on, for some sixty years.

As Moses was trained in the schools of Egypt, and became learned in the wisdom of that remarkable country, so Daniel was acquainted with the advanced knowledge of the Chaldeans, their astrologers and their sacred scribes. "In all that concerned the movement of the heavenly bodies they were the teachers of Egypt and Greece." From Herodotus we gather that the Greeks learned from Babylon the pole, the sundial, and the division of the day into twelve parts. The first eclipse on record (a lunar one) was accurately observed at Babylon on March 29th, 721 B.C.

Daniel, therefore, was no ignoramus, but had his mind stored with useful knowledge.

II. To mental capacity was joined moral virtues and graces.

There can be no doubt at all that Daniel was guided by the very highest principles.

It is clear from the history that he was distinguished by self-control, that virtue so often commended in the New Testament. He was master of himself, of his mind, of his affections, of his appetite. He held himself, so to speak, well in hand. Character goes for something to-day in our Houses of Legislature. The gifts of eloquence are of little avail if there be a known absence of self-control in its widest sense. Allied with this virtue was Daniel's reticence. He knew when to speak and when to be silent. His silence before Darius was a telling condemnation of the unjust action of the king. It is said of a late Prime Minister that he never attacked small men; and when asked for an explanation concerning a particular member of Parliament, he replied, "He has the advantage of my silence." Daniel, too, could speak when necessary with great power and effect, as he did to Belshazzar. Pitt's defence of himself against the attacks of Walpole is a part of imperishable history.

A third virtue exhibited by Daniel was his integrity. In an earlier chapter (vi. 4) we read: "The presidents and princes sought to find occasion against Daniel . . . but they could find none occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him." So is it with our magistrates, judges, and ministers of the Crown in their public capacity. Statesmen sometimes possess secrets of statecraft and policy which, if used to their own ends, might result in enormous gains of personal wealth. But, in modern times at any rate, bribery and corruption and self-aggrandisement have not been known among our magistrates or the responsible ministers of the Crown.

Another feature that distinguished Daniel was his courage—not ordinary courage, such as men exhibit in facing political difficulties, but the courage of a slave and a captive, whose life was at the mercy of the monarch; the courage of acting in the fear of God, in the face of ignorance which had cruelty attached to it, of religious bigotry, of prejudice and jealousy and even hatred—the courage that is not ashamed of God or of His religion.

Our statesmen in the past have exhibited it: as Cranmer did in the great debate in the House of Lords; as Mr. Wilberforce did in the House of Commons; as Lord Shaftesbury did in both Houses. If it seems to be wanting to-day, it is because the Legislature is no longer distinctly religious, and courtesy—perhaps a mistaken courtesy—leads to reticence. God's name is very rarely heard now in our Houses of Parliament, and action based upon the authoritative principles of a Divine revelation is seldom asserted.

But such courage, in Daniel's case, was based upon undoubted piety. When it is not so, it is either braggadocio or cant.

III. I pass on now to Daniel's relationship to the reigning monarchs.

How many he had to deal with we do not know, but four are specified—Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Darius, and Cyrus, the first and the last being amongst the wisest and most powerful rulers of the ancient world. Daniel never speaks harshly of Nebuchadnezzar. His were the sins of a heathen king—he was proud, autocratic, dictatorial. He considered that he was equal to any god. A great conqueror, he held life very cheaply, and ruled according to his own will. Daniel seems to have regarded him with respect, and even with affection. I do not think his language when in his presence could be designated "the empty phrases of court flattery." As heathen kings went, he was a good king.

Belshazzar, who was probably his grandson, lost all the advantages of Nebuchadnezzar's strange experiences; ignored Daniel, probably the wisest statesman that ever lived; and acted as another Rehoboam. The story of his disgraceful banquet is painfully dramatic. Nothing can be finer than the entrance of the aged and dignified Daniel after what seems like the seclusion of fifteen years. After the shouts of fear and the general tumult, resulting in the appearance of the queen-mother, came the calm and dead silence as the great minister delivered what may be termed his judicial and condemnatory charge. The king is told of the great advantages he possessed, and of his wilful neglect of them; of his sins in the face of despised knowledge; and of his terrible doom.

Darius, on the other hand, knew Daniel's worth, and seems to have regarded him with affection. Trapped into an action of cruelty, no one is more rejoiced than he is at Daniel's deliverance and safety. We can scarcely conceive that Daniel had any serious differences with Cyrus—a subject of prophecy, mentioned by name, and one who apparently admitted the over-ruling providence of the God of the Jews. It may have been through his great statesman's influence that Cyrus allowed and encouraged the restoration of the Jewish captives to their own land. But what we are concerned with is this: that—no matter whether the monarch were the autocratic Nebuchadnezzar, or the wilfully wicked Belshazzar, or the friendly Darius, or Cyrus, the man of destiny—Daniel under each and all exhibited those resplendent virtues which have been specified, and set before mankind the principles and policies of the true statesman. He is the model for all politicians to copy.

The statesmen of to-day, no doubt, have their special difficulties, but they are as nothing compared with those of a slave-minister at a heathen court. If at such a court Daniel could lead a consistent, holy life, and be loyal to his God as well as to his king, how much easier is it for statesmen in a Christian country to do the same! Here there is a general regard for religion. Here the surroundings are not hostile to Christianity. Here consistency and high principle win—yes, command—respect and admiration. And there are opportunities, in relation to education, to the observance of the Lord's Day, to fidelity to the truth, and to morality, when wisdom and courage and equity should come into play, and when character may be both exhibited and tested. The example of Daniel will then be of no slight service.

I give it as my own deliberate opinion that belief in the over-ruling providence of God is essential in true statesmanship. Agnosticism is out of the question. The history of Israel, the book of Psalms, the writings of the Prophets, teach clearly that God is the God of nations as well as of individuals. Kings reign by His will, and are bound to uphold true religion; and those who serve under them must honour Him and carry out His will.

In order that they may do this properly, they, like Daniel, must be men of piety, devotion, and prayer. They have again and again to face difficulties and perplexities, and they need the wisdom that cometh from above, which is promised as an answer to believing supplication. Can any sober-minded person for one moment suppose that Daniel could have been so able and successful a statesman, so upright in all his conduct, so courageous when persecuted and threatened with cruel death, so calm before vindictive enemies and in the presence of State complications, if he had not been a man of prayer? No doubt, in his case, "much prayer saved much time." Busy as he was, it was his habit to pray three times a day; and some of his petitions are on record, and reveal the splendour of his mind and the disposition of his affections. Like Moses, he was a meek man; like Solomon, he was a wise man; like St. Paul, he was a brave man, and in the certainty of persecution and threats he could have said, "None of these things move me." I myself do not for a moment believe that he could have behaved as he did, and have exhibited such resplendent virtues, if he had not by earnest supplication obtained needed blessings at the throne of grace. I care not who the statesman is; I care not what gifts of learning or eloquence he may exhibit; I care not what business capacity he may possess; I care not what popular approval he may win—he will never be in the highest sense a good statesman unless he lives in the fear of God and holds constant fellowship with his Creator and the God of his salvation.

It follows also that a good statesman must primarily aim at the glory of God. This result is the end of human existence. The charge Daniel brought against the sensual, worldly, irreverent Belshazzar was as follows: "The God in Whose hand thy breath is, and Whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified." Because God's glory was not his settled purpose, he was no use, so to speak, to his righteous Lord, and therefore he suddenly perished.

It may be that some politicians enter Parliament without any such holy ambition. It may be that there are gigantic struggles for office with no such purpose in view. It may be that great gifts are expended upon merely secular questions, in what I may call a secular way. But statesmen of this class can never be favourites of Heaven, nor win the respect of their own age or of posterity, as Daniel did. Their very success may confirm them in worldliness and practical infidelity. The homage of admirers may seem to be the approval of an unsatisfactory line of policy. But he is a wise statesman who considers again and again whether his public action is and can justly be considered such as to please his Lord and Saviour and his future Judge.

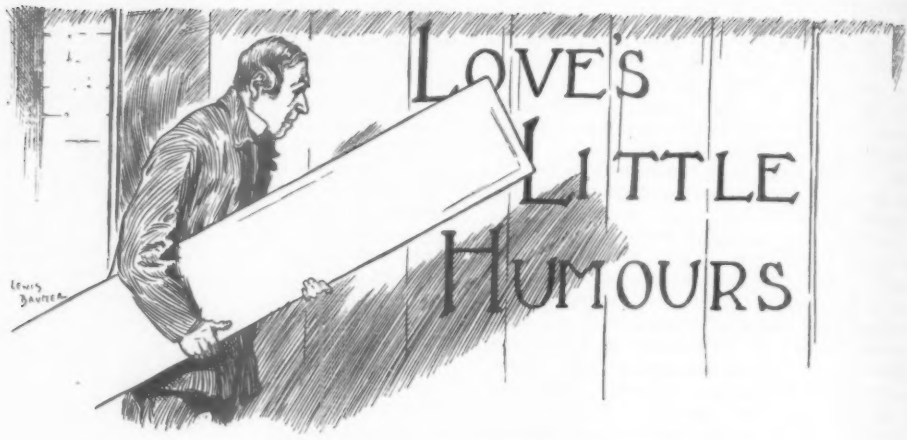
I know some of the difficulties of public life. I know how easy it is for the secular spirit repeatedly to assert itself. And it is this knowledge which makes me desirous that our politicians, to whatever party they belong and whatever rank of life they occupy, should seek and gain that grace by which alone they can glorify God.

But, in spite of all dangerous tendencies and influences, what enormous privileges they enjoy! No one supposes that Daniel sought office for the sake of office. No one imagines that he plotted and schemed to obtain it. No one can conclude that he used his position for any selfish end. No one is of opinion that he lived for fame, or that he ever dreamt that his godly example would extend throughout all time. No, but his aim from first to last and in all circumstances was the glory of his Maker; and hence he was "greatly beloved."

Statesmen are prominent men. They live under the public eye. Their speeches are reported, and their likenesses are seen in periodicals and newspapers and shop windows. "A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid." This prominence has its obligations and responsibilities. But what an advantage it is! What facilities for doing good it affords! How wide is the influence that can be exercised! Life is a serious matter, at any time and anywhere; but it is a glorious privilege when grace is provided for all emergencies and for all obligations, and when the position is both prominent and pregnant for good. Distrust of self in reverent minds carries with it reliance upon God. When the main object is God's glory, the details, the secular and spiritual obligations, fit in easily and naturally to their proper places. It is not unbecoming to desire with the whole self that God should designate His faithful servant as "a man greatly beloved." A holier or higher or better ambition than to be greatly loved by that God Who is Himself love could not possess the being of any creature, however lowly, however exalted, in the vast universe of the omniscient and omnipotent Creator and Ruler of all things, which teems with endless and countless life. Let such an ambition be the ambition of our statesmen to-day, and they will be a blessing to their own country and the very salt of the earth. Let such an ambition be yours and mine, and, whatever be our condition or position—be it low or high, with few or many gifts, with small or great influence—we shall not have lived in vain.

THE MARTYRDOM OF FAITHFUL

(After David Scott.)



HEED not the binding chains! Heed not the strong,
Fierce torture of the flames that blast and scar
That quiv'ring body! Lift thine eyes afar;
See, where they wait thee, the angelic throng
To voice thy triumph with their choral song;
And thou, victorious, like a radiant star
Shalt shine where the eternal glories are:
Brief the sharp pangs, the rapture endless-long.

His pallid head sinks backward; the closed eyes
Faint into death; and out of that fell fire,
Upborne as by the breath of pure desire,
The enfranchised spirit to its Heaven flies.
O Earth, Earth, Earth! blind to the avenging sword,
How long slay'st thou the chosen of the Lord?

ADA BARTRICK BAKER.

From the Design by David Scott.

By the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse.

CHAPTER I.

A CLOCKWORK MAN.

AS the church clock chimed eight, whilst the blue smoke of the houses rose straight up in the morning air, Michael Chigwidden came out at the side door of his little tailor's shop, his feet shuffling along in a big pair of red carpet slippers—he never put on his boots till the day's work was done. He took down the shutters, and then went in at the door, his hand giving an extra twist to the two flat curls into which his hair was brushed over each ear—they lent a kind of flourish, a graceful finish to his bald head.

From dawn to dark Michael Chigwidden was regulated by the church clock; by its quarters he woke, he dressed, he ate and drank, he worked, he went to bed, he slept. Once, when the clock was out of order and stopped for a fortnight, Michael Chigwidden was ill—very ill—the only illness of his life. People said the stopping of the clock was the cause, not a coincidence.

There are some men who surely never were born; the thought of it is absurd; no effort of the imagination could ever picture them as babies; they must have been made right off—like Adam, finished at once. Such a man was Michael Chigwidden—rigid, exact, crystallised. For such men the years of their growth abide like the branch of the tree. You might cut Michael Chigwidden down, or chop him up—you might saw him or plane him—but you could never bend him to any other shape than that in which he had grown.

Now of all men the tailor would appear the last who could afford such cast-iron ways. There are many callings—from the orthodox minister to the rag-and-bone merchant—where the reputation can be maintained by an angry resentment of new-fangled notions. The tailor, however, must hold the mirror to the changeful ways of human vanity, and veer with the winds of fashion as they blow from London or Paris. But Michael Chigwidden was as the rock to the river. Fashions might come and fashions might go, but he was not borne along by this frothy stream. Rooted and firm as the solid earth, he changed not with the spring or autumn; he was as the yew of which Tennyson sings:

> "O, not for thee the glow, the bloom,
> Who changeth not in any gale;
> Nor branding summer suns avail
> To touch thy thousand years of gloom."

Such was Michael Chigwidden.

CHAPTER II.

A GLANCE AT WEST TAMERTON.

THE town of West Tamerton, although of very considerable importance to those who lived there, or within the circling influence of its market day, was at least remote and leisurely. No railway in those days disturbed the wooded valley of the Tamar. Once a day the coach went up and down its steep thoroughfare linking it with mysterious regions "up the country." This was the main artery of its existence; there were lesser veins of circulation in the shape of sundry vans that crept to the neighbouring towns and villages within the radius of ten or twelve miles, apparently of much use only on market days. So far as news was concerned, West Tamerton lived, as the doctors say, on its own adipose tissue, found its supply within its own little self. It knew everything about everybody else in the place, and mostly knew a great deal more about other people than they knew about themselves. There hung over it a dreamy leisureliness as of a land where it was always afternoon—except, indeed, on market days, when everybody put on a show of bustle which so exhausted the energies that it took a week to recover. Other days went round like a straggling flock of sheep, so similar that you could not tell one from another; then came the market day at their heels, like a barking sheep-dog, and they scampered hither and thither in a rush.

Indeed, it was told that old Diggory Grey, away in St. Dunstan's parish, did actually mistake the days, so much alike were they, and, somehow losing account of the week, got up on the Sunday and thought it was Saturday. He rose at five, instead of seven, which marked with him the day of rest, and spent the morning in scattering manure over the field. Then at eleven he went in for a hasty dinner, dressing himself for market between the mouthfuls, putting on the clean "bosom" and the black tie and the Sunday coat and waistcoat. With the big basket of butter and eggs on his arm he set out for the walk over the moors. But as he drew near to the highway he woke up sufficiently to scratch his head by way of gathering his wits together. There was a strange and startling stillness everywhere. No rattling carts went on the road, no hoofs of trotting horses.

"Whatever is it, then?" said Diggory to himself.

He entered the street of the town. No cattle stood in its ways, no "stannin's" choked the footpath. The market-house was closed, the shops were shut. Not a soul appeared in the streets. The very public-houses had not opened their doors.

"Whatever is it, then?" said Diggory again with a gasp.

Then a slight break of light crept over him.

"Must be a burrin', I b'lieve, and everybody gone to it. Dear, dear! and I never heard tell of it, neither: must be somebody very important, too."

Then came a stout old woman to the door of her house, thinking that everybody else had gone to church and it was safe for her to show herself. Diggory hastened to find some explanation of the mystery.

"Here, mother, who is it then?"

"What 'ee mean?"

"Why, whose burrin' is it?"

"Burrin'; what are 'ee talking about?"

"Why, it must be a burrin'—all the shops shut up, and nobody about, and market day and all."

"Market day! Aw, dear, dear! Where do you expect to go to, I should like to know, with a great basket on your arm and this here the blessed Sunday?"

Diggory gasped. "Sunday!"

"Iss, Sunday."

Diggory turned in horror, and in a great perspiration. He took off his hat and fetched his handkerchief out of it, and wiped his face.

"Aw dear! to think I should have spent the blessed morning in scattering manure over the field, and now I shall have to go home and pick it up again, because it's Sunday!"

Happy place, where life was a round of such sweet leisureliness!

Well, seeing West Tamerton was what it was, it is easy to imagine the sensation with which the news broke upon it one day concerning Mr. Michael Chigwidden. It was an alarm as of fire. Yet not to be told in a hurry, but to be lingered over, that the effect of it might be the more overwhelming.

It was Martha Toms who carried the tidings to Betsy Crocker

"You do knaw Michael Chigwidden, don't 'ee?"

"Knaw Michael Chigwidden? Iss, of course I do."

"Michael Chigwidden the tailor, I do mean."

"Iss, of course. Well, what is it?"

"'Tisn't the old Michael Chigwidden, the uncle to en."

"Of course not; he's dead."

"But it might have been, for all that. I've a-heard strange tales of dead folks."

"What is it, then?"

"You never would have believed it, but 'tis true."

"Well, I never!"

"You might have knocked me down with a feather, as the saying is."

"Aw!"

"I never thought it of en."

"Aw!"

"Why, he's going for to be married!"

"Never!"

"And she's so staid a female, too."

"Dear, dear! Well, there, to be sure; who to, then?"

"Why, to Petronel Varnicombe, the dressmaker.

"Well, I never did!"

And each was off in haste to carry the tidings to the less informed.

CHAPTER III.

COURTSHIP.

HOW such a matter ever came about was, indeed, very much of a mystery. It is true that Petronel Varnicombe sat directly in front of Michael Chigwidden in church. Thus was afforded opportunity for meditation such as the occasion is intended to promote; and if loftier things did not occupy the good man's mind, possibly it was the fault of the preacher. As Michael's eyes could not fail to see over the top of the Prayer-book, they had of necessity to look at the figure in front of them. There were clusters of curls that peeped beneath the bonnet, tremulously keeping time as she joined in the psalms or kneeled for the responses.

The nearness of their pews afforded an excuse for a word of recognition that grew somewhat suddenly on his part into a tender inquiry as to her health. This without long delay passed to a hand-shake; and at last they walked together as far as their common way or the narrow pavement permitted.

So it came about that one evening Michael Chigwidden got up to close the shop at a quarter before eight—a change that implied something of terrible seriousness. Then he took off the loose carpet slippers, and put on his boots. He turned to view himself in the glass, giving the flat curls an extra twist and patting. He put on his hat, and boldly went forth to Petronel's house. To her it was a great astonishment to find that the knock was that of Michael Chigwidden. And while she expected only some passing message of a moment, she was still more surprised when he took off his hat and pushed his way into the little parlour.

Whatever passed between them we can only guess, but it was enough to set the rumour afloat that Michael Chigwidden was going to be married to Petronel Varnicombe. Thus far they certainly had got.

Henceforth every evening, however busy she might be, even in the all-important matters of weddings or funerals, and although it involved setting to work again as soon as Michael was gone, and sticking at it until midnight, yet Petronel cleared her room and tidied it with utmost care. Every evening, a little before eight, she made the fire burn its brightest; she set some little dainty on the table for supper; she put the old arm-chair in the chimney corner; and then quietly waited the coming of her lover.

And every evening, on his part, Michael Chigwidden went forth at a quarter to eight, and hastily put up the shutters; he changed the big carpet slippers for boots that were carefully polished; he gave the flat curls on either side of his head an extra twist and pat.

As the chimes struck the hour of eight, never a minute before, never a minute after, Michael boldly came into the dressmaker's little room. The greeting was sincere enough, but not enthusiastic, and then two hours slipped by pleasantly for both. It was a rest, a break, a change, without excitement, without expectation or claim. Every evening at the stroke of ten Michael rose and held out his hand, always with the same formula:

"Well, Petronel, what do 'ee say, then?"

The answer was always the same:

"Aw, Michael, let us bide as we be."

The weeks went by, the months, and even the years. But amidst the changes they brought nothing broke the constancy of Michael's visit. The formula was always the same, on his part and on hers. The very intonation of each word had grown fixed and unalterable.

It came at last to be said only because it had been said, and both would have been bewildered at its omission, and quite as much amazed at any change.

It was after the engagement had lasted seven years that a neighbour, anxious to get rid of his house and furniture, thought that Michael Chigwidden would probably require some such convenient dwelling when he took to himself a wife. And surely that happy event could not fail now to be within measurable distance.

"Well, Mr. Chigwidden," he began, as he called at the tailor's shop. "I've been thinking about you."

"Aw," said the tailor, "is it a new suit of clothes?"

"No, no, nothing of that sort. I am going away, you know, and want to get rid of my house."

"Well," replied Mr. Chigwidden, "what's that got to do with me?"

"Why, I thought it would suit you very nicely."

"Me!" cried Michael; "whatever should I do with the place?"

"But I suppose you are going to be married soon, are you not?"

Michael gasped, his jaw fell, and beads of perspiration stood on his forehead. He grasped the counter with each hand, as if to keep himself from falling.

"M—m—m—married!" he cried with horror.

"Yes, married," said the neighbour.

"W—w—w—whatever for?" stuttered the tailor.

"But you are engaged, aren't you?"

"Of course I am," said he, growing angry.

"Engaged to be married, I suppose?" said the neighbour.

"No," said the tailor, turning on his heel.

It took at least an hour for Michael to get over the shock, and it was another hour before he was able comfortably to sit cross-legged, and to resume his stitching. And even then he kept breaking out with indignant exclamations: "M—m—m—married! M—m—married! Whatever for?"

CHAPTER IV.

HOW IT ENDED.

IT was ten years since the engagement had commenced, when Michael Chigwidden, after many weeks of deliberation and anxious discussions with Petronel, was induced to go to London to visit the Exhibition of 1862. Once away from West Tamerton, in the midst of the relatives with whom he was to stay, there was plenty to absorb his thoughts, and Petronel found no place amidst the excitement of the day. Worn out by the weariness of so much sight-seeing, at night he was asleep before her name could come into his mind.

But very different was it for poor Petronel. In her loneliness she missed him. Every evening, from mere force of habit, she put away her work, and she tidied up her room. Every evening she made the fire at its brightest and cheeriest; she set a place for two at the supper table, and put the arm-chair in the corner and waited. The clock struck eight, but no presence broke the monotony of the day. Never did the hours seem so long. Never were the evenings so dull. And as she thought of him now, it was altogether in another light. He was not merely a friendly visitor, but far more than he had ever seemed.

"Ten years!" she said to herself; "ten years! and his faithfulness has never wavered, his devotion has never changed—and every evening he has asked, and asked in vain."

She upbraided herself severely for never having seen before all that it meant to her now. She wondered that she could have withstood the claims of such affection. If he were but with her now, she almost thought it would be impossible to deny him anything. On his return she must give him some token of how deeply she felt his constancy, how warmly she had come to appreciate the devotion he had shown for all these years. There was but one fitting gift, and that should be his. She would at last consent to be his wife.

A fortnight expired, and Michael was home again. Eagerly that night he hastened to put up the shutters, and to put on his boots, for he had seen much and had a host of things to tell. He could not wonder at the warmer greeting with which Petronel welcomed him as he came into her room. For her to see him once more in the easy-chair, and to feel the break that his presence brought, restored to her life a charm, and completed her determination fitly to reward the years of his love.

"Two hours slipped by pleasantly for both."—p. 386.

The two hours passed more quickly than ever. The incidents of the journey to London—in those times a rare thing for any person of West Tamerton—the sights and wonders he had looked upon in the Exhibition, all gave to the tailor, in Petronel's eyes, an added importance almost, indeed, a greatness.

Then the old church clock chimed the hour of ten. Michael did not know it was so late, and rose in a hurry. He held out his hand, and hastily went through the familiar form of words:

"Well, Petronel, what do 'ee say, then?"

A new light shone in Petronel's eyes, the glow of a love that was almost a passion, an adoration, a great gratitude. Michael waited only for the familiar reply, and was eager to go. Punctuality had come to be to him almost a tyranny. But Petronel held his hand; and for a full minute there was a silence in which one heard nothing but the ticking of the clock in the corner of the room.

Then she lifted her eyes to his, and even ventured what she had never done before—to set her arm about his neck.

"Michael, I've been thinking."

Michael started and gasped, "Aw, my dear!"

Petronel misunderstood him, and found it an encouragement only more boldly to declare herself.

"I've been thinking," she went on, "of the years of your love, and devotion."

"Never!" cried Michael tremblingly.

To Petronel still it was only the gladness of a man who finds at last what he has sought so long.

"I have resolved to consent to be your wife."

Michael snatched away his hand and thrust poor Petronel from him.

"N—n—n—never," he cried, and, without so much as staying to put on his hat, rushed through the street, and burst in at his door, and scarcely felt himself safe, even when it was locked and barred.

It was a long time before he could sleep, and even in his slumber there came the muttered indignation: "M—m—married. Whatever for?"

The next day poor Petronel had no heart for anything. She sat with her breakfast untasted, utterly careless about her work for an hour or more. Some message of urgency aroused her at last, and she flung herself desperately at the dressmaking, and scarcely laid it aside for a moment. The night came, and eight o'clock found her still at her work. The fire had gone out, and the hearth was all unswept. Table and chairs were littered with the materials of her dressmaking. There was no need now to brighten the room, to set the cloth, to get something dainty for supper, and to wait expectant and eager for Michael's coming.

But to Michael the day had been a weary one. He had taken down the shutters and prepared for the day's work with all his unerring precision. He had sat in his red slippers, cross-legged, stitching and snipping, but his thoughts were with Petronel. He sighed. How could he alter the habits of ten long years? What was he to do with his evenings?

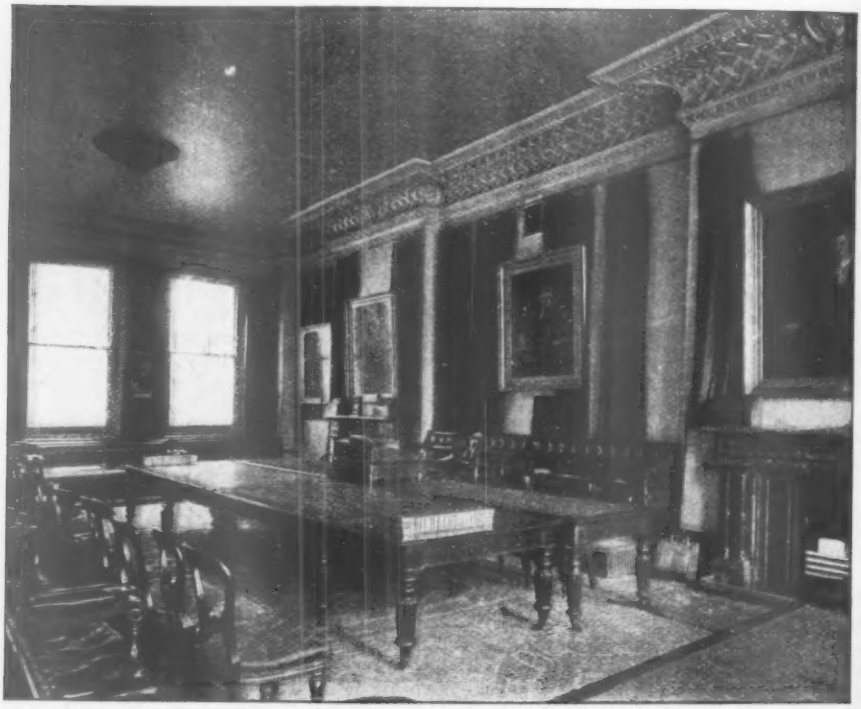
That night, as the old church clock chimed the hour of eight, much to Petronel's amazement Michael rushed into the little room, and sat down without a word. The silence lasted for many minutes.

"Petronel," he sighed, "'tis no good. I can't live without you."

"Michael," said Petronel, "I can't live without you."

"I've been thinking, Petronel." He paused again.

"Well, Michael," said she, after a silence of some minutes, "what have 'ee been thinking, then?"



It was a long time before the answer came.

"Well, Petronel, lev us bide as we be for the present, and then, please God, when we are dead, we'll be buried comfortable in the same grave."

MEN WHO MANAGE MISSIONS.

SOME FACTS ABOUT FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETIES AND THE MEN WHO CONTROL THEM.

By Hugh B. Philpott.

THE BOARD ROOM CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

RIGHTLY regarded, the home side of foreign missionary work is by no means devoid of interest. Indeed, missionary problems are only half understood while this side of the work is ignored, and there are many matters which are more likely to be justly appreciated in these prosaic London offices than anywhere else; there, if anywhere, the right perspective is obtained, and wide and general views can be taken.

It is a vast and many-sided work that goes on at the headquarters of the great missionary societies. The supply of candidates has to be kept up, and they have to be wisely prepared for foreign service; the churches have to be kept informed of the progress of the work abroad, and their missionary zeal maintained and quickened by sermons, meetings, the circulation of literature, and other means; money has to be collected and allocated to various purposes; questions of missionary policy have to be decided; the health and personal needs of the missionaries, whether abroad or home on furlough, must be a matter of constant solicitude; the progress of the work in every part of the mission field must be carefully watched, and the workers themselves encouraged and helped with friendly counsel. The organisation by means of which these and many other duties belonging to the home side of missionary work are carried out varies considerably in the different societies. But, in nearly all, the work centres round two or three men, generally the secretaries, who, devoting their whole time and strength to the work, have all its details at their fingers' ends.

Let us first glance at the work of the largest of all missionary societies, the Church Missionary Society, which has its headquarters in Salisbury Square. At the present time the Society has a staff of 1,276 missionaries (including missionaries wives and lay helpers), 375 native clergy, and 7,915 native agents and teachers, and its income last year amounted to £342,000. In view of the vastness of the operations which these figures suggest, it is not surprising to find that the secretarial staff of the Church Missionary Society is stronger numerically than that of any other society. It consists of nine gentlemen, who divide amongst themselves the control of the various departments of the work. The Rev. F. Baylis, M.A., who kindly acts as our informant, is one of the three secretaries who devote their attention specially to the foreign field. They work in connection with a "Correspondence Committee" of about a hundred members, which meets twice a month, and keeps in touch, through its sub-committees, with the Society's agents all over the world. It is also responsible for the very important work of obtaining recruits for the foreign field, and recommending them for acceptance.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

MR. D. MARSHALL LANG, LAY SECRETARY, CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Funds and Home Organisation Committee undertakes another very important duty, that of bringing the facts of missionary work before the people at home and seeking their sympathy and support. The Rev. J. S. Flynn devotes the whole of his time to the work of this committee, which is, of course, very responsible as well as arduous. For it is obvious that any slackness in this department, any want of completeness in the organisation, would mean loss of income and weakness all round.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. H. E. FOX, CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Publications Committee of a missionary society might be supposed to represent a comparatively unimportant part of its work. But when it is stated that last year the Church Missionary Society issued nearly five and a half million publications of one kind and another, for sale and gratuitous distribution, it will be believed that in this Society, at any rate, the work of disseminating missionary literature is a vast business in itself. The Society issues ten monthly and quarterly publications as well as a good many books on missionary matters. The production of all these publications is under the direction of the editorial secretary, Mr. Eugene Stock, who has had the assistance lately of the Rev. G. Furness Smith, M.A.

(Photo: Maull and Fox, Piccadilly, W.)
THE REV. G. TONGE, CHURCH OF ENGLAND ZENANA MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The financial and business side of the great organisation is controlled by the lay secretary, Mr. D. Marshall Lang, who deals with all receipts and expenditure, controls the business staff, and generally fulfils most of the duties that fall to the manager of a great business house.

Such is, very briefly, the way in which the most important branches of the work are divided amongst the officials of the Church Missionary Society. But there is need in all such great organisations of one representative personality to whom all may look up as their chief. Such a position is filled by the honorary secretary, the Rev. H. E. Fox, M.A. He presides at the weekly meeting of secretaries, when the programme of the week's work is arranged; he is the representative of the Society and its spokesman in relation to the outside world, and is the friend and confidant both of missionaries and officials. Notwithstanding that his position is a purely honorary one, Mr. Fox is so far from being a mere figure-head that it would be difficult to find among all the missionary secretaries in London—and they are a hard-working and devoted body of men—one whose life is more completely devoted to the missionary cause.

THE REV. ALEXANDER CONNELL, B.D., FOREIGN MISSIONS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The Church Missionary Society, although the largest, is not the oldest Church of England missionary society. That distinction belongs to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which was founded in the year 1701. Its earliest field of work was the British colonies in America (now the United States), and it has maintained throughout its history a more distinctly colonial character than belongs to most other societies. Every colony in the British Empire, with the single small exception of the Falkland Islands, has at some time or other received its aid, and at the present time it carries on a good deal of work in the colonies and supports chaplaincies on the Continent of Europe, as well as engaging in what is, of course, its principal work, the preaching of the Gospel to heathen peoples.

The chief of the secretarial staff of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel is Bishop Montgomery, formerly Bishop of Tasmania, who came home by invitation of the bishops to devote his whole attention to the work of missionary organisation. Bishop Montgomery keeps himself in close touch with all branches of the Society's work, he brings matters before the various committees, and acts as the Society's spokesman and representative. The detailed work is subdivided among the secretaries in a similar manner to that of the Church Missionary Society, one secretary having charge of the European chaplaincies, another of the home deputation work, and another,

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

BISHOP MONTGOMERY, SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.

Canon C. H. Robinson, of the editorial work connected with the half-dozen periodicals issued by the Society.

The Church of England Zenana Missionary Society is a society which sends lady missionaries to work among the women of India, China, Ceylon and Singapore. It is not unnatural that the management of such a society should be largely in the hands of women. Most of the committees are composed chiefly, if not entirely, of women, and several of the leading officials of the Society are women. The editorial superintendent, who ably controls the production of some very attractive literature, is Miss Irene H. Barnes; the secretary of the Home Organisation Committee, whose duties are to extend the knowledge of the Society's work and recommend the appointment of local secretaries, is Miss Mulvany; and the deputation secretary, who arranges for deputations and preachers throughout the country, and often herself visits and addresses the local workers, is Miss Lucy Jukes. The clerical secretary, who may be regarded as the Society's representative and chief, is the Rev. George Tonge, M.A., who exercises a general supervision over practically all branches of the work.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

EXTERIOR OF BUILDING, SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.

To explain in detail the organisation of this Society, which is very effective and complete, would occupy much more space than can be spared. One thing which was specially impressed upon my mind as the result of a chat with Mr. Tonge was the heavy responsibility which rests upon a missionary society in regard to its own workers. At first sight one might suppose that when an earnest Christian worker has volunteered for foreign service all the Society has to do is to send him out to some part of the mission field where more workers are wanted and to pay his expenses. The matter, however, is by no means so simple as that. The reputation of a society, its efficiency in the field and the degree of confidence it will command at home, depend upon the faithfulness and the discretion of its agents. It becomes, therefore, a matter of the utmost importance that new workers shall be most carefully chosen and trained.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

THE REV. GEORGE COUSINS, LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

In the Zenana Society the lady who wishes to be a missionary first fills up a form answering certain questions and supplying references. She then goes to some approved training home for about two years, during which time she also has opportunities for engaging in various forms of Christian effort in connection with neighbouring churches. This generally shows whether the candidate has the capacity for spiritual work and the true missionary spirit; for, as Mr. Tonge says, "If she doesn't show a missionary spirit here at home, it is not likely to be developed in a voyage to India."

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Baker Street, W.)

THE REV. WARDLAW THOMPSON, LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

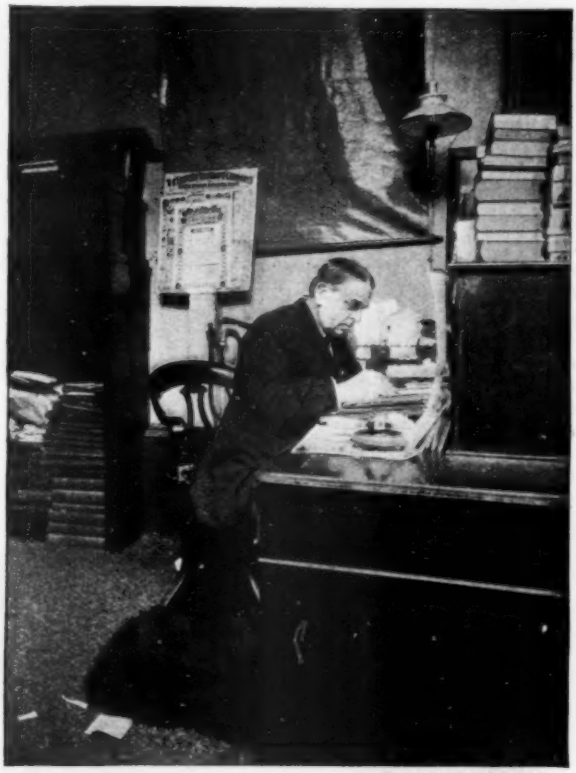
Turning our attention next to societies unconnected with the Established



(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

EXTERIOR OF BUILDING, LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY

Church, we first look in at the London Missionary Society's headquarters in Blomfield Street for a few minutes' conversation with the "Home Secretary," the Rev. A. N. Johnson, M.A. We find Mr. Johnson busy with plans for adding to the already extensive efforts the Society is making to bring home to its constituents a sense of responsibility for foreign missions. Conferences of ministers are being arranged and the services of the best speakers are being enlisted to address public meetings. "What we want," says Mr. Johnson, "is information spreading. I don't think it is people's antagonism to missions, but their want of knowledge, which makes them withhold the support we need." For the London Missionary Society, like several other societies, has been experiencing lately something very like a financial crisis, and is feeling strongly the need of a larger income.

We are reminded by Mr. Johnson that the London Missionary Society is really an undenominational society. It was founded more than a hundred years ago by a body of men of different denominations, who declared the design of the Society to be to send to the heathen, "not Presbyterianism, Independency, Episcopacy, or any other form of church order and government, but the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." That principle has never been departed from, although the Society has come to be very closely identified with the Congregational churches owing to the fact that nearly all other bodies of Christians now have societies of their own. Still, there are a few missionaries even now in the London Missionary Society who are not Congregationalists. A recent notable example was the martyred missionary, James Chalmers, who was a Presbyterian.

The Society has two foreign secretaries, the Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson and the Rev. George Cousins, who between them get through an immense quantity of correspondence with missionaries in the field. Nor is this correspondence of a merely formal character. Mr. Cousins, from his own experience as a missionary, and Mr. Wardlaw Thompson, from his natural sympathy and wide knowledge of the problems of missionary work, are able to enter into intimate and sympathetic relationship with the missionaries and to give advice and encouragement that are often sorely needed.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

MR. A. H. BAYNES IN HIS ROOM AT THE BAPTIST MISSION HOUSE.

The finances of the Society are under the control of Mr. Cousins, and one may well wonder how he and his colleague find time to write the intimate personal letters I have referred to and address public meetings, in addition to attending to all sorts of business details. The explanation is probably to be sought in the fact that the Society gives a very free hand to its missionaries in the field, who settle in their district meetings many details which in other societies would be referred to the home authorities.

The Baptist Missionary Society is distinguished among other societies from the fact that it has a layman as its leading official. I suppose it will not be thought invidious thus to describe Mr. A. H. Baynes, the general secretary. Mr. Baynes has served the Baptist Society as secretary for the last thirty-six years, and must have a quite unrivalled experience in all matters relating to missionary organisation. The ideal secretary of a religious society would combine spiritual and moral force with business aptitude and a genial, courteous manner. The combination is a rare one, no doubt, but the Baptist Missionary Society seems to have found it in its general secretary. A great worker is Mr. Baynes, retaining in his own strong and able hands such varied duties as the control of the finance, correspondence with missionaries, and the editing of the magazines.

Matters of home organisation are in the hands of the Rev. J. B. Myers, who is known as the association secretary. His duties, like those of so many other missionary secretaries, are specially arduous at the present time, owing to the fact that the Society's income falls short of its normal expenditure. He is devoting himself energetically to the task of persuading the Baptist churches that their duty is to increase considerably the amount of support they have hitherto accorded to their missionary society.

The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society presents some aspects which to those unfamiliar with Methodism may be a little puzzling. The voluntary element enters into its organisation less than into that of any of the societies we have been considering. This arises naturally from the fact that foreign missionary work is regarded by the Wesleyan body as part of their church work, not as an addition to it. The organisation and rules applying to their churches at home apply with little modification to their churches in China or Africa. The Wesleyan missionary, unlike the missionaries of most societies, is not necessarily a volunteer for that particular work. He is like a soldier on duty abroad. He is working at that particular place because he has been sent thither. His not to reason why. A man who becomes a Wesleyan minister is liable to be sent to any part of the world, except the west coast of Africa, where, owing to the risk to health, none but volunteers are sent.

(Photo: Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THE REV. F. W. MACDONALD, WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

A CANDIDATE BEFORE THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

It is the same, I believe, with the secretaries of the Society, who have received their appointments, not, perhaps, because they desired them, but because they have been selected by Conference. Bearing this fact in mind, we may perhaps see a testimony to the importance the Wesleyan body attach to foreign missionary work in the fact that for the past eleven years one of their most gifted men, the Rev. F. W. Macdonald, M.A., has filled the office of secretary to the Missionary Society. Mr. Macdonald is a former professor of Handsworth College, who has left the impress of his strong personality on many of the younger men in the Wesleyan ministry; he is a man of wide and deep culture and a brilliant lecturer and preacher, whose advocacy must be a continual source of strength to the Society.

Mr. Macdonald's special department is the work on the Continent of Europe, and he visits some of the stations once or twice every year. The Rev. William H. Findlay, M.A., who was himself a missionary for twenty years, has charge of the rest of the foreign work, and the Rev. Marshall Hartley deals with finance. The home organisation secretary, the Rev. William Perkins, has somewhat different duties from those of the secretaries who fill this position in other societies. Owing to the ecclesiastical system of Wesleyanism, every Wesleyan chapel in the land may be regarded as to a greater or less extent a supporter of the foreign missionary work. The secretary has not to appeal for an annual collection and a public meeting; that much is assured. He finds plenty of work to do, however, in arranging for effective speakers to be sent to every district, and helping the local workers to make the missionary anniversary what it very often is in country districts, one of the great occasions of the year.

The Missionary Society connected with the Presbyterian Church of England is a smaller society than most of those which have been mentioned, but it deserves a word of recognition, if only from the fact that nearly all the organising work is done by voluntary workers. The convener, the Rev. Alexander Connell, B.D., is pastor of an important London church, and the vice-convener, Mr. John Bell, is a City merchant. Both these gentlemen devote a large share of their time to missionary work. Mr. Connell corresponds with missionaries, presides at committee meetings, and frequently preaches and speaks on behalf of the work. He is a most persuasive and attractive speaker, and, having visited the Society's mission fields in India and China, can speak of the work from first-hand knowledge. Mr. Bell looks after financial matters, presides at committees in Mr. Connell's absence, and generally acts as referee on all business matters. The more detailed secretarial work is done by the Rev. William Dale, who also edits the missionary periodicals.

Two general considerations, both full of encouragement, in regard to our great missionary societies may be noted in conclusion. In the course of my inquiries into the organisation of the societies it was inevitable that comparisons with other societies should be made. Yet I heard no reference to another society or another official that was not kindly and charitable. Among our great missionary societies jealous and ignoble rivalry is, I think, practically non-existent. The men with whom I conversed represent many different schools of thought and methods of church government, yet they find it possible to maintain the most cordial relations with each other. Striving earnestly towards the same great end, they have neither time nor inclination to quarrel by the way.

The second consideration is the immensity of the opportunity which lies before the Christian churches in regard to missionary work. Everywhere the societies have the same story to tell of a readiness to hear the Gospel, of new doors being opened, of opportunities for starting fresh missions and developing old ones, but also—alas!—of inadequate means to take advantage of these opportunities. There will be many great forward movements in the mission field when the churches give the word.

XUM

THE NEGLECTING OF JOAN.

By Margaret Westrup, Author of "Love and Photography," "Noll," Etc.

JOAN sat up in her crib and looked at the big bed next to hers. The big bed was empty, and this to begin with was a revolution.

So it was that the very beginning of that day was different from the beginning of other days.

The other days always began with a snuggle in nurse's bed. In all the years and years and years Joan could remember there had only been one day that had begun without the snuggle. It was the day after Joan, flying into a temper at having to go to bed, had called nurse a "guinea-pig." Joan had smacked her, too, as hard as ever she could, and, as she reflected now, eyeing that empty bed, used all her hands to do it.

So the next morning there had been no snuggle. Joan had buried her face in her pillow in such an agony of shame that she had not dared to suggest even a "How-d'ye-do?" much less a snuggle. And when nurse had dressed her that morning she had seen the flattened tip of the poor little nose, and so forgiven her.

But all that was matter of old history now. It was when Joan was "ker-wite" little—six whole months ago almost.

Joan wondered suddenly if it could be that she had wakened in the night before nurse had come to bed. She had done that once—oh, more than six months ago, when she was "jus' a baby." But even now the remembrance of the feeling that came over her when, half-asleep, she crawled into the big bed that was always so warm and cuddlesome, and found it cold and empty, sent a little funny shiver through Joan's chubby body. She had cried then—cried and screamed—all alone in the big, cold bed, till nurse and mother came running into the room, and everything grew right. "Babies," said Joan earnestly, "are such funny little things." For that was quite nine months ago now.

But Joan knew that it was not night now. There was the sun shining on her blue-and-white water-jug and basin, just as it always shone as she crept into the big bed. Moreover, the big bed had been slept in this time. There was the dent in the middle that nurse always made, and the blanket and sheets and counterpane were turned back anyhow.

A little lonely hurt feeling stole upon Joan as she sat up in her little bed and looked round the room. Her eyes, wandering wistfully, fell upon her dolls' cradle. Joan suddenly felt the need of a doll. She climbed over the side of her crib—the side farthest from the big bed—and trotted across to the roomy old cradle, where slept in two rows twelve dolls.

Joan stood and looked down at them with a brow of frowning thought. Clementina's blue eyes gazed seraphically up at her, and Clementina's rosy lips smiled alluringly. Clementina was a beautiful doll. Her face was wax, and her eyes were big and blue, and her cheeks were pink, and her head and shoulders were covered with long, golden curls. She was Joan's "last." Joan had only possessed her for ten days, and, as yet, none of Clementina's charms had faded. But Joan had a deep and secret suspicion that Clementina gave herself airs. She was sure she had seen Clementina's blue eyes glance unkindly at poor little Chrissy May's tipless nose. And she was ker-wite sure Clementina despised Babblewags. Babblewags was made of rag, and his flat face had worn many expressions during his life, expressions that owed their being to the brush of Man-Daddy. Just now his expression was mournful. Man-Daddy's arm had been jerked by an impatient little onlooker, and Babblewags' mouth wore a melancholy droop.

Joan, looking along the line of faces, red, yellowish-pink, grey, black, came to Babblewags, and the droop clutched at her motherly heart, and she stooped and gathered him to her bosom.

She glanced at Clementina as she stood up, and Clementina smiled a sneering little smile at poor Babblewags.

Joan's face flushed indignantly. She clasped Babblewags closer; then, guiltily, hesitatingly, with many glances round the room, she bent and tweaked one of Clementina's long, golden curls.

After that she scuttled back to her bed, and fell headlong over the side with Babblewags. Then they both hid for a little while under the bedclothes.

Aunt Theresa had given Clementina to Joan. Joan, hiding under the bedclothes, could hear the very creak of her as she bent down and laid the doll in Joan's arms. Joan had once asked Man-Daddy if Aunt Theresa were made of wood: "Because, you see, she creaks jus' 'zact like Dandyboy." Man-Daddy had looked across at mother with the lift to his eyebrows that Joan knew always presaged something funny.

"I think she is rather wooden, Joan," he had said.

"She's jus' hard like wood," said Joan.

But mother had shaken her head at Man-Daddy. "He is joking, Joan," she had said.

When Aunt Theresa had given Joan the doll, she had said, "Be careful with her, Niece Joan; she is a beautiful doll. I do not often make presents, so I shall expect you to value this one, and treat it properly."

Aunt Theresa was very tall, and she always dressed in black.

Joan, under the covers, wondered what she would have said if she had seen her tweak Clementina's curl. She knew it was not "treating her propelly."

"But I don't care," said Joan; "she shouldn't have smiled so sneerumly at dear Babblewags"; and she emerged, flushed and wild-haired, from beneath the bedclothes. At that, the empty bed beside her brought a fresh pang to her heart. Joan, thinking matters over, grew dignified. She had not been naughty; indeed, she had been "wondrousfully good": she had eaten all the nasty brown bits of bread in her bread-and-milk last night without "one bit of a word."

This thought finished matters. Joan rose; she climbed slowly and very dignifiedly over the side of her bed, and began to dress herself. There was no fun about it. Sometimes she had done it with nurse looking

"'I'm jus' going to wash myself.'" on and laughing, and giving a hand to buttons and tapes that did up somewhere behind. It had been fun then. Joan wondered why things did up at the back. Standing with her little red stays dangling, she said to Babblewags, "It's goin' to be a horridful day, Babblewags. I shall be dirty, and all done up anyhow. I s'pose nurse has gone away to get married, and now I'll always be a dirty little girl what never has baths, because there isn't a bath or anything put ready."

To make things out as black as possible fitted in with Joan's feelings just then. She went on: "My hair'll be all tangly till you can't get the comb through, and then it'll all have to be cut off—cut off," she repeated, and then in a burst of utter dismalness, "and most likely my head, too!"

She blinked and swallowed, then proceeded with her dressing. The button-and-tape-behind difficulty was overcome by the simple expedient of bringing things round to the front. Joan wondered why she had never thought of it before. She looked down with a momentary gleam of pride at the white flannel petticoat that bunched out so queerly in front. Then she put the thin, white petticoat over that. It was very thin, and it twisted itself about her head and shoulders till her arms ached with trying to get it right. Joan was quite sure Clementina was laughing at her. She could see her shiny pink-and-white face in the cradle "jus' bursting with laughs."

"You see," said Joan, "I'll always have to dress myself now, and make my own breakfus', while cook's away, and—and sleep in the big cold bed most likely!"

It was when she was wrestling with her water-jug that nurse came running in. Joan was standing on a chair in a pool of water. The front (or rather back) of her white petticoat was wet, and so were her feet.

"Oh, my dearie! what are you doing?" cried nurse.

Joan looked at her over a bare shoulder, "I'm jus' going to wash myself, nurse Mary Saunderson," she said, in a very dignified voice.

Then nurse knew. She looked very grave.

"I'm very sorry you've been left alone so long, Miss Joan," she said respectfully, "but I was called up very sudden——"

Joan turned round.

"Your mother wasn't very well, Miss Joan——"

Joan stumbled headlong off the chair.

"My hands are glorifully cold," she said; "the jug was cold as cold——"

Nurse caught her arm. "Your mother's dozing, dearie."

"Oh!" Joan's face fell. "I'll go so quiet, nurse," she pleaded. "I'll go so mousily, nurse—and she does like me to put my hands on her front-head——"

"Not now, dear. Sleep's the best thing for her. I'll get your bath ready."

"But I'm all dressed, nurse!"

Nurse looked down at her, and a twinkle came into her eyes.

"Your petticoat's wet, Miss Joan: best let me undress you," she said gravely.

In her bath Joan was seized in a whirlwind of many emotions, and she flung her arms tempestuously round nurse's neck.

Nurse submitted, but she did not understand.

"What is it, dearie?" she said, without a murmur at the wetness of the fat arms.

But Joan could not explain. She tried, and nurse heard a rapid rush of words in which "big bed," "bath," "gone away," "to get married," "Clementina," "Babblewags," "all empty," "hours and hours and hours," "all quiet," "so sneerumly," "pulled her curl," "Aunt Thrissa treat her propelly," recurred a good many times.

And nurse kissed her, but she did not understand.

Things seemed to be going better then, and Joan was wheedled into believing it was not going to be a "horridful" day after all. She ate her porridge from nurse's knee, to "make up," and Joan infinitely preferred nurse's knee—which was not a bit like a knee at all, but like a cushion—to her high chair, which, when not occupied by her, was given over to such of the dolls as best deserved the honour.

This morning the chair was occupied by Babblewags, mournful, perhaps weighed down by the prominence of his position, for he was given the best seat; Chrissy May, nose-tip-less, but cheerful; Lilyatum, pale and interesting, and the twins.

But directly breakfast was over nurse disappeared again.

"Promise me, dearie, not to come on mother's landing," she said, before she went.

Joan thought. A promise was never given lightly by Joan.

"I want to come when she wakens, nurse——"

"Not unless I fetch you, dear."

"But why——"

"Mother's to be kept quiet, Miss Joan."

Joan wheedled. "Jus' one little, little cold hand, nurse——'

"No, dear.'

"One little, little tiny wee-wee finger, nurse?"

But nurse was firm, and the promise had to be given.

When nurse had gone Joan trotted downstairs to say "Good-morning" to Man-Daddy.

Now Joan had many ways of saying "Good-morning." Sometimes she did a double knock with Thomas's china head on the door, and then Man-Daddy would say, "Postman, my dear," and mother would answer, "I wonder if there's a letter for me this morning?" and Joan, chuckling till she could not speak, would burst in, and then——Oh, how surprised they were!

Sometimes Man-Daddy would take her on his knee, and read her to mother. "Dear Man-Daddy," he would read, "I spent a very good night along with all the little folk from the land of Nod. They really are very queer, but you mustn't laugh at them, or they would be very hurt. They always walk on their heads, these little folk, and when you go to touch them they just melt away like the mist on the hills as you draw near. They dance with the fairies in the moonlight round the toadstools, and a fat old toad sits on the stool and gives prizes to the best dancers. Some of the little Noddites collect the most beautiful gems with which the ground is strewn, and the fairies weave them into crowns and wands and all sorts of beautiful things. These are the prizes. But if a mortal tries to touch one it just melts into water as if it were an ordinary every-day dewdrop. The Noddites look rather queer, dancing on their heads, with the fairies holding their ankles instead of their hands, but the dance——"; and so Man-Daddy would go on till mother rose, and then he would cry out at the lateness of the hour, and rush off to his studio.

Sometimes Joan would come in, a little shrinking figure, and say, "I am a flower," and then they would have to guess. When she huddled herself together like that, and hid her face under her hands, she was a violet. When she came in very slowly, and holding herself very erect, she was a lily. When she came laughing in, as perky as possible, she was London pride. And they had to guess, and till they guessed right there were no "Good-mornings." When Joan chose this way of saying "Good-morning," Man-Daddy and mother would look at each other with a nice sort of look. That was all Joan thought about it; but, really, there was just a little bit of pride in it.

Sometimes Joan would come bursting in with a demand for a "jumble-kiss." "I don't want two seplerate 'Good-mornings' to-day," she would cry. "Come, Man-Daddy"—and she would fling herself on her mother, dimples, eyes and hair wild with glee—"we are ker-wite ready!"

To-day Joan decided on none of these "Good-mornings." She had many others. As she trotted rather soberly down the shallow stairs she decided on the one where she stood outside the door, and in a very deep voice, said: "Who am I? Guess my name quick, or I'll chop off your head!"

Then Man-Daddy, in a voice quaking with fear, would cry out various guesses. Perhaps he would say, "It is Blunderbore! Oh, I pray you mercy, Sir Giant!"

And Joan, the deep voice broken with a shrill chuckle would answer, "Wrong! Quick, quick, or off comes your head!" and perhaps she would end with a big shout. Then Man-Daddy would cry to mother, "His voice is louder than a speaking trumpet."

And Joan would answer, "Quick! I am as tall as an ordinlary spire steeple!"

"Oh, he comes from Brobdingnag!" Man-Daddy would cry, then.

And about that time Joan would be thinking that hugs and "Good-mornings" were nicer than a doormat, and so she would cry all in a hurry, "P'raps I'm not ker-wite as tall as an ordinlary spire steeple! And p'raps I've got a little girl's name! And p'raps my voice isn't ker-wite as loud as a 'speaking trumpet.' Quickery-quickery-quick!"

"Why, I believe it's Joan! Only Liliputian Joan!" Man-Daddy would cry, and then there would burst into the breakfast room a rosy dumpling of a Joan, shrieking with glee at the thought of all the dreadful things they had feared of her.

So this morning Joan crept to the doormat.

"Who am I? Guess my name quick, or I'll chop off your head!"

Then she waited, pinching poor Babblewags in her excitement. But no one answered. All around there was silence. A nasty feeling began to creep over Joan. She tried again. Perhaps Man-Daddy was behind those "huge-most" sheets of newspaper, and had not heard her.

Standing in the shady little hall, Joan realised for the first time in her life the meaning of silence. There was not a sound in all the house. Other mornings there was always a cheerful little clatter coming from the kitchen; the sound of nurse moving about overhead as she made the beds; the warm feeling of Man-Daddy's and mother's presence on the other side of the door.

Now there was nothing. Joan was a healthy, fat little soul, but she had an imagination. And the imagination of childhood is a thing keen and inexplicable, and rarely understood by the grown-ups. Joan stood on the mat immovable. Slowly a terror was creeping over her. She dared not move her eyes from the door in front of her, yet she was sure a brown bear was creeping out of the shadows behind her. The silence made a buzz in her ears that she knew was the brown bear's breathing. Suddenly from overhead came the murmur of nurse's voice. With a cry Joan flung herself at the door and entered the breakfast room. It was empty. On the table at Man-Daddy's end was the newspaper, not unfolded. In front of the dish of bacon stood a clean plate, clean knives and forks. Only the coffee cup had been used.

There was no chair put for mother; no plates, no knives or forks. The flowers in the middle of the table were dead.

Joan stared at it all, and a great lump of desolation crept into her throat.

The silence had come back again; suddenly Joan saw the brown bear; he was lurking behind Man-Daddy's easy-chair. Of course he would be able to hug her and Babblewags to death and then eat them up, for Joan knew there was no one near—no one within miles and miles. No one but the brown bear and them. He did not growl—he was a very quiet bear—but she could hear him breathing still. She would rather him growl than be so quiet. Everything was so quiet. Then suddenly something leapt within her. With a rush Joan's face grew scarlet. She gave a little choked cry of utter, overwhelming joy—"Man-Daddy! oh, Man-Daddy!" For there in the hall, taking off his hat was Man-Daddy. Everything steadied suddenly to the real joyous life of every-day. Joan hurled herself against his legs and hugged them. But Man-Daddy stooped and unclasped her arms impatiently.

"Run and play, Joan; I'm going upstairs."

Joan stared through her roughened hair. "We—we haven't had one 'Good-morning' Man-Daddy," she said, and she gripped Babblewags' head till it grew all lumpy.

He patted her cheek. "Good-morning, dear. Be a good little girl, Joan, and go and play"; and he was off upstairs, walking silently, without a glance back.

Joan watched him till he turned the corner, and then she fled through the breakfast-room, a great sob bursting from her throat, out into the garden, and straight to the bed of violets over in the shady corner by the apple tree. There she flung herself down and wrestled it out. The waters of desolation went over her head as she lay there. There was no one in all the great big world now but her and Babblewags. They would have to live alone for ever and ever and ever.

But the little violets swayed lovingly towards the small, tragic figure prone in their midst; they wrapped her round with their fragrance, closer and closer, till at last it stole to her brain, and Joan sat up, tear-stained, dishevelled, but with a glimmering of hope struggling to life in her eyes. Anyway, the brown bear had gone. Joan knew he would never come into the garden amongst the flowers. Babblewags was very wet. She hoped he would not catch cold. She looked at the violets.

"Oh, dear little shy ladies," she said, "it's a horridful day!"

The violets whispered their sympathy, and Joan was a little bit comforted.

"Mother's ill," she said, "and Man-Daddy's gone, and nurse —Oh, little shy ladies, it's the mostest horridfulest day for ever and ever and ever!"

It was a queer day, too. All sorts of bewildering things seemed happening. Joan was not much surprised to see a stranger walk across the breakfast room and go out of the door into the hall. The stranger wore a grey dress with white collar and cuffs, and a white cap with long streamers behind. Nurse dressed very much the same. Joan sighed deeply. She took the most pessimistic view of things to-day. As a rule, she was a born optimist. "I 'spose nurse has gone away to get married like cook, and that's my new nurse," she said. She frowned heavily. "I won't call her nurse, anyway," she murmured, "I'll call her—thing!"

She flung Babblewags from her because he looked shocked. She turned to the violets. "Dear little shy ladies in blue," she wheedled, "you're not shocked, are you?"

The violets were very still.

"You see, she's not my own nice cushiony nurse, little shy ladies," Joan coaxed; "she's a horridful bad old thing!"

The violets kept quite still.

"Oh, you're not shocked! Oh, please, I must call her that! I must call her thing—oh, I must!" Joan urged tragically.

And the violets bowed their heads in sorrow.

Then Joan knew that she was indeed deserted by all the world.

She flung herself down in a passion of grief; but she cried, "I will call her it! I will! I will!"

"Miss Joan! Miss Joan!" The comforting voice came floating like rare music across the garden.

Joan sat up.

"Where are you, dearie? Miss Joan!"

Once more the blood rushed in a wave of keenest relief to Joan's tear-stained face. She tingled with the joy of it from head to foot. She stumbled headlong to her feet. In the distance she could see the short, broad figure that just then was more beautiful to her than a legion of angels.

Joan's legs twinkled desperately down the garden path. She hurled herself against the white apron, and this time she was picked up into warm, comfortable arms that held her close.

"Poor dear," nurse was saying, "it's a shame! She's been crying——"

Joan wished she had not said that.

"Only little wee squeezy tears, nurse," she explained, her fat arms round nurse's neck; "almost dry ones, not real wet lots!"

"I've got something to tell you, dearie," nurse said; "you'd never guess."

"Is—is it a nice thing?" said Joan, with new-born suspicion.

"Oh, lovely, dear! Something you've wanted ever so bad. I'd best tell you, I think, for you'd never guess."

Joan was not up to her usual form just then. "Yes, tell me," she said languidly, "and keep on squeezing me, nurse."

"Well, what would you say to a little brother, Miss Joan?"

"I think I'd say, 'Come and play football,'" said Joan earnestly.

"He won't be doing that yet awhile," said nurse; "such a fine baby he is, Miss Joan——"

Joan struggled erect.

"A baby, nurse?" She pinched nurse's shoulder wildly. Joan adored babies. She had not realised a baby in nurse's allusion to a little brother. She had regarded it as a mere abstract question.

"Why, yes, dearie! A sweet little brother."

"For me, nurse? A real live baby?"

"Yes, dearie. Don't pinch so."

Joan butted her yellow head ecstatically into her shoulder. She made queer, breathless little noises of bewildered joy. Then she looked up again. "Where is he, nurse?"

"He's asleep in mother's room, dear. You may come and have a peep if you will promise to creep——"

"Oh!" Joan flung her arms round her neck. "Oh, the duckiest!" she gasped.

In the corridor outside mother's room they met Man-Daddy. He caught Joan up and hugged her. "We didn't have half a 'Good-morning,'" he said: "it was all the new baby's fault, little woman."

Joan clasped his neck with forgiving arms. She never bore ill-will: she was as sweet as her own little bed of violets.

"I'm going to see—him," she whispered.

"Are you? Be very quiet, dear. Mother must go to sleep again."

Joan looked into his face with stricken eyes. She had forgotten.

"Is her head very bad?" she said.

"Not now, Joan." He kissed her soft neck. "I'm off to Kilbury," he said; "I should have been there two hours ago. I'll be back soon, Chubbyite."

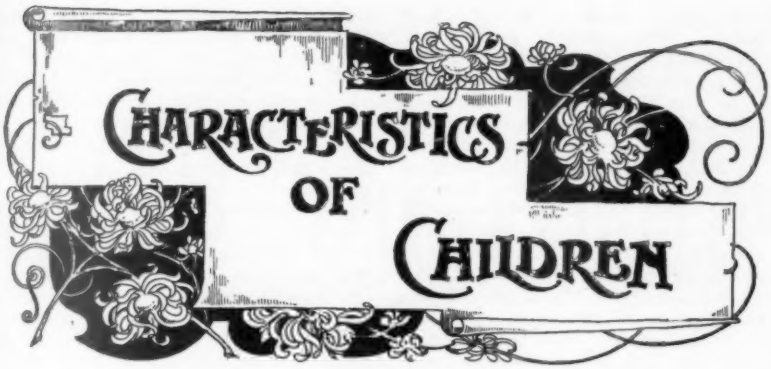
Joan crept into the bedroom. The person in the grey dress and white cap was sitting there. But Joan had no eyes for her. Her eyes, big and eager, went straight to her mother. And mother smiled, and the "thing" drew back the sheet, and there, on her mother's arm, was the baby. Joan looked. She did not say a word. Her heart—her soul—every bit of Joan was in a turmoil. All her motherly instinct—and in this chubby Joan it was big and strong—was going out to the little red bit of a baby lying there asleep. She could hardly breathe. She could not speak. But suddenly she stretched out her arms to him.

"You mustn't wake him," said that hateful "thing" in grey.

Joan looked at her mother.

"You may kiss him very gently, dear," she said.

Joan bent and kissed the red cheek.



And then nurse took her away.

Outside nurse said smilingly, "Well, what do you think of him?"

Joan looked up at her. "Oh!" she said.

"'I'm going to see—him,' she whispered."

A PAPER FOR PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

By a Former Diocesan Inspector of Schools.

EDUCATION involves the "drawing out" of all the natural powers given by God to man. These may be summed up under the three heads of physical (which concerns the body), intellectual (which has to do with the mind), and moral or spiritual (in which the soul takes part). The education of an infant belongs to the mother, and may begin in the first few weeks of its life. As the child grows, both parents and all the members of the home share, more or less consciously, in drawing out, or developing, the child's powers. Presently its education is partly entrusted to others—day school and Sunday school teachers, for instance; but still the hours at home during which the child is being to some extent educated by its environment are at least double those spent under the tuition of others. It is well, then, that all who have to do with children should study their dispositions as a help to the rightful training or education of the same. All children have some common traits, but most have some distinctive characteristics which require special treatment.

I. THE PHYSICAL. The body of a child is in a constant state of restless activity. Like all animals, it wants to be always moving. It crawls, or walks, or runs about incessantly. A wise teacher will utilise this activity by directing it aright. By easy drill and simple gymnastics each member of the body may be trained to develop its full usefulness, the result of which will be healthy limbs. So with the eye and the hand. The training of these by kindergarten methods is of the greatest importance, and will develop accuracy, neatness, painstaking, and observation, which will be of the utmost value as years go by.

Another physical faculty is that of imitation. A little babe soon learns to laugh when its mother laughs, and for the first few years of its life does everything mostly by imitation. It speaks and sings, and talks and laughs, as those about it do. The child is always observing, and watching, and thinking of what it sees and hears; and, as far as it can, copies its teacher. How is this faculty to be trained? Surely by setting before it always the best models of accurate and good words, of true and noble conduct. All unkind words, all angry looks, must be restrained, and an atmosphere of love be shown. Harsh words from one parent to the other, kicks to a troublesome dog, blows as a punishment to a disobedient child, will be noticed and copied, when the opportunity comes. The tone of a parent's voice even will pervade a whole family.

II. THE INTELLECTUAL. Keenness of inquiry comes only second to the keenness of observation already spoken of. A child is always asking, How or why did this happen? What is this? When shall we have this or that? This inquisitiveness is one of the most charming things in a child's nature, and must be encouraged and not repressed. But the teacher must not be afraid of saying "I don't know." Far better to find out the answer and satisfy the child than to put it off by saying, "Don't ask questions." Keenness of memory is also most valuable. When the mind is fresh and vigorous it should be stored with what is good and lasting. How many an aged person in a long illness has been comforted by the psalms and hymns and prayers learned in his childhood! Keenness of receptivity is near akin to keenness of belief. A child's mind is like a clean sheet of paper. We can write on it what we will. How careful, then, should all be, who have to do with it, that the impressions are such as shall last! The Christian teacher will take care to impress on the child's mind clear, distinct, and accurate thoughts of God, his Heavenly Father, and of Him Who loves him and gave Himself for him. Nor must we forget keenness of imagination, which often plays such a large part in a child's life. Children love fairy stories and games in which they "pretend." Care must be taken that the moral of the stories should always be good, and the "pretend" games should have to do with pleasant and not gruesome incidents - weddings rather than funerals!

III. THE MORAL AND SPIRITUAL. Children by nature are full of love. They love those who first love them. Nothing is easier than to gain a child's love. They must love something. A doll, a toy, a kitten, will all be loved in turn; and a child comforted by its mother will always return a mother's love. This love must be used to direct the thoughts to the love that is everlasting and cannot change: for

> "She may forgetful be,
> Yet will I remember thee."

Docility is another moral trait. Like climbing plants, children can be easily trained if taken young enough. Care must be taken not to give a twist the wrong way. A teacher's manner, voice, expression of countenance, all help in the training. One who has been taught to obey will in after life be the best to rule. Obedience must be insisted on and enforced in early life, and it will come naturally as the child grows older.

A child's faith also is marvellous. From the first day of its life it believes in its mother. Nor does that faith lessen as years go on, unless the mother herself has shaken it by broken promises or want of sympathy. The father naturally cannot see so much of the child as the mother, but if he will only use his opportunities, on holiday afternoons or Sunday's quiet hours, to interest himself in his children's pursuits, his influence over them will be great, and their trust in him unbounded. "My father's at the helm" will be an every-day thought in such a household. It should be an axiom in every family of young children that the parents can do no wrong. There ought to be a like faith in the teacher, who should be to the child the embodiment of all that is wise and kind and good outside its own home. And this faith may then be directed to Him Who is the all-good and all-wise. Even a child has often longings and yearnings for things beyond what this world can give. These can only be satisfied by faith in God and heaven.

There is a natural reverence in most children which deserves notice. It is the outward expression of inward thoughts, and can be easily trained. Folding the hands and closing the eyes in prayer can be learned at the mother's knee. A careful and quiet reading of the Scriptures, and reverent use of holy names and places, can be taught both at home and school. No jests about sacred things should be allowed. Sunday should be a holy day as well as a rest day, and the whole tone of the house help to train the child for eternity.

Everything young is beautiful: the playful kitten, the budding rose, the early spring flowers. But what is so beautiful as a little child—so bright, so gay, so innocent, so full of faith and love and unselfishness? Ours be it, then, at home and school, to train these children for God. Then, when the end of all things comes, we can look up with happy confidence to the Judge and say, "Behold, I and the children whom Thou hast given me."

I. W. GEDGE.

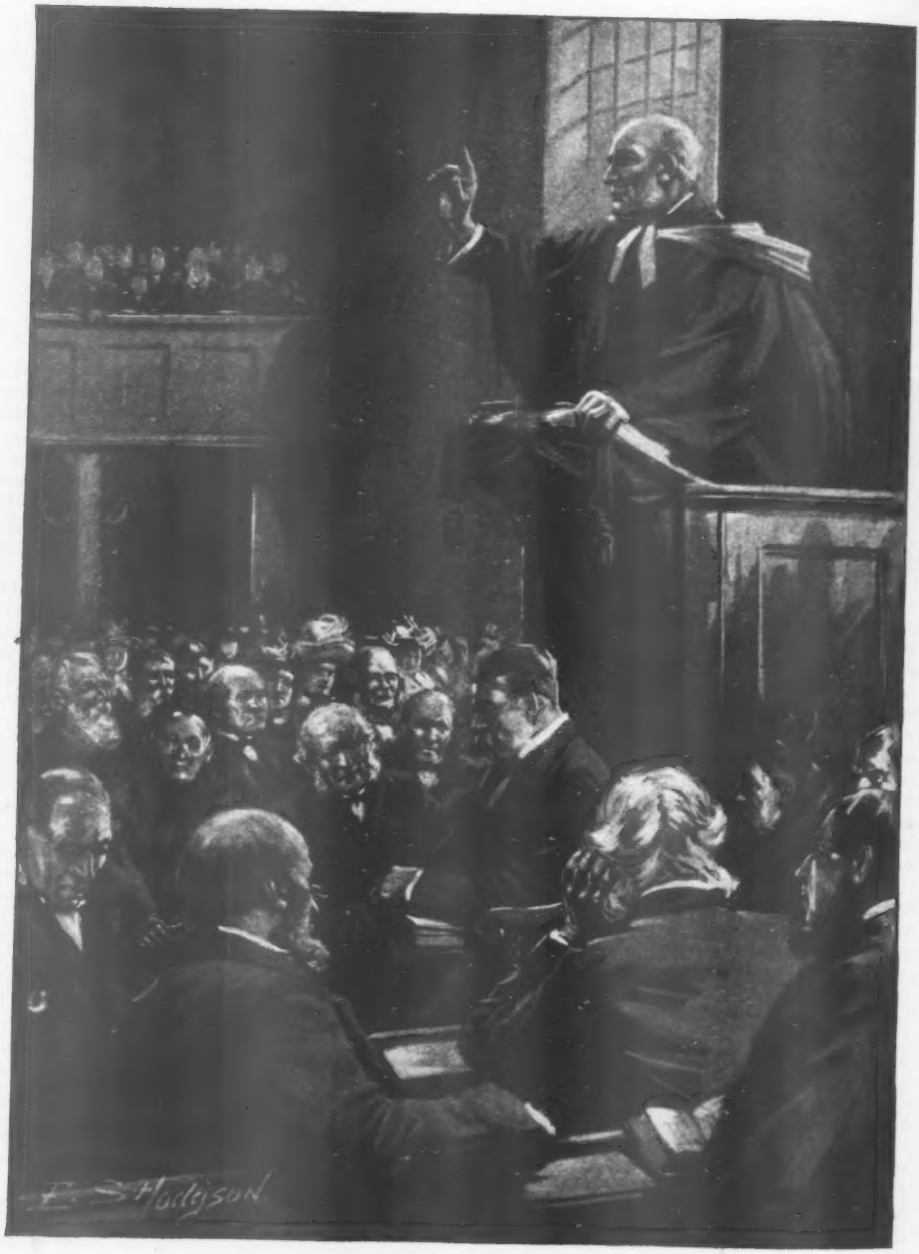
BACK TO THE FOLD

By James Miller.

THE KIRK door had been left open, to give the sweet scent from the flowers in the manse garden a free entrance, and the voice of the preacher could easily be heard far down the loaning road. It was such a morning as one delights to associate with the country Sabbath; the air fresh and fragrant after the cooling influences of a night's rain, and the sun shining out in its full splendour. Hundreds of roses of every colour hung on the bushes clinging to the kirk walls, and bees, birds, and butterflies charmed the ear with the most delightful melodies as they roamed lazily amongst them. The glebe cows, sleepily lying amidst the clover chewing their cud, inclined their heads towards the kirk, as if aware that an extra interest circled round it to-day.

The village itself was deserted, and the little kirk full as it had not been since the day on which our old minister preached his retiring sermon. For one of our own boys, who since he used to guddle in the Knaeck Burn had grown to great prominence in the ecclesiastical world, was adorning our pulpit in his Doctor's hood, and telling in as simple language as he used to long ago, when, a raw divinity student, he occasionally gave us "his word," that grand story of the love of One and the cruelty of many.

We, away up among the hills of Scotland, like above all things to have the true Gospel preached to us. A mistaken idea seems to have got abroad in our present-day universities that our forte is Biblical argument through six or seven heads. On the contrary, it goes quite "against the grain" with us to have to listen to a young man, fresh from the divinity hall, endeavouring to prove by "up-to-date" reasoning that this or that belief of our fathers was wholly wrong. The Doctor, however, spoke as from heart to heart, and we, to a man, followed word for word.



A weather-beaten, road-stained tramp, a man who could have passed for any age, wearily dragging one stockingless foot after another, comes within range of the preacher's voice, glances furtively around, and, seeing he is unwatched, creeps close to the wall to listen. What sin-shaken penitent could withstand the words of the preacher to-day? He unfolds the scene on the cross, and speaks of man's inhumanity then, man's inhumanity still. His voice is quivering with fervour, his face aglow with a fierce desire, as he utters the pleading words:

"Brothers, sisters! Know ye, you are crucifying Him still? Every step in forbidden paths since at a mother's knee you were taught to call Him 'Jesus, Saviour,' is another nail to hands and feet."

Within the kirk more than one hearer prayed as he sat for forgiveness at the hands of his Maker, and even the attitude of the lonely wanderer underwent a change. His listless air was gone, and he leant forward, eager to catch every syllable; such a power has that wondrous story over the most degraded.

Old Watty, the beadle, coming out after the sermon finished to be in readiness with the parish magazine as the congregation retires, sees him still standing thus, and hastens towards him. Watty is a true Samaritan of the old school, and at all times he endeavours to live up to the command given by his Lord and Master: "Go, and do thou likewise." At the first signs of his approach the tramp would fain have slunk away, but Watty possesses one of those God-given countenances which inspire confidence in whatever strait you meet them.

"Ye're lookin' geily used up na, and I

"The Doctor spoke as from heart to heart."—p. 407.

dinna doot but ye're as hungry as ye're tired. Man, if ye jist hing aboot till the kirk skails, I'll tak' ye ower tae my hoose close by, and gi'e ye a bit lift on your road."

The wanderer hesitates. It is long since he has known kindness, and yet he feels he should hurry on.

"When ye come the length that I am, sir, ye're almost past caring for being bodily tired or bodily hungry. There's ae thing I wid ask ye though, seeing ye're sae kindly spoken: could you tell me whar I'll get a sicht o' that meenister's face?"

"I'll promise mair than that, if ye but promise tae step ower-by. He's coming tae see us i' efternin, so ye wid could hae a crack wi'm then. There noo! jist step ower among the stanes while they're skailin'. I'll come roond for ye ance I've got a'thing red-up. The fowk'll a' pass oot the ither wiy. They'll hae too muckle tae crack aboot this day tae mind coming roond tae look for ony-thing new."

The paraphrase ended, and Watty hirpled off to his duties. For a minute his com-panion stood undecided, but the first foot on the doorstep convinced him, and he dragged himself round to the back of the kirk.

After the last worshipper has given his "Guid day wi' ye then, Watty," and taken himself to the other side of the kirkyaird-dyke, the beadle beckons Mary his wife (she has had to bide at home to-day to make ready for the visit of the great preacher) from the doorway of their little cottage close by, and together they persuade the wayfarer to repair thither.

"Stap in man, stap in," says Watty, "and mak' yersel' at hame. The hoose o' Watty Shearer is ever open tae them wha are findin' this world a sare trauchle."

They soon worked such a change in their guest as would have made it difficult to recognise the old man in the new; a plenti-ful supply of soap and water and a steaming Scotch dinner are well calculated to brace up nerve and body alike. But Watty had met prodigals before, and sometimes been sorely used in the meeting.

"Maybe ye'll be wantin' tae gang yer ain gait noo, withoot haein' a crack wi' the meenister; I would fel like ye tae stey, but, gin ye're so-bes minded, I'll no' seek tae haud ye back. Here's a bit sma' thing tae help ye along the road."

"You misjudge me there altogether, my good friend. You have treated me as no man has treated me for years. You bring up before my mind a story that often came to me when I was in the lowest dregs, and which I heard first at a loving mother's knee." The stranger's voice had taken on its natural tone now. It was evident he was "schuled." "I must see him, for I believe that I have met him before—long, long ago, and I must speak to him—now or never. You have put possibilities within my reach, and if he walks as he preaches I may yet repay, in part, your kindness."

"Oh! but I'm gled tae hear ye speak like that. Dinna be faird tae open oot tae the Doctor; he's aye ready tae help those wha need it." It is easily seen that Watty's joy is genuine.

Shortly after this the minister knocked, and was ushered by Mary into the best room. She would not allow him into the kitchen, though he would fain have preferred it. He got the story at once from Watty's lips, and without a moment's hesitation went ben to see the wanderer.

What transpired in the room of that little ivy-covered cottage on that beautiful summer day, when Jesus, by the mouth of one of His disciples, pleaded, as of old, for the keeping of a sin-stained soul, no mere human being has a right to know.

Half an hour passed, and then the minister appeared alone, with a far-away look on his face.

"Watty, do you mind when you and I were laddies, and the pranks we used to carry through together?"

"Aye, fine that, sir; mony a' ane, and we're nane the waur for't."

"Do you mind the chap you fought, and worsted, when he told you you couldn't jump the Knaeck Burn above the mill?"

"Eh, div I no'? Often have I thocht o' Wullie Reid! They say he j'ined the sodgers, but I'm sare dootin' he's in a bad way noo, whare'er he be. But whey dae ye gang back on they auld days, sir?"

"Watty!" (the Doctor's voice was quivering, and he fell into the dialect) "he's ben the hoose; he's the stranger you were the 'good Samaritan' to to-day. Just a minute though. Dinna gang awa ben in sic a hurry. You didn't recognise him, and I didn't recognise him, so it's not likely anyone else would. He's anxious to start anew in his native village. Need anyone know how he came to it to-day?"

"Ye've fairly ta'en awa my braith, sir, and me ne'er tae notice. It bates a'. Noo I ken why I wis sae anxious for ye tae see him. But, gin I dinna manage tae bring him back among oorsel's withoot onybody being a bit the wiser, my name's no' Watty Shearer."

And so it was. In God's good providence He had seen fit to bring these three old school-day chums together again under such circumstances. Truly His ways are wonderful, and past all finding out!

STRENGTH AND BEAUTY.

By
The Rev. C. Silvester Horne.

"Strength and beauty are in His sanctuary. . . . Give unto the Lord glory and strength."—PSALM xcvi 6-7.

THE leading suggestion of this beautiful passage is that we should give to God as we receive from Him. That the highest form of worship is less in what we say than in what we are, and that what we are depends on our attitude to God. According to the teaching of this psalm, worship is not a lifeless formality, but a life-giving and life-receiving activity—intense, real, passionate. Worship is growth—it is a process of becoming. It is a consecration and surrender of thought and life; it is the aspiration and the veritable ascension of the spirit; it is a resurrection out of the worldly and the sensual into the pure, unselfish spiritual life. There is no possibility of mistake as to the psalmist's meaning, for he is careful to repeat and explain himself. "Give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name." "The glory due unto His name" is further described in the next verse as the "beauty of holiness." Give unto the Lord this glory and strength. For all strength and beauty are revealed and bestowed in His sanctuary, in the exercise of true worship. This is to be my theme in this paper. The highest life is a combination of strength and beauty; and that highest life is the gift of the sanctuary; it is unattainable apart from the spirit of worship.

I take first the proposition that the highest life is a combination of strength and beauty. It is almost singular how we have come to divorce these two qualities as if they were irreconcilables. Yet it does not admit of question that not only the Hebrew ideal embraced them both, but the creed of ancient art in its noblest era associated the perfection of beauty with the perfection of strength. The sculptor honoured magnificence and majesty in the human frame: he revealed the beauty that lay in limbs that denoted a sense of power. It is only later on that we begin to see ideals contrasting themselves. One painter worships soft loveliness, and his imagination riots in luxuriance of colouring; but another still upholds the ideal of the majestic, and about his work there is a restraint and even austerity. That is how the ideals of Raphael and Michelangelo perpetually contrast themselves. And the pre-eminence of the latter is just here: that he never wearies of insisting that strength is inseparable from the highest beauty. The graceful, the lovely, the charming, the exquisite, are not irreconcilable with what is soft and weak. But the highest beauty is strong, noble, magnificent. You remember, some of you, how Mr. Ruskin enforced the complementary truth in his teaching about architecture. In the rudest forms of building, a strong arch was constructed by laying a huge square stone slab across two huge square upright pillars. When it was complete it had certainly the aspect of durability. Plain it was and ugly, but surely, said the builder, it could not, at any rate, be stronger. On the contrary, arches did not become strong until they became beautiful. It was only when the curved line of beauty was discovered that the secret of strength was discovered too. Your exquisite Gothic window arch was not only a joy and a delight to the beholder, but it was capable of sustaining great weight of wall above it. You might lose the sense of its strength in the sense of its beauty, but the fact remained that beauty and strength had been discovered together. Or again, you will remember how the old pillars of ancient temples were made thick and square, and squat and ugly. But then came the discovery that you did not detract from strength if you built a more tapering pillar and adorned it with carved capitals, or fluted it from base to summit. There is no antagonism between strength and beauty. This psalmist is in agreement with the thought of the apostle, who wrote, "I will make thee a pillar in the temple of my God." To sustain the work and worship and service of God as a very pillar in His sanctuary it is not needful to be hard, or rude, or coarse, or assertive: you can demonstrate your strength without sacrificing the beauty of character. Because you are strong you are not disqualified from being holy; because you are holy it is no reason why you should be weak and foolish. The God-given life is strong and beautiful: give therefore "unto the Lord glory and strength."

I am concerned to press upon my readers less that strength is consistent with beauty than that beauty is consistent with strength—nay, that in its highest form beauty is inseparable from strength. We are familiar in the world with so many shapes and fashions of fragile loveliness: butterfly beauty that the softest touch of a finger will mar beyond all remedy; exquisiteness of bloom and flower that the first breath of shrewd wind or frost blight and wither. But I am here to maintain the ideal which governed the art of Michelangelo: that the truest and highest beauty is not the beauty of weakness but of strength, and not the beauty of evanescence but of durability. And before I begin to speak of that highest of all forms of beauty, which is called here the beauty of holiness, let me interpose a word of warning against confounding the appearance with the reality of strength. The strongest forces in this world are not those that confront us in seeming durability in marble, or granite, or adamant. We know that there are influences in this world that subdue even the so-called everlasting hills; that have levelled, slowly but surely, giant mountains to diminutive mounds. When you inquire what these influences are, you are told of the air, and of water in rain, and snow, and dew; and possibly of that intangible element that we call fire—air, water, fire, and a viewless energy which eludes all our inquiries and which we call electricity, as a cloak to cover the nakedness of our ignorance. These which are so changeful in the forms they assume, these which will not abide your question nor stand the impress of your hand—air, water, light, fire, electricity—these are where strength lies to fashion worlds, and these clothe the worlds they fashion with incomparable beauty. So insubstantial and yet so mighty! Invisible nothings creating visible everythings. Seeming strength is, we see, helpless in the hands of these elements, which again seem to have no might at all. In this vast sanctuary of the universe, the secrets of strength and beauty do go inviolably hand in hand.

Now I am going to ask you to be good enough to apply what I have been saying to this beauty which we all covet, "the beauty of holiness." This is the glory of man as it is the glory of God, and it is man's chief end to glorify God by presenting before Him this spiritual beauty. Let us admit at once that nothing is so indefinable. This that we call holiness is the least tangible and substantial of all qualities. It is an effluence, it is an aroma, subtle, mystic, felt not seen, recognised less by the intellect than by the heart. And yet I do venture to assume that this saintly quality, this aroma of the selfless life, this effluence of love, is the most amazing power in God's universe. It was this "something," which to the materialist is nothing, which was the reason why, when all the prison disciplinarians had failed to produce the faintest impression upon the Inferno of old Newgate, turned its blasphemous uproar to awed silence in the presence of Elizabeth Fry. But that, I take it for granted, you will admit. What I want to urge is, that this beauty of character is only found in combination with strength of character. Nothing is more necessary in these days of the culture of various fashions of piety than to grasp clearly that there can be no true piety apart from a foundation of sound and strong principle. It would puzzle me to find a tendency of the present day in the religious world more prominent than the tendency to confound spirituality with pietism. It is, perhaps, only another way of saying that emotion, rather than principle, rules the religious life, the very secret of instability of character and conduct in our churches. That which attracts is not really "the beauty of holiness," but the mere prettinesses of pietism. This is what answers in the Evangelical sphere to the ritualistic and æsthetic prettinesses which Archbishop Laud and his successors have confounded with "the beauty of holiness." But beauty of this highest fashion is the crown of strength—strength of conviction, strength of moral principle, strength of devotion to duty, strength of love.

If you will allow the illustration, there is a distinction which we all recognise between what is pretty and what is beautiful in relation to the human countenance. There is a mere prettiness which can go, and often does go, with poverty and insipidity of character. But there is no beautiful countenance apart from a certain elevation and nobility of spirit; there is no beauty of countenance apart from strength of character; there is no beauty of countenance apart from soul. That which gives beauty is the inward light, the play of feeling, the expression of noble seriousness and dignity of moral life; and, above all, the aspect of reverence and faith. Beauty and strength belong peculiarly to this sanctuary of the spirit, where life is touched to sublimity by the consciousness of the presence of Deity. Nothing is more needed in our modern churches than this "beauty of holiness," where firm and strenuous principles form the very foundations of piety. I cannot tell you how much I come to dread the pietism which is a form of emotionalism, or that is even tainted with the hysterical. All Agapemone lunacies and sensationalism are the issue of it, and in some of its forms it is perilously attractive. But I confess it suggests to me that parable of Coleridge's of the phosphorescent waves of the tropics, which are made lustrous by a sort of diseased or decayed matter—luminous by their very rottenness. There is a hectic hue about some religions which is brilliant, but which one knows to be ominous of anything but health. No, my brothers, it is the beauty of health we want, not the unnatural brightness of disease. Those words, health and holiness, holiness and wholeness, have a common root. Oh, worship the Lord in the beauty of health—the health of the spirit! Worship the Lord with healthy mind and will, conscience and heart! Oh, Divine Healer, give us back the health of the soul! Cleanse us from its diseases, that we may present before our God, as "the glory due unto His name," a whole manhood, strong and pure and active, beautiful with the beauty of health.

You men and women who read these words—what is it in religion that attracts you? Is it its ornate and æsthetic setting? Is it the picturesqueness of its ritual? Is it a certain pride, perhaps of eloquence, in your popular preacher? What is it in religion that attracts you? Was it not prophesied of the Messiah that when He came He would have no beauty that men should desire Him; that is to say, no beauty as the world looked for it and esteemed it? When men began to come to Christ out of a vulgar curiosity, He turned round upon them and told them in awful terms the law of sacrifice; and they said, "These are hard sayings," and they went away and walked no more with Him. He was too strong for them; His message was too strong meat; He announced a law of life that meant the very crucifixion of the old selfish nature in them. They saw no beauty in this strength. Think of His appeal! He never held out the glittering crown and said, "Come!" Anyone can see the brilliance of this. But He held out a cross and said, "Come: take up the cross and follow Me." They could see no beauty in that. The message was too strong, and they did not know that in its strength was its beauty. And you—why are you interested in religion, and what is it that attracts you? Do you like ingenious spiritualisings of simple sayings, prettinesses of illustration, and so forth? Or have you come because the grand, noble, austere demands of the Gospel are as life unto your soul? Have you come to be humbled and awed, searched and tried? Have you come to receive such principles of thought and conduct as will give order and power to your life, and make you to fear no face of man, but to live out your life in the light at any and every cost? Is it the Cross of Jesus Christ that has won you? Are you drawn unto Him Who was lifted up that you may be lifted up indeed to share His very sacrificial spirit and dedication to the service of man? That is the question. Any attraction but the attraction of the Cross is unworthy. I hear to-day in quarters not a few the question, What will draw? And the answer is, Beautiful music, elegant ritual, poetical preaching, social amenities. Oh, it is not for me to despise any means that may lead any soul nearer to God and happiness! But the old words are in my ears: "I, if I be lifted up, will draw—all men unto Me!" Think of that. Within the sanctuary of Christ it is the Cross that has an irresistible beauty. The strength and the beauty go hand in hand.

My space is filled, and what I proposed to say about the influence of the sanctuary, the influence of sacred thought and common worship to produce this noble combination of strength and beauty, must remain unsaid. But this I must be allowed to say: if the worshipper's strength become rude and cold and hard, he has lost the influence of the sanctuary. If the worshipper's beauty cease, and honour and principle become weak and characterless, he has lost the influence of the sanctuary. Without reverence there is no beauty of manhood; nay, and without love, none, none. I know that to-day men praise the strength of will, of energy; and I have no dispraise for that, until it becomes one of the "idols" of the market-place. Mere strength of will is not by any means always beautiful: it is not seldom hard and brutal. Love is the stronger force when all is said, and love is beautiful. Matthew Arnold's lines contain a haunting truth:

> "I, too, have longed for trenchant force
> And will, like a dividing spear;
> Have praised the keen, unscrupulous course
> Which knows no doubt, which feels no fear.
>
> "But in the world I learnt what there
> Thou, too, wilt surely one day prove:
> That will, that energy, though rare,
> Are yet far, far less rare than love."

The love which is the gift of Christ, the love of God, spread abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost given unto us—oh, covet it, pray for it, welcome it, give it hospitality! For here is strength and beauty: a love far deeper than man's deepest hate, stronger than death and hell; and beautiful, radiant, the essence of sainthood. Covet it; and the day will come when you who have sought it with prayers and tears, will have found it unaware; and others, beholding your strength of principle and beauty of soul, will say with the psalmist, "Strength and beauty are in His sanctuary."

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XII.

Basil Pierpoint, curate-in-charge of Lynton St. Maurice, visiting his church one evening with a friend, finds a girl, a stranger, writing in the parvise chamber. His peremptory manner of requesting her departure rouses her wrath. The girl, Evelyn Retallack, a High School mistress, out on a holiday with two friends, is engaged in writing a story. In her anger she now resolves to pillory Pierpoint therein. As all Lynton St. Maurice is Retallack property, the girl's name rouses interest in Pierpoint and others. His friend, Claude Winwood, visiting Lyntonstowe, the Retallacks' place, meets Snell, the old librarian. From him he learns that Colonel Retallack had two sons: John, who, by refusal to obey his father's wishes, had been disinherited, and Arthur, who had obeyed, had married the heiress of the neighbouring property of Lynton St. Mary, and died, leaving one daughter, Elinor. Almost immediately afterwards Colonel Retallack was killed in a carriage accident, leaving Elinor his sole heiress. Circumstances incline Winwood to suspect Evelyn's close relationship to Colonel Retallack, and a chance meeting of the four young people in the parvise chamber reveals the fact that Evelyn and Elinor are first cousins. This meeting ends in an unlucky contretemps, whereby Evelyn and Pierpoint are delayed till late in the church by reason of a violent thunderstorm. Next day Elinor comes to see her cousin and to invite her to Lyntonstowe.

CHAPTER XIII.

AT WORK.

EVELYN was destined not to pay that visit next day to Lyntonstowe. When the carriage arrived for her, all that returned with it was a note from Alice, explaining how Evelyn had that morning had a telegram from her uncle, Dr. Meredith, summoning her up to town: her mother was taken suddenly ill.

Very seriously ill Evelyn found Mrs. Retallack, and she had not time for any thoughts but to tend her mother for the first few days after her return to London. Then a change for the better set in, and Evelyn's spirits rose. Soon Mrs. Retallack was so far recovered that Evelyn, sitting at her bedside, was able to tell her many details of the summer holidays which had not found their way into her letters. The chief and most absorbing piece of intelligence, too, had never been written, owing to her sudden departure from Lynton St. Maurice. Mrs. Retallack received the news of Elinor Retallack's introduction to her cousin, and speedy recognition of her, in very quiet fashion. Evelyn, her mother being still weak and ill, had approached the subject very carefully, as soon as her uncle, Dr. Meredith, allowed her to do so.

"Tell her gently," he said. "Yes, you are right—she ought to know, and she has a steady soul."

Dr. Meredith looked curiously at his niece as he spoke. He was a hard-working man, and, like his sister, of a steady nature. He had very little opinion of the Retallack family, as far as he knew anything of them.

But even before she had made all this known to her mother Evelyn had felt it incumbent on her to write to Elinor Retallack to explain her sudden departure and consequent inability to accept the offered hospitality. As, in their brief interview, Evelyn had not addressed her cousin by any name, she now felt a slight awkwardness as to how she could begin the letter. Eventually she wrote "Dear Cousin Elinor."

By return of post came a letter from Elinor, full of regrets that the acquaintance just begun should have been so sadly interrupted, and expressing an earnest hope that they would meet again at no far future date. At the end she sent her love to her "Aunt."

When Evelyn began her recital to her mother, there was a little visible start. Mrs. Retallack heard all the rest with her usual quietness.

"I am glad you have met your cousin," was all she said.

A woman of strong character, married to a man of excitable temperament, she had early learned that her part in life was to act as ballast to the household. She did not follow her daughter's flights of imagination or of optimism, but kept ever in a more level way.

Now, when Evelyn read Elinor's letter and message, the "Aunt" received it with a little smile but no words.

"If they were to ask me to stay with them, mother? What do you think? Shall I go?"

"It might be well to wait for the invitation first, would it not, Evelyn?" returned her mother.

"Of course," laughed the girl, "but one must be prepared for either fate, must not one? I only wish to know—would you object?"

"Object to your visiting your father's home? Certainly not. I should be pleased that you should go."

"And you, mother, would you go?"

Mrs. Retallack lay back on her pillow for a moment, and was silent. The girl fixed her dark eyes on her mother's face. Mrs. Retallack turned a little, and smiled at her, a quiet little smile.

"I think I am tired now, dear; talking soon exhausts me, and—is it not time for my medicine?"

Evelyn sprang to her feet full of contrition. She understood when a subject was closed with her mother, whose very quietude and reserve of manner kept the daughter silent at times when she longed to speak.

There seemed no reason for writing again to Elinor Retallack, and that episode ended.

When, a week later, Alice and Judith returned to the suburb of London where was their school, they found Mrs. Retallack much better and the first alarm over.

A year or so before, when Evelyn had become a teacher in the aforenamed suburban High School, Mrs. Retallack had taken a house in the neighbourhood and, in order to eke out her small income, had accepted as boarders Alice Kenyon and Judith Kyle, two of the other mistresses at the High School. Hence the somewhat incongruous set of friends. For, had not these three lived in daily intercourse, it is very questionable whether they would ever have drifted into even the loose comradeship which held them together. There were, of course, degrees in that alliance. Alice's affectionate nature readily responded to the devotion which Judith felt for her. Intellectually, they had little in common. Alice, though clear-headed, was of only mediocre talent, while Judith was a clever woman; but she required someone on whom to pour out the tenderness of her nature, a tenderness which lay deep and fiery beneath a crusty exterior. Alice, in her gentleness and sweetness, supplied this want. In another way, too, she was a foothold in life for Judith. Her simple and sincere goodness, the fact that religion guided every thought and act of her life, was of wonderful comfort to Judith, over whose soul at times rolled dark clouds of doubt and difficulty. The tie, then, between these two was close and intimate.

Alice, to whom it came easy to be affectionate to everybody, cared greatly for Evelyn. The audacious charm of the girl's character, her very outbursts of unreasonableness, her pitiful little mistakes and risings again—in a word, all in her that was daring, unpremeditated and nebulous—caused a lively delight in her society for the more tranquil temperament of the elder girl. Alice had led the small and retired life of a country clergyman's daughter. To her, brought up on very limited means, every penny was of value, every moment of time had its use. Her life was narrow, but she walked therein contentedly, and it brought no uncharitableness. Her aspirations were far less wide-reaching, her content much greater than Evelyn's or Judith's. But she possessed that rarest of talents, a knowledge of her own limitations. Once she had drawn a laughing comparison of herself and her two friends:

"It isn't a case of the Lion, the Eagle, and the Lamb, as I know you would both like me to say. But Evelyn soars aloft like a skylark viewing prospects I shall never behold, and Judith, as a keen hawk, pursues quarries never for me, while I—I scrape along contentedly, just a barn-door fowl."

"Indeed, if we are to be compared to birds of such flight and prowess, you, Alice, must be something much better than a poor old clucking hen!" cried Evelyn.

"Please," interrupted Alice, "I never said a 'poor old clucking hen'! I said 'a barn-door fowl,' and if I omitted the proper adjectives it was only because I felt they were packed up in the noun somewhere. I should say no 'clucking hen' but a respectable, comfortable, contented, self-respecting Dorking fowl!"

"Well done, Alice!" laughed Evelyn. "Adjectives in Indian file. It sounds like my own style."

"Adjectives are your bane," growled Judith; "they are always a proof of weakness of thought."

Which Evelyn naturally proceeded to combat eagerly, and the debate continued, growing warmer, until, as usual, Alice, the peacemaker, stepped in. Her tact was inexhaustible, and tided over all difficulties.

There is something very depressing in the reaction after holiday-making. Life, too, becomes flat and uninteresting, when, after one brief intense period, half pleasure, half pain, but always full of keen sensations, we fall back once more to the normal, the uneventful. This Basil Pierpoint experienced. His surprise and disappointment were great when, on the afternoon after his last recorded interview, he again called on some pretext—and found Evelyn Retallack gone. Nor had he much time to console himself in the society of her friends; for a day or two after they also left, to spend the remaining ten days of their holidays at their respective homes. Lynton, they confessed to each other, was dull without the third in their trio.

Dulness, however, is a poor and inadequate word to describe the desert waste his parish now presented to the curate-in-charge. He struggled manfully to do his duty, and strove to fill his mind with former thoughts. But there are breezes which sweep through the open windows of the heart, bringing rare perfumes with them, and, though one close the windows, the odours linger long.

Miss Elinor Retallack was a new source of interest. Pierpoint liked her. Her timid manner appealed to him. In fact, had he not but lately broken his old ideal and set up in its place an entirely different model, he would have been compelled to confess that this gentle, shrinking creature—as he read her—was all that a woman should be.

And to think that when a pair of mocking brown eyes are in the protasis, the apodosis, the mind and heart of the beholder, must follow their mood!

Elinor Retallack resumed her class of young girls. She assisted liberally in all the curate's ideas of improvements. She was ever ready to aid him in all his plans to work up what had been, indeed, a rather neglected parish. But, in brief, she was not—her cousin.

Winwood, before he ended his visit to Lynton, took a perverse delight in extolling Miss Retallack of Lyntonstowe. He pointed out her quietude of manner: a quiet manner was an excellent quality in woman; her hand, too, was immaculate; her fingers were never inky; her voice was gentle; and so on.

"Well," returned Pierpoint one day, "I grant all these premises. What is the conclusion?"

"Need there be any?"

"Well, I should have thought so many affirmative propositions would have brought a conclusion in their train."

"It got left behind. Elinor Retallack is a very nice girl."

"Nobody said she wasn't," retorted Pierpoint, descending to colloquialism.

Now even Winwood was gone, and his friend missed him much. Pierpoint tried to make him stay longer, but Winwood declared his work was waiting. What this work of Winwood's was nobody had ever yet found out. Evelyn had once chaffed him about it:

"Of course you spell it with a capital W?"

"No," he replied in his gravest tones, "I write it in italics and put it in parentheses."

"You ought to take up some profession," Pierpoint urged.

"Yes! But, you see, taking up a profession is a serious thing. I must look about me, and not be too precipitate."

"You are certainly not that," replied his friend grimly.

Pierpoint had entered on his own profession some four years before, and Winwood was his senior by a couple of years.

This "work" of Winwood's kept him so busy on his return to town that scarcely any communication passed between the friends, until one morning, some six weeks later, Winwood received a line from Pierpoint, briefly informing him of his intention to arrive in town on the following day.

Business—partly at least, he explained the evening of his arrival, as they dined at Winwood's club, had called him up. He had only a few days to stay, as he could not leave his parish unprovided for.

Winwood lived in very comfortable bachelor quarters. Pierpoint was to be his guest as long as he pleased.

As the two men parted for the night, Pierpoint said carefully:

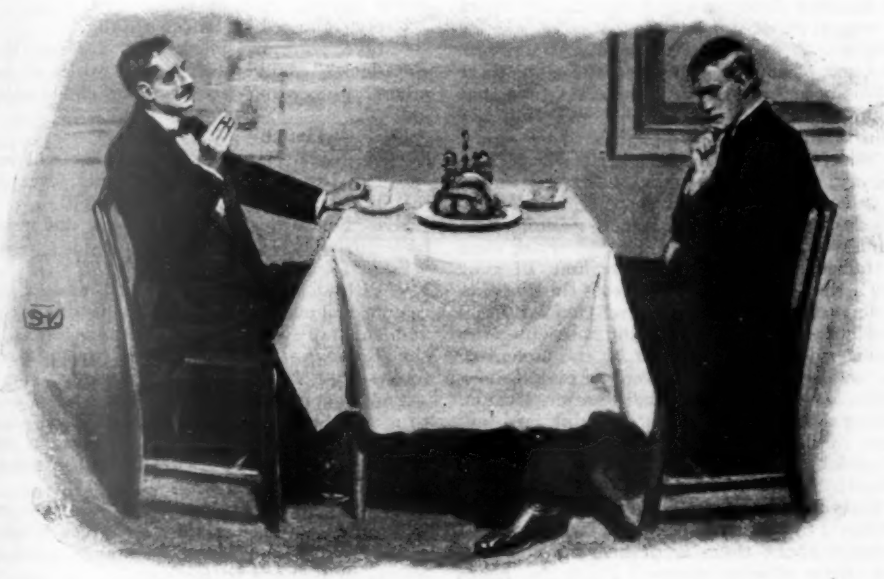
"Have you seen Miss Kenyon or Miss Kyle lately?"

"No; I have never seen any of them since I came up. I have often thought of asking permission to call. I know a cousin of Miss Retallack's very well, Dick Meredith. I really must look them up. But I have been so busy with my work."

"I suppose she is hard at work, too," Basil said to himself.

CHAPTER XIV.

AN IMPOSTOR.



NOW it was the slack time of the day in Letham High School; that is, it was the half-hour after the midday dinner. Such mistresses as had work to do in the afternoon stayed for this meal. It was usually a lively one—at least, if Evelyn were present. On this day she was in high spirits, and had drawn Miss Stubbs, the Third Form mistress, into a lengthened discussion. It was Miss Retallack's delight to fling out a paradox in the face of this lady and lead her on, step by step, by apparently irrefragable statements, until she was landed in a quagmire.

Miss Stubbs believed herself to be a Socialist, chiefly because Miss Grey, the mathematical mistress, was of that persuasion, and Miss Stubbs adored Miss Grey; which adoration the latter lady suffered with a chastened mien. To show her devotion to the cause, Miss Stubbs would every now and then air her views in a slow, repining voice, following the will-o'-the-wisp of Evelyn's arguments and propositions until she found herself sunk in an absurdity; which caused Miss Grey, after writhing for some time at her futility, to utter one biting word. Whereupon poor Miss Stubbs would open her round eyes wide:

"But you said yesterday——"

"Yesterday is never to-day," interrupted Miss Grey caustically.

"There," interposed Evelyn in her most soothing—that is, most mischievous—tones, "you see, Miss Grey is one of the most advanced of her sex. She never says to-day what she said yesterday, and, as she is a mathematician, she understands all about sequence of series, of course, and is fully aware that we have nearly converged, and the most advanced woman of to-day lies just at the back of the first one, and never knows her own mind."

"Business, he explained, had called him up."

Miss Grey laughed. Evelyn's arguments, or rather sallies, she never troubled to combat. But Miss Stubbs began again some wandering reply on the tyranny of mistresses in requiring servants to wear aprons.

"Now," cried Evelyn, leaning back in her chair—for they had returned to the mistresses' room by this time, lunch having been disposed of—"now, waiving all such trumpery arguments in favour of aprons as cleanliness and protection, which, you will allow, are merely forensic, let us get to the main point, the apron proper—that is, pendant from the waist. That I cannot agree to call tyranny; but the bib thereto—ah! there I am with you. The bib, Miss Stubbs, is tyranny, pure tyranny. Shall we start a society for abolishing it, and call it 'The Bib-banishing Band'?"

"But it isn't the bib—it is——"

"Pardon me. Which comes top—bib or apron?"

"Why, bib, of course; how else——"

"Very well. We must begin at the beginning, must we not?"

"Why not the end?" smiled Miss Grey.

"I will discuss that with pleasure, Miss Grey, if you like." Evelyn looked up, a quick change in her voice.

Miss Grey shook her head, and took up a newspaper from the table.

"Now, Miss Stubbs," continued Evelyn to her adversary, "who wear bibs?"

"Why, children, of course, and——"

"Exactly, children. And aprons are worn by women; is it not so?"

"Yes——"

"Also bishops and freemasons don these articles of attire. Hence, you must grant that making a woman wear a bib is treating her as an infant."

"Why, that is what I say. It is just tyranny, and a sign of servitude!"

"Quite so. But bibless aprons, Miss Stubbs, they are the insignia of women, bishops and freemasons. Would you separate our sex, even in thought, from the Church and liberty? Perish the idea! We will discuss the question of the strings another day," added Miss Retallack, rising as at this moment Miss Stubbs' rejoinder was cut off by the advent of tea, an indulgence largely permissible in a mistresses' room. "I think," went on Evelyn, helping herself to sugar, "I think we are many of us still in a very mediæval state of mind."

Judith looked up.

"Have you been reading Tylor?"

"No; I never read books of that sort. I know all about them from hearing you and Miss Grey discuss them. Facts in heaps don't interest me, and I abhor statistics."

"Tylor is a suggestive writer," observed Miss Grey, looking into the fire.

She was a tall, elegant woman, and Evelyn's eyes rested on her with pleasure. She desired Miss Grey's good opinion; but that lady, being of a singular aloofness, never took much notice of Evelyn, except to smile at her sallies.

"She is thinking of what he says about men still in this generation yet living in the Stone Age," said Judith brusquely.

"No, I am not," retorted Evelyn. "Your man refers to savages. But I mean that people outwardly civilised are centuries back in their mode of thought—people who believe in palmistry, for instance."

"Yes," said Miss Grey, "I see what you mean. Persons for whom the methods of the Schoolmen still represent their reasoning powers."

"Yes, people who say, 'I read it in a book,' and that ends all controversy."

The door opened to admit a lanky young woman wrapped in a velvet mantle. She had a kitten in her arms.

"Oh, look at pussy, my pet!" she cried, in rather affected tones. "Is there any milk for her? Oh! have you used it all up, you greedy humans?"

"So sorry!"

"Poor dear! I have just got a new picture of a kitty, from little Bessie Byers—such a sweet kitty! This is my fifty-ninth. Won't you come and see it, Miss Kenyon? It is such a dear! Cats are the only things in the world for me."

Evelyn glanced at her scornfully.

"Have you any marks yet for me, Miss Retallack?" said a very level voice at her elbow, proceeding from a very rigid-looking girl.

Evelyn started.

"Oh, dear! Miss Fox, your voice will pursue me through time and space, ever demanding that which is not—marks!"

Miss Fox adjusted her glasses and asked imperturbably:

"Am I to add up without?"

"Without? Just fancy! And what a nice rebuke I should get then! Well, 'Man is one, and the fates'—that is, my Latin lessons in the Remove—are three per week, therefore——"

And Evelyn, pushing aside her teacup, went to a table in the window, where stood ominous heaps of exercise books. Seizing a pile, she dipped her pen ferociously in the red-ink pot and began.

"I am glad the Company provides red ink," she muttered. "My resources couldn't stand such a drain on them as the ink required in Remove corrections."

A bell sounded, and two or three of the occupants of the room hurried to snatch up piles of books and so forth and to depart to their respective duties. The others subsided to corrections or betook themselves home. Soon nothing was heard but the scratching of pens and an occasional groan at a glaring fault.

"Just listen!" cried Evelyn, who had passed from Latin to history: "'James I. had claimed the right to levy impostors.' Poor man! he was bad enough, but I am sure he found himself impostor enough for the whole kingdom."

"Do you mind if I take that down?" asked Miss Fox quietly, and she proceeded, with unsmiling face, to enter it in a note-book.

"Miss Grey had a lovely one the other day."

"What was it, may I ask?"

"'A theorem is a thing which you must believe, but cannot prove. A problem is a thing you must prove, but cannot believe.'"

Alice laughed.

"How delicious!"

Miss Fox entered it carefully.

"Yes," she said gravely.

"Impostors!" cried Evelyn, crossing out the word vigorously, chiefly to relieve her feelings.

A knock at the door, and a maid entered.

"Please, a gentleman to see Miss Retallack."

"A gentleman? Gracious! Is it—yes—say I am coming, Emma." Then, as the door closed after the maid, "Alice, you know I am innocent of murderous intent! Can you prove an alibi? I know—I feel—it is Mr. White come to bring me to justice because I gave his Doris just what she deserved the day before yesterday. Can you stand by me and prove an alibi? Doris was alive at one o'clock to-day, when you took the cloak-room, was she not?"

"Go away!" cried Alice, laughing. "Don't keep him waiting, poor man!"

Evelyn cast a glance of despair at her hands.

"That's not what it looks," she cried. "It's only red ink, and—I wish I were not so untidy! It seems like guilt, and it is only heart-brokenness over misplaced Latin accusatives."

She left the room, and walked down the hall to the waiting-room. As she went, a thought flashed into her mind and caused her to quicken her step. Was her mother ill? Was it someone to summon her? As she opened the door of the waiting-room, she caught her breath. The only occupant stood with his back to her—a clergyman. Undoubtedly her mother——But he turned quickly, and the startled look left her eyes for one of pure amazement.

"Mr. Pierpoint?"

"Yes," he returned, holding her hand tightly.

"Oh! I am so glad to see you," she cried. "I mean," quenching the sudden light in his eyes, "what a relief! I thought you were from the doctor—from my mother. You bring no bad news, I hope?"

"No," he answered, "I hope not."

"Is it——" Then, her manners suddenly occurring to her, "Won't you sit down? Can I do anything for you?"

Somewhat lamely and rather circuitously, Basil proceeded to inform her that, being in town on business, he had seized the opportunity to call on her, and thought, on the whole, it would be best to call at the school rather than at her own house, as he did not know—— And here the explanation broke down, and he looked at her appealingly.

"I understand," she replied in a judicial tone. "You have really sought Miss Retallack in her official capacity to know if you may venture to call on Evelyn of that ilk when under her mother's protection."

"Yes," he assented.

Monosyllables are generally safe. His mind was dwelling on her sweet name, his eyes on her bright face.

"Now that was very nice of you," she nodded. "Miss R. aforesaid graciously grants the permission aforementioned, provided—yes, really I must put in a proviso, for this is term time, and I am smothered in work——"

He started to his feet.

"Pray forgive me; perhaps I am wasting your time—I did not think——"

"No, no; please don't go for a moment yet. Surely converse with our kind is better for the intellect and far less waste of time than correcting infants' struggles with the Latin tongue. Are you fond of Latin?—for I am."

"We missed you so much in Lynton," he burst forth irrelevantly. "Yes, I like Latin, too. I think you and I generally like the same things."

"Oh, Mr. Pierpoint! How can you say so? And, indeed the remark is not original, for you have already given utterance to that obvious mis-statement. We have not a liking in common."

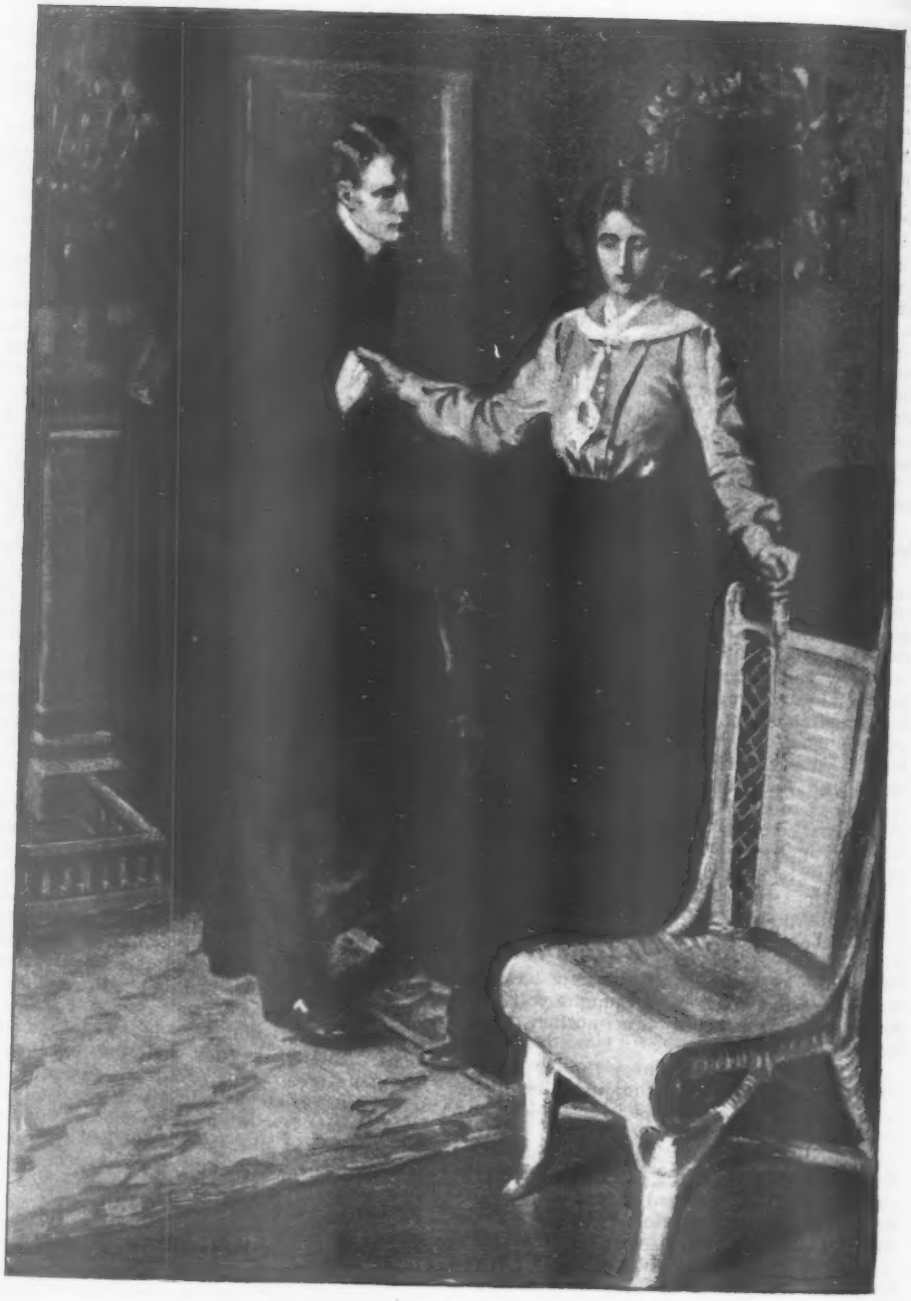
"We have," he answered, in a voice suddenly grown deeper. "We both like Evelyn Retallack."

The quick colour ran up her cheek. She suddenly remembered this was not a Devonior, and she was now the Second Form mistress.

"You mean Elinor Retallack," she said coldly. "How is my cousin?"

"Miss Retallack is very well, I believe; but——" He got up and went to the fireplace. A piece of chalk lay on the mantelshelf. "I don't know how—it is difficult to say it," he began in a changed voice, and the chalk snapped in his fingers; "but I feel I must. And when you say you are overburthened—Evelyn"—turning suddenly round and rushing over the words—"Miss Retallack, will you marry me?"

The girl stared at him in absolute amazement. Swift on that followed a sense of disappointment: how dreadfully prosaic!



"Why?" she asked mechanically, after that moment of astonished silence.

She grasped his distress, his awkwardness, but half the room was between them, and her courage came back.

"Why? But you know I love you, don't you? Couldn't you like me even a little?"

She shook her head. She had risen to her feet.

"I am sorry," she said gravely. (Yes, she was sure that was the correct way to begin.) "I—I had no idea——"

"'I mean—to everything—No!'"—p. 421.

He came towards her quickly, and, seizing her hand, looked at her fixedly.

"You mean—even in the church——"

Her brows contracted in quick anger.

"I mean—to everything—No!"

Her hand was dropped. He turned. She heard the door shut after him.

"Stupid," she cried, "to remind me of that!"

Slowly she returned to the mistresses' room.

"Well?" asked Alice. "Was it Mr. White, or an 'impostor'?"

Evelyn looked at her. Had she been out of the room only a few minutes or a year?

"It was an impostor," she said slowly.

CHAPTER XV.

"IN A DEVON CORNER."

AT that moment, in London town, Winwood entered a dingy house in a City street, and, striding up innumerable dirty stairs, at length reached a door. He gave a hasty knock and entered. A man was writing busily at a table. He bestowed a nod on Winwood and went on.

"Can't talk for ten minutes. Amuse yourself."

"Nice grimy hole to amuse oneself in," retorted Winwood, throwing himself into an armchair by the fire, the only comfortable chair the room possessed. A table at his elbow was covered with piles of manuscript and printed matter. He idly took up some of these, one after another, and put them down again. He glanced through a few pages of one and laid it back on the table; a second and a third shared a similar fate.

"How can people waste good ink so uselessly?" he murmured as he lifted a fourth manuscript off the pile. It met with no better fate than its predecessors. Winwood threw back the pages into position with an air of lassitude, and turned to place it with the rest. Suddenly he sat up straight and a smothered exclamation broke from him. He threw himself back in his chair and read in earnest now. His companion got up and left the room, but Winwood paid no heed, turning page after page, his face now amused, now frowning. At length the owner of the room returned, stood a moment and looked at him.

"Well?" he asked. "What have you brought me?"

Winwood started up.

"Where did you get this?" he cried.

"This? What?"

"This—this tale?" and he thrust forward the manuscript.

The editor was near-sighted, yet he had a constitutional horror of spectacles. He put his nose down to the writing.

"Oh—that's a little thing a girl sent me. We took something of hers before, and this has a good deal of local colour, so——"

"Local colour! I should think so! Do you know the lady—the writer?"

"She's been here, but I have no very clear recollection of her."

"You mean to say she writes—habitually writes?"

"Yes; I believe so. Do you know her?"

Winwood laughed.

"Rather! But, I say, you can't print that thing, you know."

"Why not? We can't all write with your air of distinction, and the local colour——"

"Oh, hang the local colour! Why, my dear man, she has simply studied——" But he pulled himself up. "Look here, I'll buy that manuscript from you. What will you take?"

The editor looked at him and blinked his eyes.

"Are you in love with her?" he asked, with a laugh. "Or is it literary jealousy?"

"In love with her? Heavens, no! Here, where's the rest? This is only the end."

"My dear fellow, you are talking nonsense. The first half is in print. It will shortly be out. It just cut nicely into two. You can read the first half in our December number."

"The little——" But Winwood restrained himself. "To think that was her occupation!"

A light broke on the editor.

"Has she put you in? Eh? Case of using bottled-up experience? Common in callow authors."

"No; not me—at least I didn't find myself there. No doubt I come in as the clown in the first part. But she has put in a friend of mine—one, too, who is idiotic enough about her as it is."

The editor resumed his seat at the table, remarking casually:

"Did you recognise the likeness before you saw the name on the title-page?"

"No—no, I don't think so."

"Very well; don't trouble, then. Nobody else will, for, as you see, Miss Retallack writes as 'J. Evelyn,' and only gives her real name for postal purposes. Show me your article now, and let's get to work."

As Winwood left the office a little later, his own business despatched, his mind reverted to Evelyn's tale. Then he uttered an imprecation, and completed the phrase begun before:

"The little minx! I never could have believed it. And I suppose she flirted with that poor old Pierpoint just to see how he would do it!" Then he laughed. "Hope he'll take it as a joke, however, when he comes to know. I think I shan't tell him."

XUM

But he did tell him; for by the time the two men met again the humour of the thing struck Winwood more than what he considered the shabbiness of it, and he even anticipated Basil's appreciation of the joke. After all, Pierpoint's attraction towards Evelyn was no doubt but a passing fancy.

Pierpoint's manner that evening was so gloomy that Winwood feared his business had not progressed. He knew the nature of it—the sale of a portion of Basil's father's property.

"Hope you got on well?" he said.

"No," was the reply, "my business has sped ill. But don't let us talk of it."

"Have a good smoke, old man, and—oh, I have such a joke to tell you. I went to see Briscoe—editor of the Iridescent, you know. I lit on a manuscript there which I read. The likeness of the hero to yourself was so striking that I turned to the title-page: 'In a Devon Corner,' by Miss Evelyn Retallack! Good joke, isn't it, to put one's friends under the microscope and make slides of them?"

Basil started to his feet.

"What!" he cried, "put me in a tale? Made—made capital of me?"

"Exactly! Out of all of us—only we call it 'copy.' Spent her time in dissecting us, and writing nice descriptions of us—under other names, you understand. Let us be thankful for that."

"And——"

"And," went on Winwood, "it's your faults she has catalogued and classified."

A certain conversation held with her at the church stile flashed on his memory, while Pierpoint remembered one at Lyd Tor. A glance at Basil's face sharpened Claude's intelligence. Had he made a mistake?

"I went to see Miss Retallack to-day," began slowly the man from Devonshire.

"Oh!"

"Yes—I mean no."

"You didn't see her?"

"Yes, I did."

"Why do you say 'No' then?"

"She said 'No.'"

Pierpoint threw back his head. He knew he could not keep things in, and it was just as well to make a clean breast of it.

"Well!" ejaculated Winwood, after the brief recital, "I am glad she has stopped her studies. It is a blow, of course, but this will help you to get over it."

Somehow the joke seemed very poor now. After a moment of deep silence, Basil said slowly:

"Well, she had a perfect right, I suppose; but I had not expected it."

"No; neither had I."

Suddenly Pierpoint shrank back.

"Did she—is the tale finished?"

"Yes. To-day's experiences were too late for this issue. Oh, I say," getting up hastily, "I am awfully sorry, old chap. I have no right to talk like that. But I liked the girl—liked her very much, you understand," with a straight look at his friend, "and now—well, that's over now."

A pause, then "Good-night" said Basil heavily, and left the room.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE THIN EDGE.

"ARE you ill?" asked Judith abruptly, when Evelyn had sat silently staring into the sitting-room fire for fully five minutes.

Evelyn shook herself together.

"Ill? No; thank you."

Judith, the fire mended, returned to her work.

"Judith!" came Mrs. Retallack's voice, and Judith got up with alacrity. There was a sound friendship between those two stern souls.

Then Alice came to mend the fire. Evelyn looked up at her. Alice asked no questions, but she stooped down gently and kissed the girl on the brow.

"How comforting you are!" murmured Evelyn.

"I am glad to comfort you, dear. If there is anything the matter——" She paused.

"Oh! everything is the matter—or, rather, nothing matters, does it?"

"Yes; everything matters," returned Alice gravely. "We need not even go to Judith for a scientific reason for that, need we? We have the witness within."

"But then you are very good, Alice, and you never make mistakes, or do what you would wish undone."

"My dear!" cried Alice, "don't laugh at me!"

"No; I am not laughing. You are like a good chess-player. You know your moves long beforehand, and are prepared for every contingency. I am sure you have already planned where you will spend your holidays this day ten years."

Alice laughed.

"It is well we are accustomed to divide and subtract all your statements, Eve, before we accept them."

"Whereas I," went on Evelyn, still staring into the fire, "I just live from hand to mouth. I have no idea even where I shall be at Christmas, for instance, beyond that I suppose I shall spend the holidays here."

Alice, who had been standing, sat down now in a wicker chair at the other side of the fire, and took up her knitting.

There was silence for a space until Evelyn broke it suddenly.

"Alice, have you ever been in love?"

A deeper colour ran up Alice's pale cheeks.

"Why do you ask?" she replied after a moment.

"Forgive me. I suppose it is a question one has no right to ask, but," pushing back her hair, "I wonder what it is like?"

"Why," smiled Alice, recovering, "surely you have studied the subject well, seeing the desperate way your heroes and heroines behave."

"Yes; but that is only played to the gallery. I must suit the taste of the age. But—it's a pity when people upset things. Do you know who came to see me at school to-day?"

"Was it not Mr. White?"

"It was Mr. Pierpoint."

"Mr. Pierpoint!"

"And he asked me to marry him."

Alice dropped her knitting, turning shining eyes on her friend.

"Really?"

"Really."

"And—you?" a little breathlessly.

"I? I said 'No, thank you,' of course."

"Oh, Evelyn, did you really? I am so sorry."

"So am I—not that I said 'No,' but that he asked me. I think it horrid of him to upset things so. You know I began with positively disliking him, and then, just when I had reached a comfortable stage of not inimical indifference—he was very nice to me on one occasion—then he goes and spoils it all."

"'For you, miss.'"—p. 424.

"I don't understand. What has he spoilt?"

"I don't quite know how to explain," a little wearily; "but first he utterly surprised me and then he irritated me. Why, he asked me to marry him much in the same way he bade me leave the church long ago—or more, perhaps, as one would say 'Please pass the salt.' But when I said—what I said, then"—her voice fell a little—"then he just looked at me for a minute and turned away, and I don't know how it was, but I never felt so small in my life. His look wrapped me round, as it were, and he has nice eyes, you know, self-forgetful kind of eyes. The look seemed to say, 'You poor little thing, I wanted to give you something you haven't got, and you will not accept it!' Though I was very angry, I never liked him so much as at that moment."

Her voice had sunk nearly to a whisper. Now it ceased, and Alice too was silent.

The rest of the term dragged somewhat for Evelyn. Small pleasures fell to her lot at times, all of a very mild type. Life seemed flatter, and her thoughts constantly wandered back to that corner of Devon where, she began to think, she had reached a turning point in life. Two persons out of all whom she had there met stood out clearest and most occupied her mind: her cousin Elinor and Basil Pierpoint. A feeling akin to envy assailed her when she thought of the former. For Elinor she built up a perfectly happy lot, and then, an old dream flashing back on her, Basil Pierpoint got into the same dream and played his part therein manfully. His character now, in the eyes of his biographer, underwent a change. She discussed him again and frequently with herself. Could Pierpoint know how often the thoughts of Evelyn Retallack were bent on him, he would have felt somewhat less gloomy, working out, as he was, a bitter disappointment. The thoughts, too, were much more kindly than they had been. "Let us grant everything," she said to herself: "vanity, tactlessness, domineeringness (that word may be softened; we may substitute love of power, which is a very virile quality) —love of power then, self-seeking—No, I fear that must go altogether. After all," she broke off, forgetting to balance her period this time, "he cannot care so much for things I took for granted were all in all to him, for he actually wished to marry me, and he knows I am absolutely poor. I wonder why he did it? And what did he mean by the way he looked at me just at the end? Well, I am guiltless of one thing: I never tried to make him fall in love with me. I tried to make him like me; but that was for purposes of art; I wanted to know all about him. And now——"

Evelyn was supposed to be correcting exercises; but the mistakes had reposed placid and uncorrected under her eyes for fully ten minutes, and the blotting-pad was now decorated with a neat pattern in dots and arabesques. A postman's knock, and the maid entered with a letter.

"For you, miss," she said, handing it to Evelyn.

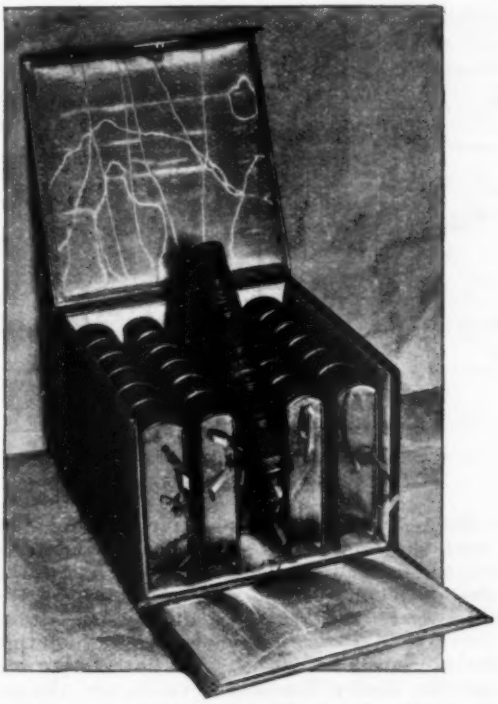
She held out her hand indifferently. Evelyn never got letters that interested her much, unless when in treaty with a publisher. The letter now lay unheeded a moment while she finished the cherub into which she was fashioning a certain blot.

"I wonder," she went on to herself, "how he writes letters? I should like to get one from him."

Her eye fell on the postmark of her letter, and the pen fell from her fingers. "Lynton St. Maurice" was the legend stamped on the envelope.

Evelyn tore the letter open and read it eagerly.

[END OF CHAPTER SIXTEEN.]

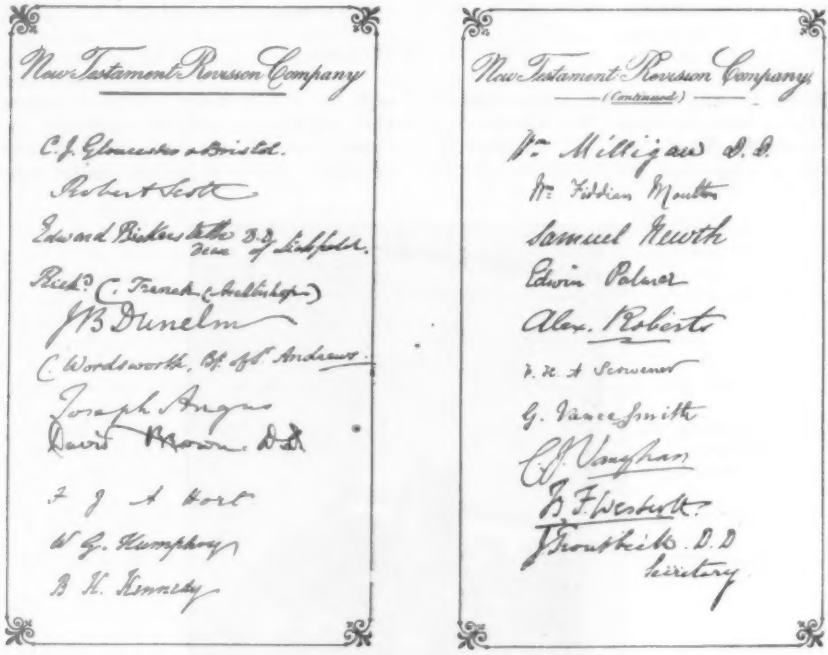


PRESENTATION BIBLES.

SOME NOTABLE AND HISTORIC VOLUMES.

By F. M. Holmes.

A NOBLE and historic presentation Bible was accepted by Queen Victoria in May, 1885. It marked the close of a long and important work, for it was a copy, in five handsome volumes, of the Revised Version, which had been in preparation for about fifteen years.



THE REVISED BIBLE AS PRESENTED TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

Some particulars of this famous copy will be interesting. The volumes were the standard edition, printed in pica type, and of the size known as royal octavo. They were specially bound in dark purple morocco, the arms of the Oxford and Cambridge Universities being grouped on the front, and the Royal arms on a morocco case in which the volumes were enclosed. Silks also were inserted within the covers, the whole being a beautiful specimen of the book producer's art.

The copyright of the Revised Version is the joint property of the Oxford and Cambridge Universities; but the presentation was made by the Convocation of Canterbury, at whose suggestion the revision was undertaken. The Queen acknowledged the gift in a gracious letter to the Archbishop, and congratulated

A beautiful presentation copy was also accepted by the Prince of Wales, now King Edward VII.; and in thanking the Archbishop he said: "The labours of the revisers must indeed have been very arduous and difficult, but I sincerely trust that they have been crowned with success, and that they have generally received the approval of the nation. Most sincerely do I desire with you that the love of the Bible in our country may receive a fresh impulse from the the revisers "on having executed this most important and difficult work so successfully," and assured his Grace and Convocation of the deep interest with which she would read the sacred volumes.

AUTOGRAPHS OF THE SURVIVING MEMBERS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT REVISION COMPANY: IN THE BIBLE PRESENTED TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

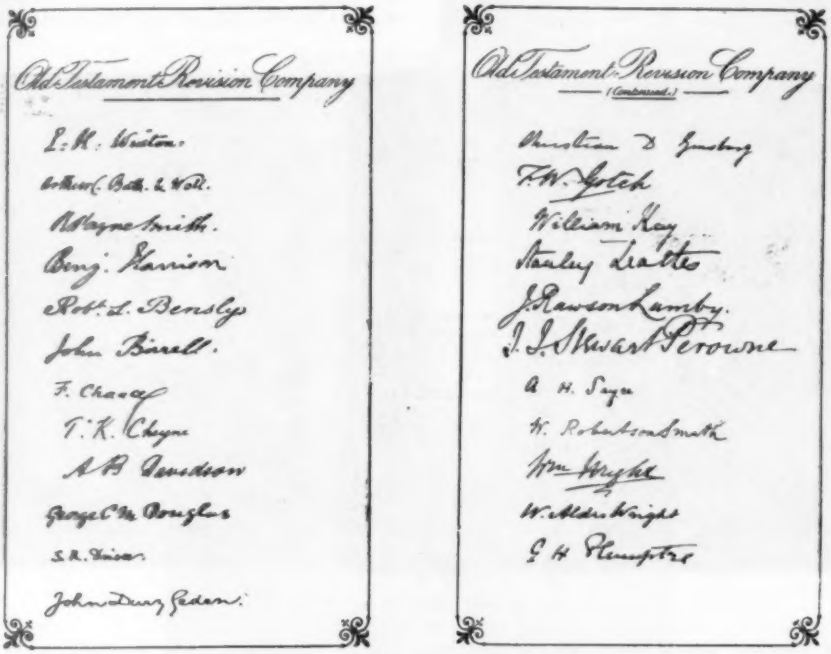
Her Majesty also caused the copy to be returned, so that Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford University Press Warehouse, might obtain the revisers' autographs. He did so, the names of the Old Testament revisers being in Vol. I., and of the New Testament revisers in Vol. V.

clearness and accuracy after which our learned scholars have striven."

These historic volumes possess a rare significance of their own, as illustrating another episode in the long and fascinating history of the English Bible; but not less interesting as marking great national events, are the presentation Bibles used at the coronations of our sovereigns.



The volume used at Queen Victoria's Coronation was an Oxford Bible, quarto in size, bound in crimson velvet, the royal arms shining in gilt on the centre of the covers. The book was closed with two broad silver-gilt clasps 1½ inches wide, the crown and "V.R." being embossed upon them. The edges were gilt, and the corners square and silver-gilt, while the binding within was of blue watered silk.

This Coronation Bible went to the Bishop of Winchester of that day, who took it by reason of his office as "Prelate of the Garter," and the volume is now in the possession of Bishop Sumner's descendants. The text has marginal preserved at Windsor, where one would think all the Coronation Bibles should be kept.

King Edward's is a very beautiful book, and indicates that binding to-day can be produced as choicely as ever. The work was executed at the Oxford University Binding House, and the volume, which is of large quarto size, was presented jointly by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The binding is of royal red levant morocco, references, and contains the Apocrypha, while an index and tables of weights and measures, and coins current in biblical days are added; also two markers of blue ribbon with gilt fringe. Additional interest is given to the volume by the autograph of the Queen, which was inscribed on the fly-leaf.

AUTOGRAPHS OF THE SURVIVING MEMBERS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT REVISION COMPANY: IN THE BIBLE PRESENTED TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

But while Bishop Sumner took Queen Victoria's Coronation Bible, as he was entitled to do, it is believed that Bishop Randall Davidson has waived his claim to the Coronation Bible of Edward VII., and that the historic volume will be polished, and a border of Tudor roses on the covers encloses a beautiful design, within which, on the front, are the Royal arms, and on the reverse the arms of Edward the Confessor, of the two Universities, and of Westminster Abbey. The design is in gold, and the edges are solid gilt, while the doublure, or inside of the cover, is of russia leather, the rose, thistle, and shamrock being utilised as ornaments both on the inside and outside of the cover.

It was upon this Bible that the King took the Coronation oath, the Archbishop of Canterbury presenting it with the words: "Our gracious King, we present unto your Majesty this book, the most valuable thing that this world affordeth. Here is wisdom; this is the royal law; these are the lively oracles of God." The King, on taking the oath, kissed the volume.

Together with the Coronation Bible must be placed the superb copy presented to King Edward by the Bible Society as a memento of the historic event. The Bible itself was one of the Society's eleven-shilling quartos, printed in pica, with marginal references and half-a-dozen maps; but it was bound in the finest pressed royal red morocco, with bevelled boards and gilt edges, the doublure being of the same morocco, richly inlaid, and the fly-leaves of red silk.

KING EDWARD VII.'S CORONATION BIBLE.

The design on the front cover is adapted from early Christian symbols. The centre is occupied by a cross, of ancient shape, enriched with interlacings of gold on grey-blue, and bordered with white and golden-brown. The spaces around the arms of the cross are filled with vine-leaves and bunches of grapes, emblematical of Christ the True Vine. Around the cross extends a border of wheat-ears typifying the Bread of Life, and at intervals are placed ten medallions representing early Christian symbols, those at the four corners being larger than the intermediate emblems. The border is in deep maroon, with soft green colour outside, while the medallions are coloured like the cross, thus bringing the whole scheme of colour into a harmonious whole.

The symbols on the medallions are: the Good Shepherd, on the top left-hand corner; then (proceeding to the right) the Greek monogram of Christ's name; an early Christian lamp, as a ship with figures of the Apostles Peter and Paul at the top right-hand corner; the anchor; a ship at anchor, an emblem of the Church; the seven-branched candle-stick; the dove; the peacock, a type of the Resurrection, because of the renewal of its beautiful plumage; the lamb; and the fishes, mystical representations of Christ. The four corner designs are, by permission of Messrs. Birdsall and Son, the binders, reproduced on page 430.

The reverse of the volume is also adorned with medallions, with vine-leaves and bunches of grapes, while the adornment on the doublure is the labarum, or Greek monogram of Christ's name, in a somewhat different form from that on the outside. An illuminated leaf of vellum, placed before the title-page, contains the inscription; and the beautiful volume is enclosed in a royal red velvet case embroidered with his Majesty's crown and cipher. This beautiful work, which was prepared and executed at Messrs. Birdsall and Son's establishment in Northampton, was entirely hand-tooled, and was built up of many small fragments, the circle surrounding the enclosures being by far the largest detail.

THE BACK COVER OF QUEEN VICTORIA'S CORONATION BIBLE.

On various important occasions during a long course of years the Bible Society has presented copies to royal personages. Some have been given in connection with great national events. Such, for instance, was the handsome copy of the Hungarian Bible presented to the King of Hungary in 1897, at the celebration of a thousand years of Hungarian national existence, his Majesty being of course King of Hungary, though Emperor of Austria.

Other presentation copies have marked new and memorable translations, as when in 1894 the Society presented the King of the Belgians and the Count of Flanders with special copies of the Congo New Testament; and the King expressed the interest which he naturally felt in a book prepared for the people of his African colonies, and in the beneficent work of the Society generally.

(By permission of the British and Foreign Bible Society.)

BIBLE PRESENTED TO HIS MAJESTY BY THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

But one of the most notable was the copy in the Russian vernacular offered to the princess who married the late Duke of Edinburgh, afterwards Duke of Saxe-Coburg. This Bible was the only translation presenting the entire Bible in modern Russian. It was handsomely bound in three volumes, one containing the first eight books of the Old Testament in the version authorised by Alexander I.; the second, the remainder of the Old Testament translated by Professors Levisohn and Chwolson at the Society's expense; while the third gave the edition of the New Testament sanctioned by the Holy Synod or Supreme Council of the Russian Church.

In June, 1891, the Society sent a copy of the Amharic and Ethiopic Scriptures to the Emperor of Abyssinia; and in course of time he replied, courteously thanking the Society, and offering a gift of elephants' tusks, which reached the Bible House on June 15, 1893.

Yet another memorable presentation Bible was the first ever presented to the head of the Mohammedan faith. In 1856 the American and British Bible Societies had presented Ali Pasha, the Grand Vizier of Turkey, with a richly bound copy; and in the next year, through Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the Society presented one to the Sultan, Mr. Barker, the Society's agent, being favoured with a short personal interview.

Through the United Presbyterian Church the Shah of Persia was also given a Bible in 1849; while presentation Bibles have been offered to numerous royal personages as wedding gifts, or on the occasion of some notable event. The Society has given probably more than thirty presentation Bibles between the years 1839 and 1902.

New editions have also been made the occasion of noteworthy presentations. When Queen Victoria visited Glasgow in 1888, a copy was presented to her by the Oxford Press of the then new bourgeois edition of the Oxford Bible for Teachers, representing the work of the University Press exhibited at the Glasgow Exhibition. The book was printed on the Oxford India paper, and bound in "Garter blue" polished morocco, with "V.R.I." and the imperial crown emblazoned on its covers, and enclosed in a blue morocco case with a gold lock.

If her Majesty kept this volume at Windsor, it would rest in the same noble home as another presentation Bible of a very different character and of quite pathetic interest; for Gordon's own pocket Bible was presented to Queen Victoria by his sister, and is preserved here. And in this connection may be mentioned the little khaki-covered Bible produced by the Oxford Press for the soldiers during the Boer War and presented to her Majesty.

The royal weddings of our princes and princesses have been the occasions for the presentation of some very handsome Bibles. When the Princess Royal was married to the Crown Prince of Prussia in 1858, the maidens of the United Kingdom presented her with a special copy of Bagster's polyglot Bible, bound in rich purple morocco, with beautifully chased clasps and corners of gold, bearing the rose, thistle, and shamrock, and the arms of the bride as Princess Royal of England. An illuminated fly-leaf of vellum bore a suitable inscription, stating that the Bible was presented with the loyal, loving, and prayerful wishes of the maidens. The beautiful volume was enclosed in a casket of British oak richly carved, the devices being chiefly roses, and also the words, "Search the Scriptures."

The Young Women's Christian Association, which had been founded in 1855, was largely, if not entirely, responsible for this volume, as they have been for many presentation Bibles since that date, joining with others in several subsequent gifts.

The gentlemen of England presented a Bible to the Prince of Wales (now King Edward VII.) on his marriage in 1863, and the ladies of England presented a Bible to Queen Alexandra at the same time; Bishop Pelham afterwards saying that the Bible then given to the Prince was in constant use at Sandringham at daily prayer.

These presentations to the Prince and Princess led to the idea of offering a Bible from "the maidens of the United Kingdom" to the Princess Helena on her marriage in 1866, and Miss S. M. Nugent, the daughter of Mr. Richard Nugent, the honorary secretary to the movement for presenting a Bible to the Prince, was made honorary secretary, though only a child at the time. This lady also occupied a similar position to the enterprises for presenting Bibles to the Princess Albany, and about 12,000 to the Princess Beatrice's Bible. The subscriptions to the "Maidens' Bibles" were raised by private communications only, no public intimation being made until the presentation.

Some description may be given of one or two of these handsome volumes. The Bible presented to Princess May (now Princess of Wales) on her marriage in

(By permission of the British and Foreign Bible Society.)

CASE AND INSCRIPTION OF THE BIBLE PRESENTED TO HIS MAJESTY BY THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Louise, the Duchesses of Connaught and of Albany, and to the Princess Beatrice, when Miss A. St. G. Nugent acted as chief organiser. To this last effort no fewer than 45,000 subscribed, each giving from a penny to a shilling; and at its presentation Miss S. M. Nugent was asked to write her name in Queen Victoria's birthday book.

For subsequent royal weddings others of a younger generation took up the work of organisation, headed by the Hon. L. Kinnaird, and, for the Bible presented to the Duchess of Fife, by Miss C. Stopford. In these later presentations the Y.W.C.A. has taken the chief part, though many members had given previously — between 6,000 and 7,000 to the Bible for the Duchess of 1894, on behalf of the Y.W.C.A. and other women of the United Kingdom, was one of Bagster's miniature quartos, with references, notes, maps, and charts. It was bound in royal purple morocco, inlaid with rich crimson and cream, and adorned with ecclesiastical emblems embossed in gold. The edges were illuminated with monogram and coronet, and with such sentences as "Search the Scriptures" and "Thy Word is Truth." Richly illuminated vellum pages bore the inscription, and the volume was enclosed in a casket of British oak having the royal arms and the motto "Honi soit qui mal y pense" engraved on the cover.

A somewhat similar Bible was presented to the Princess Maud on her marriage in 1806. The binding was of the finest royal blue morocco, the sides being richly decorated with a fifteenth-century design. In the centre was a cross, between the arms of which were panels filled with mediæval foliage in gold and colours. At the intersection of the cross and on the border were emblems of the four Evangelists, and in the centre of the whole H.R.H.'s initials and coronet in carved gold. The edges were gilt and illuminated with texts, devices of the lamb and flag, and dove, as well as the Princess's initials and coronet. The clasps were of gold, and the inscription was on a vellum fly-leaf, while the magnificent volume was enclosed in a carved casket of British oak.

Sumptuous as are these bindings, presentation copies of the Scriptures in past centuries have been equally, or even more, costly; for it is recorded that Pope Hormisdas in the sixth century received from the Emperor Justin a copy of "the Gospels in silver covers set with precious stones, and weighing fifteen pounds."

Quite different again from these elaborate and expensive volumes is the Bible of John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians," preserved at Jesus College, Cambridge. The volume is a copy of his celebrated Indian Bible which he presented to his old college, and on the fly-leaf he wrote his name. The book is treasured there as the personal gift of a distinguished man and the work of an honoured Cambridge scholar.

Many are the memories—historic, literary, and personal—which cluster around presentation Bibles. Time and time again have individuals or associations chosen these volumes as fitting memorials of some great event or as expressions of their best feelings. Beautiful workmanship has been lavished on these gifts, human interest has added to their charm, but all alike testify to the supreme appreciation of the wonderful Book and the high rank which it takes among the precious things of the world.

(Photo supplied by Messrs. Houghton and Gunn.)

THE BIBLE PRESENTED TO THE PRINCESS OF WALES ON HER MARRIAGE.

THE HIDING PLACE.

By C. E. C. Weigall, Author of "The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers," "Gunner Jack and Uncle John," "An Angel Unawares," "Too Late," Etc.

"I have seen the morn one laugh of gold,
I have known a mind that was a match for fate;
I have wondered what the heavens can hold,
Than simplest love more great."

"I CALL it shameful!" said Mrs. Arnott truculently.

She was sitting on an inverted box in the apple chamber that had once held bottled cider, and there was an air about her of heated displeasure that would have daunted a person less brave than Esther Haviland.

"I call it a crying disgrace, and so does Elias. Ever since she come to this place, and I found out that we was cousins, I've done my best for her. Plums when they was in season, and butter all the year round, and the best of advice always; and now not even to be mentioned in her will! Whoever expected she had a son? He's a good-for-naught, I'll warrant, and no doubt he's dead long ago. And the meaning is that you keep all this little property, that should have been mine by rights. A soldier! Don't tell me! I know your soldiers—scum of the earth, I call 'em—all gold lace and braid outside, and whited sepulchres within. Tell me that a soldier will get the Moat Farm? Why, that's as much as to say the whole place will be a wilderness by this time next year."

"Mrs. Arnott," said Esther, with tremulous anger, "you forget that my father was a soldier."

"And a pretty mess he made of your mother's life, to be sure!"

Mrs. Arnott had the irritating manner of a woman who knows her subject so exactly that she can always hit the right nail on the head.

"If he hadn't been killed in one of them Indian skramashes that bring no one any honour, you might have been living in comfort, perhaps with a nice little shop to bring you in a decent penny, and your mother wouldn't have died of starvation."

Esther's broken exclamation of anger made her pause.

"How dare you!" said the girl in a low, tense voice. "Oh, how dare you! My father died as only a brave man can die, saving the life of his friend."

Mrs. Arnott sniffed loudly.

"He'd better have saved his own, for charity begins at home. But that isn't what I came here to say. Now, Esther Haviland, I've looked through every bit of stuff in the place, and I know to a penny what everything's worth, and what I say is: Mrs. Purvis can't ever have been living on what you made on cheese and butter, for she wanted her comforts. Where is her money hid?"

"She had none," reiterated Esther, with growing tears. "I used to make plenty by the butter."

"You tell that to your grannie!"

Mrs. Arnott had recently comforted herself with a little strong refreshment, and the result of her potations was evident in the growing rudeness of her manner.

"You can't make me believe as how the best of medicines and meat essence was managed on nothing a week. There's money in the house, and you know where it is."

Esther looked helplessly round her. It was impossible to convince the terrible woman who was now invading the farm that she was not an impostor. Mrs. Purvis had been buried seven days, and the wonder of her last will and testament was still the talk of the countryside. Esther had cried her very heart out over the grave of the woman who had been so strangely kind to her; and now, with renewed vigour, she had realised that there was a chance before her of showing her passionate gratitude by the care that she could take of the dead woman's property for her son's sake. She would hand over the Moat Farm in so perfect a condition that the unknown Tom should find its value doubled by her care. Before the grass was green on the grave of Mrs. Purvis she would have scraped together a sum that should represent a nice little nest-egg for the returning soldier. The lawyer had advertised for him.

Mrs. Arnott considered the silence as regarded her own name insulting, but the rest of the world called the will instinct with pathos.

"All to my beloved son, Thomas Clive Purvis, to be held in trust for him by the only woman in the world whom I have found to be trustworthy through and through—Esther Haviland."

And Esther determined to deserve her character every day that she lived.

"Oh! what can I say to convince you that there is no money hidden?" she cried desperately. "What can I do to make you go away and leave me in peace?"

"Oh, that's what you want, is it? Want me to go? Well, I'll gratify you fast enough when I've done," said Mrs. Arnott vindictively.

She rose from her seat, and walked unsteadily through the door, her light eyes glancing from corner to corner of the attic.

"Left you the bureau, did she—and all in it? Well, I've looked through every paper and spotted old photograph, and there's nothing here as'd fetch twopence at a show. But I'll back there's money in it somewhere, and before I shake the dust of this house off my feet I'm going to find it."

Lying in a corner there was a heavy hammer that had been wont to be used for breaking up firewood, and Mrs. Arnott caught it up.

"Oh! what are you going to do?" cried the girl, trembling with helpless terror.

She tried to catch at the infuriated woman, but Mrs. Arnott flung her into a corner, where she crouched, sobbing piteously, with her hands over her ears, so that she might not hear the thuds of the hammer falling on the frail wood. When it was over, and the bureau lay in wrecked pieces about her, Mrs. Arnott rested from her labour with a scarlet face and a mouth twitching with passion.

"I've done it," she said; "and there's not so much in it as would buy a box of hairpins; and now my only consolation is that when Tom arrives he'll turn you out on the world with not so much as a sixpence."

She kicked the shattered bureau contemptuously with her foot, and left the room noisily; while Esther, on the floor, lay sobbing with gasping breath for the loss of the inanimate thing that had meant so much to her.

When the noise of the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Arnott in their spring cart had died away out of the yard, Esther rose wearily and went down the stairs wiping her eyes. She had not the heart to touch her wrecked possession, but she locked the door behind her and came down to the fresh air of the front garden, hoping to find there the peace of mind that she had lost. It was a golden February afternoon: one of those days that are a foretaste of summer in a winter month. On the brown garden the broad yellow sunbeams lay like a radiant cloak, and Esther's quick eyes noted some withered stems of chrysanthemums and late sunflowers that should have been removed long ago. The farm man, Abel Dunn, was milking in the shed, and the maid had gone home for the day to her mother, so that the girl tied a handkerchief over her ruddy hair and tucked up her black skirt:

"I will do it myself," she said emphatically; "and that bit of ground will take no harm to be dug over, and thinking won't make my troubles any lighter."

She threw up a spatter of soil with the fork, and sniffed in the fresh smell of the mould,

"Dear earth, I could kiss every clod, for I love you so! And alas—alas! I have got to leave you."

She turned, with the sun in her eyes, to look at the orchard of apple trees that another month would see shrouded in a green gown of young leaves, and because the sun dazzled her she failed to see another figure advancing towards the house with a hesitating step.

"Good afternoon, miss. Am I speaking to Miss Esther Haviland?" said a manly voice from behind her, and Esther turned sharply round with a faint cry.

There in the long grass by the sundial stood a man in the scarlet uniform of a sergeant-major of the Line. He carried himself so well that it was a pleasure to look at his handsome, upright figure, with the sash across his breast and the medals in a row from button to side seam. His keen, sunburnt face and grizzled hair spoke of long residence in a hot country; and his eyes, kindly and pleasant and full of vague regret, were the eyes of a man who has seen much and suffered many things. All this Esther saw; and for his part Tom Purvis said to himself that never again could he forget the picture that his mind absorbed that February afternoon. Backed by the grey house and the golden light, the figure of Esther Haviland stood out in sharp relief, with the beauty of each feature, the brilliance of her colouring as clear as a miniature in ivory. For a moment she looked at him, breathless with surprise; then, as consciousness came to her a lovely flush swept from chin to brow, and she darted forward.

"Oh—are you Tom?" she cried eagerly. "Did Mr. Angus find you?"

He stood looking at her gravely.

"I saw the advertisement," he said; "it was in a great many papers. And I went to Mr. Angus, and he told me everything and showed me the will."

There was admiration on his face, and in his voice a note that Esther did not recognise; but it had taken root there when Lawyer Angus had told him of the goodness of Esther Haviland to his dead mother.

"Welcome," said Esther falteringly. "I have everything ready to show you; and I am glad I worked hard, for otherwise I should not have been ready in time."

She resolutely put away from her her own feeling of regret at losing a home so dear to her, and began to tell him falteringly of his mother's goodness to her, and of how she could never hope to repay her.

They stood together in the garden, with the ripple of the stream behind them, and the cawing of the rooks in the wind-swept elm trees over their heads; and Tom's eyes took in the full measure of the neat garden, and the spotless, shining windows, and the paintwork of the house.

"And so my poor mother was an invalid for so many years, helpless on her bed, Lawyer Angus says, and it was you who kept things straight and did all the work. I think that you have paid your debt already," he said softly.

"I could never repay her love and kindness," cried Essie. "She gave me a home when I had none."

"And she has left you, so I hear, a very tidy little competence!"

The sergeant's eyes were twinkling as he looked down into the tear-dimmed ones below him.

"She left me—her bureau; but Mrs. Arnott has broken it up, trying to find money in it, though I told her there was nothing in it but photographs and letters."

Tom gave a sudden loud burst of laughter, but Essie's sob made him grave again in the same instant.

"Why, my dear," he said, "there is no need to cry. I can mend it for you. But are you going to tell me that my mother told you naught about the old bureau when she left it to you?"

"What was there to tell?" cried Essie, bewildered.

"Show me where it lies."

Tom Purvis's mouth was quivering suspiciously under his heavy moustache, but there was something more than interest in the glance that he threw at her downcast face. She was as pretty as a flower, this girl with the blue eyes and hair like a ripe wheatfield in August, and he had never seen anyone to compare with her in all his experience of womanhood. He followed her in as she tripped lightly across the gravel path and up the stairs. His eyes took in the well-ordered house, and the pathetic evidence of his mother's connection with the place—the old ornaments and furniture that he remembered in the house where he had been born. Without a word Essie led him up the attic stairway, and into the apple chamber, where she pointed, voiceless, to a pile of broken wood and cracked varnish.

Tom drew up his lips in a whistle, for the girl's dramatic gesture of sorrow touched him.

"Well, I'm blessed!" he said. "What a venomous old party that lady must be who did it."

"She was very angry," said Essie. "But it was all I had to remind me of your mother; and, you see, she has even broken the frames of the photographs inside."

She held up a portrait disconsolately, and Tom took it from her and looked at it earnestly.

"I was a rum-looking little kid in those days," he said thoughtfully. "Fancy her keeping all these things! Well, she must have loved me, after all; and I did wrong to leave her."

"I think that she loved you too dearly for words," said Essie softly. "She was saying your name when she died."

"And I never guessed it!"

Tom's voice was harsh with emotion; and the girl, looking at him curiously, glanced away, for there were tears in his eyes.

"And you mean to say," said Tom at last, "that you never guessed that this bureau had a hiding-place?"

"But there could have been nothing in it; for, see, it is all broken."

For his answer Tom Purvis took up one slender leg that had been smashed off at the joint, and unscrewed the gilt claw at the foot, disclosing a narrow tube, hollowed to the very top of the wood. It was filled with yellow banknotes rolled up carefully in waxed paper; and Essie gazed at them open-mouthed.

"This was one hiding-place," said Tom tersely, "and the other was in the leg of the four-post bed on which she died."

Esther collapsed into a chair in breathless amazement.

"But I don't understand—it cannot be for me?" she stammered.

"There are three thousand pounds here, and maybe half as much in the bed-post," said Tom, in a business-like voice. "'Tis a nice little portion, Essie Haviland; and you deserve every penny of it." And for all answer Essie, in her surprise and relief, laid her head down upon her hands and burst into tears.

"Essie," said Tom very gently, "I wish you would not cry. I wish you would take heart about it all, for I don't know what to say to you."

"I can't take it. She never meant to leave it to me," sobbed the girl.

Her pretty hand lay in her lap, and Tom Purvis touched it with the caution of a man who is handling a rare and precious piece of china.

"I am a rough fellow," he said, "but, save for my quarrel with my mother, which was over my wish for soldiering, I have led a straight life. I don't know what to say to you, Essie; but with my mother's last will and testament there was enclosed a letter to me and you. Will you read it, Essie?"

The girl took up the sheet of paper, written in so tremulous a handwriting that it was difficult to decipher:

"My dear Son,—It is the wish of your dying mother that you should make Essie my daughter indeed, if she will have you. I know her to be a modest, upright woman, and I know you, my dear son, to be a good man, save for your temper, which is sharp—and maybe you inherit it from me. When you read this, show it to Esther Haviland, and bide by her wish.—Your loving mother,

"MATILDA PURVIS."

"What do you say, Essie?" said the sergeant-major unsteadily. "You may think it sudden, but when I saw you digging in the garden I fell to loving you straight off."

"I don't know what to think," said Essie, tremulously. "Will you give me a little time, and go back to your regiment and leave me here?"

"No, I won't," said the sergeant with unexpected boldness; and in the silence that ensued he crept a little nearer to the girl, and saw the sunlight still about her, touching her bright hair and her rosy, downcast face. "My time's up in the regiment, and I want you, Essie, to help me to lead a good life in this country place, and to show me what a home can be after a barrack room."

A faint smile fluttered the corners of Essie's mouth.

"You want a great deal," she said, saucily.

"Es her turned sharply round with a faint cry."—p. 434.

"A man can't win a woman all in a hurry."

"But I can," said Tom Purvis stoutly; and Esther said afterwards that she only capitulated so easily because she was so astonished at his boldness.

But, for all that, the new Mrs. Purvis who reigns at the Moat Farm is a very happy woman.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

FEBRUARY 15TH.—Christian Self-control.

Passage for reading—1 Corinthians viii. 4–13.

POINTS. 1. All things made good by God.

2. All things lawful, but not all things expedient.

3. All occasions of offence to be avoided.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Divine Design. An old Persian fable says God created the world a vast, level, barren plain, with not a green thing to be seen on it; not a flower, not a bush, not a tree. He came forth to view His new creation, and to adorn it with beauty; and He sent His angels to sow broadcast over the world the choicest seeds of the most beautiful flowers and trees. Satan on his black wing followed, and saw the unburied seed lying all over the earth, and he said, "This is the work of the Almighty. I will destroy it." So he went to work, and every seed that could be found he buried out of sight in the soil, and, as if to make his work complete, he summoned the rains of heaven; and they fell upon the earth and saturated it, that the seed might rot away. Then, with a smile of satisfied pride, he looked to see the chagrin of the Almighty when He should see His work destroyed. But as he gazed the seed germinated; it broke through the clods, and came up in forms of beauty everywhere; and the apparent ruin became an Eden of loveliness. Thus do men still try to spoil God's good gifts by using them for improper purposes.

Lawful, but not Expedient. A little girl was playing round a room one day with her white frock over her head. A friend from India who was present laughingly called her "Pishashee," the name given by Indians to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying to everyone she met, "I am the Pishashee; I am the Pishashee!" Would she have done so, had she been wrapped in black and called "Witch" or "Devil" instead? No; for the reality was nothing—the sound and colour were everything. Even so the thing offered to the idol was in itself nothing, but the use made of it was sinful, and therefore to be avoided.

A Travelling Bishop. Not long ago a bishop was travelling in South Africa in an ox waggon, on his way to the opening of a new church. The oxen went very slowly, and the bishop was sadly afraid he would be late. He kept urging the driver to make the animals move more quickly, but all in vain. They crept along, unheeding the whip, and the good bishop was in despair. At last the driver said, "I can make these oxen get on quickly, if you don't mind, bishop." "Don't mind," said the bishop; "why, that's just what I want." "Ah!" said the man, "but these 'ere animals are used to very strong language, and they won't get on without it!" "Well," said the bishop, "it's very important I should get there in time!" So the man used the strong language; but the bishop taught him some other words to use to the oxen, which might do just as well, and not be an occasion of offence.

FEBRUARY 22ND.—Christian Love.

Passage for reading—1 Corinthians xiii.

POINTS. 1. Love needful in all good deeds.
2. Love is unselfish, hopeful, and lasting.
3. Love the greatest of all virtues.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Lord Shaftesbury. Perhaps the most touching thing that appeared in connection with Lord Shaftesbury's death was this. Two ragged boys, denuded almost of clothing, were standing gazing into a window on the morning of the late Earl's decease. The one remarked to the other, "Lord Shaftesbury is dead"; and his companion responded, "That's not our Lord Shaftesbury?" "Yes," replied the other, "it's our Lord Shaftesbury." Why could they speak of the great man in such familiar terms? Simply because he had sunk self, and associated himself so much with them that they could speak of him as one of themselves. His whole life was full of deeds of love.

Love Self-denying. All things are easy which are done for the love of God and of the souls which He loves. A lady who had a most sensitive ear for music—so much so, that a note out of tune caused her intense discomfort—joined one of our English sisterhoods. Being visited one day by a friend, she was found placidly seated in an outhouse, in the midst of a most horrible din, raised by a number of lads whom she was forming into a drum and fife band. "How can you possibly endure this noise?" asked her friend. "Oh," was the sweet reply, "it's very good for souls."

The Greatest Thing. It is related of St. John that when he was very old and weak, and lay upon his death-bed, his friends gathered round him that they might listen to his last words of wisdom and counsel. He lifted himself up, and repeated again and again: "Little children, love one another." And when, hoping that he might have said other things, which, perhaps, they would have treasured more eagerly, they asked if he had nothing else to tell them, he answered, "There is no need for more; for love includes all. Fulfil therefore this law: love one another."

MARCH 1ST.—Paul and Apollos.

Passage for reading—Acts xviii. 24—xix. 6.

POINTS. 1. A Christian must learn before he can teach.
2. The Scriptures make wise unto salvation.
3. Repentance of no avail without faith in Christ.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Learning Despised. A learned clergyman was accosted in the following manner by an illiterate worker who despised education: "Sir, you have been to college, I suppose?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "I am thankful," replied the former, "that the Lord opened my mouth without any learning." "A similar event," retorted the clergyman, "took place in Balaam's time, but such things are of rare occurrence in the present day."

The Value of the Scriptures. An old and blind man thirty years ago came into possession of a book printed in Burmese, and containing only the Psalms and a part of the Prophets. Before he had finished the Psalms he cast away his idols and Buddhism, and believed in a living God, Creator, Preserver, and Judge of men, and from that time he has worshipped and prayed to the Eternal God. He committed many of the Psalm-prayers to memory, and daily offered them, especially the Fifty-first. For twenty years he lived in this way before ever hearing of Christ and the Atonement. Coming then from the interior to Prome, he heard of a foreign teacher residing there, and from him received a copy of the New Testament. He says that if a man should go about and attend to his business twenty years by starlight, and the sun should then rise on him in all his glory, he thinks it would produce about such a change in his eyes and vision as the Gospel of St. Matthew produced on his mind; that then the long night of praying to God, and hoping for mercy without a Mediator or an Atonement, came to an end, and for the past ten years his hope has been firmly fixed on Christ, and there it rests.

Repentance and Faith. It was said of the famous Mr. Dodd that persons called him in scorn "Faith and Repentance," because in his preaching he insisted so much on these two things. When he heard of his nickname he said, "If I were to die in the pulpit, I would desire to die preaching repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and if I die out of the pulpit, I would desire to die practising both."

MARCH 8TH.—St. Paul at Ephesus.

Passage for reading—Acts xix. 13–20.

POINTS. 1. Converts profess Christ boldly.
2. Converts give up evil practices.
3. Converts deny themselves for Christ's sake.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Brave for Truth. In Jerusalem, during the ceaseless civil wars which had followed the division of Alexander's empire, one old man, named Onias, had lived a life so high and humble, and so apart from strife, that his prayers were believed to have power like Elijah's, and those who had no ambition for his holiness coveted his intercessions. One of the contending factions—both Jewish—dragged him from his home to pray against the other. But the old man had not learned to turn prayers into curses. Quietly he knelt down among the excited mob, and prayed aloud: "O God, King of the universe, since on one side are Thy people, and on the other Thy priests, I beseech Thee, hear not the prayers of either to the injury of the other." The cries of the enraged partisans drowned his voice; the stones fell thick around the grey head; the feeble life was easily bruised out of the aged frame, and he fell, one of the few martyrs to mercy the world has seen.

An Indian's Conscience. An old Indian once asked a white man to give him some tobacco for his pipe. The man gave him a loose handful from his pocket. The next day the Indian came back and asked for the white man. "For," said he, "I found a quarter of a dollar among the tobacco." "Why don't you keep it?" asked a person standing by. "I've got a good man and a bad man here," said the Indian, pointing to his breast, "and the good man say, 'It is not yours; give it back to the owner.' The bad man say, 'Never mind—you got it, and it is your own now!' The good man say, 'No, no! you must not keep it.' So I didn't know what to do; and I thought to go to sleep, but the good man and the bad man kept talking all night and troubled me; and now, when I bring the money back, I feel good."

The Making of Character. Make up your minds about it while you are young. It is far easier, while your hearts are young and fresh, and open to all good influences, to make your lives beautiful and pure in the sight of God and man, than it is to do so after your character has become more formed, and the chill world has cooled down your young affections and enthusiasm. I saw once, lying side by side in a great workshop, two heads made of metal. The one was perfect—all the features of a noble, manly face came out clear and distinct in their lines of strength and beauty; in the other, scarcely a single feature could be recognised—it was all marred and spoiled. "The metal had been let grow a little too cool, sir," said the man who was showing it to me. I could not help thinking how true that was of many a form more precious than metal. Many a young soul that might be stamped with the image and superscription of the King, while it is warm with the love and glow of early youth, is allowed to grow too cold, and the writing is blurred, and the image is marred.

By Flora Schmalz.

THE gate was swiftly opened, and a child was gently placed inside it. There came a swish as if of wings, and in a twinkling the gate was closed.

The boy's eyes remained shut, but he felt that two loving arms were twined around him, and realised a sense of peace and safety which he had never known before. At the very moment when he was expecting to receive another deadly blow he had suddenly fallen asleep. And now his aches and bruises were no longer a trouble to him; his weary, battered limbs appeared to be light as air.

The boy gave a slight shiver, and then he opened his eyes, and began to rub them hard with both his hands. Something strange must indeed have happened—something which dazzled and bewildered him. For that dark, sullen shadow, which had always hung over him, was miraculously removed. Light—pure, translucent light—diffused itself on every side. Yet there was nothing harsh or garish in this soft, golden radiance. So that when a few minutes had passed he was already becoming used to it, and began to look about him with a languid curiosity.

He still lay close to the garden gate, though the encircling arms were removed. As his eyes wandered hither and thither, he noticed that the grass beneath him was wondrously soft and green, and that further on it was overspread with flowers, of exquisite form and hue. Oh, if he could but reach them! He thought he would give all his marbles just to pluck a few of them, and to hold them, and smell them, for a little while.

When the boy tried to rise, the mere act of motion filled him with such a keen delight that he rolled over on the turf once or twice before making any further effort.

Presently he scrambled to his feet, and hurried off in the direction of the flowers. He remembered having once seen a pot of drooping daisies, in a neighbour's window, in the wretched slum where he had lived. But these daisies where wholly different. They held themselves erect, and seemed to be full of sap, while each perfect petal was tipped with a vivid crimson.

"You may gather them, if you like, dear little one."

The boy looked up and beheld an angel, in shining raiment and with silver wings. He received a luminous and tender smile.

Soon he was running wild among the flowers. He came to a hedge of hawthorn in full blossom, which filled the air with fragrance. But the scent of the nestling violets on its banks was sweeter still. It was as if all his earthly dreams of an impossible Spring-tide were realised at once.

He did not know how long he had been there, when he heard a sound that was strangely familiar to him. And there was something in that joyous hee-haw that greeted him like a note of welcome. Surely this sleek and comely donkey must be the one that had belonged to the costermonger in his alley, and that he had lately missed. It had been no unusual thing for him to share his crust with it, so deeply did he pity the poor, ill-used animal. And now, as it advanced fearlessly to meet him, there was a grateful recognition beaming in its gentle eyes.

"Its life on earth was one continual torment," said the angelic voice. "Take it to the most velvety part of the sward that you can find, dear child."

So the boy led the donkey away to a spot where the grass grew very fresh and long, and left it to frisk and gambol at will.

Feeling somewhat overcome by the novelty of it all, he sat down in an arbour formed out of the twisted trunks of trees, and listened to the carols of the birds. He remembered a deplorable, half-starved lark, that one of the neighbours had kept imprisoned, outside the window next his own. For when he was not trying to sell matches in the streets, what he had most enjoyed was to lean right out of the window, and to take note of his surroundings. Now he watched another lark that was soaring upward into the blue ether, while it poured forth a flood of thanksgiving in its song. As he grew in knowledge, the boy conjectured whether this joyous singer might not be that same miserable captive, come likewise into its inheritance. And his own soul was filled with the melody of a great content, so that he longed to find utterance with the bird.

It was impossible to say if so many hours, or only minutes, had elapsed, for he had lost all count of time. But after what appeared to be a very brief interval, he again heard a sound like the beat of wings.

"You may now enter the grounds which surround the King's Palace," said the angel, very kindly. "There is someone waiting for you there."

Then the boy was borne gently onwards, until he found himself before a shining portal, on which was inscribed the command to knock. He did so, and the door opened of itself, admitting him into an inner garden, of surpassing loveliness.

"Here is the little girl I want you to take care of," said the angel, placing the hand of a smaller child in his. "On earth she has been starved and cruelly neglected. The cloud under which she lived was as black as yours, or blacker."

"Poor little thing! I am very sorry for her," sighed the boy, though only half-heartedly. For his mind was full of another little girl, whom he had left behind him, in that other world.

"I must go now," said the angel, "to bring a baby home. He will be pleased to come, and I am glad to take him away. For the dear mite would certainly have turned out badly, had he remained below. But what is it you want, dear boy?"

"How I wish you would fetch the little carriage-lady!" the boy could not help exclaiming, so filled was he with the longing to behold again the one whom he had loved best on earth. It was but rarely that her mother's brougham had visited the slums. Yet such an occasion was, for him, like catching a glimpse of that patch of sky from his garret window. It had served to keep alive in him his intuitive belief in a better time coming.

The angel smiled upon him, and immediately the boy's eyes were opened, to perceive quite a crowd of children close at hand.

"I was waiting to see if you would remember her," said the approving voice. "Do you recognise that little girl who is so devotedly kissing her doll?"

Then the boy was consoled when he looked once more upon the little face, that had formerly been so pale and sad, but was now so bright and rosy.

"But why is she to have such a shabby old doll?" he inquired, rather doubtfully.

"Because she is tired of fine dolls, and loves this one above all the rest," the angel graciously explained to him. "On earth, the poor child was overladen with good things, and that is why you see her here. She has also been asking for you, and now you may be together as long as ever you like."

Then the boy knew that the first little girl was gone, and he stretched out his hands to the other, who came and held up her doll, so that he might kiss it. As the angel left them, she put her other hand in his, and he gladly submitted to her guidance.

"Come," she said, in affectionate tones, "and I will show you where you can get a peep at the Palace of the King. The King is away just now in another of His Palaces. But soon He will come back, and then it will be Paradise indeed."

"Shall we ever see Him?" questioned the boy, in an awestruck whisper.

"We shall hear His footsteps," answered the child, in accents of anticipatory delight, "and the brightness of His Presence will fall upon us when He passes our way. Now, if you look through these tall trees, you can catch a glimpse of the Palace."

When the boy obeyed her he was transported with wonder, and trembled from excessive joy.

Behind the Palace, which stood upon a hill, lay the city of pure gold. The sunshine was reflected on its walls and pinnacles, which glittered with pearls and precious stones. So that, overpowered by the glory of it, the children could look no longer, and were forced to turn aside. Neither could they find words in which to express their feelings, as, hand in hand, they wandered on together.

"Tell me," said the boy at length, "when you went out into the darkness, did you expect to find it light?"

"No," she replied, with a retrospective smile; "I was terribly afraid that they would put me into a dark hole in the ground. And so they did shut up a part of me, that is resting there, until the great resurrection of the bodies. But, you know, an angel brought my real self to this beautiful garden instead. And when the church bell was tolling dolefully for me down below, the children were singing to give me a cheerful welcome up here. God in high Heaven is so good; He wishes us all to go on living and loving for ever and ever more."

"What a pity they don't know down there just what they are coming to," said the boy, very thoughtfully. "But now we can't go back, and there's no one else to tell them about it."

"Oh, but the angels often visit the earth," the little girl informed him, hopefully. "And sometimes, I believe, they take messages to our dear ones, who are still mourning our loss. I often think that if my dear mother could only be sure that I am here, then she would grieve for me no more. How I would like to ask the kind angel to let her know!"

Hardly had she finished speaking when the angel stood beside them.

"It shall be as you wish, dear little one," said the benignant voice. "On earth it is night, and your mother lies asleep. I will go and whisper to her of this Paradise for children, and I will leave a kiss from you upon her lips."

Straightway the angel vanished, and they were alone again.

"Did you notice the large mansions," said the little girl, "where the children were at play? That is where we live. And close at hand we have, each of us, our own little garden to keep in order. In them we plant the seeds of our favourite flowers, and these have never failed us yet."

Then the boy recollected that many of the children he had seen were carrying spades and watering cans; just as it flashed across him that he had remarked all sorts of animals, in the outer garden, before he entered the shining portal.

They were about to return on their homeward way, when the angel once more overtook them.

"Fret thyself no longer, my child. Thy mother believes that she hath but dreamed of thee. Yet her heart is now at rest. She will ever look forward to meeting thee in the blissful hereafter. But hark! do you not hear a sound from afar? It announces the coming of the King. Quick, dear children, and prepare to welcome Him!"

Then the children hastened to gather the pure white lilies which grew by the way, until their arms were full of them. And as the stalks were stripped of the flowers, new ones sprang up in their place as fresh and fragrant as before.

Meanwhile the light around them grew softer and richer, until it concentrated itself into a pathway of dazzling radiance. The air quivered and vibrated into a faint hue of violet, as the first notes of celestial music became distinctly audible. Slowly the melody rose and swelled into the anthems of the Heavenly Hosts. To the boy's intense delight he found that he was able to join in that mystic song, and so he obtained utterance at last.

The children laid down their lilies on the path of golden light. The little girl sank gently on her knees, but the boy, overpowered by the glory, prostrated himself in deep adoration. And as that luminous Presence went by their souls expanded, and their faces were transfigured. The beauty and abundance of life was theirs, and filled them with perfect joy.

When the brightness had gradually faded from the track, they rose from the ground, trembling, yet not afraid. In the distance could be heard the chorus of children's voices, as they sang to welcome their King; while overhead, in the holy calm that now ensued, the birds burst into canticles of unutterable praise.

The boy knew not how it was that his memory went back to a story once related to him by a city missionary. And his companion listened to the old, familiar tale with parted lips and bated breath, because for her, as for all of us, it was ever fresh, ever real.

The story told of a carpenter's shop, in obscure Nazareth, which was overshadowed by a tree. And the Son who dwelt there, in meek subjection to His parents, was Jesus Christ, the everlasting Lord.

Sometimes a Light Surprises.

Words by WILLIAM COWPER. Music by E. BURRITT LANE, Mus.B. Dunelm, F.T.C.L.
(Organist of Redhill Congregational Church.)

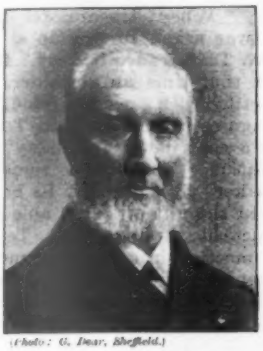
Allegretto.



TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A DENOMINATIONAL WORKER.

ONE of the most remarkable developments of the Temperance movement during the latter half of Queen Victoria's reign was the formation of denominational Temperance societies. In the early days of the work, when the abstainers were a feeble folk, it was an unheard-of thing for any aggressive Temperance effort to be organised by a church as a church. To-day all this has been changed, and every religious denomination, without any exception worth mentioning, has its own society or league for the promotion of the Temperance cause. One of the best managed and most efficiently organised denominational societies is the Free Methodist League, whose operations are co-extensive with the United Methodist Free Churches. The Rev. Joseph Thornley, of Sheffield, the secretary of the association, who is widely esteemed in his own denomination, has also a distinct place in Temperance circles. He was born in 1838, and as a young man relinquished excellent prospects in the commercial world for the work of the ministry. He is an excellent preacher and speaker, and his thorough grip of the Temperance question is vouched for by the fact that he has "graduated" in Good Templary, which has turned out so many able Temperance folk. From Sheffield as a centre, Mr. Thornley serves his own denomination as its accredited Temperance representative in all parts of the country.

(Photo: G. Inear, Sheffield.)

THE REV. JOSEPH THORNLEY

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

The working of the new Act which came into operation on January 1 is being keenly watched by Temperance reformers and representatives of the liquor traffic alike, to say nothing of those social reformers who stand just on the border line of the Temperance movement. Time alone will tell how far the new legislation will effect a change in the criminal statistics of the country. One thing is certain: a decided step in advance has been taken, and the Temperance leaders must see that any retrograde proposals are promptly checked in the bud.

A FRIEND OF THE POOR.

One of the most popular members of the Shoreditch Board of Guardians is Mrs. C. W. Garrard. She is a life abstainer, and during her many years' service as a Poor Law Guardian has missed no opportunity of championing the cause of the poor women and children. To remove the taint of "Bumbledomism" and make the poor unfortunates share in the small comforts which one associates with home happiness has been this excellent lady's ambition. Steady, persevering, persistent work, rather than talk, has marked her public career, with the result that quite a number of small reforms stand to her credit. She is the wife of Mr. Charles W. Garrard, a member of the Borough Council of Shoreditch.

(Photo: G. Eisdale's Views, Lower Clapton Road, N.E.)

MRS. C. W. GARRARD.

Mrs. Garrard has been a prominent worker in Band of Hope circles, more particularly in the district covered by the Hackney and East Middlesex Band of Hope Union.

A PRACTICAL SUGGESTION.

The circulation of Temperance literature as a distinct part of our work continues to be most inadequately recognised both by individuals and societies. An examination of the various published annual reports of town and country societies reveals the fact that the money spent upon literature remains very small. If the present year is to be a good year for work, it can only be by a thorough determination on the part of individuals to support the press, not only in their private capacities, but also as members of committees dealing with the expenditure of societies. As Temperance men we are saved the outlay which non-Temperance men are put to for beer. Why not make the beer money book money in 1903? The cost of two pints a day would give us £9 2s. 6d. to spend in Temperance literature in a year. If every worker laid out that sum this year, it would furnish him with a supply of tracts and periodicals for general circulation, stock his shelves with all the new books on the question as they appear, and enable his newsvendor to deliver regularly week by week all the Temperance papers and a good supply of the monthly magazines.

A CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

It would be easy to multiply testimonies from the published writings and speeches of our great military leaders. Lord Wolseley (Sir Garnet, as he then was), when conducting the Red River Expedition, rigidily enforced a regulation to prevent dram drinking. Only one bottle of whisky was carried on the expedition, and this in Wolseley's own canoe. On the return journey, when all danger was past, it was proposed to broach it. "No," replied Wolseley, "I have promised it to Kane," his soldier servant of the 60th Rifles, and sure enough Kane obtained the bottle which had journeyed upwards of two thousand miles. The "Soldier's Pocket Book," published by Wolseley in 1868, contains some sterling advice on the value of total abstinence. Let one brief extract suffice: "By increasing the allowance of tea, and abolishing that of rum, you diminish the supplies to be carried to a great extent, whilst you add to the health and efficiency of your men. Their discipline will improve as their moral tone is raised, engendering a manly cheerfulness that spirit-drinking armies know nothing of. No men have ever done harder work than was performed by the troops employed upon the Red River Expedition. No spirits of any sort were issued to them, but they had practically as much of good tea as they could drink. Illness was, I may say, unknown amongst them." From our own times back to the days of the Commonwealth is a far cry, but the testimony is the same. The soldiers of Oliver Cromwell, for example, during their laborious campaigns, carried with them knapsacks containing oaten meal, which when hungry they mixed with water, anticipating by a few centuries the "Stokos" of Mr. John Abbey. On this dietary, for a considerable period, Cromwell's soldiers principally subsisted, and sustained great fatigue in the full vigour of health.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

The death of Archbishop Temple was an irreparable blow to the Temperance movement. His devotion to the cause "through evil report and good report," and his unswerving belief in the ultimate triumph of our principles, served to rally our workers again and again. To the Temperance workers of Rugby belongs the credit of having brought Dr. Temple into the ranks. When Headmaster at Rugby School he was asked to preside at a meeting of the town Temperance Society. Dr. Temple was not at that time an abstainer. He went to the meeting with an open mind. The late Robert Maguire (well known to THE QUIVER readers as a contributor for many years) was the deputation. Those who remember this genial speaker will not need to be told that he possessed the gift of being able to interest and instruct his hearers. Dr. Temple went from that meeting in a thinking mood, and it was not long before the Rugby friends discovered that he had become an abstainer. Upon the death of the venerated Samuel Bowly, Dr. Temple, who was then Bishop of Exeter, accepted the invitation of the National Temperance League to become its President, an invitation which was conveyed to the Bishop by the late Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson. Dr. Temple's work for the League proved incessant, and his pecuniary help was frequently given on a most generous scale. The Church of England Temperance Society has also lost a most enthusiastic worker in the Archbishop. While Bishop of London, it was his habit to regularly preside at the meetings of the Executive Committee of the diocesan branch, and Dr. Temple had visited nearly every diocese in connection with the work of the Society. Band of Hope workers cherish with pride the brilliant reception given to Dr. Temple and Mrs. Temple in the Morley Hall by the Hackney Band of Hope Union, at which Madame Antoinette Sterling supplemented her songs with a bright little speech, in which she made the announcement that "she too was an abstainer." The Archbishop joined the Rechabite Order, and upon several occasions warmly commended the work of this active body. His thorough interest in remedial legislation was attested again and again by his speeches and votes in the House of Lords. We thank God for all that His honoured servant has done for the furtherance of the Temperance cause, and our prayer must be that He will call other labourers to come to the help of the weak against this mighty enemy of our race.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

Crush the Adder.

NEAR the Lizard, and in other parts of Cornwall, there are double stone walls. The space that is between the walls is filled up with earth, so that it is easy to walk along the summit. Wishing to climb upon one of these walls, a farmer one day placed his hand upon the top. The hand met something cold and clammy, and he knew that he had touched a deadly adder. A shiver passed up his arm; but he did not lose his presence of mind. Pressing down the venomous reptile with all his force, so that it could not move, he managed to alight safely on the other side of the wall. If we would crush the temptation of the first glass, and throttle the whisper of the first alluring voice that invites us to do evil, the way of transgressors would not be nearly so hard. But the grasp must be in a divine strength "By my God," says the Psalmist, "I have leaped over a wall."

A Nonconformist Veteran.

To celebrate the eightieth birthday of the Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers a few friends subscribed the cost of a portrait of the veteran Congregationalist, which is to have a resting-place on the walls of the Memorial Hall with those of other leaders of Nonconformity. The presentation was made on December 29th, 1902. The portrait is the work of Mr. C. H. Blair, and, as may be seen from our illustration, is an excellent likeness. Mr. Blair is the painter of the presentation portrait of Mr. George Smith of Coalville, and of that of Dr. Robert Moffat which hangs in the Medical Hall at Edinburgh.

(From the Painting by C. H. Blair.)

THE REV. DR. GUINNESS ROGERS.

Going to the People.

IF the people will not come to us, we must go to the people. Such is evidently the motto of the Manchester Wesleyan Mission. Taking a small organ with them, two or three of the Mission workers will sally forth to the crowded districts of the Cotton City, such as the Jersey Street dwellings at Ancoats—dwellings which were once an old cotton factory—and will invite the people in the dwellings to come to their windows and listen. The organ is almost certain to attract a number of children, if no others, and the preacher and the Sister of the Mission are bound to get some hearers while they preach, and sing, and pray. Perchance some of those who thus listen may find their way at other times to the Mission chapel or hall. The Manchester Wesleyan Mission may be taken as an instance of what has been called the Forward Movement—the Methodism that is not afraid to break with its traditions, if need be, and inaugurate new methods, to reach the people and touch them at various points of their life. It will convert large old-fashioned chapels from which the congregation has departed into halls, and utilise also the large public buildings of the city, as does the Rev. S. F. Collier the spacious Free Trade Hall in Manchester. A notable example of the Forward Movement may also be seen in the London Wesleyan Mission, which has about eight branches and uses some forty buildings constantly on Sundays and weekdays, its various congregations totalling some twenty thousand persons.

INVITING THE PEOPLE TO COME TO THEIR WINDOWS.

The Dead Wild Duck.

THERE is a passage in "The Life of a Scottish Naturalist" which must touch the heart of every reader of it. Edwards, one very hard spring, found a wild duck dead, with her bill full of snow, and under her thirteen eggs. Her strong wings could easily have borne her away to food and safety, but she would not leave her eggs. What noble mother love, God's love, the value of life in God's eyes! And if the natural life is precious, how precious is the life which is still closer to His heart! What care the spirit's life deserves and requires! What criminal folly it is to be careless of it in ourselves or in those dear to us. If the mother bird gave herself in seeking first the life of the offspring for which she hoped, surely no effort and no giving are too great for the parent of living children to plant and foster in them the life of the Kingdom. The place of parent or teacher is noble because it is an altar on which the highest sacrifice is laid for the highest end.

Two "Quiver" Heroes.

WE are glad to be able to put before our readers this month portraits of two recent additions to the roll of wearers of the medal of THE QUIVER Heroes Fund, particulars of whose gallantry were published in a recent number of THE QUIVER. Mr. William Cass, of Scarborough, was one of the three persons upon whom our silver medal was bestowed for their share in the attempted rescue of five children at Reighton Sands, in Yorkshire, the other two winners being ladies, whose portraits we have not yet received. Mr. Donald McCrea, who wears the bronze medal, saved two children from drowning in the canal at Lancaster. May we again remind our readers that we are at all times glad to hear of cases of individual gallantry in the saving of life which have not been recognised through any other fund or society? Such cases must be reported to the Editor at once, and the records must be attested in all instances by eye-witnesses whose credibility is vouched for by a magistrate or minister of religion.

JERSEY STREET DWELLINGS, ANCOATS MANCHESTER.

(Photo: Sarony, Scarborough.)

MR. WILLIAM H. CASS, "QUIVER" SILVER MEDALLIST.

The Fairest Flower.

(See Frontispiece.)

MANY and interesting are the legends which have grown up round the name of James I., King of the Scots, who was taken prisoner by the English early in the fifteenth century, and held for eighteen years. Of his long imprisonment there are not a few reminiscences in "The King's Quhair," the best known of the literary legacies which King James left his people. He there speaks of the incident which Mr. Penrose has chosen for the picture which forms the frontispiece to this number of THE QUIVER. It depicts the meeting of the captive king with the Lady Jane Beaufort, of whom the kingly prisoner writes:

> "And therewith cast I down mine eyes again,
> And walking as I saw beneath the tower
> * * * * * *
> The fairest and the freshest youthful flower
> That ere methinks I saw before that hour."

King James's life was, from first to last, full of trouble, and the target of intrigue, and he fell at the hands of assassins in his fortieth year.

Through a Window in Peking.

NEW-YEAR'S time, and a bitterly cold night in the city of Peking; yet the native converts are gathered in goodly number within the church of the London Mission, with their revered pastor and friend, the English missionary, for a meeting in connection with the world-wide week of prayer. In that same Chinese city, at the same late hour, British soldiers are engaged in new-year carousings. One of the noisy company is an unhappy backslider from God's grace. Not long ago, in the British chapel at Hong-Kong, he learned to know Jesus as his Saviour; but now, through evil company at his new station, has fallen into sin, and on the night in question has been drinking hard. Presently he and his dissipated comrade sally forth into the streets, and, happening, to pass a long, lamp-lighted Chinese building, he looks in through a window. "How can I ever forget the scene!" he said afterwards; "rows of Chinese men, women, and children knelt with heads bowed in prayer. How miserable I felt! Which were the heathen—I or the Chinese? Here was I, belonging to a Christian nation, not fit to stand side by side with one of these Chinese whom people so despise." Deeply conscious of his degradation, he was turning away, the drunken mist now cleared from his senses, when strains of what seemed to him sweetest music sounded forth within the building. "Work, for the night is coming" was the hymn. As he still lingered near, the missionary came out, and spoke with great kindness to the remorse-stricken man as he guided him back to his military quarters. "I found no rest," he said, "till I gave my heart again to God at the London Mission the following day." How cheering to God's missionary servants in heathen lands such an instance of an English wanderer won back to Christ by the sight of Chinese Christians! What encouragement to all God's faithful witnesses, in every land, such evidence of indirect, unconscious influence of their "work and labour of love"!

(Photo: Webber, Lancaster.)

MR. DONALD McCREA, "QUIVER" BRONZE MEDALLIST.

A Cure for Swearing.

IN the old slavery days, an aged negro at Philadelphia, who was greatly attached to a tolerably kind master, was an example, at once amusing and edifying, of humility. He would never eat anything till the rest of the household had finished, and then made his frugal meal entirely from the broken meats; nor would he accept a more sumptuous or exclusive lodging than the nightly shelter of a commodious dog-kennel. "But I must confess," his free-and-easy owner would say, "that Uncle Enoch has done more to break me of swearing than any man I have ever known. He stands behind my chair at meals, and whenever I am so unlucky as to blurt out an oath he always makes a profound bow. I asked him one day why he did it, and he answered that he could never hear the holy name of God mentioned, in whatever way, without being overcome by reverence and fear. That bow of his is too much for me. No, I feel that I never can swear before Uncle Enoch."

Reservoir Ants.

IT is a remarkable fact that there are ants in South America, and a similar species has also been found in Australia, in whose nests some members serve as living honey-pots. The workers gather the honey, and pour it into these special members of the community, whose swollen crop occupies and enormously distends the abdomen. When necessary, these honey-ants, gently solicited by the ordinary members of the nest, give out a portion of the store, which serves as food for the rest. The case stands thus: the ordinary worker ants feed the reservoir ant, and the reservoir ant receives and gives out its store for the community from which it has received it. Are the people of a flock aware how important they are to that one of their number whom they call their minister? Possibly in an afternoon's visiting he gets more courage, faith, forbearance, gentleness than he did that day on his knees or at his books, or, indeed, all the days of that week. There are beautiful souls in a flock; many beautiful souls who can give, though they do not know it; and there are poor weak souls who need, and they give as much as the others by their very need. And so every way the man who ministers is ministered to. He who is to be full for others is filled by the others, just as the ordinary ants fill the reservoir ants and then receive from them the food they require. For the spiritual honey, the faith and grace in question, in a heart or in a congregation, cannot be stored in cells, but only in living souls. The life, prayer, example, spirit, influence of the men and women and children of the flock—that is to say, your life and spirit, my brother—are of the utmost importance to the very person who feeds you.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from November 29th up to and including December 29th, 1902. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund: A. S., 15s.; J. S. M., Ecclefechan, 15s.; "Chiff," 10s. 6d.; Mrs. Wells, Kilburn, 10s.; E. G. B., 10s.; Annie, 7s.; A Reader of THE QUIVER, Windsor, 5s.; A Farmer's Wife, 5s.; A Working Woman, 5s.; Anon, Belfast, 4s.; Winnie and Nora Harris, Netherton, 3s.; Anon, Lee Green, 2s. 6d.; "Marie," Birkenhead, 2s. 6d.; L. Smith, Woodford, 2s.; E. Grove, 2s.; A. W., Cambridge, 1s. 9d.; R. Rimdell, 1s. 2d.; M. Thomason, 1s.; C. F., 1s.; Colin B. Ellison, Blundellsands, £1 15s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "An Irish Girl," £2 10s. 2s. 6d.; A. S., £1; Yeovil, £1; E. G. B., 10s.; "Rauceby," 5s.; L. R., Newcastle-on-Tyne, 5s.; M. E., 1s. 6d.

For The Ragged School Union: R. E., Longsight, 5s.; A. Bishop, Ealing, 4s.

For The Children's Country Holidays Fund: A. S., 10s.

For The Cripples' Country Holidays Fund: "Nemo," Manitoba, 10s.

For The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children: G. P., 10s. 6d.

For The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals: G. P., 10s. 6d.

For The Royal National Lifeboat Institution: G. P., 10s. 6d.

For The Church Lads' Brigade: G. P., 10s.

For The Poor Children's Society: E. M. C., 5s.

For The St. Giles's Christian Mission: Anon., Dumbarton, 3s. 6d.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

37. What great difficulty does St. Paul refer to in his First Epistle to the Corinthians which those had to contend with who had been converted from heathenism to Christianity?

38. How did this difficulty arise?

39. What lesson do we learn from St. Paul's condemnation of those Christian converts who attended idol festivals?

40. What does St. Paul say can alone make any act acceptable in the sight of God?

41. What may be called the chief characteristic of love?

42. In what way does St. Paul illustrate the knowledge of man in this world, compared with what it will be in the world to come?

43. What Jew is mentioned as being a great and eloquent preacher at Ephesus?

44. How many persons received the gift of the Holy Ghost at Ephesus by the laying on of St. Paul's hands?

45. What is known of the church at Ephesus?

46. What event took place at Ephesus which greatly increased the spread of the Gospel?

47. Was the practice of exorcism much used by the Jews?

48. What was the effect of St. Paul's teaching at Ephesus?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 350.

25. St. Paul appears to have always attended the Jewish synagogue or place of prayer, and preached the Gospel to the Jews. When they rejected him he went to the Gentiles, but not until the Jews refused to listen (Acts xvii. 1, 2).

26. That he was the messenger of a King named Jesus, who was a rival of the Roman Emperor (Acts xvii. 7).

27. They were great students of the Holy Scriptures, and examined them carefully to see how far St. Paul's teaching was in accord with the Old Testament (Acts xvii. 10, 11).

28. "Pray without ceasing. In every thing give thanks, for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus" (1 Thess. v. 17, 18).

29. In the case of his First Epistle to the Thessalonians St. Paul adjures them to have the epistle read to "all the holy brethren," as though there had been elsewhere some neglect (1 Thess. v. 27; Col. iv. 16).

30. "Prove all things; abstain from all appearance of evil" (1 Thess. v. 21, 22).

31. He said that inasmuch as "we are the offspring of God," which their poets acknowledged, God cannot be like images of gold and silver, which we can make (Acts xvii. 29).

32. St. Paul says, "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts xvii. 26).

33. Belief in the resurrection of the body (Acts. xvii. 31, 32).

34. Crispus, the chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue (Acts. xviii. 8).

35. He "shook his raiment" against them, as Nehemiah of old had done (Acts xviii. 6; Neh. v. 13; St. Matt. x. 14).

36. No mention of Silas is made anywhere after his arrival at Corinth with Timotheus (Acts xviii. 5).

XUM

UNIV. OF MICH.

FROM THE PAINTING BY W. H. MARGETSON.

"IMMEDIATELY BEHIND IT CAME THE VICTIMS OF THE INQUISITION."

("A Flame of Fire," p. 451.)

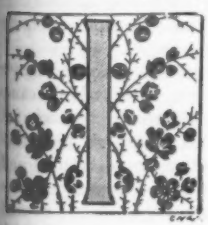
XUM

XUM

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,



Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–XII.

In the year 1587, the year before the coming of the Great Armada to English shores, Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, near Barnet town, having returned wounded from the wars, and having spent some time at his father's house, hears, through John Trenoweth, of Cornwall, that an old friend of his mother's is in the power of the Inquisitors of Spain. Being also desirous of finding out the Spanish plots concerning England, he determines to go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, of Cornwall, and John Trenoweth, in order to rescue the unfortunate lady, and to discover Spanish secrets. He therefore starts for Cornwall with John Trenoweth, and on his journey falls into the hands of Jesuit spies. Rupert Hamstead and John Trenoweth are accused by their fellow-travellers as Jesuit spies, but afterwards discover that they themselves are agents of Father Parsons. They at length reach Cornwall, where they are met by Mawgan Killigrew. Here they also come into contact with two Spaniards, whose behaviour is so suspicious that they decide to start for Spain secretly and without delay. The Englishmen leave England, and on first seeing the Spanish hills enter into a solemn covenant concerning their mission. They afterwards fall in with some Spanish gipsies, the young queen of whom greatly impresses Killigrew. She afterwards rescues them from Spanish officials, and gives them directions how to reach Toledo. After some little difficulty they enter the city. Here they hear the Archbishop's sermon, in which it is announced that heretics are to be punished by death. Here also Rupert Hamstead sees Isabella de Valencia, and presently all three take part in a terrible scene at the Circo Romano.

CHAPTER XIII.

HOW JOHN TRENOWETH SAW HIS SWEETHEART.

I HAVE said that my heart beat not more quickly than was its wont, and I have spoken the truth. Instead of being well-nigh crazed, as I had imagined I should be under such circumstances, a great calm came over me. I took more than ordinary note of the people we passed in the streets, as well as of the buildings which were larger than ordinary. I remember how in particular I paid attention to a building which had had a strange history, being at one time a Jewish temple, and again a Moorish mosque, but which was at that time a Christian church called Santa Maria la Blanca, and I remember, too, wondering why it was called the Church of the White Mary. Not only this, but when at length I came to the Church of San Juan de los Reyes, I took particular note of the chains which were festooned in front of the building.

I knew that within that same church prayers were being chanted, prior to leading a heretic victim down the steep incline, and across to the Circo Romano, which stood on the plain outside the city walls. But, somehow, the thought seemed to fill me with a kind of unnatural calm. Indeed, I asked one of the crowd which stood on the little space outside the church door what the chains meant.

"They be the chains which were taken from the Christians whom the Moors kept in their dungeons," replied the man.

"And who put them there?"

"The señor must be a stranger to Toledo, or he would know," he replied: "it was by the orders of Isabella the Catholic. Aye, and by the Mass, she made the Moors suffer for it afterwards. Good fuel they were, too, these dogs who followed the false prophet."

"And who is to be burnt to-day?" I asked with seeming carelessness.

"Aye, I know not. Some say one thing, and some another; there be several, I think, and among them an English heretic."

"Go you to see the burning?"

"What would you?" cried the man. "We have not had one for many a week, and think you I will miss this chance? The saints know that of late there hath been but little interest in life. The Inquisition falls hard on the heretics, but, as Padre Antonio said to me yesterday, it provides a rare spectacle for the people. I would not miss it for a Dutch ducat."

"Why go you not inside the church?"

"Oh! there is no sport there. The priests are mumbling prayers, and giving exhortation; but what of that? True, I would like to hear Padre Tempestad tell those poor wretches of heretics how they will burn in hell, for he hath a rare gift. I heard him once describe the sufferings of a heretic in hell, and as he told of his endeavours to scrape away the boiling pitch from his roasting body, even I felt sick. But the prayers will be long, and the sermon short to-day, so I prefer waiting here, and seeing the procession start. Besides, the church is full, and I doubt whether I could gain admission."

And this I found to be true; for when I and my companions tried to obtain an entrance, we saw only a seething mass of people, who whispered one to another so loudly as to almost drown the chanting of the priests.

"It's a fine day," I heard a man say close beside me, "and there is no wind."

"Aye, and the dried olive wood will burn well."

"Green wood would be better sport."

"Aye, but that is over-cruel, according to my thinking."

"Think you she will last?"

"What mean you?"

"It is a good mile walk from here to the Circo Romano, and it is said she hath been put to the torture. If so, I doubt whether she can walk so far."

"Aye, especially when she knows she is walking to hell."

"Not so. These English heretics think they go straight to heaven."

"What, unshriven?"

"They care not for that."

"Well, I am a good Catholic, but these be strange doings. It is these Jesuits who are at the back of it all. Report hath it that it is the English Jesuit priest who hath stirred up the Inquisition again."

"Aye, so I have heard. Whenever they have power, the fires burn. But what would you? She is English, and they defy us. They, the beer-drinking swine, have sacked our towns, and defied our arms, and, therefore, they must be punished. Even the Dutch resistance is naught to theirs. I would that the Armada started to-morrow instead of next year. But what would you? The King waits for the Pope's money, and, therefore, there is delay. But patienza, I will touch the English gold!"

"And so will I, for I am selected to go. But look you, they be coming."

In this he spoke the truth; for at that moment the great church doors rolled back, the people rushed out, while the dismal chanting sounded more plain.

I looked at my companions, who gave a low cry as the great bell in the tower began to toll a funeral knell, and I saw that each face was stern and set. Mawgan had lost all his ruddy colour, and had become as pale as a Spaniard; but this was not with fear. Nay, I knew by the gleaming of his eyes, and the firm setting of his jaws, that his heart was on fire, even as mine was. John Trenoweth, too, looked almost ghastly. In truth, his face was the face of a corpse rather than of a living man; but his eyes gleamed with that steely glitter which I had always noted when he was much wrought upon.

He did not cry out, nor become frantic as I feared he would. I could hear him breathing heavily, however, as though his lungs closed against the air, while he kept on muttering the words, "The hell hounds! the hell hounds!"

A minute later a great silence fell upon us all, for the grim procession began.

First came two men bearing a carved figure of our Lord upon the cross, after which came some ecclesiastics headed by the archbishop, all of whom wore gorgeous robes, which nevertheless bore signs of mourning upon them; and after these came a number of priests of less degree followed by many boys, who carried flags and other things, the meaning of which I could not understand. After these again came a man of great stature and commanding mien, but who made me shudder as I looked on him. He, too, was an ecclesiastic, and wore rich robes, but he was not joining in the dismal chanting which filled the air with sadness. I watched him as his eyes swept over the crowd: eyes which made one think of darkness and mystery, so deep and stern were they.

Then followed a man with a rough wooden cross,* at which a sound like a groan rose from the vast multitude, for immediately behind it came the victims of the Inquisition, or what we thought were the victims. Their faces we could not discern, for they were covered with a death mask; neither were the outlines of their bodies plain, on account of the long coarse robes which enveloped them. But we could see that two out of the four were lame, and stumbled along with difficulty; and this was, doubtless, partly because the road was rough and uneven, and partly because their limbs ached after their torture.

Who followed after the victims I know not, for Mawgan and John Trenoweth and I kept close to them, or at least as close as we could, for we could not walk by their sides because of the soldiers who formed a barrier.

Down the hill went the priests, and others, chanting the death chant, until we came to the Puerta Cambron, which, like the other great doors, was a tremendous barrier made of wood and iron, but which did not swing on hinges, but was drawn up and down in a rude socket. And after this we crossed a rough piece of ground passing not far from El Cristo de la Vega, where the victims had been condemned the day before, and where I was destined to realise one of the most wonderful experiences which surely ever fell to the lot of man. A little distance from here we struck into a rude road which led to the Circo Romano, a large level piece of ground encircled by the ruins of thick stone walls. This place, I was told, had once been a Roman amphitheatre, for the people had it that Toledo was the oldest city in the world, and that the Romans ruled the city long centuries before Wamba conquered it. Be that as it may, it was now used as a place for burning heretics, and already I saw in the near distance grim piles of wood.

It was at this time that the terror of the whole business really got hold of me, for up to now the thought that I should see any living human being committed to the flames had not really possessed me. I had, as it seemed to me, been living through a black nightmare, but now the terror of it all entered my soul, and such a fear laid hold of my heart as I have never felt either before or since.

To the right stood Toledo on its lofty heights, grim, awful, mysterious, forbidding; on the left was the church of El Cristo de la Vega, behind which was an undulating country, green with olive trees. In front was a plain, through which the tawny waters of the Tagus ran, presently to enter the great gorge which nearly encircled the city.

The day was fine. Not a cloud hung in the sky, not a breath of wind stirred. All around, save for the olive trees which appeared on the hills behind the little church, was a parched, sterile country. Not a bird sang, and not a sound was heard save the dismal chanting of the priests, the tolling of the great bell, and the distant shriek of a buzzard.

The flippant talk which I had heard a little while before had ceased. In truth, these Spaniards, cruel as they were, and always had been—aye, and laughing at their cruelty, too—had now become quiet, and subdued. Perchance the awful thought that human beings were to be burnt alive made them think of the meaning of it all. For no charges were brought against the victims save that they did not accept the beliefs of their Church. Perhaps the more thoughtful of them wondered whether He Who took the little children in His arms and blessed them would have given His blessing to the decisions of the tribunal which had condemned fellow-creatures to this.

Be that as it may, no man spoke, and when we reached the stakes and the faggots, and the priests stopped chanting the funeral dirge, the silence was that of the night rather than of the day.

Presently a man stepped upon a kind of pulpit. Who he was, or what position he held, I knew not; neither do I know his name, even to this day. He began chanting something in the Latin tongue, which I did not understand. This he continued a minute or more, during which the crowd uncovered their heads. When he had finished there was a moment's respite, for the priests spoke to each other, and even the people began to whisper.

"I would a dagger were put through them instead," I heard one say.

"Tush, man!" replies another. "Tush, man! You know it must not be. It is a law that no blood must be shed—nay, not even a drop. But listen."

At this the man who stood on the platform began to speak. I will not write down all he said, for it makes me sick to think of it, and this was no wonder, seeing he spoke of the love of the Mother Church, and of the glory of God. After this one of the victims was brought forward. A Jew I took him to be when first the mask was torn from his face, and I soon found that I was right; for the man spoke harsh words to him. He told him that his fathers had crucified Christ, and that, ever since, they had been an accursed race. That still the Holy Inquisition had been kind to him, giving him opportunities of life, if he would forswear his naughtiness, but he, being stiff-necked and sinful, had defied the servants of God. After this a woman was brought forward, and as her face was uncovered my heart stood still, for I was sure that she was the daughter of Sir John Tremayne. Her face was pale and drawn as if by much suffering, her lips were bloodless, while her forehead looked like a piece of polished bone.

* This wooden cross may still be seen in the church of San Juan de los Reyes.—J. H.

"Anne de Valencia," the man said, "I still call thee by that name, and perhaps for the last time, for after this day if thou dost not repent, thou shalt no longer be regarded as the widow of Don Basilio Fernandio de Valencia, but thou shalt be an outcast bearing thy maiden name, Tremayne. To thee the Church hath shown great mercy. Thou shalt not die to-day. Thou art brought here that thou mayst be warned, after which thou shalt have further days for repentance. So kind are we to thee that thou shalt witness the burning of thy tiring woman, Esther Truscott, who hath, like thee, been obdurate, refusing the Church's love, and denying her doctrines. It is our hope that our clemency will at once melt thine heart, and at the same time be to thee a warning."

"It is Mistress Mary—it is she we came to save!" I heard John Trenoweth say. "What says he, Master Hamstead?"

"Hush, man," I said; "she is not to be burned to-day," but I did not tell him what had been said concerning Esther Truscott, although my silence scarcely spared him at all, as will speedily be seen. For no sooner had the man ceased speaking to Mistress Tremayne, than the death mask was torn from the face of the other victim, and I saw the features of a kindly faced woman, who looked as though she was well past mid-age, although I was not quite sure. That she was an Englishwoman, I could not doubt for a moment, for hers was a face that could not belong to any Spaniard, so strongly was it stamped with the stamp of her country. This I saw in a moment, and just as I turned to look at John Trenoweth, wondering if he recognised her as his sweetheart, the priest pronounced her name: Esther Truscott.

But not a word more did he say, for John Trenoweth passed through the people as easily as a man might pass through a field of standing wheat. Not a word spoke he, although on his face was a look such as I had never seen before. Love, terror, hatred, vengeance, determination, all were there, and it seemed as though those around were moved by his presence, for no man molested him.

Before a man could well count five, John Trenoweth had reached the condemned woman and stood before her with his arms outstretched. But the woman moved not, although her eyes were wide open with fear as if she had seen a ghost.

"Esther, my beauty, my dear sweetheart!" he said, and I noted the Cornish accents; I noted, too, the tenderness of his voice.

As he spoke the woman's eyes changed, and a look of joy swept over her face; such a look as I have seen on the face of a young mother when she hath clasped her babe to her breast.

"Before a man could well count five, John Trenoweth had reached the condemned woman."

"John! John!" she cried. "You be come, then! Forgive me, John, for I loved 'ee all the time!"

At this she made a movement to come to him, while the Archbishop and priests watched with wide-open eyes, but two soldiers held her fast.

Then, as it seemed to me, in less time than it takes a clock to tick twice, John Trenoweth caught hold of the two soldiers, one in each hand and threw them from her, with less trouble than it would have caused me to throw aside two seven-year-old children. Then, while a cry of excitement rose from the crowd, they fell into each other's arms.

"Esther, my beauty, my lovely maid!" I heard him say, while she kept on repeating, "John, my John! thank God you've come to me!"

But this was only for a moment, for the soldiers rose to their feet, and made ready to rush upon them, and at this neither Mawgan Killigrew nor I could restrain ourselves longer. With drawn swords we rushed to their side; and each made a circle of steel around us. For some minutes—how many I know not—we fought like tigers. Man after man fell around us, while again and again did soldiers come towards us, and again and again did we drive them back.

Once, and once only, did I look at Mawgan Killigrew, and even now, it makes my heart warm to think of him, as I saw him then. His cloak had dropped from his shoulders, and his head was bare. But this all the better revealed his kind, honest face and sinewy form. Mawgan Killigrew was worth seeing at any time, so straight and lithe was he. Even during the few hours I had been in Cornwall, I had heard him spoken of as the finest man in the county. And this I think not without reason, for not only was he of great height, and largeness of limb, but he carried himself with grace and dignity. His face, too, was not one to forget, rather it was one to be thankful for, revealing as it did nobleness of thought, honesty of purpose. That day, however, he seemed crowned with a new glory; the joy of battle was in his eyes—eyes which shone like flames of fire—and he wielded his sword as though it were of featherweight.

His voice rang out clear and true, too, as time after time a man fell, and he gathered himself together for a fresh attack.

How long we fought, I repeat, I do not know. Sometimes I think our struggle must have lasted many minutes; at others, however, I imagine it must have been but a few seconds. For we were but two, and they were a numberless crowd. How then could the battle be long?

"Tear them asunder!" I heard men saying again and again, while others made answer, "We cannot."

"Then cut them asunder."

"It must not be. No blood must be shed. The Holy Inquisition forbids the shedding of blood."

This I heard while Mawgan Killigrew and I fought those who sought to tear John Trenoweth from the arms of the woman he had come to save.

But the end came presently. How could it be otherwise, when we were but two swords against a crowd, which became angrier and angrier each minute? I saw Mawgan borne to the ground, just as I have been told that even a lion is overcome by a pack of jackals, and at the same moment my own arms were pinioned.

"Now tear them asunder," cried a voice, "but break no bones, and shed no blood."

But that they could not do John Trenoweth's arms were around the body of the woman he loved, and the infuriated mob could not separate them.

What the end would have been I know not; nor, indeed, dare I think, but at that moment a young priest rushed into the crowd waving a letter above his head.

"From the King!" he cried, "from the King!"

CHAPTER XIV.

THE VISIT OF SEÑOR TOLEDO.

NO sooner had he spoken than the turmoil ceased. A look of expectation filled every eye, and a moment of breathless silence reigned.

The Archbishop took the letter, and scanned it eagerly.

"The English heretic is to be given further time for repentance," he said. "The King's will be done!" and at this there was a shout, partly of relief, and partly, as I thought, of disappointment from the multitude.

"Take them back to prison," said the Archbishop, and let further means be taken to bring her to repentance."

"But what of the men!" cried a voice. "What of the English devils which we have here?"

"To the dungeons with them," said a voice.

"Aye, to prison with them," said the Archbishop. "They be evidently spies and heretics. They must be taken to prison, and tried."

"But we cannot separate the man from the woman!"

"Drive a dagger into his heart!"

At this moment I saw John Trenoweth's danger. Through the sea of faces I saw him straining the woman to his breast. His face was no longer pale, nor were his eyes hard and cruel. In truth, I believe he did not realise all that was going on around him. Only one thought filled his mind. He held his sweetheart to his breast, and was content.

"John," I said, "John Trenoweth," and the crowd was silent as I spoke.

"Aye, Master Hamstead."

"She is not to die to-day. A letter hath come from the King commanding that she have further time for repentance."

"Aye, do 'ee 'ear that, my beauty?" says John to the woman.

"You must be separated, John," I said.

"Never, never!" he cried.

"It will be better, John. If you do not let her go, they will stab you to the heart, and then you will no longer be able to protect her. God hath helped us so far, and He will again. If you release her now, we will find some means to accomplish our plans."

Whether any man understood our speech I know not; neither, in truth, did I think at that moment, so much wrought upon was I. I believed then, as I believe now, that God in His good providence had guided us, and that He would guide us still further. I think, too, although my words were necessarily few, that John Trenoweth understood what was in my heart, for he kissed Esther Truscott tenderly, and said, "They shall not keep me from 'ee long, my dear, for the Lord hath delivered 'ee from the lion's mouth."

After that I have little idea what happened, for I seemed to fall into a kind of dreamy condition. It seemed as though all through which I had gone had dulled my senses; but I have a vague memory of having my hands bound, and of being led away from the Circo Romano towards the city. I do not think any great crowd went with us, for, as I was told afterwards, the people stayed behind to see the Jew burnt, desiring rather to see his sufferings than to behold three Englishmen led away into captivity.

When we had passed through the Puerta Cambron I remember wondering whether we should all be put in the same prison, or whether each man would have a solitary cell. But I asked no questions, for my brain was dull, and I could not think clearly.

Presently I found myself in darkness. The air was cool, too, although ill-smelling. Little by little my senses came back to me, and, feeling a pain in my head, I put my hand on the place where it ached most. Then I realised that I had been wounded, for it was wet with blood. At some little distance I heard a hum of voices, but the sound was not distinct, and then I think I fell asleep, for I remembered nothing else for a long time.

"Wake up and eat, señor!"

I started up, and saw a Spaniard before me, and then, looking around, I found myself in an ill-lighted room.

"Where am I?" I asked.

"Under the Alcazar," was the reply.

"All right, Rupert, we are here too." It was Mawgan who spoke, and the sound of his voice caused a sensation of joy to pass through my heart.

"Have I been ill?"

"You had a sword cut on your head, but it was not bad."

"And we are all together?"

"Aye. I hear we are to be visited, and the Spanish señors, who, I suppose, are to be our visitors, will not go to the filthy den where they put us first."

"But how did you find that out?"

"A fellow has been to us who speaks English."

"Who speaks English?"

"Aye."

Again I looked around me, and I saw that we were not so badly housed as I feared we should be. It is true that the place was neither more nor less than a dungeon; nevertheless, a ray of light penetrated the gloom from an iron grating placed in the wall, while on the floor was a thick litter of straw, which, as far as I could see, was clean.

The food brought was of a coarse and unsavoury nature, but hunger had come to me, so I fell to eating ravenously. After I had eaten I felt better. Some sour wine, too, although anything but pleasant, slaked my thirst, and made me feel something like my own man again. By-and-by the Spaniard left us, so that we could speak freely.

"We have saved my Esther, Master Hamstead," said John Trenoweth. "Had we not been there, she would have been committed to the flames before the man from the King arrived."

"Aye, and it was a glorious fight, too," said Mawgan almost joyfully. "I am willing to be cooped up in this hole, when I think of the way we slashed at those Spaniards. By Cormoran, Rupert, but thou knowest the tricks of sword-play."

"God, in His mercy, saved my Esther," said John Trenoweth. "She is alive, and she still loves me. Aye, and I have faith; the same God Who hath brought us together will help us still further. I feel it in my heart."

"But we are in prison," I could not help saying.

"In prison! But what of that? Esther is alive, my own little maid that was parted from me more than twenty years agone! If God helped us once, He will again!"

In truth, a great change had come over John Trenoweth. He seemed full ten years younger, and his voice rang out clearly, as though his heart was warm and joyful.

"I tell you God brought us here—aye, and He brought us in time, too. Could they tear me from her? Nay, not ten of them! They dragged, and dragged, but what of that? I held her in my arms. Aye, even although you had struck no blow for me, I would have held her, until the Lord brought deliverance."

Much as I feared the future, I would say no word to discourage him; neither, indeed, had I the right, for we had been wonderfully delivered. Still, I loved not the thought of prison, and I wondered what was the meaning of the news which had been brought to Mawgan.

"The man who spoke English said we were to be visited?" I said to him. "But by whom?"

"Aye, that I know not. I have told you what he said to me. A Spanish lord, he said, could not go into the black, stinking den into which we were first thrust, so we were taken to better quarters."

"Aye, but who can be our visitors?" I asked aloud.

"Who cares?" cried John Trenoweth. "Even though they be the hell hounds of the Inquisition, I will not be afraid. The Lord will be our defence even here!"

At these words a great fear came into my heart, for I believed that he, unknowingly, had suggested the truth. We should be visited by the priests, and possibly should be put to torture. And the thought of this was terrible to me, for although I feared no man when my limbs were free, and I carried a good sword, I dreaded terribly the ghastly torments to which the Spaniards put English Protestants.

Presently the light which reached us through the iron grating passed away, from the which I gathered that night was upon us, whereupon we laid ourselves down on the straw, and after some time fell asleep. How long we slept I know not, but after a time I found myself wide awake, and possessed with the feeling that someone was near us. Why I thought this I know not, for all was still save the heavy breathing of Mawgan Killigrew and the low murmurings of John Trenoweth, who even in his sleep spoke of his "dear little maid."

"There's someone whispering," I thought at length, and, sitting up, I listened more intently. Yes, there could be no doubt about it: there was a low murmuring at the door, and upon this I woke Mawgan Killigrew, who lay by my side.

"What is it?" he asked in a whisper.

"Someone is at the door," I said. "Listen, but do not make a noise."

At this John Trenoweth also awoke, and together we waited and listened.

Presently a gleam of light shot across the floor, and then little by little the door opened, as if by stealth, and a moment later two men came into the room. The one I saw in the twinkling of an eye was a priest of some sort. The other had so wrapped his face in his cloak that I could not discern his features. Nevertheless, I believed that I knew who he was. There was something in his movements which reminded me of the man I had seen on the Sunday morning before, and made me think of my father's visit to Gloucester at the time when Master Hooper went to heaven in a flame of fire.

"What would you, señors?" I asked aloud in Spanish, "and why is our rest disturbed?"

"Master Hamstead?" said the man in the cloak.

"To whom do you speak, señor?" I asked.

"To you," he replied. "You are Master Hamstead."

"And why should I be Master Hamstead?" I asked.

"Because my eyes never deceive me, old as they are"; and there was savage glee in the tones of his voice. "Because—because—well, never mind—I greet you, Master Hamstead, and, believe me, it grieves me much to see you here."

"And why should it grieve you?" I asked.

"Because your father was a brave man, and because—well, it will not be easy to get you away from here."

"You wish to get us out from here," cried Mawgan Killigrew eagerly.

"Else why should I be here? Believe me, I have been looking for you for many days."

I waited for him to continue.

"Believe me, the Spaniard is not ill served in England, and we know of all that takes place"; and he laughed pleasantly.

"You have been in England yourself," I ventured.

"Aye, long years ago. But no me gusto—that is, I like it not. Ah, the skies are gloomy, and the rain falls often. Not that there be not many green trees and fields, and many singing birds. But bah! the English know not how to live, or to love."

"But they know how to fight!" said Mawgan.

"Aye, Master Killigrew—you see I know you—aye, they know how to fight, but clumsily, clumsily. With a bludgeon they hit hard, but with a rapier—bah!"

"I would gladly contest the point with you," said Mawgan, rising to his feet. "Choose your own weapons, man, and let us have twelve square feet."

The man in the cloak laughed. "See my white hair," he said. "Ah, but I love other weapons than steel now; but time was when—but enough. Señors, I salute you!" and, taking off his hat, he revealed the features of the man I expected to see. It was Señor Toledo grown old: Señor Toledo in his own country, the man who, my father said, was as cunning as the devil, and as deep as the bottomless pit where he dwelt.

But I did not make out that I knew him. Moreover, I pressed Mawgan Killigrew's arms as a hint that he should be silent.

"Ah, yes," he went on. "I was in England in the good days of old. But I was unknown. Then what would you! I ate the beef, I drank the beer, I made love to the pretty women, and after breaking many hearts I returned to Spain. Señors, do you know that you be all mad?"

I shrugged my shoulders, even as a Spaniard might.

"Aye, mad," he repeated. "You came to take away Señora de Valencia and her serving woman. Ah! you start! The señora is the daughter of John Tremayne, and had she married according to his desires she would have been one of the richest women in England. Ah, yes! I know right well. I am what you call frank, free of speech, my masters—is it not so? That is why I desired speech with you. But you be mad. Think you that an Englishman could come to Spain—aye, and to Toledo!—and take away the señora as a hind could take a kitchen wench from one of your English houses? Ah, think you that? Think you we did not know that this man here, John Trenoweth!—ah, but your names are hard to utter—was sent to Hamstead Manor—what for? How did I find out? Sabe Dios!"

That the man had something in his mind I knew right well. Else why should he seek speech with us? Why, moreover, should he tell us that he knew aught of our plans?

"Falmouth is a fine harbour," he went on. "Oh, I know! A fine harbour, and Master Killigrew governs it—Master Killigrew, hearty of manner and free of speech. How do I know it? My masters, there were friends of Spain in the neighbourhood of Arwenack before Señor Gomez went there. Why? Sabe Dios! Do I not speak freely according to your English desires?"

"Well," I cried, "and why all this?"

"Why? Ah, you speak as you fight, bluntly, clumsily, and——"

"Honestly."

He shrugged his shoulders scornfully.

"And you thought," he went on, "that we should be unprepared. You did not know that in England every parish has a friend of Spain. You did not know that there is not a vessel which leaves an English port but has someone who longs for Spanish rule, and who finds a means of sending news to us. You did not know that one of your own countrymen hath established such a system of espionage in England that aught that affect us is made known to us with the speed of a bird's flight. Ah, but it gives us little pleasure to fight with you, you be so clumsy, so mad, so blind!"

At this I laughed—why I hardly know—but my laugh angered him.

"Oh, yes, Señor Gomez did not—but what of that? You are here in Toledo, and here you will stay. Remember, we Spaniards be no fools!" This he said angrily.

"He is trying to frighten me," I thought, but I held my tongue.

"You and yours should know better," he went on, "for you have had experience of the Spaniard."

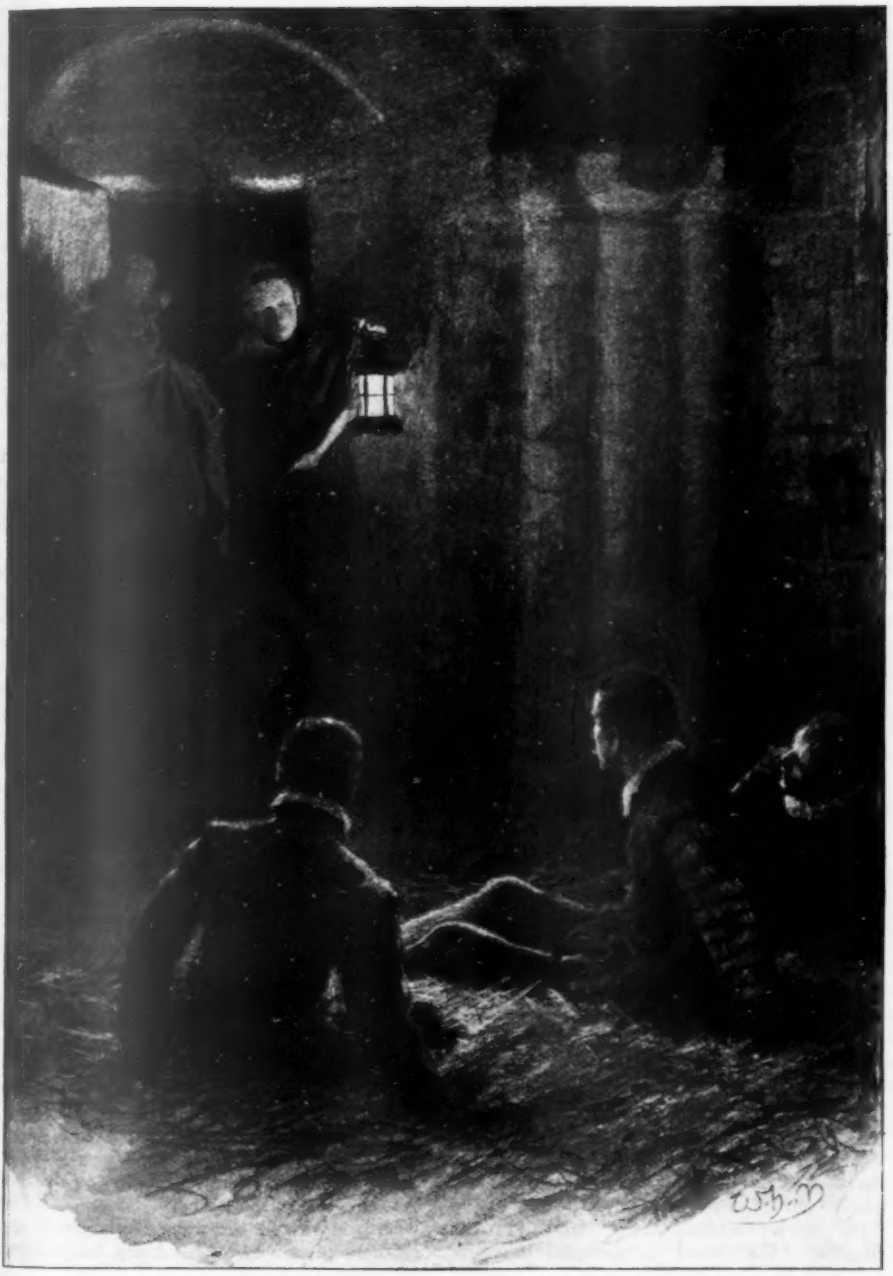
"Aye, I have seen them run away," I said with another laugh.

He stamped his foot with rage, but presently he mastered himself.

"Well, what expect you?" he asked.

"I expect you to do your worst," I replied, "I expect you will try and treat us as your countrymen have always treated mine when they have had them in their power. I expect you will use the same means as you have used in the Indies—aye, and in your own country among the Moors, and Jews, and Christians. I know them. The torture, the faggot. There is nothing new in them. Clumsy and brutal, and, well—Spanish."

"Yes, my master," he said between his teeth, "and what then?"



"Only that we shall beat you!" I cried.

"Beat us!"

"Aye, beat you." It was John Trenoweth who took up the tale. "You may do your worst, but we shall take Sir John Tremayne's daughter back to him. We shall take back my Esther to Cornwall, Master Spaniard, and laugh at you for what you are—a cruel, bloodthirsty, Popish crew."

I thought he would have struck the Cornishman, but he restrained himself.

XUM

"I believed I knew who he was."—p. 455.

"A caballero may not soil his hands by touching swine," he said. Then, turning to me again, he continued:

"You think because you escaped from the gipsy camp, and because it seemed as though good fortune were on your side this morning, that you can escape us. But bah! I could have captured you a score of times these last two days. But I did not. Why? Because I was not ready. Besides——" And then he stopped suddenly while I waited for him to continue.

"I will tell you what will come to pass," he said at length. "You heard the sermon in the cathedral on Sunday, so I need not enlarge on that. Well, in one day—two days, perhaps, but quickly, you will be taken to El Cristo de la Vega, and your faith will be inquired into."

"Inquired into!" I repeated with a sneer.

"Aye, inquired into, for the Holy Inquisition never condemns before trial; and then, if you prove untrue to the doctrines of the Church, you will be put to torture. And I tell you the thumbscrew, the rack, be not pleasant."

"And afterwards?" I asked.

"Afterwards—well," and he shrugged his shoulders, "you will understand the secret which that dog of a Jew learnt to-day. The flames, señors, the flames!"

I was silent.

"You do not speak, señor."

"No, I am waiting."

"Waiting? For what, señor?"

"To know why you have come to visit us to-night."

"I have been to England," he said presently, "and therefore think not of the English as some think of them. They are fools, and blind—but all are not bad. Therefore—well, I might be disposed to be merciful to you."

Still I waited, never speaking a word.

CHAPTER XV.

SEÑOR TOLEDO'S OFFER.

"I REMEMBER that both you and Master Killigrew here be only mere boys, and therefore act but foolishly," he said, after quietly watching us for a few moments. "As for your serving man here—well, he can be dealt with later."

"He is no serving man," said Mawgan Killigrew. "His blood is as good as yours, señor, and he is as brave a man."

The Spaniard shrugged his shoulders again, but beyond this he took no notice of the interruption.

"Being mere thoughtless boys," he went on, "it doth seem hard that you should, well, let us say, be treated as the Jew was treated to-day. Nevertheless, you will be, if I do not interpose. It is true I shall place myself in opposition to the Holy Inquisition, but what of that? I am too old to be a suspect; besides, I have not lived so long in Toledo for naught. Be that as it may, I have decided to give you a chance of life."

"Thank you, señor," said Mawgan quietly. "Then I suppose we may walk out of here free men?"

The Spaniard showed his yellow teeth like one in anger.

"I was right in saying that Master Killigrew was only a boy," he said. "But bah! what would you?"

"You would make a bargain with us," I said.

"Señor Hamstead is an Englishman and loves a bargain," said the Spaniard, "and—well, even Spanish caballeros love honest treaty. Quid pro quo, as the Latins say—is that not so, Señor Hamstead?"

"Well, what would you?" I asked, for I was impatient to know what he was driving at.

"You know what your life is worth here," he replied. "Let me take my hands from you, and what then? It grieves me to say it, but the Spaniard loves sport, and nothing would please him better than to see three English heretics roasting. But it would not please me. Would you believe me, I have spent much time in persuading the holy fathers to adopt another form of death. It is not pleasing to a man of refined tastes, it is—well, a trifle vulgar and brutish. A clean rapier thrust I love, but the flames, the smell of roasting flesh—bah! But that is not to the point. The señors would like to go back to their island again. It is scarcely conceivable, but there—they were not born in Spain."

"Well," I said.

"Well, I have come to tell them of means whereby their wishes may be accomplished."

We remained silent, so the Spaniard went on.

"What I ask is that one of them, say Master Killigrew, shall write a letter at my dictation."

"To whom?"

"To Sir John Tremayne."

"And the purport thereof?"

"Oh, the purport is very simple. I only wish you to tell Sir John Tremayne that you lie here at our mercy, and the only condition on which your lives can be spared is that he shall cease to be angry with his daughter, the Señora de Valencia, and that she be the happy possessor of his favours, just as she would have been if her late noble husband had not so honoured her."

"And if this is written, what then, señor?"

"Then, well, you shall be treated as noble prisoners until we have restored your country to its rightful king. What would you? Is not that noble?"

I laughed in his face. I could do no other, so plain was his meaning.

"You laugh, Señor Hamstead, but why? I have promised great things, and I ask but little. What would you? I take my hand from you, and bah! you burn! But write this letter, and you live! Is not this fair?"

"And what becomes of the señora?" I asked.

"The señora?" He shrugged his shoulders contemptuously. "Who is the señora? What is she? She hath been protected—indulged—because she married a Spanish noble. Even the Church dared not harm her while he lived. He was the King's friend, and although the holy fathers have frightened him to do many things—aye, many things—so many that he hath much withdrawn his presence from Toledo, they could not make him consent to her proper punishment while Don Basilio Fernandio de Valencia lived. But now, what would you? There must be but one law. Faith or death. You have broken it in England, and what have you become? A usurper sits on the throne, and——"

But he did not finish the sentence for Mawgan Killigrew caught him by the neck.

"Take back those words, señor," he said, "or I will drive the tongue that spoke them down your vile throat."

For a moment I thought he was going to call in the guards, but he had a point to gain, and he refrained.

"Ah! I take back my words," he said, with a spiteful laugh—"and why? Because in a little while England will belong to Spain. The true faith will be triumphant and——But enough, señors; the fate of the señora will be happiest and best for her. She is in the hands of our Holy Mother the Church, who acts in love. What is done to her will be for the good of her soul, and for the glory of God. But that is naught to you, señors. It is for you to do my will!

"Your will?"

"Aye, I have dallied long enough. For why should I, who can command, make bargains? Even with Spaniards I say, 'It must be done,' and it is done. Else what would you? Los individuos del estado lláno—by that I mean what you English call the commoners, the low-born, the base, will dare to set their opinions against ours! And where is the country then? The low-born have opinions—wills of their own! It would be the death of the country! Fancy it! Common people, aye, and people of other countries, the English daring to set their thoughts, their wills against the Holy Church, and against the Spanish nobles! Bah! You have heard my will, señors, and the letter will be written."

"Get it written," I said with a laugh.

"What? Dare you?" he cried.

"Aye, I dare!" I replied quietly. "Think you that we will tell Sir John Tremayne that we bargain for the mercy of a Spaniard? Think you that we will ask him to give our English lands and our English money to Spain? For that is what it means."

"And why not?" he asked. "Think you it will remain in Sir John Tremayne's hands when Spaniards have taken England? Think you that Spanish nobles would dirty their hands to fight with English pulvea if it were not for the lands, the gold? For religion, yes! But what would you? The chosen people of God may despoil the Egyptians. Do my will, señor, and gain your liberty, for by the Mass it will be all the same in the end."

"If you felt so sure of taking England, Señor Spaniard," I said, "you would not be so eager for the letter to be written."

"What of that? It is my will. Dogs of English, obey!"

He was losing control of himself now, and then for the first time the man who was dressed like a priest spoke to him in low tones.

"Your excellency will gain nothing by anger," he said in Spanish. "You remember what——," and then he spoke so low that I could not hear him.

Presently he turned to us again, his wicked old eyes gleaming with anger; nevertheless, he spoke with a kind of mountebank bravado.

"You know not who I am, señor," he said. "You know not my powers. You know not that my will is law even in high places. You know not that even were the Holy Inquisition to pass judgment, I could overrule that judgment! It is not for me to reason, but to command. Therefore think yourselves honoured that I have dealt with you as though you had even a right to question my desire. But this letter must be written. It is my will. If you knew my power, you would obey without question."

"In my father's hall is a sword which he took from Señor Toledo," I said, "and the son is not afraid of the man whom his father hath beaten!"

At this he was no longer able to control himself. He struck me in the face with the flat of his hand.

"That for you and your father!" he cried. "It is enough! Your sandglass hath run out. I was wrong to show kindness to you beef-eating, beer-drinking puerco! You know my name, now mark the anger of Don Ferdinand Toledo! Tremble, you English vagabundos! My hand no longer protects, it punishes! You shall have a foretaste of the doom of your mezquino country!"

With that he threw the lower part of his cloak around his neck, replaced his hat, and with the simple expression, "Bah!" walked away.

Mawgan Killigrew laughed as he went out. "Surely you have played in the theatres, Master Toledo," he said; "you make an excellent mountebank!"

At this we all fell to laughing together, but in truth our position was serious. That we were safely guarded there could be no doubt, and I saw naught before us but the torture and the faggot. Still, we did not come to Spain to do the will of the Spaniard, and we had vowed never to yield to his demands That I was in an ill-temper I admit, for although I did not despair of getting out of prison, I was angry that, although we had for the moment saved the life of an Englishwoman, we should as a consequence be cooped into gaol like three thieves. But neither Mawgan Killigrew nor John Trenoweth troubled one whit. For Mawgan was never the man to fear aught. Hope always seemed to rise in his heart, and even were he pinioned to a stake, waiting for the fire, I believe he would laugh at the man who was holding the torch to the sticks. As for John Trenoweth, he seemed to be born anew. Ever since he had seen his sweetheart his confidence had not left him. To him her release was because of the hand of God, and he was joyful accordingly.

Thus it was that when some minutes later I spoke despondingly of the future, both refused to listen to me.

"Fear a Spaniard!" cried Mawgan, "by my grandfather's bones, no! As for writing such a letter, why we could never hold up our heads again! I have already a dozen schemes in my head for getting out of this hole, and before a week is over we will let these Spaniards know what free Englishmen can do."

"The Lord hath saved once, and he can save again," said John Trenoweth. "Put your trust in Him, my masters, and be not afraid."

"What did that priest with Señor Toledo, I wonder?" I said, half to myself.

"Sabe Dios, as the Spaniards say," replied Mawgan; "besides, it doth not matter, for there are two ways by which we can get away from here!"

"What are they?"

"Both simple, very simple. One is, pull out that grating yonder, and creep out to the courtyard overhead; the other is easier, but more risky."

"Let's hear the other, for the first is foolishness," I replied.

"There are two men who guard us; well, when they bring our food in the morning, we will gag them, and then walk out."

At this I fell to laughing, so foolish did it seem, although Mawgan regarded his plan as sound and good. But we did not continue to speak of it, for at that moment we again heard whispering outside the door.

"More visitors," cried Mawgan. "By Tre, Pol, and Pen, but these Spaniards show us much attention."

"Speak not so loud," I whispered; "we know not how many of these people understand our tongue."

Again the door opened, and again we saw in the light of the candle he carried the face and form of the young priest who had accompanied Señor Toledo.

"What would you, senor?" I asked. "We would sleep, man, for we be weary."

"I have come for your good, señor; I have come to give you another chance of life—aye, and perchance of liberty." This he said in the Spanish language.

"Speak on, Master Priest," I said, "but if you know our tongue, speak it, for my friends do not know yours."

At this he seemed confused, and he turned to the door as if expecting someone.

"Señors," he said presently, "do you remain obdurate? If you think, you will see that our demand is but little. But it may mean much. You are young, too, and liberty and life are surely sweet to you."

"As to that, Master Priest," said Mawgan, "we have our life; as to our liberty, we shall take it at the proper time. But if you think we will do your dirty work either because of threats or promises, you do not know us. Besides, what are your promises worth?"

"They are as certain to be fulfilled as our threats."

"But what guarantee have we?" asked Mawgan.

"You shall have the word of——," but here he stopped, as if not knowing what to say. Presently he went on again, however. "You know not what you refuse, señors," he said. "I tell you you are surrounded with danger, and your lives are not worth a piece of bronze money. Besides, your refusal touches more lives than your own. What can it matter to Sir John Tremayne, what——that is, is it not his daughter's right? And to her what may it not mean?"

"'Anger not Señor Toledo.'"

"Look you, señor," I said. "Suppose I write this letter, what then? Suppose I say to him, 'Sir John, we are in prison, and the price of our liberty is your wealth. Dower your daughter with your wealth, and we are free.' Well, then, suppose he acts in accord with the letter. What then? Will your Church take its solemn oath that she shall be free to return to her father's house? Tell me that."

"Aye, it will," he replied.

"You swear that by the Mass," I said.

At this he stammered, like a man confused, as in truth he was.

"It may be; that is, if she renounces her errors, and promises obedience," he murmured presently.

"Aye," I replied, "and a fool can see what that means. But if she will not?"

At this he was silent for a moment, then he said, "It is not for a priest to answer all the vain questions of a heretic."

At this Mawgan Killigrew laughed again, while John Trenoweth said, "Bravely spoken, Master Hamstead. Fear not; the Lord will save us!"

"I tell you, you are mad," he cried. "It is your life, man, and more than your life! Oh, the Church is kind; but you know not!"

"It may be we are mad, Master Priest," I said, "but it may be you know not Englishmen. We can die, my master, but we do not play into an enemy's hand. Tell the truth: where is the Señora de Valencia now?"

He shuddered like a man under a great fear.

"She is in prison," he said; "but I have prayed for her, prayed that she may be led to the truth."

"Is she alone in prison?" I asked. "Have you put her to torture?"

"And if you can free her from torture?" he cried; "if by writing this letter you can save her from untold agony, and give her liberty, what then?"

"Aye, but how would that give her liberty?" I asked. "You want her father's money. If Sir John dowered her with all he has, what then? Your Holy Church, as you call it, would demand as the price of her life that she make it over to her. It would be taken by the Jesuits, and then what would they do to her? If she would not forswear her faith in her Saviour you would burn her for the glory of God. You have played the game before, Master Priest, and we have seen your cards."

His eyes flashed angrily, but he spoke no word. It was then that I for the first time took particular notice of his face, and as I looked I wondered, for here were no evil, villainous features; rather, they were somewhat kind. It was true that the light of a fanatic burnt in his eyes; nevertheless, they suggested kindness, humanity. Under some circumstances this man could believe he was pleasing God by burning a heretic, but on the other hand, he could be moved to pity. I judged that he took his calling seriously; nevertheless, he was still a man, with a man's passions, a man's hopes. In truth, I judged that here was a man who could love, and hate, and fight; a man, moreover, who would rather fight openly than in the dark.

"I tell you, you do not know all," he said at length.

"Then tell us all, Master Priest," said Mawgan. "We did not come from England to play blind man's buff."

He hesitated again, then looked towards the door.

"Be you the tool of Señor Toledo?" I asked.

He looked nervously around as though afraid.

"Anger not Señor Toledo," he said in a whisper. "Even now, I pity you. Death is not the worst thing, my masters. A man can die, and then be out of pain. That is, if he hath made his peace with the Church," he added quickly. "But there is worse than death. There is living. You be strong, and could bear much. That is why you have need to fear. First one finger, then another. First one limb, and then another. First one eye and then another. To die by inches, to die of torture—that is what those suffer who anger him. Think of it my masters. What will he do? 'Write the letter,' he will say. 'No,' you reply. Then the left hand will be burnt off. 'Write the letter,' he will say. 'No,' you reply. Then the right eye will be plucked out. And so on until you obey."

Mawgan laughed in the priest's face. "That for Señor Toledo!" he said, snapping his fingers.

"What! do you not fear him?"

"Fear him! I never feared man yet. Have you ever read the story of Samson, Master Priest? He killed more at his death than during his life. Well, what would happen, think you? 'Write the letter,' he would say. 'Good,' I should reply. 'Give me a pen, and tell me what you wish written.' Then I should strike him once, and Señor Toledo would never speak again." At this Mawgan laughed heartily, like a man in good humour.

The priest looked at him in amazement.

"You know not," he cried. "You speak as if the señora were all. There is the señorita."

"Doth she desire this?" I asked.

"Aye, that she doth."

"Let us see her, Master Priest," I said. "If she desires that her mother be the tool of those who would burn her, let us have speech with her, and let us see if a daughter's love lives in her heart."

Again he looked towards the door, and hesitated.

"She hath no power," he said, like one musing. "She is bound, bound, bound. Besides, she is a child of the Church, taught from childhood to hate heresy and heretics."

"Then do your worst altogether," I said. "We will not write the letter, Master Priest."

"I could write it myself," he said.

"Aye, and think you that Sir John Tremayne would not know it was a forgery? Before we came away, we bade them all beware of such things. No, no, you have made your request, and you have heard our answer. Go to Señor Toledo, and tell him of what we have said. As for this señorita, the child who will connive at her mother's death——"

"You shall see her!" he interrupted.

"Very well, let us see her; but when?"

"Now. She is close by. I will bring her to you."

At that he went away, while we three looked into each other's faces, wondering what the outcome of all this parley might be.

[END OF CHAPTER FIFTEEN.]

A TALK WITH MISS LOUISA TWINING.

"I HAVE lived in four reigns, under eight Archbishops of Canterbury, and seven Bishops of London."

Thus, Miss Louisa Twining, the pioneer of Workhouse Reform, the practical and spirited leader in every question that affects the well-being of the poorer classes, and who at eighty-one, still brisk and dauntless, is ready to give us the benefit of her long experiences in the past, and with her ripened judgment shows how to apply remedies for future social ills.

(Photo: Elliott and Fry, Baker Street, W.)

MISS LOUISA TWINING.

But she prefaces every interview with this condition:

"No personalities, please: this is an age of self-advertisement and self-consciousness. I am glad I belong to a former generation, when we neither expected nor got encouragement for doing our duty. Whatever I did, was done simply because I felt I had to do it. Just say enough to extend the cause I have always had so much at heart."

And yet, in spite of that rather sweeping condemnation, it is her personality which interests and influences the present generation; the personality of one whose memory goes back to the early 'twenties of the last century: who can remember making daisy-chains in the Temple Gardens (she was born in Norfolk Street, Strand) when no embankment separated them from the river, and she and her brothers and sisters played round the red hawthorns, and rested beneath the poplar on whose trunk was carved the date of her father's birth.

One likes to linger over the early days of the earnest little girl, who describes herself as sitting on an elder brother's knee while he explained to her the first chapter of the Gospel of St. John, a brother whose own character was moulded by Dr. Arnold of Rugby. One likes to picture the quaint mite in her old-fashioned frock and coral beads, at two years old, playing with a "dolly" which is in perfect preservation now.

"I don't believe," says Miss Twining triumphantly, "that toys of such antiquity can be met with at the present time, except those of our late Queen at Kensington Palace. Another treasure was a small silver warming-pan for a doll's house which was given to our mother, and which once belonged to the Princess Amelia. In after life I had the pleasure of sending it to Princess Beatrice for her little girl, and received in reply a gracious note of thanks."

She tells almost pathetically of how in '98 she came back to lodge in the Strand to seek for the house in which they were all born, and how great was her disappointment to find the place usurped by "gigantic, towering buildings." Along Fleet Street she walked, past St. Dunstan's Church, where as a child she had so often waited and watched for the two figures which struck the hours, mentioned in Cowper's "Table Talk," and described by Strype as "two savages, or Hercules, with clubs erect which quarterly strike on the bells hanging there." They were removed in 1829, and purchased by the Marquis of Hertford.

St. Clement Danes recalled to her the memory of the beadle "gorgeous in apparel, armed with a formidable wand, with which he tapped the heads of noisy or slumbering children, the sound echoing through the church." The Strand brought back visions of her visits to Exeter 'Change, then the only collection of wild beasts in the Metropolis. Step by step the changes seemed to increase: There were no milk-women with their pails and yokes, no "buy-a-broom!" girls singing national (Bavarian) songs as they tripped along; all these had gone with the nightingales of Chelsea and Camberwell, and the lovely lime avenue in the Temple Gardens.

There is no space to dwell on her account of her first railway journey, from Euston to Berkhamstead, a distance of twenty-seven miles, which was accomplished in the wonderfully short time of an hour and a quarter! Nor can I repeat her graphic description of Queen Victoria's Coronation, when she had an excellent view of Her Majesty on her way to the Abbey, "wearing a diamond circlet and looking rather frightened," and an equally excellent one of the procession coming back, when "the young Queen wearing her crown, and looking much delighted, was really laughing as she passed us."

Miss Twining had the advantage of hearing many of the great speakers of the day: she was delighted with the eloquence of Sir Robert Peel, and of the Duke of Wellington naïvely remarks: "I wonder the poor Duke was not tired of hearing of his victory, and of disclaiming all merit in it." Some generals of our present day must have a fellow-feeling with the Duke.

With her great love of music, one can imagine her delight in hearing Jenny Lind in the Messiah, where the delivery of "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was a "never-to-be-forgotten enjoyment." Amongst other musical treats were hearing Mendelssohn play on the organ at St. Peter's, Cornhill, while Grisi, Listz, Thalberg, Lablache all contributed to complete the young girl's education, and enabled her to lay in a stock of sweet memories to enrich the life that was soon to be all labour for her fellow-creatures.

It was in 1847 and 1848 that Miss Twining began seriously to work out the problem of remedying our social system as connected with the working of workhouses. Visitors were not allowed in those days, trained nurses were unheard of, officials drank with impunity, and the dirt, disease, tyranny, and wretchedness that went on behind the grim walls of the Union are too terrible to contemplate.

Miss Twining resolved to alter all this, and with characteristic energy went straight to the fountain head. She applied for permission to the Chairman of the Board to take other visitors to the Strand Union, where she herself used to visit an old woman from Clare Market. Her request was refused, but, nothing daunted, she asked for an interview with the Central Board, of which the Right Hon. M. Talbot Baines was President and Lord Courtenay secretary.

The result is best told in her own words: "As I drove down to Whitehall, I conjured up all sorts of fears as to the results of my audacious attempt. I suppose these fears were apparent, for the attendant said to me, 'You need not be afraid, ma'am: you will find them very nice gentlemen indeed.' And so it proved: Lord Courtenay said, 'If I could get the sanction of one board, they would not refuse'; and Mr. Baines admitted that good might be done. It was clear, however, they had no intention of granting my request, and on a further application it was again declined."

And so she went on alone, reading the Psalms to the lowly sufferers and cheering them to the best of her power.

In 1855 she published a pamphlet at the urgent advice of Mrs. Jameson (author of "Sacred and Legendary Art"), who always encouraged her to persevere, and who later visited the Strand Union in her company. In 1857 the subject was mentioned by Lord Raynham in the House of Commons, and this, with her stringent series of letters to the Guardian, brought the matter prominently before the public. The Lady Mayoress formed a visiting committee for the West London Union, and the taking of flowers on Sundays to the inmates began from this date. In 1861 a first inquiry was made as to the number of paid nurses in London workhouses; and with Miss Twining egging them on with pamphlets and letters, the celebrated "Lancet" Commission was held in 1866, when experienced medical men were ordered to report on the condition and management of workhouse infirmaries, and in the following year a Bill was passed, by which infirmaries were to be separate from workhouses, the sick were set apart from the able-bodied, and lunatics and children were no longer all to be huddled together indiscriminately.

Thus, after fifteen years of unwearied fighting against almost insuperable difficulties, Miss Twining saw her labours rewarded. Not that she is quite satisfied yet. She says:

"We want still further classification of inmates, the appointment of a higher class of officers, both men and women (the latter to be inspectors also), a more careful selection of guardians, including women in due proportion. Further, if women are to be employed, they must submit to a training that will fit them for the work."

Miss Twining did not confine her efforts to London. A paper of hers, on "The Condition of Workhouses," was read at the Social Science Association at Birmingham early in the 'fifties, and she herself attended the one held in Liverpool under the presidency of Sir John Russell, and read her own paper on "Workhouse Management." All up and down the country her strenuous measures were brought before the notice of earnest and thoughtful workers, and one of the pleasantest features of her labours must have been the meeting with other great and helpful souls. She paid a visit to Mary Carpenter at Bristol when she was establishing her reformatory for girls, and speaks of her as "the most persevering of social reformers, who never rested till she succeeded in obtaining the merciful change in the law by which girls and boys were exempted from lengthened imprisonment for crime, and were sentenced to reformatory training instead."

"Reading the Psalms to the lowly sufferers and cheering them to the best of her power."

It was in 1861 that she became acquainted with Frances Power Cobbe, when the consideration of destitute incurables was engaging the minds of both; and by their united efforts these unfortunates secured special treatment, Miss Twining herself for thirty years being the chief worker in connection with the Home for Incurable Women in North London.

Long before this, she had come to know Florence Nightingale, and had taken her share in the question of nursing reform.

Another philanthropy Miss Twining was able to establish, with the generous aid of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, was the Home for Workhouse Girls founded in 1861 in New Ormond Street, which assisted over a thousand workhouse girls to obtain good situations, before it was merged into the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants. An anecdote in connection with this work she relates with relish: A girl who had behaved badly, and who had to be dismissed, wrote, some time after, saying she was well married, and wanted a girl from the Home as a servant!

Miss Twining was much too broad-minded not to see the advantage of extensive travel and social communion with the most cultured of every land. She is never more interesting than when talking of her tours on the Continent and her keen appreciation of all that was grand and beautiful in art. She herself is no mean artist, and a fine art gallery in South London possesses some of her drawings. But she always returned with renewed vigour to resume her campaign in the cause of progress and improvement. It was after her tour in France in 1879 that a great desire of her heart was granted, and she attended the first public meeting of the Workhouse Infirmary Nursing Association, when the late Duchess of Teck was present, and Miss Nightingale sent a letter of hearty commendation. This Association has trained over a thousand nurses. Another charitable object engrossed her about this time, and that was the "after care" of convalescent lunatics from Colney Hatch, and a system of boarding out and visiting was established which did incalculable good to a class too long neglected.

Gradually, as time went on, she was able to delegate some of her most arduous work either to public bodies, or to those who were sufficiently well trained to succeed her, and therefore when in 1884 she was elected on the Kensington Board of Guardians she was free to enter upon her new career with a zest unhampered by other cares. For six busy years she laboured, rooting out old abuses and suggesting practical methods of reform; while she still kept in touch with the former scene of her labours, and though in 1890 she resigned her post and retired to Worthing she continued to attend meetings which had for their furtherance objects so dear to her heart.

Her next move was to Tunbridge Wells, but there her fame had preceded her, and she was induced to become the first woman-guardian of the Tonbridge Union, and, as usual, soon found herself up to her ears in work. The boarding out of workhouse children was one good step she effected, and she succeeded in establishing a settlement of nurses to nurse the poor in their own homes. In three years she was able to resign her work to other women now ready to take it up, and as the place did not agree with her she went to live in Rochester, a cathedral city always having a special fascination for her.

But London really claimed her affections, and in 1900 she was back in Kensington, warmly welcomed by her many friends, who sympathise with her feelings when she owns "the old interests of a lifetime can now be maintained, and I am able to attend the meetings of those movements of which I saw the beginning forty years ago."

It is rather strange to hear Miss Twining say after her experience of town and country life that she considers the average poor of London have a higher standard of morality than the rural poor. Her allusion is to those working classes with whom she came in contact during her ten years' work at mothers' meetings.

She does not attempt to explain the anomaly. In looking back some sixty years and more, and while acknowledging the progress made in some directions, she points out with unsparing keenness that there is much, still much, to be done.

"I want to see a large increase in the number of woman inspectors of workhouses, prisons, and lunatic asylums. At present, where committees of management are composed almost exclusively of men, the matron can just twist them round her little finger. She presents a report; they have no reason to doubt its accuracy, they sign it, and the work is finished. I don't want to say anything against the matron, but she would be more than angel if she managed perfectly a large institution; abuses must creep in, and it requires constant investigation to keep everything up to date. Nor," she added, with a twinkle in her bright eyes, "do I want to say anything against men. I have always met with much courtesy and kindness from them, but they are all victims to red tape, and dread to go beneath the surface of things. The good and excellent work done by women during the last twenty-five years makes me surprised at the delay in bringing about this change.

"I also think the country has been very slow in not providing a home for incurable men in this part of England, who can pay according to their means. They can't all afford the expense of private hospitals, nor is it fair they should come upon Poor Law infirmaries."

"You started one for women, did you not?"

"Yes, fifty years ago; it is one of seven Homes which, I am happy to be able to say, I helped to found. The others are—one for girls from workhouses, begun in 1861; one for incurable and infirm women, at the end of the same year; the Queen Square Home for Epileptics and Incurables, 1866; the Art Students' Home in Brunswick Square, 1879; two homes for District Nurses, Kensington, 1884; and one in Tunbridge Wells, 1894."

Miss Twining is unstinting in her praise where she considers praise is due.

"The development of 'settlements' for women workers is one of the excellent results of the present day. Long years ago I felt the want of some such plan, and in the 'fifties wrote on the subject. Miss Martineau also wrote on their unhappy lives in solitary lodgings, and it is of interest to note that forty years ago plans were floating which now are materialised into assured successes."

She would much like to see a college founded for "Business Training and Habits." Nor can we wonder that she thinks such an institution necessary when she caustically relates that on returning to London she took the precaution to send her changed address to all the societies to which she subscribed; result—they nearly all sent to the old address!

So many of her ideas have been adopted that perhaps this also will be materialised in the future, though in extenuation one may suggest people are more busy now than in the days which Miss Twining can remember, when envelopes were made by hand, and were used a second time by being folded inside out and re-directed. Who would have leisure for such little economies now?

She is very strenuous on the incalculable

MISS LOUISA TWINING.
(In childhood.)

good done by mothers' meetings, but wishes there was even more attention paid to diffusing knowledge of health laws. As she puts it pertinently: "The country is discussing the decreased birth rate. Why not bend their efforts to decrease the enormous mortality amongst children owing to the ignorance of mothers? The National Health Society is working hard, but there are many it can never reach."

Busy as Miss Twining has always been, she has found time to contribute her share of literature to the century just gone by. "Types and Figures of the Bible," "Symbols and Emblems of Mediæval Art," besides numerous volumes on her life's work, show that her gifts are many and varied.

And now I must conclude, as I promised, with her own remark, that the information contributed "is by an octogenarian whose only object in giving it is to assist others to form a right judgment on some social questions, and not to magnify any part she has been permitted to take in them."

Roses Without Thorns

By Helen Boddington, Author of "The Awakening."

CHAPTER I.

"JOSEPH BROWNE, cab proprietor," was set forth in large gilt letters over the front door of a small house in the High Street of Wynton, adjoining which on the left was a covered yard or coach-house containing vehicles that had apparently been in use for a great number of years.

It was evening; John, the old cabdriver, and Thomas, the stable lad, had taken their departure, while Mr. Browne, seated comfortably in the front parlour, was talking over the news of the day with a neighbour who had just dropped in. There was a door leading into the stable yard, and presently this opened and a child came out, shut it carefully after her, quickly crossed the yard, and climbed into the roomy old cab which stood almost exactly opposite the door.

Once inside, she threw herself on to the seat, and sobs, which had evidently been held in check for some time, broke forth, shaking the little frame as a rough wind does a delicate flower.

"I'm so miserable; I'm so miserable!" she wailed. "I wish I was dead; I wish I was dead!"

There was no one to answer, there was no one to comfort the childish grief, and so it seemed the greater.

"I hate her; I hate her!" she went on in a passionate voice. "Oh! mother, why did you leave me with her? Oh! mother, mother, I want you so!"

Then she broke into fresh sobs. "She can't hear what I say; she never will hear me again."

It seemed as though this were a fact she had only just realised, for suddenly the agony in the young face increased tenfold, and, throwing herself farther back into the seat, she stretched out her arms and pillowed her head on them. The sobs had changed to bitter childish cries, which grew weaker and weaker as time went on, and finally ceased. The child slept! Tender, loving Nature had given her own healing balm—had for a while lifted the load of care from the young shoulders and laid a gentle, soothing hand on the bowed head.

CHAPTER II.

"WHERE'S the little 'un?" asked Joseph Browne of his wife, who was ironing at the kitchen table.

"In bed, I s'pose," was the curt reply.

"Look here, Susan!" said honest Joseph, putting on his hat and great-coat preparatory to going out, "don't yer think as you're a bit 'ard on the little lass? I 'eard 'er cryin' a while since fit to break her 'eart."

"'Ave I got that child to manage or 'ave you, I should like to know?" said Mrs. Browne, looking at her husband as though she would like to give him a thrashing with the whip he was taking down from the wall.

"There, there, my dear; there, there!" said Mr. Browne soothingly, while his wife gave vent to a few more scathing sentences in her shrill voice, and he stood by patiently waiting until it should please her to finish. Then he opened the door.

"I'm goin' to fetch Mr. Ferrars from the Town Hall. He's gone to the meetin' there;" and so saying the good man disappeared. Leading his horse from the stable he harnessed it to the old cab in which was the sleeping child, and, climbing into the box-seat, took up the reins and started off for the Town Hall.

Here he drew up and waited. At the end of ten minutes people began to issue from the door, and among them a man who came quickly down the steps and made straight for Mr. Browne's cab.

"Good-evening, sir," said that worthy, touching his hat.

"Good-evening, Browne; I am afraid I'm rather late."

Opening the door, the newcomer jumped in, drew up the window, and in the same instant the driver whipped up his horse and the man leant back in the corner of the vehicle with half-closed eyes. It was a bright moonlight night—so bright, indeed, that the face of the man on the one side of the cab and that of the sleeping child on the other were distinctly visible.

His entrance had evidently disturbed her, for she stirred in her sleep and a tired sigh escaped her lips.

What was that? Surely some living, breathing thing. He started and leant forward, and then his eyes rested on the little sleeping child with the moonbeams shining on her.

"What is the meaning of this?" he muttered. "A child, and asleep too!"

The same moonbeam which fell on the delicate little face shone on his as he bent over her, showing up the deep lines and rugged features and the streaks of grey in the black hair.

The face was a stern one; the mouth was bitter, and looked as though it could not smile. Perchance the man's life had been cast in thorny places.

"What a fool I am!" he muttered, after he had stared at her fixedly for some seconds; "but she does look half a spirit in the moonlight."

"Mother," murmured the childish voice, "mother;" and opening her eyes she stretched out her hand as if expecting it to alight on some familiar object, but it fell to her side and hung loosely over the edge of the seat. Still half in dreamland, she drew herself up into a sitting posture and looked at her companion.

"Why am I here? What is it? Where am I?" she asked perplexedly.

Then it all came back to her. "Ah! I remember now—I was miserable," hanging her head, "and I ran out of the house, into the yard, and got in here so that she should not see me cry, and then—and then—I suppose I went to sleep."

"Yes, you certainly went to sleep; but what were you miserable about? You are too young to be miserable," he said thoughtfully.

"I am always miserable now, because—because—mother's gone away, and Mrs. Browne's so unkind to me."

"Do you live with her, then?"

"Yes, when my mother died she asked her to take care of me."

"Where did you live before then?"

He did not know why he should trouble himself to ask all these questions: he had no interest in the life of the child.

"Oh! a long, long way from here; but mother was ill, and then we came to Mrs. Browne's and had a little room of our own, and I was happy, quite happy, till—till mother died."

The great blue eyes were full of tears. She was standing up quite close to him now, and one pearly drop fell on his hand. He started, and, putting one arm round her, drew her nearer.

"Poor little morsel of humanity," he muttered, "so you, too, have felt the pricks."

"Does that mean that you are sorry for me?" she asked, looking wonderingly into his face.

"I suppose it does," and he laughed a peculiar laugh.

"You are a funny man, but I think you are kind," she said musingly.

Then she perched herself on his knee.

"Where are we going?" she asked presently.

"I am going home. Suppose you lie down on that seat again and go to sleep; I shall have to get out soon."

"No, no," she said pleadingly, "let me stay on your lap," and she nestled her head contentedly on his shoulder.

He drew her into a more comfortable position, all the while surprised to find himself nursing a child. He looked down at her face. She had closed her eyes, and the long dark lashes brushed her cheeks. Then he began to wonder what her name was, and presently, when she opened her eyes again and looked up at him, he asked her.

"Maisie," she answered in a sleepy voice, "Maisie Dornton," and then, more drowsily still, "You are a nice man; I wish I could stay with you always."

When Mr. Browne drew up before the low white house which was Douglas Ferrars' lonely home, the child was asleep.

"Lor!" exclaimed honest Joseph, as he opened the cab door, "if it ain't the little 'un!"

Then a whispered conversation ensued between the two men which ended in Douglas Ferrars attempting to lay his burden on the seat. Attempting, I say, because at the movement two little clinging arms tightened their hold on him and the sleepy voice murmured, "Let me stay with you."

"Ring the bell, Browne; send for her to-morrow. Mrs. Morgan," as his housekeeper appeared in the doorway, "put her to bed."

"Heavens! what a fool I am!" and he put the child into Mrs. Morgan's motherly arms and disappeared into the house, "without so much as wishin' me good-night," as Joseph Browne said afterwards.

CHAPTER III.

THE first sound which fell on Douglas Ferrars' ears as he came from his bedroom the next morning, was a childish voice singing. Half-way down the stairs he stood still as if fascinated by the sound, it being so strange a one in that house.

He could hear footsteps coming pattering along the passage, and a second or two later she stood at the bottom of the stairs looking up at him.

"Why! how late you are," she exclaimed. "I have been up for hours and hours, and, oh! what a lovely garden it is, and what lots of flowers there are; and, oh! the sun is shining outside; and, oh! I'm so happy."

She stopped for want of breath, and, clutching his hand, she danced along by his side as he crossed the hall.

He seated himself near the breakfast table, where, at his elbow, the morning paper lay waiting to be read, and when he looked at her seriously—sternly—she thought she had been guilty of some offence. She did not know how unused that gloomy face was to smiling.

"You are vexed with me? Is it because I went into the garden?" she asked anxiously.

"No, no; I am not vexed with you. Why should I be?" and he passed his great hand over the golden hair, marvelling at its softness.

"Ah! I am glad!" and the eyes became merry again. "I should not like to vex you, because you were so good to bring me to this beautiful place." Then, as her eyes fell on the breakfast table, "Oh! what a dear little teapot. Do let me pour out your tea for you. I wish you would."

"Why! you would spill it," he said, glancing at the tiny hands.

"No, I won't; I promise. See! you sit there," and she dragged a chair up to the side of the table. He mechanically did as she bade him, and presently he found her sitting at the head of the table, pouring out his tea and talking to him in her innocent childish way.

"You see, I can do it," she said triumphantly.

"Yes, I did not think you were so clever," he answered; and surely that was a smile which lurked round the corners of his mouth.

Mrs. Morgan, entering the room a little later, started in surprise.

"Well!" she exclaimed under her breath, "if this doesn't beat everything!"

Douglas Ferrars appeared slightly confused, but Maisie was glorying in her new position, and looked extremely proud.

"I've poured it out all by myself," she said, "and I haven't spilt a drop."

"Bless the child!" said Mrs. Morgan, looking from one to the other of this strange couple, "bless the child!"

Having finished their meal, they rose from the table, he departing to his study, as was his invariable custom after breakfast, she darting out into the sunshine, where presently he saw her from his window playing among the flowers.

How little makes the joy of a child, how quickly the sunshine disperses the clouds!

Later on Maisie waylaid the master of the house as he was crossing the hall. "Come outside with me," she said, slipping her hand into his. "The gardener has given me a little garden all to myself; come and see it, will you?"

She led him across the soft velvety lawn, and paused in front of a small flower-bed. "See, this is it; I'm going to set some seeds, and the gardener is going to give me a little rose tree."

"And are you going to grow some roses without thorns?" he asked.

"Why! roses always do have thorns, don't they?" she returned, looking up into his face wonderingly. Then, "I think you look very sad," she said thoughtfully. "I wonder why you are sad?"

"Because my roses always have thorns, and when I pluck them they hurt my fingers," he answered, with a peculiar smile.

She took his hand between her own and examined it musingly.

"I know what I'll do," she said; "I'll grow some roses on my tree, and I'll gather them for you and cut the thorns off."

"Wise little philosopher! How easily you would solve the problem of life."

"Mrs. Browne's come for the child," said the voice of Mrs. Morgan from the doorway.

"Oh! don't send me away yet; let me stay a little while longer, please—please do; it is such a lovely place and I'm so happy here; and oh! if you send me away now, I shan't be able to set my rose tree."

"And then I shan't have my roses without the thorns," he said. "Well, if I let you stay a little while longer, will you promise to go without murmuring when they send for you next time?"

"Yes, yes; I promise. Oh! you are a kind man, and I love you so," she said, as she pressed her cheeks lovingly against his hand.

"There, there! and you won't forget about the roses," he said huskily, as he left her to interview Mrs. Browne, who very willingly complied with his request that the child should stay for a short time.

"She closed the locket."—p. 472.

CHAPTER IV.

As the days passed, Douglas Ferrars grew so accustomed to seeing the child flitting about his house, seated beside him at meal-times, or wandering with him round the old garden, that, almost unconsciously, he shrank from parting with her.

She had crept into his heart, which before had been so barren; she had softened the hard places in his nature; she, the little child, with her loving tender hands, had taught him to look at life from a different point of view. But she would have to go—he had no right to keep her with him always; and then he tried to persuade himself that it would be a relief to return to his old mode of living. And so at last he told her she must go on the morrow. She did not say anything, only tears filled the great blue eyes, and she looked at him so sorrowfully that he turned his head away, because he could not bear to see the cloud on the young face, and because the eyes reminded him of someone he had known and loved in the far distant past.

All day long she crept about with bowed head, and several times he caught her looking at him wistfully.

"You shall come again some day," he said on one of these occasions. She smiled a dreary smile, thinking, perhaps, some day might be a long time.

When evening came he found her looking at her garden. "I have set some mignonette seeds there," she said, "and I was going to water them every day, and watch the flowers grow bigger and bigger, but—now—I shan't be able to;" and then she went into the house, while he stood with his eyes fixed on the little garden, thinking of the seeds which she had planted, and the roses which she had promised to gather for him without thorns.

Later, when the lamp was lighted in his study and he sat there alone, the door opened gently, and a little white figure stood before him.

"I've come to say good-night," she said. She came near to him, and he lifted her on to his knee. Her lips were twitching, and she pressed her soft cheek lovingly against his. She wanted to say something, but the words were long in coming because the tears were not far away.

"I love you so," she said softly, encircling her arms round his neck; "you have been so good to me, and I want—I want—to thank you. I will try to be brave, indeed—indeed I will, for I do not wish to vex you."

"Yes, yes, and you shall come again. You shall come again when the roses are in bloom." He looked tenderly at the sweet little face, and then his eyes fell on a locket which she wore round her neck.

"Is there anything inside this?" he asked, idly fingering the trinket.

"Yes, my mother's picture," she answered, as he touched the snap and the locket lay open in his hand. He started, and drew his breath hard. A lovely girlish face looked up at him, and as he gazed upon it he seemed to hear a voice from the long ago.

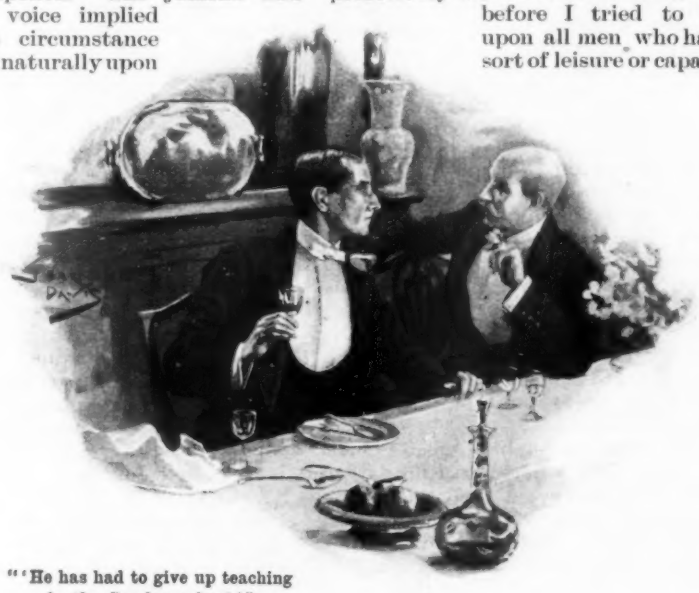
"My little Lucy—dear love!" he murmured softly; "you went away from me; you left me all alone, but I did not forget you—for you took my heart with you."

A childish hand closed the locket and hid the pictured face from view. Then he came back to the present again.

"Won't you let me stay with you?" said the sweet voice, and the arms entwined themselves closer still about his neck. "I will love you always—always."

He took the wee face between his hands. "Her little child! Do you think I could send you away from me now, dear? No, no. You shall stay with me always, and your little hands shall take away the thorns from the roses."

And so together they would traverse the same pathway, the child and the man, she holding the sceptre of love and hope, he guiding her over the rough places with gentle, strong hands.



TALKS TO MEN.

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A., Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

II.—AS CHURCH WORKERS.

"Not with eyeservice, as menpleasers."—ST. PAUL.

"AND as Mrs. Pontifex has never called upon Mrs. Spinks, he has had to give up teaching in the Sunday school." This fragment of conversation, overheard at a dinner-party, sticks in my memory, not so much on account of the sentiment, which is common enough, but for the amusingly logical and decisive air with which the words were spoken. The judicial and even tone of voice implied that the one circumstance followed quite naturally upon the other. Mrs. "Pontifex," of course, is the Rector's wife, and Mr. "Spinks" was a Sunday school teacher. It was by a man, and concerning a man, that the observation was made. Though Mrs. "Spinks" would appear to have had half a finger in this particular parochial pie, it is a mistake to suppose that it is women only who regard the doing of church work as a personal favour to the clergy. I will go so far as to say that I question whether those little piques, and vanities, and sorenesses, which do so much to neutralise or to poison spiritual lay effort, are not more pronounced among men. Women as workers have their special faults, and their direction needs firmness combined with tact, but I do think that, as a sex, they are more really religious, and that they have a stronger sense of unselfish duty. But if, whether among men or women, purity of motive could be secured, there would be a regeneration of the work which is now done professedly for God in our midst. Almost before I tried to impress upon all men who have any sort of leisure or capacity the obligation to be in some kind of a way church workers, I would beg them to settle with their own consciences, once for all, the motive which urges them towards their task. If they are stirred by any ambition lower than a whole-hearted desire for the glory of God, and for the spiritual welfare of men, their efforts will probably end, like those of poor Mr. "Spinks," in bitter failure and resentment. For their own sake, and for the sake of others, they had better never have stepped out from the ranks of their lazier or less obtrusive brethren among the laity.

"'He has had to give up teaching in the Sunday school.'"

But, while we insist on the prime necessity of purity of motive in all who would be church workers, we can listen with patience to the arguments of men who do not yet realise that any such duty rests upon themselves. We can only hope gently to persuade; certainly we can browbeat nobody into sharing our opinion. Till adequacy of motive is fully recognised, people are not likely to see that God's work is not as man's work, and cannot be judged by the same rules. Otherwise there would be some show of surface reason in the excuse of the layman who says, "Why should the clergy be the only class of the community who demand help with their work? A solicitor asks for no assistance, save that of his clerk, with his cases, or a barrister with his briefs. A doctor does not expect his neighbour to cure his patients, or a draper call in Tom, Dick, or Harry to stand behind his counter," and so on. Nor does the venerable idea show any signs of immediate dissolution, that "a parson only does one day's work a week, and that is on Sunday." I have heard this soft impeachment, before now, from a rustic in the smallest county in England, and from a tradesman in the greatest city. Let us waste no time over such real or pretended belief. The record of the Church for the past half-century would be its contradiction, except that to ignorance or to prejudice all misunderstandings are possible.

But the more reasonable objectors, who do not grasp why a clergyman needs help with his work, deserve a reply. They can be answered from common sense and from Scripture. Reflection will show that the commission of the faithful minister of God embraces the whole sphere of life. Other professional folk are specialists—their labours lie in fixed departments—composite human nature, with all its wants, and failures, and aspirations, and possibilities, is the true parson's parish, as the world was John Wesley's. The real Christian ministry reaches into those indefinable and interminable regions of life where the sacred and the secular meet, and obviously one man cannot do everything. "If I only could come in to dinner at seven o'clock, and have my evening to myself, as my neighbours do," remarked a hard-worked vicar to me, "I should not mind how much I did in the day." "I do loathe school treats!" has been the confession to me of another pastor who is unquestionably a great spiritual force. Consider this single illustration of school treats; it will serve as one among a hundred. Children require rewards and recreations, the provision for which can only come indirectly within the scope of strict ministerial work. There is nothing analogous to this excrescence in the life, for instance, of the lawyer. We surely should not assert that school treats are the minister's exclusive business, and that he deserves no lay aid.

But, besides the answer of common sense, there is the answer of Scripture. The difficulty we have noted made itself felt early in the history of the Church. Because it was not meet ("good form" we might almost translate) that the Apostles "should leave the Word of God and serve tables," deacons were appointed to attend to those widows whose claims have been ecclesiastically insistent and clamorous in every age. And the help of those who were not even deacons is abundantly sanctioned and recognised in the New Testament. St. Luke's mention, in the Acts, of "the Word of God," reminds us how varied is even the directly spiritual side of a clergyman's duty. It comprehends the administration of the sacraments, the conduct of public worship, the functions of parochial visiting and of individual exhortation. Above all, so far as time is concerned, there is the incessant study and preparation which is required for the worthy occupation of the pulpit. Never had preachers a more exacting audience than in these days, when each hearer reads enough to fancy that he knows more than a little. Never has there been a greater necessity for sermons that shall be not only devotional and instructive, but interesting and lively; and to be interesting and lively on a subject which is conditioned by the severest canons of reverence and taste, and which is expounded at least twice each Sunday, needs much previous reading and preparation. The present Bishop of London, when he was in Bethnal Green, said how thankful many a town parson is to screw out an hour's reading before dinner by occasionally being able to answer all the morning's letters on postcards; and Dr. Dale of Birmingham drew an amusing picture of the faithful wife with her back against the door of her husband's study, to rescue the minister from intruders. If the laity allow the scanty spaces of "learned leisure" of the clergy to be absolutely eaten away by miserable secular minutiæ, they cannot grumble if they get discourses that are thin, bald, and unreflective. They may congratulate themselves if their lot is not as unsatisfactory as was that of the humourist who sang:—

"To Church once I went,
But I sighed and I sorrowed,
For the season was Lent,
And the sermon—was borrowed."

"'I do loathe school treats!'"

Just as, in these days of arrogant though half-educated criticism, a distinct portion of clerical energy must be jealously conserved for the Word of God and what pertains thereto; so, by reason of the enormously increasing populations of London and other cities, church work of all kinds was never so urgently required. There are those, like the late Dr. Arnold of Rugby and the present secretary of the Additional Curates' Society, who would advocate the institution of an order of permanent deacons, devout men permitted by law to earn their living by secular labours; but, meanwhile, there are fragments of hard-won leisure that most members of a congregation who are in earnest can regularly give up to God. How can such well-wishers make their sacrifice more effectual than it frequently is? They may take it as a rough rule that many, or most, of the gifts they bring in for the highest service from their profession or business will stand them in excellent stead when crowned with self-suppression and sanctity. For instance, no sound professional or business man was ever unpunctual, irresponsible, and unreliable. He is a fortunate incumbent who finds all these commonplace and worldly qualities in the majority of his helpers. "The parson is such a bad man of business," it is the fashion to say. Poor fellow! he groans often enough in secret over the unbusinesslike habits of certain of his lay colleagues. The man who would not be a moment late on Monday morning, at his shop or office, will keep an unruly class of boys on Sundays waiting for five or ten minutes. There is also a strange indisposition among men who, on weekdays, have every sort of responsibility, to take on a bit of parish work, and see it right through from start to finish without constant and fussy applications to their minister, and the perpetual stimulus of pastoral pats upon the back. To be willing to accept the lion's share of praise for the success of some new parochial departure, when it "comes off," but to shrink from the chance of trifling failure, is neither considerate nor courageous. Church activities cannot be regarded as really valuable, save for the pressure of the moment, which tumble down like a child's house of cards directly the guiding and inspiring hand is withdrawn. Again, the sense of honour, which would forbid a man to "cave in" in an affair of the world, is curiously lacking, sometimes, in a crisis of the sanctuary. Some big parish enterprise is impending, a scheme which has been the anxiety of months and on which vast pains have been spent. And then, almost at the last moment, two or three of the main workers withdraw, and the distracted parson is at his wits' end to fill their places. "Touchiness" is often the cause of this betrayal. There has been friction among the committee, and it is only by punishment of the blameless clergyman and a risk of the wreckage of the whole concern that ruffled sensibilities can be avenged. A fatal proneness to take offence is at the root of much parochial failure. Our preliminary (and not apocryphal) Mr. "Spinks" seems to be not for an age but for all time. Some people will always be pleasanter to get on with than will others. In nine cases out of ten the fancied slight is due to a diseased egotism (that "vice of the virtuous"), and in the tenth it should be borne for the sake of Him Who endured more than "slights," and to Whose glory all church work must be done. There is no maxim more golden than this: "Avoid touchiness."

"The distracted parson is at his wits' end."

One of the minor beauties of church work is its variety. Nearly every capacity and taste can find its exercise. There are tasks to be done even in the outer courts of the temple. Gifts more directly religious are, no doubt, desirable; but a judicious administrator would never refuse the aid, offered with a good heart, of a man who could only look after the lighter portion of a parish concert, or superintend the entertainments at a bazaar. His ships brought the wise king of Israel "apes and peacocks" as well as articles of more enduring worth. The best general answer to the question, "What shall I do?" is, "That which wants doing most." Reservations, however, there must be, for there are duties for which men otherwise able are worse than useless. I knew a helper, of a devoted missionary spirit, who well-nigh wrecked a luckless Sunday school he tried to superintend because he had no tact with his subordinates. The least efficient teachers will sometimes make the best visitors, and a city clerk whose reading of the lessons could set a congregation's teeth on edge may be a perfect treasure with the parochial accounts. At the same time, the sincere and disinterested church worker will not shirk his incumbent's suggestion simply because it goes against the grain. In many parishes there is just now a desperate need for teachers in boys' Sunday schools; perhaps it is the most crying want of all. Surely, it is pluckier to try a solid six weeks of such teaching to start with, and then to know that one has honestly failed, than to seek at first an easier but more pretentious sphere. "I can't bear those fellows who will only carry banners!" exclaimed a vicar to me, who is himself a lover of ornate ritual. I should like to quote a remark (before we quit practical detail) which I heard the other day from an honorary lay worker of thirty-five years' experience, who was addressing a meeting of voluntary church workers; the words come better from lay lips. "Unpaid work," he said with emphasis, "should be better done than paid."

Purity of motive, let us once more insist, is to be striven and prayed for by all who work for God in the lowest places as in the highest. There are few sadder sights than to watch men rubbing shoulders with their social superiors in church work, in the hope that they may wriggle their own way up a little bit beyond their station. When their efforts fail, they take sittings at another church. We pass over, with a shudder, those cases where a rogue has used the pseudo-respectability his association with his church has given him as a means to hoodwink and fleece his neighbours—the shadow of Calvary has fallen upon a good many impenitent thieves. But there are church workers who can be profitably reminded that what they are offering to the Almighty will be tainted and worthless if it is mixed with any thought of worldly aggrandisement or advantage. In the routine of their daily toil they are, perforce, brought into contact with so many low ideals. Let them keep their religion, at least, pure; unlike those > "Who never worshipped God except for gain,

> So never took that useful Name in vain."

And this same purity of motive should have a converse effect. It should be a talisman against that morbid dread of being deemed a hypocrite which is an occasional deterrent from engaging in church work at all. "I really am a good Churchman," an able professional man has observed to me, "but I have a particular objection to being thought so." It is a single-minded devotion to the cause for which Church and clergy stand that alone can make us oblivious of mortal praise or blame. The grandeur of the mark at which, together with the clergy, they aim is the laity's noblest inspiration. There is no vision so sublime. Let not church workers be depressed at the pettiness of the most that they can do. With such a goal before us, a paltry piece of work, as it may seem, is no more wasted than were the labours of the unknown artists who prepared the myriad canvases of Rubens, or the pupils who shaped the rough marble for the statues of Michael Angelo. The picture towards which, with clasped hands, clergy and laity look is a world radiant with the light of Christ; the consummation for which they struggle is that of the human soul conformed to the God in Whose image it was made.

O Strength and Stay!

No. 12, "Hymns Ancient and Modern."
(By permission of the Trustees.)

Music by C. A. MACIRONE.

2. Grant to life's day a calm unclouded ending,
An eve untouch'd by shadows of decay,
The brightness of a holy death-bed blending,
With dawning glories of th' eternal day.

3. Hear us, O Father, gracious and forgiving,
Through Jesus Christ Thy co-eternal Word,
Who, with the Holy Ghost, by all things living
Now and to endless ages art adored. Amen.

GIVEN IN SLEEP.

By W. M. O'Kane.

"ALWAYS that horrible click!"

A young man of about thirty bent over an elaborate and beautifully made model of a spinning frame. His face was older than his years. A strained look was in his eyes. Across his forehead the thought furrows ran deep. The mouth that had evidently been once flexible and pleasant had set into a hard, almost ugly, expression of discontent. He looked like one whom the world had treated badly.

For a hundredth time he touched the driving wheel of the model. It rotated easily, and the various parts worked beautifully—but only for a moment. The "horrible click" that he had learned to wait for, and that he cursed in his heart, came, and the machine was locked instantly.

He sat looking at his model with lack-lustre eyes. Suddenly he took up a small hammer, and would have smashed to atoms the labour of three years. But a pair of soft arms wound tenderly round his neck, a cheek soft as peach-down laid against his own, prevented him.

"Darling Dick, won't you go out for a little?" a sweet voice pleaded. "You are ruining your health sitting constantly over that horrid little machine."

"And what about you?" the man asked, turning round fiercely. "Is your health nothing? Have I not dragged you down with me, down from luxury to poverty, down from Trevor Towers to a beastly two-roomed flat in Ninth Street? Is it not a fact, too, that you, who once never knew an unsatisfied want, are literally starving?"

He sprang to his feet and glared like a caged animal round the little room that served as kitchen, dining- and drawing-room.

"Don't, Dick, don't!" the girl wife pleaded. "All will come right some time."

"You always say that, my sweet," and his voice became as tender as in the old days before misfortune came. "You always say that."

"And I know it to be true," she exclaimed impetuously. "I know it! I feel it! All this misery will end in great happiness."

"May God grant it."

"He will, sweetheart. I know He will."

"I wish I had your faith."

"Now, darling, do run out for a little fresh air while I transform our kitchen into our drawing-room." The attempt at a joke was pitiable. With quivering lips the man placed a cover over his model and left the house.

As Richard Dudley passed through one mean street after another he thought bitterly of the time when he won the heart and the promise of the hand of Essie Trevor. His father was then supposed to be immensely wealthy, and he was his only son. An awakening came when his father died suddenly, and Dick found himself as poor as any beggar. Essie defied her parents, and refused to give her sweetheart up. Dick had some mechanical knowledge, and obtained a post in one of the large manufacturing establishments in his own city. He married Essie, who was promptly disowned. For a little the pair got along wonderfully well. But misfortune seemed to have marked Dick for its own. He lost his situation through the failure of the firm, and to-day, though he believed that a fortune was in the machine he had nearly perfected, he and his young wife were on the verge of starvation. In fact, his brain was, even now, occupied with the problem of finding food for the morrow.

"By Heaven, I have it!" he suddenly exclaimed aloud to the utmost consternation of an aged vegetable woman who was passing. "I know every window, every bolt, of the Towers. It will be for his own daughter's life, and I will break into the place to-night."

His face broke into a hard, mirthless smile, as he thought out his scheme. He had arrived, by this time, at one of the main thoroughfares, and the flashing equipage, containing the harsh-faced stepmother of his wife, dashing past him, served to confirm the resolution he had taken.

When he returned home, evident traces of tears were upon the face that tried to smile bravely. "Cheer up, dearie," he said. "Perhaps the end is in sight."

Between one and two o'clock the following morning, Dick rose and dressed noiselessly. He crushed back the feeling of guilt and shame that caused the blood to rush to his face, as he looked at the pure but pallid face of his girl wife. Lighting a tiny spark of gas in the little kitchen, he selected such implements as he thought he should require, and then stole, like the thief he already felt himself to be, from the house.

When half-way down the hateful little street, it occurred to him that the gas which he had left burning in the kitchen might direct suspicion to him afterwards.

He hurriedly retraced his steps. As he entered the kitchen, the bedroom door suddenly opened, and his wife stood before him.

Dick crushed back the exclamation that rose to his lips. As he retreated into the darkest corner of the room, it became evident to him that his wife had not seen him. Her eyes were open, but expressionless. She moved with a peculiar gliding motion quite unlike her usual walk. Never before had Dick seen anyone walk in their sleep, and it was some minutes before he realised the truth.

Meanwhile his wife glides quietly to the table where the model rests. With a woman's quick, deft fingers she removes the cover. She gives a touch here, a pull there —the machine works for a moment but comes to the usual and hated deadlock. The woman pauses. She bends over the machine. What is she doing? Is she about to destroy the toil of years, the fruit of his brain? She has taken out a long shaft with four wheels fitted. She arranges the wheels differently, and with even more skill than the man who watches her, fascinated. She makes some slight alterations in the corresponding parts of the model. The shaft is inserted with the same marvellous dexterity. The driving wheel is rotated. The machine runs as smoothly as a dynamo. His discovery is completed!

With a heavy sigh, the woman leans back in a chair, her great sightless eyes directed straight at her husband. For full three minutes she remains thus, then rises and glides back to her bedroom.

As soon as she is gone, the man, with mingled hope and terror surging through his veins, rushes to his model. He touches the driving wheel, and waits in mortal agony, expecting the horrible click that always locked the action. It does not come. A glance of his practised eye shows how the discovery had been completed. The blood rushes to his head. He reels, staggers, and falls unconscious on the hard, tiled floor.

When he came to himself, he wondered vaguely what had happened. Little by little the events of the night returned to him—the resolve to rob his father-in-law—the return to the house—the appearance of his wife walking in her sleep—and, last of all, the completion of his invention. Was it all a dream? Had he gone to sleep in his chair, dreamed all that had happened, and fallen to the floor? He feared as he approached the model. He could not see distinctly as he looked upon its intricacies. For a full minute he hesitated, his finger resting upon the driving wheel. He rotated it at length and his model worked perfectly. It was true! His wife had, in her sleep, accomplished what he had so long failed to do. With a full heart he thanked God that the contemplated crime had not been committed.

Suffering had not yet driven youth and romance from Dick Dudley's heart. Carefully he packed the model in its case, and retired, not to sleep, but to plot how he might most successfully spring the great surprise upon his young wife.

After a breakfast that completely exhausted the larder, Dick went out bearing his precious model under his arm. He knew exactly where to go, the firm that was only too anxious to buy his discovery. In less than two hours he had in the breast pocket of his well-worn coat a cheque for ten thousand pounds, an agreement for patent royalties, and a hundred pounds loose money for present needs. As he walked homewards he was as one intoxicated.

Passing through King Street, he saw his wife hurry along on the opposite side of the thoroughfare. He followed her. She entered a well-known jewellery establishment, remained twenty minntes, and then hastened homewards.

Dick entered the shop almost as soon as she had left. Essie's betrothal ring lay upon the counter. Tears rushed to the poor fellow's eyes as he thought of what it meant for her to give up her most cherished possession next to her wedding ring. In a couple of minutes the ring was safe in his vest pocket.

When Dick returned home he found his wife busy over the tiny range. "Why, darling, I thought our stock of provisions was exhausted," and he tried to hide the exultation in his voice.

"Trust a woman to find out ways and means."

"But how did you do it?"

"No matter. I am almost a better inventor than yourself."

"Better indeed. For you have succeeded where I have failed."

"Well, never mind, my dear old boy. Success will come some time. Now go and make yourself tidy for our frugal meal." The poor girl was very brave, but she was not far from tears.

Dick returned to the kitchen, and Essie in turn went into the tiny bedroom to remove the traces of her work. When she returned Dick had placed an extra covered dish at her end of the table.

"Why, Essie, actually a joint!" His eyes sparkled, for the young fellow was truly very hungry.

"It cost only three-and-sixpence."

"But last night you had not even sixpence."

"Woman's wit, my dear sir! If you would only let me spend an hour at your model, I believe I could make it work."

"Perhaps you could."

"I dreamt about the horrid thing last night."

"What did you dream?"

"That it only required some trifling change to make it right. I wish I could remember what it was."

"I wish you could."

"By the way, what have you done with it?"

"Taken it away. Are you not going to help yourself to vegetable?"

"You wretch! How dare you make me feel the poverty of my dinner table by placing empty dishes upon it? Our funds could not run to vegetables."

"Try the dish, anyhow."

She raised the cover, and instantly let it fall to a thousand pieces on the tiled floor.

"Dick!"

"Well, darling, I am glad you can afford to smash our small store of crockery in this extravagant fashion."

"But my ring! How did it come here? I—I sold it in Gibson's this morning."

"What? You sold it?"

"Yes, darling. I knew that you were hungry. But how did it come back?"

"Meanwhile his wife glides quickly to the table where the model rests."

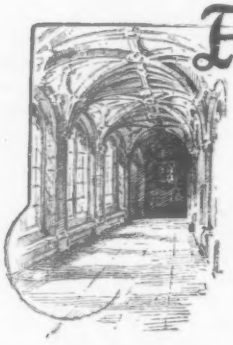
"Some fairy, I expect, brought it. Maybe there is something more."

Essie kissed her ring as she again placed it on her finger. "There is an envelope—perhaps some clue to the return of the ring."

"Dick, Dick! It is a cheque, and for ten thousand pounds. What does it all mean?"

The man came round behind the girl's chair, lifted her face and kissed her. "It means that I have sold my model, and that we are comparatively rich."

"Oh, Dick! I am glad. And so you finished it last night while I slept?"



"No, dear. It was you who finished it while you slept."

And then he explained.

THE WAY OF REMEMBRANCE.

By the Rev. Hugh Black, M.A., Author of "Friendship," "Culture and Restraint."

"I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance."—2 PETER iii. 1.

AT first it looks merely like a graceful courtesy for the writer to declare that he is giving his readers not so much new truths as only reminding them of what they already know; just as previously in this same letter he says, "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them." Again and again in St. Paul's Epistles also we find marks of the same gracious courtesy, as if his readers knew the things he desired to teach them and possessed the virtues he longed for them to have. In the Epistle to the Romans we are touched with this sweet humility and courtesy in the implication that all he hoped to do for them was to remind them of something they knew as well as he. "I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another. Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God."

This courtesy of the Apostles, however, in assuming previous knowledge is not just meaningless flattery. That attitude, for one thing, is the true teacher's instinct. To assume knowledge is often the way to bring out into consciousness what is either latent or is in danger of being forgotten. It is more than a mere trick to gain the confidence of an audience by giving them a good opinion of themselves. It was really true that their readers knew the facts and conclusions they sought to bring before their notice: they had been taught in the faith; they were aware of the story of God's grace in Jesus Christ, and also of the religious import of that story. And so, as a matter of fact, what they did need was to be reminded of it, to have it impressed on conscience and heart. It bears repetition. All subsequent progress in the Christian life is attained by bringing out into thought and practice what they already know and believe. What can one do to a Christian congregation but stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance? Thus, these words are more than idle courtesy; they are the statement of a fact that, in moral living, men need to be reminded of what they know, and that only by repetition are faith and knowledge deepened.

But there is more in it than this evident truth. The words of our text suggest an even deeper thought of religion and life. We are led to look for this deeper idea when we think that all the Apostles followed this method. To take another instance, this time from St. John: "I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it." In fact, the great appeal of religion seems to be an appeal to memory. In the promise of the Holy Spirit to His disciples our Lord states that the work of the Spirit to them would be "to bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

XUM

By way of remembrance is the method of religion. It is so in the life of the Church at large. A revival of religion comes when the Church is recalled to the facts and forces that underlie her very existence. A revival comes not by novel doctrines of a novel creed, but by a firmer grasp of the things that cannot be shaken, a recovery of faith in God and Jesus Christ and the human soul and eternal life. It is when the Church is stirred by way of remembrance that new life seems poured through her veins. Every religious advance is got by a return, as the advancing tide falls back on the basic bosom of the sea to prepare itself for an increased sweep up the shore. All through the history of the Church we see this, ever going back to the fountain-head, returning to Christ to gain fresh vigour and new insight. It is got not by new discoveries, but by a completer grasp of what it already has, digging deeper to find the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hid in Christ. The Church falls back, as it were, to review her possessions, to remind herself of them. Every revival of religion is to save the Church from forgetfulness—forgetfulness of the essential things. The progress of religious truth is by way of remembrance with a new light in it, not by discovery of the new, but by recovery of the old, seeing more clearly into what it contains, dispensing with all that is temporary and accidental, and laying hold of what is of the essence of truth.

In the individual life also the method of religion is by way of remembrance. It is a going back to something we possessed before, listening to an old voice, submitting to an old inspiration, accepting an old instinct. It is a reawakening of our real nature. The religious appeal is ever to something innate, to spiritual capacity which we have by right of birth, though that capacity be smothered by the mass of secular concerns that fill so much of our life. It is really, we feel, a coming to ourselves, having our minds stirred by way of remembrance, as the Prodigal Son at last in the far country came to himself and remembered his father's house. Religion is simple, elementary, going back to the primordial type of life. When we bend to God, it awakens in us echoes of long-remembered and long-forgotten strains; it is like a sweet and solemn and holy memory. When we waken to religion, we are struck with our folly that we did not see it before, since it lay to our hand all the time, and we just needed to be recalled to it by way of remembrance. It is nothing foreign to our nature, but is our natural life, as God is our natural home. Religion in its essence is to become again a little child, to go back to what we were—what, indeed, we really are when all the wrappings of worldliness are stripped off us. We see the Kingdom of God when we come thus with the child's eyes and the child's heart. When we are so converted, it is not like being transported into a strange and foreign land; it is like being restored to our own native land after a long and dark exile. We are home at last from a far country, where we should never have been but for our own folly and sin. We are reinstated in our own rightful place. It is by way of remembrance that every religious message comes to us, touching a string of early memory. This is the deep thought in the Platonic fancy of which Wordsworth made such beautiful use in his "Ode on Immortality": that our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting; that the dream-like vividness and splendour of sight in childhood speak of a prior state of existence, and the soul comes from God with vague memories of another life; and that through time shades of the prison-house begin to close upon us, and so the way to true joy is by way of remembrance, by "those first affections,

> "Those shadowy recollections,
> Which, be they what they may,
> Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
> Are yet a master light of all our seeing."

Religious teaching is thus distinguished from all other teaching. It uses some of the same methods, but it points to a different end. It is not just information, the acquisition of new facts, however true. It cannot be satisfied until it touches that chord of the spiritual nature which proclaims man akin to God. That is reached when we recover faith and attain the simple, trusting, artless attitude of a child. Other education can go on by set rule, by prescribed task, from text-book to text-book; but this education must also go back and within till it regains the sense of God's presence. The method of preaching, therefore, is not merely stating truths which men may accept, but is also to stir up pure minds by way of remembrance. Religion is concerned not only about views and systems of truth, important though these be, but chiefly about bringing men to self-consciousness and consciousness of God; bidding them reflect, turn in upon themselves. This distinction between religious teaching and all other teaching is a fundamental one. When all has been done in the most perfect system of religious education, nothing has been achieved unless the heart is touched and the soul has been held in recollection. It is not just true information about God and about human duty and the like, part and parcel though this is of any religious training worth the name; but it needs to be something more than all this. It must touch a personal chord and move the heart till the whole man gets into a right relation to God. Religion works therefore by inspiration rather than by information. The mind must be stirred; the soul must be stirred to holy recollection. The heart must be wakened to its birthright, to the great vocation among the sons of God.

Anything may do this; anything may open the gate of memory. God is not far from any of us. We dwell on the borderland of the unseen, and though the shades of the prison-house have gathered round us, we may be recalled by any of the surprises of life. Any event—of sorrow or joy, of loss or gain—may suddenly remind us of God, and thus be an agent of religious education. Should we be so dull of heart and so slow to believe, when everything can speak to us of the spiritual world? What opportunities we have! How mind and heart are stirred by way of remembrance! Are we not pulled up every now and then by some hint or some lesson reminding us of the inward and higher life which we acknowledge to be our true life, although the things of sense keep us blind to its claim over us? But the way of remembrance is never quite closed up. At any point we can be surprised by our own soul; at any point we can be surprised by God. Though we take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, though we ascend up into heaven or make our bed in hell, we cannot escape from the witness to the Divine which our own nature declares. It is not easy to get away from God, so long as the mind may be stirred by way of remembrance.

How true it is that the method of religion is by way of remembrance we see at the very first step of all religion. At the threshold stands repentance, and repentance is awakened memory. It may be the good of the past or the evil of the past that stirs the heart. In any case it is an appeal to memory. How a revived memory can burn into the conscience, and melt the heart, when nothing else can! It may be the recollection of an early paradise, an innocent youth, a happy home, the sweet affections of other days, the angel faces that smile on us still. The ache of desire for some buried past can turn all the present to ashes. That appeal of memory can move a man when all other motives have lost their grip, and bring him back to God as the prodigal turned at the soft thought of his father's house. Or it may be that repentance is induced by a sin that will not be forgotten or a shame that will not be buried.

> "What can assuage the unforgotten pain,
> And teach the unforgetful to forget!"

It is part of the burden and the glory of moral existence that we do not forget. It is because we have a life all our own, with a past all our own; it is because we are spiritual entities, with unbroken continuity of personal life, that religion can get at us thus by way of remembrance. No man is safe from his past, be it of good or evil. So repentance comes often as a form of recollection. When we consider and remember and come to ourselves, when memory revives, conscience awakes. The buried past reappears as on some awful Resurrection Day.

We are all open to this appeal, all open to have our minds stirred by way of remembrance: and it is not all sad memory or recollection that carries with it a sense of shame. We bring to mind the ever-old, ever-new fact of God's eternal love; we see the gracious providence, goodness, and mercy that have followed us all our days. Our hearts are stirred into gratitude as well as into contrition by the backward look; and surely also into renewed aspiration and resolution to let the consoling, inspiring power of our faith move us to larger service and more loyal devotion. By way of remembrance we think of the love with which the Saviour loved us and gave Himself for us, and we are stirred to walk worthy of our great vocation as the children of God.

A Complete Story.

BETTY'S little house was in a by-street in Southwark. Towering behind it was a great blank-visaged factory, upon the gaunt walls of which its back windows peered closely, as though they were short-sighted, and were trying to make out what the huge object was. Through the long hours, from morning till night, the great engines throbbed, and the machinery rattled and groaned, and the heavy waggons jogged and jolted over the rough stones of the courtyard. Every sound penetrated with startling distinctness into the back rooms of Betty's house. When the heavy pistons thumped and thundered amidst a commotion of hissing steam the windows shook furiously, and the sound penetrated with dull reverberations, even to the front room which looked out upon the small street. When the men, busily loading the huge boxes from the swinging cranes high in mid-air into the waggons below, talked and shouted to each other, you might hear every word they said, supposing you had been sitting in any one of the back rooms. Betty largely measured her life by the factory. When she heard the hoarse hooter ring out in the morning she used to say: "Six o'clock! In half an hour I must rise to get Tom's breakfast ready." When she heard the same signal at one o'clock she used to say: "I must lay the table. Tom will be here in ten minutes."

Everyone has some characteristic of temperament which impresses itself upon his or her friends as the days go on. In superior circles of life they would call it a trait of character. In the circles in which Betty moved it would be described as "a way." "That is So-and-So's way," they would say. "He's got that way about him." "Oh, it's her way—that's all." Betty most decidedly had a "way." In the vernacular of the district, it might be called a "cheerful way." More educated people would describe it as a perennial optimism, a buoyancy of spirit, which would persist in rising above all difficulties. Even if you filled the glass with water from Marah, or with the bitterest of fluids, or even with the blackest ink, Betty's optimism would still shoot upward like a cork, and float triumphantly upon the surface. Whatever trouble was looming, however bitter or black it was, Betty had that "way" about her that she could throw it off, and dismiss it with a fine carelessness, and the cheeriest of smiles. Her favourite expression was wonderfully characteristic of her temperament and nature. It was always uttered with as cheery a laugh and as merry a smile as though the incident which had called it forth were the best joke in the world. Whatever the nature of the difficulty which brooded over the day, Betty would throw down her gauntlet to it with as defiant an air as any knight of old, and would laugh, and exclaim with a fine scorn, "Poof! If I never get anything wuss nor that——" The sentence never went further. It was enough for Betty. It expressed all that she meant It met and wrestled with every trouble. If it did not actually overcome the difficulty, Betty believed that it did, which was quite as good. There was nothing more to be said after she had delivered herself of this exclamation. "There might always be something wuss"; that was the text of her life; and it never failed to convert the darkest cloud into a simple passing shadow, with the sunlight behind it. "We'll soon get over that! If we never get anything wuss nor that——"

Betty was small and spare and almost fragile in build. Her face was redeemed from absolute plainness by her eyes, which were bright, and quick, and kindly. Their almost limpid blue beamed upon you with a smile as she spoke to you. Her words were accompanied by energetic action of the head, with which she emphasised in the affirmative or negative any remarks she was making. If she said "No," she shook her head. If she said "Yes," she nodded it. It was like a dose of quinine to see Betty toss her head, and smile, and say: "Well, if I never have anything wuss nor that——"

Betty never married. She found another and a distinct call in life from the time her brother Charles died. He was already a widower, and the family of three children was thus rendered completely destitute. Betty was at the time in service as a cook at Brighton. She was the only sister of her brother; and he had been the only son. "There is no one but me," said Betty, "to look after them." And so she gave up her situation, withdrew from the savings bank her laborious savings of fifteen pounds, took that house in the small street in the Borough, bought a sewing-machine, and set herself to earn a livelihood by needlework and letting lodgings. She had wonderful "ways" about her, had Betty. This according to the report, in vernacular, of the neighbours. She had a "way" of making both ends meet. She had a "way" of making clothes last. She had a "way" of meeting the obligations of rent-day which was perfectly inexplicable to the other residents of the street, and which certainly outraged the local custom. She had a "way" of getting the better of every little financial difficulty by her shrewd and far-sighted methods. Those methods may be interesting enough to earn a few lines of description. Betty, if she had been born a man, and in a higher sphere of life, might have been a great Chancellor of the Exchequer. She certainly had a genius for financing. She used to control her moneys by means of what I should call "funds," but what Betty called "pockets." There was, for instance, the "housekeeping pocket," which was responsible for daily expenses of commissariat and sundry domestic needs. So much per week. There was the "rent pocket," which was rigidly kept apart for its mission. So much per week. There was also the "clothing pocket." So much. And last of all, there was the "giving pocket." Yes, Betty even kept a "giving pocket." And she did not fill it last, as so many people do. "I reckon I ought to be able," said Betty, "to put threepence a week by for the 'giving pocket.' I shan't miss threepence a week. That's a penny for myself at church on Sundays, a penny for Tom, and a penny for Bill. They can't expect a penny off Fred yet; he's too young." And so, week by week the "giving pocket" was replenished, and week by week was emptied. For as regularly as the Sunday evening came round, Betty put on her plain little bonnet and neat jacket, with the fur round the edge, both of which she kept scrupulously in some mysterious cupboard wherein you might distinguish the odour of camphor. People who had known Betty for five years had never known her in any other outdoor gear than that bonnet and the jacket with the fur round it.

Betty's laws and methods in regard to her "pockets" were rigid, inflexible, immovable as the laws of the stars. One pocket was never allowed to interfere with the province of another. If one began to limp towards the end of the week it must fight its own battle. "Oh, you are gettin' short, are you?" Betty would sometimes exclaim with a little frown. "Well, serve you right for buying that there bony meat! If you will be foolish you must put up with bein' short. You've got to last out to the end of the week, anyhow. Well, if we never get any wuss trouble nor that, we'll do. But you've got to last out." And by means of much anxious puzzling and planning the defaulting "pocket" was measured and meted out so that it lasted until pay-day came round again. It was due to this rigid and methodical economy that Betty was never in debt; that she could look back with a sigh of content upon every week as it merged into the next, and say, "Another week gone and everything cleared up."

Betty's age, when she had given up her situation and had taken in hand the family of her brother Charles, had been thirty-two. From that time until she was fifty-one—that is to say, for nineteen years—she lived in the little house underneath the tall factory in South London. How faithfully she acted the part of mother to the orphan children; how neatly she kept them dressed and booted and stockinged from the day she adopted them; the neighbours can even yet tell you. She was a wonderful hand at patching and darning. That was why Tom and Bill and Fred always looked so neat, despite their ardent efforts during the day to undo what Betty had so carefully mended. Tom was the veriest street-arab in proclivities. He had a great penchant for trudging through muddy pools, for instance, with a view to seeing how high he could splash the water. He also took a scientific interest in "suckers," which, as you may know, are not conducive to cleanliness of the hands and clothes. He also had a passion for playing knuckle-down, preferring rainy days as a matter of choice, and choosing by way of predilection that part of the ring which was muddiest wherefrom to kneel to take his aim. Bill and Fred, as a matter of course, took after Tom in these respects. They did everything as Tom did it, regarding him as a sort of hero and lord whom they emulated in every small trick of manner and habit. Despite their united efforts, Betty was too much for them. Her clothes-brush (it was an uncomfortably hard one when it played about the neck, and its hairs had a way of pricking the knees as she worked at the mud on their trousers) was too vigorous; her boot-brushes were too active; her needle too quick. It took Tom some time to get used to the indignity of having his boots polished: and though he used to do his best during the day to wipe out the disgrace, he could never keep up with Betty. They all three could not keep up with her. At last Tom gave it up in despair. In a melancholy and aggrieved way he used to pull out a piece of brown paper whereon to kneel before playing marbles. That clothes-brush did prick so. He also thought twice about trudging through pools. If there was anything calculated to annoy Tom it was to have to stand with his boot on the egg-box in the back yard, with Betty pounding away at it, while he could hear the boys shouting at play in the street.

For fifteen years the factory behind the house thumped and rattled. For fifteen years Betty put her head to the waves, and surmounted them one after the other as they came along, paying her debts, managing her various "pockets," and bringing up her adopted family in the cheeriest and bravest manner. And then Tom, who had been ten years of age when she took the family "in hand," and who had latterly been working at the factory hard by, obtained a better position as warehouseman at the East India Docks. He had only been waiting for this improvement in his prospects to enable him to marry Mary Thompson, with whom he had been "walking out" for two years. Mary, on her part, welcomed the prospect of release from drudgery as a shop assistant with undisguised satisfaction. So Tom and she were married and went to live at Plaistow. This was a great wrench to Betty, who missed the daily round of duties, the getting up in the early morning, the preparation of dinner at a certain hour, the time-table, so to speak, which Tom's working hours rendered necessary. Tom did not of course feel it half so much. A new interest had entered into his life. And, moreover, he and his brothers looked on Betty as their aunt and nothing more. She had been in very truth a mother to them; but there was this difference—that she was not their mother. She had brought them up tenderly and well: working for them cheerfully; tending them in sickness; holding no sacrifice as too great for their sakes. But yet she was not their mother. She had entered into their lives of her own free will at a period when they were too young to realise things. They had accepted her as a natural fixture. They had learned to look upon her as an adjunct of their existence. But she was not their mother. It is the way of the world.

Tom, when he first married, used to visit Betty once a week. Soon it became once a fortnight. Then it dwindled down to once a month. Then Tom's wife, who had some high and mighty ideas, became dissatisfied with Plaistow as a place of abode; and they moved to West Ham, as being more fashionable. They did not even communicate their new address to Betty. Tom's wife would not have liked her aristocratic neighbours to see that shabby old bonnet entering her doors. And Tom the careless, Tom the light-hearted, Tom the easily led, was unconsciously influenced in the same direction. No one would have been more surprised and indignant than he if you had pointed out to him that he was perpetrating a cruelty upon Betty. He did not realise it in that light. There was no malice prepense, no intentional unkindness about his action. It was simple carelessness of character, and nothing more. And she was not his mother.

Twelve months after Tom's marriage Bill had an offer of a carpenter's post at Gibraltar, and he, too, went off. He spoke a few words of regret as he said good-bye, and made some remark in half-jovial fashion about hoping to see Betty looking "well and fit" when he came back to England; and so he went off, with the outfit which Betty had so lovingly, so carefully, and so tearfully packed for him. And Betty was left alone with crippled Fred.

He was yet only an apprentice to the boot-making trade, and was for the most part dependent on Betty. That is to say, she supplied him with food, and he devoted his small wages to the purchase of clothes. Fred was not what you might call a genial character. What he had to say he said in as few words as possible, and that was the end of it. There was not the shadow of demonstrativeness in the whole of his nature. He never displayed the slightest affection towards Betty, although she had brought him up from childhood. Not that he intended to be cold. It was simply his nature, and to his nature he remained true, even after Betty and he were left alone. He was subject to long, moody, almost morose silences. He would brood over things with taciturn, unhealthy brooding; over some fancied grievance in the workshop; over his crippled condition; over any morbid subject that occurred to him. There are people who are of that nature. Betty understood him well, and never obtruded herself upon him save when he was in the mood for sociability. But she was always cheerful, always pleasant, always ready to meet him more than half-way.

Two years after Bill had departed Fred completed his term of apprenticeship and obtained a situation in one of the Northampton boot factories. So he, too, went off, and Betty was left alone. She continued for a time to live in the house beneath the factory, and occasional lodgers came and went in fluctuating instalments after the manner of their kind. There were so many housewives in the neighbourhood who were anxious to add to their scanty income by taking in a "respectable man" that poor Betty, hidden away in her little house at the further end of the street, under the shadow of the great gaunt factory, stood but slender chance of securing an inmate for her rooms when they became empty.

None but those who have endured the experience can realise what an utter, grey misery of loneliness a solitary life in a dark London street means to a heart that has aught in it of human kindness or warmth of feeling. Betty found it out for the first time. Her life had been such a busy one that she had never before known what loneliness was. With her work to do in her busy situation; with the boys to look after in later years; with her cheery nature making of every household task a keen pleasure; the days had passed like swings of a pendulum, and she had been happy. But somehow life became very dull and clogged and long-drawn-out when she was left all alone. The winter had fallen, and in a poor London street winter means dreariness indescribable. Moroseness everywhere, from the heavy-laden, truculent sky to the scowling gloom that ever hangs upon the perspective of the dingy thoroughfares. Grey dolour everywhere, from the sombre faces of the houses across the way to the dismal hideousness of the muddy road and slimy pavement.

When Betty found that lodgers were few and far between, she called her optimism to her aid. "Soon get over that," she said to herself with her cheery smile. "If I never get anything wuss nor that!" And so she applied herself with tenfold vigour to needlework. By her earnings at this she managed to keep her head above water, and to pay with precise regularity the rental of the one room to which she had now been obliged to reduce herself. There was no one now to expect home at mid-day, no one upon whom to lavish her wealth of affection. It was a very lonely life in that one little room. But she used to derive great comfort from speaking fond sentences to a stuffed cat with beaded eyes, which she kept upon the mantelpiece. "You dear!" she used to say. The cat was by no means a "dear." It was stiff and vacuous and rigid. But somewhere there was a swelling in Betty's heart, a lonely seeking for companionship, which made even the stuffed cat a comfort to her. "You dear!" she would often say, in impulsive bursts of affection, and then a strange inexplicable yearning would come over her, which caused the tears to well to her eyes. Only for a moment. For she would pull herself together, and smile, and say, "What's the matter now? Oh, well, if I don't get no wuss nor that!"

Sewing work is very trying for the eyes. Working in the dim, grey light of London wintry days, in a small, dingy, ill-lit room, what else was to be expected than that which happened? Betty's eyes had never been strong. Coming home one evening in the drizzling rain, after making a few simple purchases of food, a strange blur came over her sight, and she found herself walking blindly in a dense blackness, across which came flickers of feeble light. She came violently against the railings, and stood grasping them in dumb consternation. A little sob of fright sprang to her throat, and she looked helplessly round. All was dark around her save for a dim glimmer of lamp-light which palpitated before her eyes. Almost as her fingers closed round the railings the blur passed away, and once more she could see clearly. She went on her way smiling through her tears and saying, "Oh, it's only a cold. If I never get no wuss nor that!"

The next morning broke in dull and lowering. All day long the clouds hung heavily over the great city, and the grey light glimmered sombrely through the window of Betty's little room. All day long, too, she sat at work at her sewing before the little table underneath the window, only pausing to get her simple meals, and to walk to and fro occasionally until that lump in her throat had gone away. It was a strange and inexplicable lump, and it had troubled her more on this day than ever before. Occasionally, to be sure, it had come there before—when she was talking endearingly to the stuffed cat, for instance, or when she thought of the days when the "boys" had been with her. But she had swallowed it triumphantly with a smile and her usual phrase. To-day the lump asserted itself, and would not be swallowed. When it became very troublesome she rose from her sewing and walked the length of the room (it was only five steps). Then she walked back again. Once she went to the side of the table and looked out upon the dismal scene. And even as she did so, that strange blur came again upon her sight and made all dark around her, and as suddenly left her again. She found herself clutching the window curtain with frantic grip. Her knees were trembling. Her tongue was parched and clove to the roof of her mouth. This sudden darkness terrified her beyond endurance. And there was her sewing not finished. If she could not sew, how could she. . . . The very thought paralysed her. . . . She must sew or . . . She had no money. . . . She must earn it. . . . She half staggered, half crept to the chair, and placed her feet upon the treadles of the machine. Then she attempted to smile. "If I never gets any wuss nor that," she said. Then she suddenly leant forward over the machine, and wept as though her heart were breaking.

"'Will you come and be my mother—the mother of both of us?'"—p. 490.

* * * * *

"This must be the place," said Fred. "They told us the top floor, back room." He had a trim, neat, girlish-looking woman with him.

"Knock at the door, Fred, and ask," she said.

Fred knocked, but there was no response.

No sound but the lumbering of a cart in the roadway, the swishing of the rain upon a small skylight above the landing.

"It must be the place," he said in an undertone. And he knocked again.

Again no answer, but the patter of the rain.

"They seemed sure she was in," she said, in a low voice. "Hadn't you better open the door and see?"

Fred softly lifted the latch and peered in. The twilight was fast falling, and the place was in semi-darkness. For a moment he stood on the threshold, unable to trace the outlines of the room. But the sharper divination of the woman behind him bade her step forward quickly towards the machine. She leant over Betty, placed her hands gently upon her shoulder, and raising her head, laid it against her own bosom. Betty started, as from a dream, and looked up through her tears at the face above her. She turned to Fred and peered at him through the twilight. She put her hands out towards him, and swallowing a sob, tried to speak. Her voice would not come. She shook her head, laid it against the bosom of the woman, and burst into another flood of weeping.

"You are to come and live with us," said Fred's wife. "That's what we have come up for. We'll take no refusal. You are to come straight away to Northampton. No more of this drudgery at the sewing machine. From the first time that Fred told me all about you I told him what our duty and pleasure ought to be. Aunt Betty, I have no mother. Will you come and be my mother—the mother of both of us?"

There are times when the heart is too full for speech. When a friend comes to you in the darkest moment of your life; when you think you are forgotten, deserted, alone, and suddenly find the grip of a hand; when you turn your face to the wall in desolation and suddenly find your head drawn close to a warm-beating heart: mere words at such a time are impossible. Betty, blinded by tears, put out her hand towards Fred's wife and clutched her arm. There was a world of pathos in that clutch.

ROUND ABOUT THE HOME OF A FAMOUS HYMN-WRITER.

By W. J. Roberts.

(Illustrated from Photographs by the Author.)

WHEN William, Prince of Orange, intent on the accomplishment of his glorious Protestant mission, landed at Brixham in 1688—although the manner of his landing was anything but glorious, if report be true—he found it but a tiny village of fishermen's huts.

Set back in a sequestered, rock-girt cove on the southern shore of Torbay, it must have appeared to the sensitive William as but a poor omen for the success of his venture that the fickle winds of the Channel should have driven him there for a landing, where, indeed, the friendly but dull Devon fishermen must have seemed to him in his impatience, as so many barbarians, as he watched them staring open-mouthed at his fleet lying just beyond their tiny harbour, nor put forth a helping hand or word of advice when he strove unsuccessfully to land.

One hears much to-day of the phlegmatic Dutch—the Brixham men of William's day must have been infinitely more so to have caused even a Dutchman to rouse them from their lethargy, and we can almost picture him as he stood in his galley, irritated that he should have been driven by the adverse winds to such an out-of-the-way, uncouth spot, fuming at the delay as each attempt of his rowers to find a safe beaching-place proved ineffectual, until at last, his exasperation mastering him, he cried in broken English, "Ach! mine goot peoples, I haf only come for your goots, for all your goots!" and requesting that some help might be afforded him in his predicament. If Brixham wit had been keener—as keen as it is to-day—a foreigner crying for help because he had come for their goods, for all their goods, would have obtained anything but a welcome; but if its wit was not keen, its heart was warm, and its sympathy, roused at last by the distress of its would-be visitor, went out to him; and one of its sturdy, impulsive sons, Peter Varwell by name, waded out through the mud of the foreshore to where the galley bobbed and danced at the water's fringe, and boldly carried the not unwilling future monarch of Britain, pick-a-back fashion, on to dry land.

MADE SNUG FOR THE NIGHT.

Such was the event which first made Brixham hold up its head with pride and gave it a distinctive place in the history of our country. Such a stirring episode was never repeated, however, and although so proud, Brixham still remained a tiny fishing village, with never a thought of or from the outside world. Only when the Napoleonic scare was gripping the minds of men, and Torbay was made a rendezvous for the Channel Fleet and a military station created at Berry Head, in the neighbourhood of Brixham, did the village merge into a town, adapting itself to the manners and customs of the up-to-date soldiers and sailors, and, we regret to add, at the same time adopting their vices.

Thus, from being a quiet, well-behaved, religiously inclined little community, the fisherfolk were metamorphosed into a rowdy, sinful people; and it was thus that, about the year 1819, the Rev. Francis Henry Lyte found them when he was sent to minister to their spiritual needs.

Very frail and delicate, refined, and with a poetic nature, he was the last man in the world, one might have thought, to cope with these rough, blunt folk; yet possibly this very weakness of body was as a saving grace in the eyes of the muscular men of Brixham, for without a doubt he won their hearts for his Master, and, ere his frail life flickered out, had laid up in their minds such a store of memories of himself and his goodness that even to-day, fifty odd years since he died, his name is venerated, stories of his gentle yet manly ways are told by fathers to sons, and the influence of his life may be distinctly traced.

His preferment to Brixham was fraught with rich blessing to himself and his people, and inasmuch as it was whilst there he received the inspiration for, and wrote, that beautiful hymn, "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide," we may say without fear of contradiction that the blessings of that preferment have extended beyond the confines of the little West of England fishing port even to the uttermost parts of the earth.

BERRY HEAD HOUSE, "ENSCONCED AMIDST A WEALTH OF TREES," WHERE "ABIDE WITH ME" WAS WRITTEN.

Holidaying recently in the vicinity, we made a little pilgrimage to Brixham, led thereto by reason of its association with the gifted hymn-writer. We found it a quaint, whitewashed, tar-smeared old place even in these go-ahead, twentieth-century days: there is an unmistakable old-worldishness about it that at once strikes the visitor as being different from anything he has yet seen. The shed-like railway station at which we alighted is perched high up on the edge of a precipitous cliff—a curiously inconvenient spot for the fishermen, as it is hundreds of feet above the harbour, and only approached by a steep and rugged road. A few steps down this road we obtained a magnificent bird's-eye view of the place.

Looking down over terrace after terrace of quaintly built houses, one catches a glimpse of the harbour lying far below, from whence ascends the clatter of the caulkers' mallets as they patch up some weather-worn old trawler lying stranded on the mud. Across the harbour is another hill—Brixham is a town of hills and lung-trying vistas of steps—terraced with houses and zig-zagged with roads, chief among the latter being one to Berry Head. Carrying the eyes to the left, we note first the confines of the harbour; then, sheltered by the long arm of the breakwater, some half-dozen trawlers curtseying at their moorings; and so right out and away to the open, breezy Channel. Continuing down the road, we arrived at Lower Brixham Church, a plain structure both externally and internally, but interesting to us as being the scene of Mr. Lyte's ministry, and as containing a memorial to him erected by his parishioners. A fisherman's wedding was in progress, and round the gates the usual group of female sightseers had gathered, hatless, discussing the finery of the bride-elect. The fixing up of our camera at once arrested their attention and tongues, and it was a source of supreme satisfaction to them when they found that they had been "tooked." Brixham has never relinquished its pride with regard to its association with the memorable episode in 1688, and is always ready to show the visitor the exact spot where William landed, and to repeat the story of Peter Varwell's act. The very stone—it is averred—upon which William first set foot is enclosed in a granite pedestal, surmounted by a lamp, which is erected on the historic spot; and some few years ago this memorial was augmented by the erection of a statue of William (from funds publicly subscribed) on the Strand. It is reputed to be the ugliest public effigy in England, but, remembering the wasting disease from which William suffered and the affairs of State which weighed heavily upon him, we have charity enough to believe that, with this knowledge in his mind, the sculptor has given us an admirable portrait of his subject.

WHERE WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE, LANDED: A GROUP OF "IRREPRESSIBLE 'PRENTICE LADS."

Brixham streets, the visitor will perforce notice, are curiously bereft of menfolk, a condition easily accounted for by the fact that in plying their hazardous calling the fishermen are often out for weeks together, the majority of them resorting to the far-off fishing-grounds at Milford, famed for the quality and quantity of the fish there to be caught.

It is only on a bank holiday or Sunday that one really sees Brixham at its best. Then the harbour is a vast animated picture of moving colours, with its lines upon lines of neatly moored trawlers, and their apparently inextricable tangle of masts and cordage. Circling about them, the screaming gulls poise and sweep in graceful evolutions, as they watch and dart for the floating morsels of food and fish which the home-coming of the fishing fleet make plentiful, chasing each other in mid-air as they struggle each to possess some more than ordinarily tempting find.

The men stand about in groups, clad in costly broadcloth and velvet (for your Brixham fisherman is nothing if not well tailored on a Sunday), discussing the lines of some new boat or other topics dear to their hearts, whilst the boys—the irrepressible 'prentice lads of the fleet—exhilarated at their freedom, go about in bands, getting more or less into mischief and the bad books of the indulgent policeman. With all this life the little township seems very gay on a Sunday, but it must not be inferred therefrom that the heart of it is not religiously inclined. The fishermen have their own pet church—appropriately named St. Peter's—and to them there is no place like it in the whole world. One of the pleasantest sights is their harvest festival, for then, with the grand old hymns roared out by hundreds of sonorous voices, the service is wonderfully impressive. On these occasions, as a rule, the font is left to be decorated by the fishermen themselves, and generally takes the form of an elaborate and tasteful design composed of fresh fish and variegated sea-weeds—veritably the harvest of the sea. One might dwell at length in extolling the graces and virtues of these rugged yet kindly men; telling of their love for home and kindred, or of their unflinching obedience to duty's call when stranger or friend is in deadly peril on the storm-tossed sea.

LOWER BRIXHAM CHURCH.

Leaving the harbour and taking the road to Berry Head, a walk of a little over a mile brings us to Berry Head House, where Mr. Lyte lived during his twenty-five years of ministration at Brixham—a house described by his daughter as "the spot of all others most dear to him from long and affectionate association." It lies ensconced amidst a wealth of trees, which almost shut it off from the eyes of the passer-by, on a rocky cliff at whose feet the sea washes all day long. From it a view of some portion of the Brixham heights may be obtained, and a glimpse of the haven which lies within the breakwater. Here of an evening, when the sun dipped down to rest behind the tree-clad hills away westward, he could sit and watch the homecoming of the brown-sailed trawlers scudding and swirling before a favouring breeze, until at last they were brought up smartly at their moorings and made snug for the night. The rattle of the windlass as the anchor was let go and the clatter of the mast-hoops as the sails were lowered would be borne over the waters to him, whilst from below the murmurings of the surf-washed pebbles ascended to mingle with the sad, sweet whisperings of the wind among the fir-trees waving round about him. Small wonder, therefore, that, with the gift of poetical expression, and amid such scenes, he described the moods and fancies of the changeful waters, weaving many a ballad with the sea for its theme, ballads which the fishermen used to sing when away at the fishing-grounds.

Toward the end of his saintly life he suffered severely, and at the last had perforce to try what a summer clime could do for his weakness. Just before leaving Brixham he placed the manuscript of his now famous hymn in the hands of a near relative, and in less than two months from that date his death at Nice was announced.

"Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day," he wrote in September, 1847, and in November for him "earth's joys" had grown "dim, its glories passed away,"

THE CADGER

A Story in One Chapter by L. G. Moberly.

"WOULD it be poached eggs or fish for your breakfast to-morrow, sir?"

My thoughts were abruptly wrenched from the joys and sorrows of my heroine to the contemplation of my morrow's meal. I looked vacantly at my landlady, who repeated her question.

Then my vacant look turned to an earnest one, for I saw that her usually hard eyes were red, as with weeping, her usually grim mouth softer than I had ever seen it.

"Poached eggs, please, Mrs. Martin, and—and I hope you are not in any trouble?" I ventured to add. I had been at Mrs. Martin's for so long that I felt I should not be considered interfering if I took an interest in her concerns.

"Thank you, sir," she said, and I saw her eyes filled again with tears; "it is nothing of importance, sir. Little things do worry occasionally. Then it will be poached eggs?"

She said the last words with so evident a desire to change the subject that I could not pursue it.

Nevertheless, her manner, and above all her tears, left me wondering, for I had hitherto looked upon Mrs. Martin as indued with about the same amount of feeling as the average millstone.

I shortly plunged into my book again, and the fascinating task of rescuing my heroine (who was far more real to me than any flesh-and-blood landladies) from the perils into which her kindness of heart had led her sent Mrs. Martin and her "little things that worried" completely out of my head.

In the course of the morning, however, I was again reminded of my landlady.

Walking up and down my room, as is my custom when engaged in working out an idea, I presently found myself by the window, gazing abstractedly across the area, into the street beyond, in search of new ideas.

All at once my mind was brought back from soaring heights to present realities by the soft creaking of the back door, followed by a stealthy step in the area.

The sounds all seemed so intentionally surreptitious that I craned my head out of the window, and over the geranium and mignonette in my window boxes, to see who could be coming from the house in so stealthy a fashion.

A man's form slouched up the steps, a man whose appearance in so respectable an area as Mrs. Martin's surprised me enormously. He was one of those men who haunt the corners of streets, loaf round public-houses, tout for cabs, and, in fact, spend their lives in elaborately striving to do nothing with all their might.

The gentleman now on our area steps was an exaggerated specimen of this type, and I was puzzled to imagine why Mrs. Martin had ever allowed such a being to enter her back door.

His coat was green with age and patched from top to bottom, he wore a battered hat jammed low upon his forehead, and his boots were trodden down and full of holes.

What was visible of his face did not impress me favourably. The cursory glance I caught of it led me to infer that the man drank as well as loafed, and that his downcast, out-at-elbows appearance was entirely his fault, and not at all his misfortune.

With bent head and back, and heavy slouching movements, he climbed the steps, opened the area gate, looked furtively up and down the street, and finally loafed away in the direction of the Marylebone Road.

"Never did a stroke of honest work in his life, and never will," was my reflection, as I returned to my seat and my neglected heroine, forgetting all about the occurrence again until Mrs. Martin appeared with my lunch tray.

Then I remembered the loafer, and, being the only man in a household of women, I bethought me that it would be only common kindness to tell my landlady of what I had seen. Probably she knew nothing of the furtive gentleman's comings and goings; it was more than likely he was a friend of the grubby maid-of-all-work, who was rarely allowed to penetrate into my sanctum.

"By the way, Mrs. Martin," I said, as I cleared a space for the tray, "I saw a rather queer customer come up your steps this morning, and he looked about him so oddly that I fancy he was here on the sly. I thought I ought to mention it."

She gave such a jump that I thought the tray and its contents would be scattered over the floor; but she quickly recovered herself, and put her burden on the table, breathing heavily as she did so.

"That tray is rather heavy!" I said sympathetically; and she gasped out:

"So it is, sir."

But at the same time she gave me an odd, furtive glance, which in some queer fashion reminded me of the loafer in the area.

"I thought I would mention to you about the man I saw," I went on; and at my words she started again, and a spot of red showed on each cheek.

"He—I—he came to beg," she said hurriedly, stammering in evident embarrassment. "I don't think he will do any harm, sir; but—but, thank you for mentioning it."

She got herself out of the room after this speech, and I sat looking at the door, my brows drawn together in thought.

Why was she embarrassed by my warning about a man whom no decent householder would welcome to his dwelling? Why did she leave the room so hurriedly? And why had she started and flushed at my words?"

To none of these questions could I find a satisfactory answer, for I at once dismissed from my mind any idea that Mrs. Martin herself could have any dealings with such a type of man as the loafer. She was in every way what is known as a "superior person," and to the meanest intellect it must have been palpable that she had seen better days, much better days was my own opinion.

A week or two passed away, the incident above related had passed out of my mind, and late one afternoon I was walking home from my club, when I noticed in front of me the figure of a man which seemed in some way familiar.

Where had I seen that down-bent head, and slouching form, and green, patched coat before?

Why, of course! it was the loafer who had slunk up the area steps, the very man whose personality had interested me a week or so ago, the man Mrs. Martin had declared had come to beg, and whom I had guessed to be her slavey's friend.

I slackened my pace, moved by curiosity to see whither he was bound, and I confess to a feeling of sharpened interest when he turned down the very street in which my own lodgings were situated.

And not only that. Lingering still a little further behind him, I next saw him turn the handle of Mrs. Martin's area gate, give a furtive look up and down the street, and then disappear down the steps.

"Very odd," I reflected, as I resumed my normal pace, reaching the house just in time to hear the soft click of the back door latch, which told me that the wretched-looking loafer had certainly entered the house.

Feeling it more than probable that Mrs. Martin was out, and that the slavey was entertaining her exceedingly disreputable friend on the sly, I rang the bell, determined to investigate matters. A long pause followed my ring, but after a while I was surprised to see Mrs. Martin enter the room.

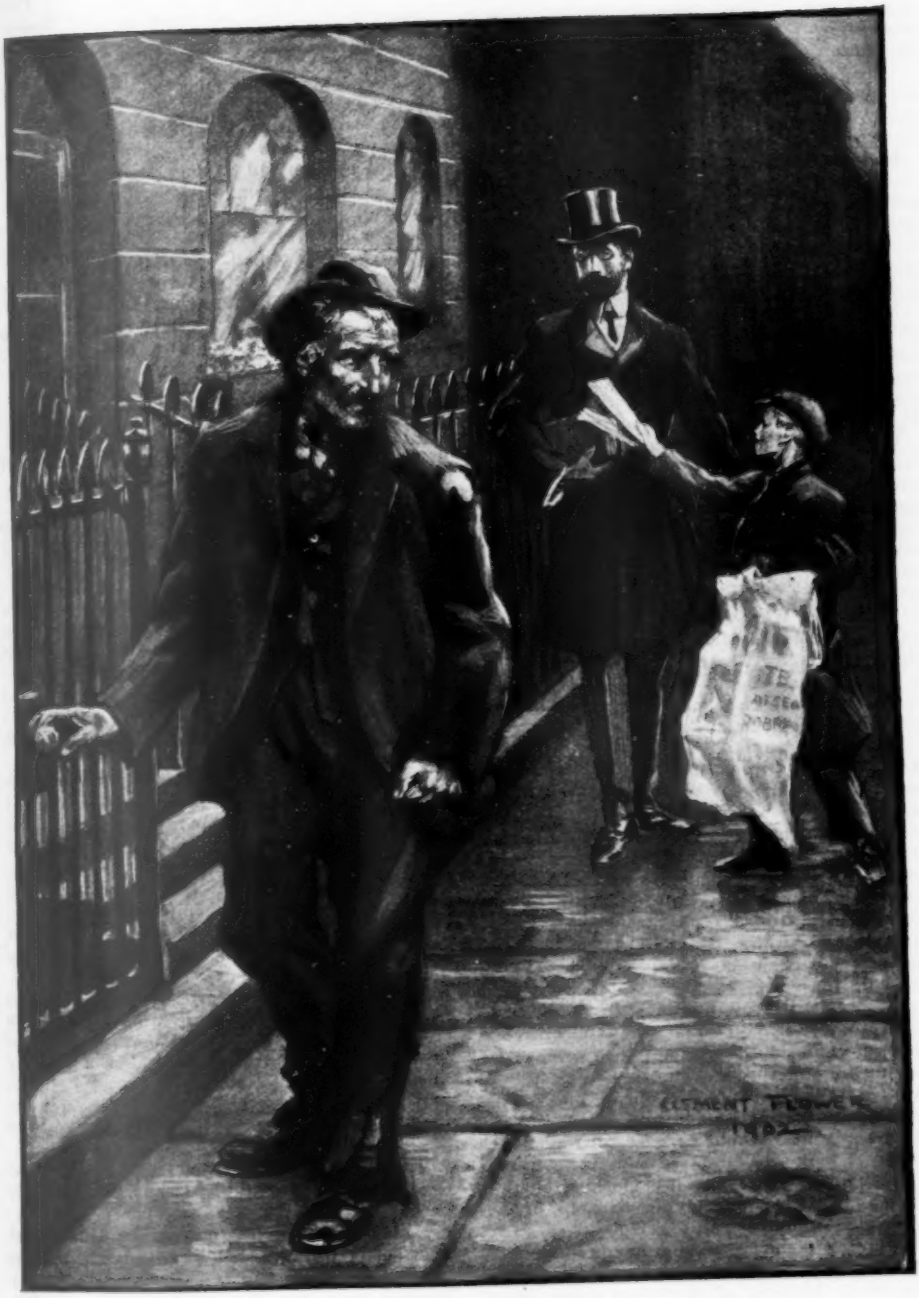
She looked considerably flustered; her cheeks were flushed; I could have sworn she had just been shedding tears, and her manner was distrait and worried.

"Did you ring, sir?" she asked.

"I did, Mrs. Martin. I imagined you were probably out, and I rang because I thought I ought to ascertain why your servant's disreputable friend is again downstairs. That same man I mentioned to you the other day, who had come to beg, you told me."

Mrs. Martin grew white, and then crimson again, and her eyes looked startled.

"Thank you, sir," she stammered. "Yes—I mean—I knew, sir. He has come for—for a morsel of bread, sir. He is very poor."



In her voice was a deprecating note very unlike the grim tone she usually adopted when beggars were mentioned. "He—he was starving," she murmured finally.

"I should say he had drunk himself into that condition," I answered drily. "Don't let the man impose on you, Mrs. Martin. These professional loafers trump up stories very cleverly."

She stirred uneasily.

"I—I know this one's story," she said; "he has told me a—a good deal."

I smiled, the superior smile of the man of the world.

"I next saw him turn the handle of Mrs. Martin's gate."

"Don't let your kind heart run away with you," I said. "These men are regular cadgers, you know. He will tell you fairy tales by the dozen if you choose to listen."

"I—I——" she began; then she seemed to change her mind. "Thank you, sir," she said gently; after which she left the room with surprising abruptness.

In the weeks following this episode I could not help noticing that Mrs. Martin's appearance grew shabbier and shabbier. She looked less and less as if she had seen those much better days in which I had always imagined her, and her face began to wear quite a worn and haggard expression.

It seemed to me that, for some unaccountable reason, she was far poorer than when I had first come to her; and yet the house was in a flourishing condition. Every room was occupied, and the lodgers were the kind of people who pay their rent regularly.

The shabby loafer occasionally came to the house, shabby and disreputable as ever, and once or twice I was convinced that I heard my landlady's voice talking to him at the back door—talking, not as I should have expected, sternly and sharply, but in a gentle, almost deprecating, voice which surprised me greatly.

"Who and what is the fellow?" I reflected, "and why is Mrs. Martin so absurdly kind to him? He is an arrant loafer, and if she is helping him she is simply being quixotic to no purpose. That man will never do any good, he is not the sort who could."

A day or two later, Mrs. Martin lingered in my room when she had cleared away my breakfast things, obviously wishing to say something.

After brushing from the carpet the last imaginary crumb and clearing her throat several times, she said nervously:

"If you please, sir, I was going to ask you a great favour."

"Ask away, Mrs. Martin," I said. "You know I will grant it, if it is possible. What can I do for you?"

"Well, sir, if I might make so bold, I was going to ask if you could allow me to have some of your clothes that I heard you say you meant to throw away. I—I——" She twisted up a corner of her apron, and looked everywhere except at me. "There is someone I know who would be grateful for them."

"Now look here, Mrs. Martin," I said severely: "if you want my clothes for that loafing fellow you are trying to help, I've a very good mind to refuse. He——"

"Oh, sir!"—she clasped her hands suddenly—"I wouldn't have asked you, but I knew you were thinking of throwing them away, and the person I want them for needs decent clothes so badly."

"He certainly does," I murmured. Then, glancing up, I saw big tears in Mrs. Martin's eyes, and as I looked they overflowed and rolled slowly down her lined face, giving it a pathetic expression which I had never observed in it before.

She caught her breath with a little sob too, and that sob went to my heart! That anyone so grim and hard as Mrs. Martin usually was should sob in such a fashion seemed pitiable.

I rose from my seat.

"Now look here, Mrs. Martin," I said firmly, "let us get to the bottom of this. I am perfectly ready to help any decent fellow in difficulties to make a fresh start, or anything of that sort; I'm not the man to refuse another man a chance. But can you deny that the man who comes so often to your back door is simply and solely a cadger—neither more nor less?"

She looked at me wistfully through her tears.

"No, sir, I can't deny it," she said.

"Has he ever done—will he ever do an honest day's work?" I went on with my catechism.

She shook her head in a mute negative.

"Very well," I continued; "then why waste your energies and your kindness of heart on him? Why not let him go to the dogs a bit faster than he is already going? Why not——"

She put out her hand—the hard, bony hand on which the blue veins and the lines that work had carved showed so plainly—and touched my arm.

"Don't, sir," she said, "don't go on. I can't let him go to the dogs, sir—I can't indeed. I daresay I'm a fool for my pains, everybody says I am. But—but—he is my brother, and I can't let him go."

"Your brother?" Sheer amazement prevented my saying another word.

A flush of shame crept over her face, her eyes shifted and sought the ground, and she spoke in hurried accents.

"Yes, he is my brother, and he has sponged on us all his life." There was a trace of indignation in her tones. "He went wrong as a lad, and he has kept on going wrong ever since. Weak as water he is, poor chap, and easily led; and oh, sir! I'm not pretending that he hasn't done plenty of evil, but I can't let him go to the dogs."

My private opinion was that he had practically gone there already, but I waited for her to say more.

"You might have guessed, sir, that I had seen better days. I—we—well, my father was—a gentleman," her voice sank, "and my brother was brought up a gentleman too. But—he dropped down to this, and I am what you see me. Money was lost——"

XUM

"Given to your brother, I expect?" I queried, and she flushed more deeply.

"Yes—it was partly that," she said. "He has had plenty of money spent on him, but it never seemed to do any good; and now I am the only one out of my brothers and sisters who will do anything for him. He has worn them all out except me, and he's worried me all my life."

I glanced at her curiously. What had made this hard-featured woman softer-hearted than the rest of her family, I wondered.

"Why do you still help him?" I could not help asking.

An odd little smile came creeping round her mouth; a far-away look shone in her eyes.

"Well—you wouldn't ever guess why," she said simply; "it sounds a silly, sentimental sort of reason, but I can't ever seem to go against it. It's like this: I can't forget the days when he was a little toddling chap of four, with yellow hair that we used to curl up into a big cockatoo, as we called it, at the top of his head, and with big blue innocent eyes that looked at you all openly and frankly. I can't ever forget that he was the little brother I used to tuck up in his cot at night; and he'd say, 'God bless you, Sis,' and I'd say, 'God bless you, Jack,' and I'd stroke his curly yellow head, and kiss his pretty eyes till he fell asleep. When I look at him now, and remember," her voice faltered, "I can't help doing all I can for him, because—come good or ill, he's still my brother, the same as in the old days."

There was a lump in my throat, and I could not answer her for fully a minute. Then I said gently:

"Of course you shall have the clothes, Mrs. Martin; and if—if I can do anything to help your brother to get a job, I'll do my best."

She looked at me gratefully.

"Thank you, sir," she said. "I—don't want to deceive you about him; he's just what you said—he's a cadger. But I can't forget the days when he was the dearest little boy you ever saw, with his curly yellow head. I can't forget that."

Ah me! What wonderful memories some women have!

NEGLECT OF READING THE BIBLE

By the Venerable the Archdeacon of London.

"These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the Word [of God] with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so."—ACTS xvii. 11.

THAT those who are in name Christians and desire to claim the Christian hope of future life and happiness should neglect the reading of the Bible is indeed the most astounding anomaly that human nature presents.

If we are Christians, we believe that God spoke to the writers of the Old and New Testament in a way by which He has spoken to no other minds however exalted. We believe that He intended to reveal Himself gradually to mankind, till the time was ripe for the appearance of His Son on earth; that He was willing to make that revelation to any nation; but that from the time of Abraham the Hebrew people showed themselves more capable of receiving and interpreting Divine truth than the Egyptians, the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Medes, the Persians, the Hindus, the Chinese, the Greeks, the Romans, or any other nation whatsoever. Accordingly, it is from the Hebrew people that we expect to learn the knowledge of His will. Spiritually, we are all Hebrews; of them our Lord was born according to the flesh. Their writings are of supreme importance to us all.

Now the word Bible means properly "Books": a collection of books; a library. St. Jerome called them "The Divine Library." Others speak of them as the Holy Scriptures, the Divine oracles.

The Bible is strictly a library of sacred literature. In its very title it conveys the miscellaneous character of its contents. It is the literature of the chosen and inspired people. We find it divided into two parts. They are called respectively the Old and New Testament, or, to use a better translation, Covenant.

The Books of the Old Testament owe their name to the fact that they give all the history, circumstances and results of the covenant into which God entered with that remarkable race who understood Him. By virtue of that covenant they were made the recipients of a certain special communication of God's will, and of certain unique and special privileges, on condition of their obedience to the duties laid on their conscience. This older communication from the Divine Being to the inhabitants of the world was obviously preparatory to something further, higher and better that was to come. That supreme and perfect communication is conveyed in the books of the New Testament, which give the actual words of the Son of God Himself, and of those who obtained all their knowledge and teaching from Him.

There is another light in which I think we are bound to regard the Old and New Testaments, and that is given us in a word used by the Hebrew historian Josephus, and constantly since his time. The word is "theocracy," the special government by God Himself; God governs the whole earth, the whole universe; but in a special way, through inspired prophets, priests, and kings, He governed His people Israel, and prepared them for the full and complete knowledge of His truth. Viewed in this light, the Old Testament describes the establishment of the theocracy in a pure and ideal form; on the failure of this, through human imperfections, the institution of a modified and imperfect theocracy; and in spite of the influence of the prophets, this in its turn fails. Finally comes the unfolding of the spiritual kingdom of God and a kingdom of heaven in the New Testament; the coming of the true King; the establishment of a new spiritual kingdom no longer confined to a single people, but open to all the world, and intended to be its transformation and salvation.

If we do not study such a unique collection of writings with the utmost reverence and attention, where is our Christianity?

To take only the first, earlier, and less perfect portion of Holy Scripture, however much may be discovered about the authorship and structure of the books of the Old Testament, the fact that underlies them all is sure and unassailable; and it is contained in the words of our Lord Himself: "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of Me."

That was the way in which our Lord and His Apostles regarded the Old Testament. They used it as the oracles of God, with as much zeal as the Jews and with greater enthusiasm, because everywhere they found in them the preparation for the supreme and most glorious truth of the Incarnation. "Had ye believed Moses," said our Lord, "ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" All the types and sacrifices of Moses were to be fulfilled in the person of the Redeemer and the sacrifice of Calvary. "'O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into His glory?' And beginning at Moses and all the Prophets He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself." Once more, to the eleven disciples, He said: "'These are the words that I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me.' Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures."

"They searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." That was the mind of the Apostles as well. Every doctrine, every teaching of the New Testament is founded on the Old, and depends on it. "I came not to destroy the Law," said our Lord, "but to fulfil." In the brief space of the New Testament there are one hundred and sixty-five direct quotations from the Old; when those that are indirect are added, it brings the number up to seven hundred. "All Scripture," writes St. Paul of the Old Testament, "given by inspiration of God, is profitable also for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." St. Paul, you will observe, gives the true key for the interpretation. It was not intended for the teaching of science; scientific truth, in all its various branches, man must discover for himself by patient and reverent investigation. The revelation of God through the Old Testament writers was moral and religious. Listen again to St. Peter: "We have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day star arise in your hearts: knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not of old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." So St. Peter had said before to Cornelius. "To Him bear all the prophets witness, that through His name whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins." And again, "Of which salvation the prophets have enquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you; searching what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us, they did minister the things, which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the Gospel unto you." To all the Apostles, to all the Christians, throughout the New Testament, the written word of the old Sacred Oracles is the very breath of the spiritual life, the ground and confirmation of all their hopes, the sanction and authority of all their beliefs.

"They searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." That is entirely and absolutely the mind of the true Catholic Church. That is the mind and habit of all the Fathers. If you ask what about the early Church after the time of the Apostles? Did they treat the writings of Christ's companions and evangelists with the same awe and reverence with which Christ and His disciples had treated the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament? Nothing can be more absolutely certain than that they did. Nothing is more remarkable than the consciousness which the Fathers who succeeded the Apostles show of the immeasurably superior authority of the inspired writings. The earliest of any, Clement, who is mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans, apologises to the Corinthians for writing to them at all; he is unworthy even to address those who had been taught by St. Paul. "Look carefully into the Scriptures," he adds, "which are the true utterances of the Holy Spirit." And again, "Take up the Epistle of blessed Paul the Apostle; what did he write to you in the beginning of the Gospel? In truth, divinely inspired, he wrote unto you Corinthians." We have in like manner a letter of St. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, a disciple of St. John, written to the Philippians. He declares that "neither I, nor anyone like me, is able to attain perfectly to the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who, when he was with you, before the men who were then living, taught the word of truth perfectly and surely." St. Ignatius of Antioch, writing to the Romans in A.D. 107, assures them, "I do not command you like Peter or Paul; they were Apostles." The famous writer and bishop, Irenæus, who in his early days was connected with St. Polycarp, the pupil of St. John, speaks thus of the inspired writers: "After that our Lord rose from the dead, and the Apostles were clothed with the Spirit of Power from on high, they were filled with a perfect knowledge of all things." And again: "The Apostles, being disciples of Truth, are beyond all misstatement." Tertullian, the ablest, and in some respects the greatest of all the Latin Fathers, put the distinction with great force: "The four Gospels are built on the certain bases of Apostolical authority, and so are inspired in a far different sense from the writings of the spiritual Christian. All the faithful, it is true, have the Spirit of God; but all are not Apostles." And the famous Alexandrian master, Origen, whose marvellous and brilliant teaching has always been a subject of the deepest study and attention in the Church, tells us that "The Holy Spirit inspired each of the Saints, Prophets and Apostles. . . . The same Spirit was present in those of old times as in those who were inspired at the coming of Christ." And again: "There is nothing," he says at the end of one of his homilies, "whether in the Law or in the Prophets, or in the Evangelists, or in the Apostles, which does not descend from the fulness of the Divine Majesty." One of the greatest names in the Church is that of St. John Chrysostom. "Whatsoever is required for the salvation of man," he says, "is fully contained in the Scripture of God. He that is ignorant may there learn and have knowledge. He that is hard-hearted and an obstinate sinner shall there find everlasting penalties, prepared of God's justice to make him afraid, and to mollify and soften him. He that is oppressed with misery in this world shall there find relief in the promises of everlasting life, to his great consolation and comfort. He that is wounded by the Devil unto death shall find there medicine whereby he may be restored again unto health; if it shall be needed to teach any truth, or reprove any false doctrine, or rebuke any vice, to commend any virtue, to give good counsel, to comfort or exhort, or to do any other thing requisite for our salvation, all these things," says St. Chrysostom, "we may learn plentifully of the Scriptures." In the same key St. Augustine, who was the strongest upholder of even literal and verbal inspiration, says: "By the Scriptures all men be amended, weak men be strengthened, and strong men be comforted." "The knowledge of Holy Scriptures," says the same eminent Father, "is a great, large, and high place; but the door is very low, so that the high and arrogant man cannot run in; but he must stoop low, and humble himself, that shall enter into it."

"They searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." That was the mind of all the great Councils of the Church. Scripture was the standard of orthodoxy, Scripture the test of heresy. It was this fundamental difference between what is inspired and what is uninspired that made the members of the four great General Councils of the assembled churches of Christendom appeal in every case to the exact words of Holy Scripture. Every one of the Fathers who has left writings behind him proves every one of his opinions by appeal to the revealed Word.

When we come to the Church of England, its view of Scripture is equally clear. "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation," says the Article. "Unto the Christian man," says the Homily, "there can be nothing either more necessary or profitable than the knowledge of Holy Scripture, forasmuch as in it is contained God's true Word, setting forth His glory and also man's duty. And there is no truth nor doctrine necessary for our justification and everlasting salvation, but that it is, or may be, drawn out of that fountain and well of truth. Therefore, as many as be desirous to enter into the right and perfect way unto God must apply their minds to know Holy Scripture; without the which they can neither sufficiently know God and His will, neither their office and duty."

And if you ask in what spirit we are to approach the great and varied mass of Holy Scripture, no two answers are possible to a Christian. From the time of the Fathers downwards it has been recognised that, on the one hand, there should be humble prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and great deference to the interpretations of the greatest theologians; on the other, a right and proper use of reason. It was said by Hooker: "Whatsoever is spoken about God, or about things appertaining to God, otherwise than truth is, though it seems an honour, it is an injury. And as incredible praises given unto men do often abate and impair the credit of their deserved commendation, so we must likewise take great heed, lest, in attributing to Scripture more than it can have, the incredibility of that do cause even those things that it hath most abundantly to be less reverently esteemed." And again: "That authority of men should prevail with men either against or above reason, is not part of our belief. Companies of learned men, be they never so great and reverend, are to yield unto reason." And again: "For men to be tied and led by authority, as it were, by a kind of captivity of judgment, and, though there be reason to the contrary, not to listen to it, but to follow like beasts the first in the herd, this were brutish."

St. Augustine said that in the great poets and philosophers of pagan antiquity he found many things that are noble and beautiful, but not among them all could he find, "Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

> "We search the world for truth (wrote Whittier):
> we cull
> The good, the pure, the beautiful
> From graven stone and written scroll,
> From all old flower-fields of the soul;
> And, weary seekers of the best,
> We come back laden from our quest,
> To find that all the sages said
> Is in the book our mothers read."

As he was nearing death, Heine, the German poet, wrote, "I attribute my enlightenment entirely and simply to the reading of a book. Of a book? Yes! and it is an old, homely book, modest as nature—a book which has a look modest as the sun which warms us, as the bread which nourishes us—a book as full of love and blessing as the old mother who reads in it with dear trembling lips—and this book is the book, the Bible. With right is it named the Holy Scriptures. He who has lost his God can find Him again in this book, and he who has never known Him is here struck by the breath of the Divine Word."

Listen to the testimony of Rousseau: "I must confess to you that the majority of the Scriptures astonished me; the holiness of the Evangelists speaks to my heart, and has such striking character of truth, and is, moreover, so perfectly inimitable, that if it had been the invention of men, the inventors would have been greater than the greatest heroes."

Very striking are the words of John Wesley: "I am a creature of a day, passing through life as an arrow through the air. I am a spirit coming from God, and returning to God: just hovering over the great gulf: a few moments hence, I am no more seen: I drop into an unchangeable eternity! I want to know one thing, the way to heaven; how to land safe on that happy shore. God Himself has condescended to teach the way. He has written it down in a book. O give me that book! At any price give me the book of God! I have it; here is knowledge enough for me. Let me be a man of one book. Here, then, I am, far from the busy ways of men. I sit down alone; only God is here. In His presence I open, I read His book; for this end—to find the way to heaven!"

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XVI.

Basil Pierpoint, curate-in-charge of Lynton St. Maurice, visiting his church one evening with a friend, finds a girl, a stranger, writing in the parvise chamber. His peremptory manner of requesting her departure rouses her wrath. The girl, Evelyn Retallack, a High School mistress, out on a holiday with two friends, is engaged in writing a story. In her anger she now resolves to pillory Pierpoint therein. As all Lynton St. Maurice is Retallack property, the girl's name rouses interest in Pierpoint and others. His friend, Claude Winwood, visiting Lyntonstowe, the Retallacks' place, meets Snell, the old librarian. From him he learns that Colonel Retallack had two sons: John, who, by refusal to obey his father's wishes, had been disinherited, and Arthur, who had obeyed, had married the heiress of the neighbouring property of Lynton St. Mary, and died, leaving one daughter, Elinor. Almost immediately afterwards Colonel Retallack was killed in a carriage accident, leaving Elinor his sole heiress. Circumstances incline Winwood to suspect Evelyn's close relationship to Colonel Retallack, and a chance meeting of the four young people in the parvise chamber reveals the fact that Evelyn and Elinor are first cousins. This meeting ends in an unlucky contretemps, whereby Evelyn and Pierpoint are delayed till late in the church by reason of a violent thunderstorm. Next day Elinor comes to see her cousin and to invite her to Lyntonstowe. Evelyn, however, has to return to town next day. Pierpoint follows her, asks her to marry him, and is refused. The same evening he is much hurt when, accidentally, he learns how she has made "copy" of him in her story. A little later Evelyn is surprised by receiving a letter with the postmark "Lynton St. Maurice."

CHAPTER XVII.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

"DEAR COUSIN EVELYN," ran the letter, "it would give me much pleasure if you would come and spend some time with us this Christmas. My mother, too, hopes you will come. Will you?—Your affectionate cousin, ELINOR RETALLACK."

After a third perusal of this short note, Evelyn started up to find her mother.

Mrs. Retallack received the news calmly, as was her wont, then, always practical, bade Evelyn pass her wardrobe in review before her. Visits to friends rarely occurred in Evelyn's life, and this revision of her dress was very necessary. She pulled out garment after garment from cupboard and drawers, Mrs. Retallack steadily inspecting each item as it was added to the pile.

"There!" cried the daughter, throwing a white sailor hat on the top of all. "That's the very last, 'the sole remainder biscuit'—all, as you see, in a state of abject decrepitude."

But her eyes danced as she spoke, and her heart danced still more gaily.

Ways and means and clothes formed the staple of her conversation with her mother and her two friends for the next few days.

But not so did she speak to herself. It would be delightful to see dear Devonshire again, charming to make Elinor Retallack her friend, a great happiness to see her father's home. Thus she played with her outer thoughts. Judith, however, one day pulled aside the curtain, and Evelyn went in further.

"You will miss Mr. Pierpoint, I suppose."

"Miss him? Why?"

XUM

"He will be gone, and therefore no more 'copy' for you."

"Gone?"

Evelyn was unaware how wide her eyes opened.

"The Rector was expected back in December, I understood."

Evelyn dipped her red-ink pen into the black ink pot, and heavily underscored the innocent sentence, "Puella rosas habet."

Lyntonstowe without Basil Pierpoint! She could not conceive it. And yet fate held that in store for her.

It was with a distinct flutter of the heart Evelyn bade her mother good-bye. Vague possibilities loomed before her, such edgeless imaginings as her soul delighted in.

Ten days later saw Evelyn seated by the fire in her bedroom at Lyntonstowe, a perfectly new and absolutely blank diary open on her knee. It was the second of January, and the page for that date lay invitingly open. Also on the little table beside her lay the diary for the year just closed, the end pages of which were still a void space. It was some time before dinner, and, having dressed quickly, Evelyn decided to spend the spare half-hour in writing up her diary. Then those many blank pages were discovered. She had written nothing since her arrival in Lyntonstowe. All had to be gone over. And now she sat, pen in hand and eyes on the fire, performing a process known to her as "boiling down." To Judith she had once described it:

"Take all the events of the day, throw them into the crucible of thought, stir with the spoon of reflection, adding thereto the flavour and fragrance of all the emotions undergone that day—but this is difficult, for emotions are as volatile oil and very evanescent—then skim, but don't throw away, for in this dish——"

"Prepared in a crucible?"

"Well, you old realist, say saucepan, if you like! In this dish"—resuming—"the 'skim' is the all-important thing: it is the resultant thought, the idea of the day. Then pour off slowly and throw away, for that is all unimportant, mere detail. At the bottom you will find a residuum of fact which may or may not be useful; chronicles of small beer have sometimes served their turn."

But in the present "boiling down" she could find apparently neither "skim" nor "residuum"; the truth being that, as her mind travelled back over those past few days, there was so much to think about that she fell into an unconscious reverie, going over again mentally all that had befallen her from her rather dreary arrival until this hour.

For it was a dreary arrival, she confessed to herself: a carriage and servants to meet her, but no face she knew; and then, after a long drive, a rather chilling reception by Mrs. Retallack. This Elinor sought to atone for. She received her cousin with effusiveness, busying herself greatly about her comfort.

Later, Evelyn came to the conclusion that Mrs. Retallack's cold manner was not due to dislike of her or anybody, but to a certain weariness of life, a weariness inconceivable to the young and ardent spirit of Evelyn; especially incomprehensible when she reflected on the luxuries which surrounded and always had surrounded her aunt—how could she want for anything?—till it dawned on the girl that there are things desired and yet unpurchasable, that happiness is not an absolute thing, but depends on having our lives arranged to scale. Mrs. Arthur Retallack's life, so viewed, was far poorer than that of her sister-in-law, though the one had never known the lack of all that money can buy, and the other had often spent a sleepless night trying to make one shilling do the work of two. In the hard-working world to which Evelyn belonged she had not met many disappointed people, or at least none suffering from intangible disappointment, and very few who found life a bore.

Evelyn found herself the only guest for the first three or four days.

"We are always very quiet just for the Christmas days," Elinor explained, "and also I wished to have you all to myself, that we might get to know one another."

Evelyn felt this a very delicate attention. At first she was stiff and Elinor shy; but these obstructions to the flow of the cousins' friendship wore down after a few days' intimate intercourse. Elinor's warm-heartedness and her evident admiration for her cousin had melted that lady's reserve; while Evelyn's gracious acceptance of this new affection bestowed upon her overcame Elinor's shyness, a shyness intensified by her keen and regretful realisation of the difference in the position of the two cousins.

As Evelyn soon learnt, Elinor had known since a child the whole history of the Retallack brothers and their father's will. She could tell Evelyn many tales of the past concerning their grandfather and his sons, tales which were quite new to Evelyn.

The source of this information was revealed when Evelyn came to know old Mr. Snell. Her first meeting with him took place two days after her arrival, when Elinor took her cousin on a voyage of exploration over the house. It was a square-built, massively comfortable mansion, quite uninteresting except to one whose forebears had seen the light there. Naturally Evelyn was deeply interested. The little turret-room her father had occupied, the schoolroom where he had learnt his lessons, her grandfather's study—all raised in her an emotion that made her almost impatient of Elinor's presence. At length they reached the library. It came back to her now, sitting by the fire, the rather gloomy December day, the darkly furnished room, the grey wraith of an old man starting into sudden life when Elinor said,

"Mr. Snell, this is my cousin, Evelyn Retallack."

"Evelyn!" the old man cried, raising himself from the books he was stooping over, "Evelyn Retallack!" Then, the light dying out of his eyes, "Ah! a girl; but you had a brother—was it true? Is he dead?"

"He died many years ago," the girl answered gravely.

"And you are Evelyn's daughter?"

"'And you are Evelyn's daughter?'"

"Do you remember my father?" she asked wistfully.

"Remember Evelyn? Of course I do. Have I ever forgotten him? Ah! if my poor words could have persuaded your grandfather in time—well—things would be different now. Rightful heirs are rightful heirs."

Evelyn's colour rose. She did not venture to look at Elinor, feeling how very ill-timed the old man's remarks were; but to her surprise Elinor added cheerfully,

"And rights are always rights, Mr. Snell, are they not, and must be put to right?"

"True, true," he replied, crushing in his fingers his bit of old black ribbon. "And if—if I could only remember and do my part in setting things to rights; but I seem to forget more and more." He looked sadly at the rows and rows of books as he spoke.

Afterwards the girls discussed him.

"What does he do?" asked Evelyn.

"Nothing but dust the library books now. He had an accident once, leaving him, as you see, a little peculiar—at least, people say so. I find him very nice and quite sensible. We quite understand each other. Of course it's an odd idea to spend his whole time searching through those books."

"What is he searching for?"

"I could never find out, but he once told me it was for a recipe, a recipe to make a man rest quiet in his grave. Is it not odd?"

Away from the freezing influence of Mrs. Retallack, the girls thawed more and more towards each other during those first few days.

"Is it not strange," began Elinor, putting her arm through Evelyn's, one day when exploring the grounds—"is it not strange that our fathers were brothers and knew each other intimately? Do you remember your father?"

"Yes; quite well."

"Oh! do you mind telling me something of him? You are like him, are you not?"

"I believe so; I have been told so."

"You remind me of the miniature of him as a boy."

"Have you a miniature of my father?" asked Evelyn quickly.

"Yes; I mean, our grandfather had, and it is there still."

Evelyn was silent. They were walking under a row of leafless limes. She looked steadily at the tops of them.

"Would you—don't you think you would like to have it?" asked Elinor impulsively. "I think that ought to belong to you."

"I should like that very much," Evelyn said steadily.

"Oh, cousin Evelyn, you don't know—Do let me once tell you how unhappy I am about that absurd will of our grandfather's! It is so unfair, and I cannot even undo any of it until I am twenty-five, for he put that in the will, that I was not to have the management of anything until I was twenty-five, for 'nobody has sense until then,' says the will, 'and some not even then.' I have seen a copy of it, and I thought that so strange to be put in a will; don't you?"

"My father was twenty-five when he married," was Evelyn's reply.

"Was he? Perhaps grandfather meant—Oh, I don't know," nervously. "There are daffodils here in spring. Do you like daffodils?"

"Yes. He meant that to refer to my father, who had gone against his wishes."

"I know," returned Elinor. "I have heard it all from Mr. Snell. I have never heard anything from mother, and I am afraid she thinks I don't know, but I do; for Mr. Snell is very good to me, and he often tells me long stories of the time when my father was a boy. He seems to live quite in the past. He is such a mysterious old man. One day I ventured to say to him what I feel about my grandfather's will, and he answered: 'It is worse even than you think.' What could he mean, do you suppose?"

"I don't know," returned Evelyn, but as if she had not heard.

"There is a good view of the house from this little hill—and do you see those distant trees? That is my mother's home at Lynton St. Mary."

"That will be yours, too, I suppose?"

"Yes; it is rather stupid having two homes so close together. At present we are keeping up both, but we always live here. Wouldn't it be nice if you and your mother lived in one and we in the other?"

"I know you mean it very kindly, of course, Elinor, but, if you don't mind, I think we had better not talk like that. Our grandfather had full legal right to leave his property as he liked, and he preferred your father to mine—"

"Oh, no; Mr. Snell has told me he cared much more for your father; only I believe mine was more yielding, and our grandfather was dreadfully obstinate. Obstinacy is a Retallack quality, they say."

"I am sure one at least of the family has escaped inheriting it," smiled Evelyn.

Elinor shook her head.

"I can be awfully obstinate, if I like, as people will find out when I at length come of age. And Mr. Snell agrees with me, dear old man!"

A log fell from the fire, and Evelyn awoke to the fact she had not yet written a word. She plunged her pen into the ink at her elbow and began.

"Disappointment," she wrote, "is truly the common lot. We are all Prisoners of Hope." This, with a sudden bend of thought from Mr. Snell's evidently disappointed life to her own late experience. For Evelyn now told herself frankly that she too was disappointed. She liked her cousin, she tolerated her aunt; she put up with the other visitors who had arrived. These rose before her now: fat Lady Phipps, her silent old husband, Sir Grosvenor, their mercurial daughter, Violet, and that absolutely intolerable young man, Mr. Laughton. Only the day before, Evelyn had written a hasty description of them and their ways to her friends:

"All four bore me," she wrote, "and each in a different way and degree. Perhaps, truly, Mr. Laughton is the only absolute and utter bore, for Violet Phipps irritates me, and her mother worries me, while I grant the stolid silence of Sir Grosvenor has something so eminently British about it that it commands respect. As to Mr. Laughton, one wonders why on earth he exists. Why he is here is easily explained: he is very rich, and the Phippses are poor. He is the son of a man who made his money. Pins, I think, were the medium. Evidently a wife of good family is the last grace to be added unto the son. This Violet no doubt will supply. Lady Phipps and Mrs. Retallack are distant cousins. We have one bearable visitor, Lord Rainsford. He is here nearly every day, and certainly dines here five days out of seven. His wife cannot live except on the Riviera, and, though he dutifully spends much time there with her, he is only really happy when plodding about his own fields here near Lynton. I like him. His chief accomplishment is making fences, on which subject he will talk all through dinner-time. But that is better than the weather. For my first few days here we rarely rose above the weather and brief spasmodic questions, my aunt's chilling, Elinor's warm. Can you imagine a shower-bath where the shower part is done in trickles—a cold trickle on one side, a hot on the other? Then I knew my fate. No butt of Malmesbury for me, but drowning in floods of commonplace. How I shall relish Judith's sarcasms in future! However, I am bearing up, and the comforts and luxuries heaped upon me help thereto. But then we know they always wreathed the victims for the sacrifice. One evening, after a discussion through three courses on—bed-socks, a wild longing possessed me to see the door open and enter—whom? Mr. Winwood. I don't know why I should think of him, unless because I was in Lyntonstowe, and he was always nice to me and never commonplace."

Quite true: Evelyn did think of Winwood often during those first few days at Lyntonstowe, but only as background to another face, which she hoped soon to see. Judith's surmise that Basil Pierpoint would have left disturbed Evelyn's visions. She found herself thinking more and more of his brown face, and she listened for some intimation of his whereabouts, yet somehow she could not ask anyone. She hailed with pleasure the advent of Sunday on the third day of her visit. Now she should see him.

A long drive and much paraphernalia fretted the edge of her calmness. In church, it was with a strange expectancy she awaited the advent of the choir and clergy. As the white-robed procession passed her, Evelyn never turned her head, but scanned each chorister and lay-clerk as he passed on beyond, seven, eight choir boys, three, four men, and then—a figure unknown to her—not Basil Pierpoint. She knelt down with a feeling of cold disappointment. So he had gone, and she became fully aware that half the pleasantness of her holiday went with him. When she gave herself time to look at the officiating clergyman, the contrast between the feeble, wrinkled man before her and the alert young face, with the keen yet boyish eyes she had looked for, was distinctly painful.

"Poor Mr. Burton seems decidedly worse, and not better," her aunt remarked, on the homeward drive. "He ought to have taken a longer holiday."

Now it was when Evelyn flashed to this point in her reflections—the core, indeed, and sum of them—when, in short, she told herself the whole truth, she wrote, as the result of her "boiling down," that original sentence given above concerning the common lot of disappointment. And, after a slight hesitation, added: "Mr. Pierpoint has left Lynton St. Maurice——"

The second bell rang.

Evelyn closed her diary, and put it carefully away.

CHAPTER XVIII.

PETER ARRIVES.

As Evelyn reached the drawing-room, Lord Rainsford, who generally acted as host when he dined at Lyntonstowe, was just giving his arm to Lady Phipps. Evelyn was aware of new faces and a few hasty introductions, but her aunt's last words swallowed up all recollection of these:

"Mr. Pierpoint, I think you know my niece. Will you take Miss Evelyn Retallack in to dinner?"

The girl started. A meeting glance, a touch of fingers, then she laid her hand on his offered arm, and they followed with the others.

"I did not expect to find you here, Miss Retallack."

"I arrived ten days ago," she said in a voice that did not sound quite like her own.

His was so still and level it made her angrily conscious of the vibration in hers and also of her heightened colour. But then he had known of her presence in Lyntonstowe some minutes before her arrival in the drawing-room, and he had had time to recover.

"Mr. Burton telegraphed for me last night," said Pierpoint, "and I came at once. I had intended staying at the inn in the village, but Peter Phipps and I met by chance on the journey, and he insisted on my coming here, instead, just for to-night."

Evelyn was aware that he was laboriously explaining and justifying to her his presence in the house with her.

"Is Mr. Burton ill again?"

It did not in the least matter to her, although she liked what little she had seen of the old man, but one must talk.

"He is not at all well, I fear. How are—your friends?"

"Alice and Judith? Quite well, thank you."

Each was very conscious of the nervousness of the other, and when they were seated at the table momentary silence followed. Evelyn racked her brains for her next remark. It was not felicitous when found.

"Have you been in the parvise chamber lately?"

He flashed a look at her. Was she laughing at him?

"You forget. I have said good-bye to Lynton St. Maurice."

"But you are back now."

She could have laughed at the vapidity of her own remark.

"Yes, and to stay, I believe. At least, Mr. Burton has asked me to stay on as his curate. He finds he must have a permanent help."

"The people will be glad to have you back," Evelyn said, breaking her bread.

Their eyes had barely met, and now she kept her lashes lowered. Even while trying to steel his heart to her, he felt to the full the winsomeness of her bright face, to which some nameless charm had been added. The lady at his left asked a question, and he turned to her.

Mr. Laughton was Evelyn's neighbour on the other side. She glanced at him now in an unseeing fashion. He pulled up his collar and put his eyeglass right. How could he know that the smile on her lips was not for him? As a rule, she took no notice of him beyond slight sarcasms which passed over his head. Now, under this direct though momentary gaze, Edwin Laughton mentally sat erect. She was a clever girl; he must say something clever to her, something quite out of the common.

"Miss Retallack—oh - your dress is white, I perceive."

"It was," she laughed, turning a tithe of her attention to him. "Frequent washings have, I fear, yellowed its whiteness."

"It washes? Does it?"

"Yes. It is nun's-veiling, you see. Do you understand woman's dress, Mr. Laughton?"

"No; at least, only a little. I like your

"'I did not expect to find you here.'" dress always, don't you know? But I—I'd like to know more about dress."

"Really? Well, shall I give you lessons?"

"Oh, do!"

There was a note of appeal in his voice. She nodded gaily.

"A guinea an hour is my charge."

"That's very cheap. I'd give more than that, you know."

"Would you? Why, you are princely, Mr. Laughton."

"Oh, no," returned that gentleman; "but I like talking to clever people—don't you know?—like you."

Evelyn could not possibly return the compliment, but she laughed.

"That is very nice of you."

And she continued to chatter to him, to his delight and to Violet's anger.

Mr. Laughton was Violet's especial property, and why on earth that Retallack girl should suddenly take upon her to fascinate him was more than Miss Phipps could understand.

On the other hand, while conducting a sober and decorous conversation with Lady Phipps, Pierpoint was acutely conscious of the flying words on his right. He knew Laughton, his wealth and his stupidity, and Basil's lip curled.

If only, when we break our idols, we could also sweep away all remembrance of them!

And if he could only know that Evelyn, through all this idle chatter, listened with all her heart to his own grave voice while talking merely to tide herself over this strange new feeling of shyness, a feeling that came over her every time those steady tones fell on her ear. Afterwards, while she could not recall one syllable uttered by Mr. Laughton, she knew all that Basil had said to Lady Phipps.

In the drawing-room the sudden advent of Peter and Pierpoint was discussed. Now Peter was the one and only person in the world who dared take carte blanche with Mrs. Retallack, explained by both on the ground that he was her godson.

"And I am very glad to see Mr. Pierpoint," Mrs. Retallack remarked to her knitting; "I have given him a general invitation here. I am only sorry I did not know a little sooner, for then he could have had the south red room; now he must have the north one. Peter says he sent a telegram—I don't understand."

"He has promised to stay till the end of the week," Elinor added.

A swift calculation on Evelyn's part: four whole days he would be with them.

Presently Lord Rainsford, having satisfactorily proved to the menfolk that our national existence depends on quick-set hedges, with the rest of the party came in from the dining-room.

Evelyn looked up brightly; but Pierpoint's glance passed over her. He went and sat beside Elinor. They had much in common, and soon Pierpoint was really absorbed in the parish details poured forth by Elinor.

Laughton, emboldened by his recent brilliant conversational efforts, approached Evelyn. She was, however, speedily relieved of him by Violet, who bore him off in triumph. A moment later the vacant chair was again occupied.

"What are you thinking of?" asked a crisp young voice.

Evelyn turned quickly, to see Peter Phipps' laughing face.

"Don't be afraid," he went on encouragingly; "we have been introduced, though I never got such a snub in my life; you were so taken up with the Parson," with a nod towards Pierpoint. "Fact; you looked straight over my head."

Evelyn's cheeks were very bright by now, but she bore herself bravely.

"I—am very sorry," she said.

"And well you may be. But I forgive you. Well, how did I start? Oh, yes; what are you thinking of? Don't you find that a good way of starting a conversation? And if people said what they were really thinking of, wouldn't it be fun?"

"It might prove very awkward at times."

"But a good joke. Let's begin. What are you thinking of?"

She caught the boy's mood.

"You," she laughed.

"Me? I hope it's something nice of me."

"Yes, very."

"Well, I'm sorry I cannot return the compliment; but I was thinking of the good time I'm going to have to-morrow. He," with a jerk of his head towards Lord Rainsford, "has asked me to one of his shoots to-morrow. Jolly, isn't it?"

Evelyn agreed expansively, as seemed to be required of her. The boy rattled on and amused her.

"Jolly 'cute of me to tow the Parson here, wasn't it?"

"Very."

"I like him awfully. Don't you? Very decent sort of chap. Just see him and Elinor! I guess they have reached Mrs. Hill's rheumatics by now. There's my mother bearing down on them. Now what's that for? I must go and see."

He left her to join the other three. Lady Phipps had evidently broken up the tête-à-tête and had involved Elinor in one of her long-winded stories. Pierpoint rose and looked about him. His glance met Evelyn's. With a murmured word of apology he crossed the room to her. Again she looked up at him.

"You must be glad to be back again in your own parish," she said with a little rush.

"I could wish it were my parish," he answered with a half-smile.

"Mr. Burton ought to give it up to you."

He shook his head.

"It isn't his to give—apart from the fact that I hope he has many years to live."

"Who is the patron, then? Lord Rainsford?"

"Lynton St. Maurice is in the gift of the owner of Lyntonstowe."

He was still standing and looking down at her.

"Elinor? How very odd! Of course—I had not thought—I am not used to territorial dignity, you know."

Now he took the vacant chair beside her, and there was a moment of silence, while he fidgeted with some trifle he had taken off the table.

"Miss Retallack," he began, with the old bluntness, "I feel I owe you an apology for being here at all. I had no idea I should meet you here, or—well, I should not have come without your permission. I hope my presence—in short, pray forgive my having yielded to Peter's persuasion, and I shall try to get away as soon as possible."

Evelyn's cheeks were crimson. The thought of her heart almost burst from her lips: "Could anything be more tactless?" She restrained herself, however, and answered with the stiffness born of intense repression.

"I am glad to meet you again, Mr. Pierpoint, and I cannot see any reason why you should leave Lyntonstowe on my account. My cousin, I think, expects you to stay until Saturday."

"We do, indeed," broke in Elinor's voice. She had just moved up and caught the last sentence. "You will be of great use here, Mr. Pierpoint."

"It is very good of you," he replied. "I shall be very glad to be of use to you, or—to your cousin."

His eyes were on the carpet, but Evelyn could not fail to detect a touch of irony in the voice.

It suddenly occurred to her that the "use" she had made of him was not, perhaps, quite as excusable as she would fain think.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE "IRIDESCENT."

A SMALL pile of letters and a roll which looked like a periodical lay waiting beside Evelyn's plate next morning. At sight of the rolled package she started and faltered in her greeting of Peter Phipps. Seizing the roll, she quickly tore off the wrapper and hastily turned the pages of the magazine disclosed to view. What she found there absorbed her to the point of forgetting to greet the other inmates of the house as they entered the breakfast-room. At length she laid down the magazine. Raising her eyes, she met the glance of Basil Pierpoint. He looked away at once. Evelyn's lashes drooped, and the red ran up her cheeks. A sudden thought flashed into her mind. Did Basil know? Could he ever guess the "use" she had made of him?

"Do you take that magazine?" Elinor's voice broke in. "I like it so much. I wonder where ours is?"

"Here it is," and Mrs. Retallack passed it down the table to her.

"And you have never even opened it, mother!"

"I do not care for it. I find it flippant."

Elinor turned over the pages of the book.

"Look at the pictures first," cried Violet Phipps over her shoulder. "I always do. Indeed, I rarely look further. Life is too short for reading. Don't you think so, Mr. Laughton?"

"Well, I don't know. They teach us, you see, before we can help it."

"What sweet pictures! 'In a Devon Corner'!"

"Yes; are they not? and the tale is interesting, too. I am anxious to know how it gets on, for it seems just written for Lynton. See, that is surely Mist Tor, and isn't that like our church, Mr. Pierpoint?"

Evelyn sat very still, apparently buried in a letter.

Pierpoint took the book and looked steadily at the illustrations.

"They illustrate those things from photographs," put in Peter. "I know a chap who does that sort of thing."

"These don't seem to be photographs."

"No doubt," Pierpoint's level voice broke in, "no doubt the artist recognised the places from the description, and perhaps—more than the places."

He could not help it. One glance at Evelyn; but her eyes were now on her plate and her face was very white. If he should ever guess! What could she do?

"I wish I could write stories," cried Violet. "People sometimes get paid well for it, I believe—and, indeed, it's rather the thing nowadays. Shouldn't you like to write stories, Mr. Laughton?"

"Stories?" He had been looking at Evelyn's face and dimly wondering why she was so quiet. "No—er—I don't tell stories, Miss Phipps. It isn't—quite nice, you know, is it?"

"I'd tell them," cried the girl recklessly, "fast enough if I got paid for it!"

"Violet!" exclaimed her mother reprovingly. "Indeed, I hope I shall never hear of your having anything to do with writing. It does lead to such dreadful habits. Lady Adeline Gore began with writing, and now——" An ominous shake of the head. "No, I can't have you end like that, Violet, and I am sure your father would never consent; would you, Grosvenor?—Grosvenor!" in a louder key.

"Eh?" from behind the local morning paper.

The question was repeated with circumstance.

Sir Grosvenor looked first at his wife, then at his daughter, finally at the kidneys just served on his plate, and turned all his attention to these last. There is nothing so non-committal as solid silence.

Breakfast over, Evelyn escaped as quickly as possible with her magazine. She betook herself to the library, always deserted at that hour. Yes, it was quite empty. Not even old Mr. Snell had yet wandered in. She chose a distant window, found a deep arm-chair, and subsided into it.

Evelyn read her own sketch with entirely new feelings. She read it as if Basil were looking over her shoulder. The plot was slight, being only the well-worn theme of love sacrificed to ambition. The hero, by name Eustace Vavasour, was represented as curate-in-charge of the given Devon corner, and the usual complement of characters took their parts around him. These last were almost all without prototype, creations of Evelyn's imagination. But for anyone who knew Basil Pierpoint and recognised the setting of Lynton St. Maurice, there was certainly a kind of grotesque likeness to him, approaching caricature, even certain phrases of his recurring; and on one page the points of a sermon, really preached by Pierpoint that summer, were given and unfavourably criticised; while the description of the country was so close and accurate as to be almost photographic.

On her, thus absorbed, the door opened, admitting Pierpoint himself. So still she was, he never perceivèd her, but throwing himself into the first chair, he too opened the Iridescent and began to read.

He had borrowed Elinor's copy! He was reading her (Evelyn's) tale, and—she did not finish her thoughts.

A few breathless moments, then Evelyn could bear it no longer. She rose quickly. He turned at the sound and started up. Again their eyes met. This time the whole long room lay between them. He stood and waited as if to open the door for her.

"I hope I have not disturbed you," he said gravely. "I did not know there was anyone here."

"No; thank you. I cannot expect to keep all this big room to myself; and, besides—I have finished my book."

He was silent.

A sudden desire seized her. She would brave it out.

"Do you condescend to the Iridescent, Mr. Pierpoint? What can you find to read in it?"

"Only what you found," he answered, a kind of smouldering light in his eyes: "'A Devon Corner.'"

"Oh! What do you think of it?" she asked lightly.

"Miss Retallack, I am not agile. I cannot fence with you, and it is not possible for me to discuss this—this life-sketch with you."

Evelyn's cheeks grew rosy red.

"I have no desire to discuss anything with you, Mr. Pierpoint—unless you wish it."

He bent his head slightly.

"This second number will justify my refusal, I fancy. I understand the editor said there would be two."

Evelyn had not known he could assume an air of such hauteur, but real wonderment made her ask:

"Two? How do you know?"

"I have friends at court—if nowhere else," with a bitter little smile. "You can understand, I wish to know how you—how the tale ends."

Then she faced him steadily.

"What do you mean, Mr. Pierpoint? What do you suspect? Please say it right out!"

"I will not," came the answer, brusque to rudeness.

Evelyn stood mute a moment, then turned and left the room abruptly.

Much of the old anger blazed in her heart.

"I'll write a third part," she cried to herself, "and—and it shall describe what a life he led his poor wife!" Then she suddenly laughed at herself. "I have given him a little soft cushiony wife, one from whom every pin has been withdrawn, and yet—once at least—he certainly preferred one who was all pins and hardly any cushion. I wonder if he has quite got over that, or——" and she fell to musing.

The residuum appeared in her diary later: "I like him when he loses his temper. He doth well to be angry."

The pronouns were left unclaimed.

CHAPTER XX.

PETER INTERRUPTS.

THESE two souls, possessing an indefinable and irremeable attraction for each other, while yet at open war, did not meet again till dinner-time, and then Peter Phipps took Evelyn in. Basil was far away at the other side of the table. For this Evelyn was soon very thankful. It was easy to talk to Peter, and still easier to listen. He was a bright and entertaining youth, so interested in his own doings and projects that he compelled interest, by attraction, in his hearers. Across a graphic account of Peter's morning bag fell, however, an arresting word from the upper end of the table.

"Doesn't Vavasour remind you of anyone, Mr. Pierpoint?"

"Of no one."

XUM

"He caught her hand in his and led her through the open window."—p. 515.

"Who is Vavasour?"

"Have you not read 'In a Devon Corner,' Mr. Laughton?"

"No; I was reading in the smoking-room. I think it too cold to read out of doors just now."

Violet laughed, and returned to the attack on Pierpoint.

Peter Phipps' prowess fell on unheeding ears.

"Well, I don't want to be personal, but there are people who remind me of—people!"

"Indeed! Do you skate, Miss Phipps?" asked Pierpoint abruptly, and, to the relief of one hearer, the hero of 'A Devon Corner' disappeared from the conversation.

Afterwards, however, he reappeared again in the drawing-room.

"Why, it is as like as possible, Elinor—only you're such a friend of Mr. Pierpoint's you won't see it. I don't like him. He is so solemn, and cares for nothing but his work; and—though he has never done so to me—I am sure he loves to set everybody right. I never met anyone more self-satisfied."

Homœopathy is the best of medicines. When Evelyn saw in this futile young person a weak copy of her own sentiments of erstwhile, she experienced quite a revulsion of feeling. Violet was intolerable in her present mood. But in a few minutes that volatile young lady had quitted the topic of Vavasour and his prototype, and was giving her views on riding-habits. Evelyn had nothing to say on this subject, having never yet ridden. She wandered down the room instead. The large drawing-room opened into a smaller, and this in turn led on to a wide balcony, a stone terrace almost, overlooking the lower ground of the avenue. Through this little room she made her way. The night was clear and starlit. Evelyn opened one of the long windows and stepped out on to the terrace. It was so mild that she ventured across it and leant against the stone balustrade. She felt a longing for quiet and time to think. Leaning there and looking out on the wide expanse of lawn and wood, she questioned with herself. But the answers were vague and wandered off into reverie.

How long she had been there she knew not, when the sound of an opening window broke in on her musing. She woke with a start to the cold of the January night and shivered, but grew still at the footsteps behind her.

"Miss Retallack—is it?—yes. Mrs. Retallack has sent me to fetch you in."

She turned away her head a little. An unaccountably wilful feeling came over her.

"I don't want to come in," she said.

"But it is so cold——" Pierpoint hesitated. "Are you quite wise?"

"You know I am not. I am never wise. If there is a mistake to make, I am sure to make it."

Pierpoint was silent from sheer surprise.

"Well?" she flashed round at him, "Won't that plenary confession satisfy you? Why do you always make me feel like a naughty child? I have behaved ill—I know it—I confess that too."

"I—I do not want any confession, Miss Retallack," he stammered; "I only want you—not to stay out in this cold night air in your thin dress."

She turned again and leant her arms on the balustrade.

"You do not fulfil your office, sir. Your care is for my material comfort only; you do not care for my peace of mind."

"Do I not?" he returned a little sadly.

She turned quickly to him, a childlike change in her voice.

"Mr. Pierpoint, will you be friends with me?"

A quick step forward, then a sudden stop.

"Miss Retallack, friends must be quite honest with each other. I—we were discussing that story—I know all about it."

She shrank back a little.

"You do?"

"My friend Winwood knows the editor of the Iridescent. He found out all about it. I believe your name was on the manuscript."

A moment's silence till she said in a low voice,

"How long have you known this?"

"Since the time I was last in town—in November."

"When—when I last saw you?"

"Yes; I learnt it the evening of that day."

"And you don't hate me!" she cried impulsively.

He half smiled in the starlight.

"Tell me—what did you think of me? What do you think of it?"

He answered after a moment, in that peculiarly steady voice which with Pierpoint indicated much suppressed emotion,

"In one way I think—the same as ever—if you will let me tell you——"

"Oh, I don't mean——" she interrupted quickly; "I mean, didn't you think it was horrid of me?"

"What do you want me to say?" He asked low; "I will say it at your bidding."

"No; you don't understand," she cried, a little wearily. "I had rather you were angry with me. You do well to be angry!"

"You, too, in your turn, will not understand," he replied again after a moment. "Anger is not my feeling; it is—you seem to wish for frankness," he went on desperately, and, as she nodded affirmation—"well, it is disappointment. That you should make mockery of me hurt me, I confess, but the feeling has almost passed away. Your right to laugh at me—if you choose—is clear, and if you have emphasised my faults, I trust it will help me to amend them. I am only sorry you should think so ill of me, but——"

"Yes?" in a half-whisper, as he paused.

"But that you should have regarded me from beginning to end merely as a study, and for that end have allowed me to grow to care for you, as I did—well," with a smothered sigh, "I suppose we always set up ideals that our deriding destinies may have the breaking of them."

He stood by her side, gazing far out over the quiet fields in the starlight.

Evelyn started and looked intently at him. Where could he have got such a dreadful thought of her? For a moment a burning defence rushed to her lips, then died away unspoken, and a strange feeling of lassitude stole over her. After all, what did it matter? What did anything anywhere matter? A few words echoed in her heart: "Care for you as I did." She shivered a little.

Pierpoint woke quickly to the present.

"Oh! how could you let me keep you here?" he cried, "Please forgive me, and pray, pray come in! What shall I do if you get ill?"

His tones and looks were full of solicitude. He caught her hand in his and led her through the open window. She went in like a little child, her eyes downcast lest unshed tears should fall. He turned to close the window. She waited for him. Then he looked at her. There was only one low light in that first room they entered, but it was enough for Pierpoint to note the paleness of her face and the droop of her mouth. Young, crude, impulsive, full of mistakes as she was, his heart went out to her with a sudden rush, an aching longing to draw her to him, to encircle her in arms that would shield her even from herself. She raised her eyes to his questioningly, a childlike, pathetic glance. It intoxicated him, and the words broke from him in a rapid whisper:

"Forgive! As if there is anything I could not forgive you—Evelyn!"

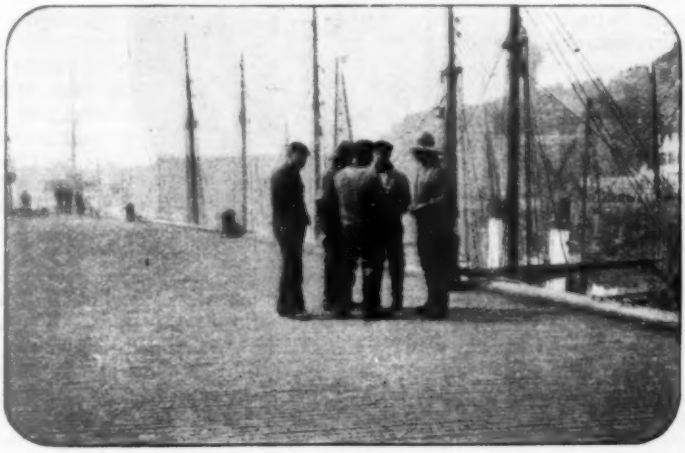
A burst of laughter from the large drawing-room beyond broke on them.

With a quick start Evelyn withdrew the hand Pierpoint had seized. No one had seen them, but a gay voice cried—

"I'll go and see!"



And in a second there was Peter Phipps in the further doorway, the curtain drawn aside in his hand.

"Well!" he cried. "You're a nice errand-boy, Parson! We sent him to fetch you to join us at ping-pong, Miss Retallack, and there he has kept you all the time in this dim little room—preaching to you, I'll be bound!"

Evelyn only smiled slowly.

The diary for that day consisted of one word: "Basil."

[END OF CHAPTER TWENTY.]

GOD'S BEAUTIFUL CREATURES.

THE CAT.

By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

WHO knows fully the inscrutable nature of the common cat? The sphinx of the household hearth is proposing a continuous riddle to us, which no one can clearly solve. Familiar as we are with it, enjoying the comfort of our fireside, receiving our caresses, as old as the age of Rameses, as young as to-day, alternately worshipped and feared, a god in Egypt, a witch in the Middle Ages, now persecuted and again loved and petted, living closely in fellowship with us, and yet remaining strangely and unsympathetically aloof all the time, with the velvet paw and the fierce claws, we cannot comprehend its ways, or understand the curious combination of opposite qualities that meet in it. Mr. St. George Mivart, the English physiologist, and M. Fee, the French naturalist, tell us much that we did not know about the wonders of its subtle and flexible organisation; and poets and artists innumerable picture to us the matchless grace and beauty of its form and movements; but how shall we explain that dignity of bearing, that proud reserve, that almost supercilious independence of character, which receives our kindness without gratitude, and solicits and rejects in the most capricious fashion our attentions? How differently does a dog behave! His master is the god whom he adores. He obeys our lightest word; he fawns upon us, and is grateful for any favour we bestow upon him, and is our attached servant and friend. But no cat owns any man or woman, master or mistress. It lives with us, and accepts our hospitality, and the shelter of our home, but it will not follow or obey us. It will not give up its sense of absolute freedom, to suit any will or word of ours, or stand in any servile relation to us. There is a primitive self-sufficiency about it which it has preserved through all its association with man, and all the changes of his civilisation, which we cannot but respect. Where can the creature have acquired this grand air of indifference in its human surroundings? Is it because it belongs to the blood-royal of the animal kingdom, and has such big brothers on its side as the lion and the tiger and the leopard; and the king of beasts is himself only an exaggerated cat?

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

"SILVER LOTUS."

Owing to this independence, which is the key-note of its character, the cat has not varied so much in its appearance as the dog, which enters into closer fellowship with men. There are not nearly so many breeds of cats as of dogs; and most cats have a wonderful resemblance to one another, from the tabby to the Persian. Owing to this general likeness, we are apt to imagine that their character is also very much the same. But while they all have the typical cat-nature in large measure, each animal, if closely observed, has a certain degree of individual peculiarity. He who attentively studies their little ways finds that they have many interesting personal traits, which identify them more even than outward appearance. We once had a very graceful grey cat, which, without any teaching, instinctively fetched and carried things. It loved to run for a quill thrown at a distance, and bring it back in its mouth, and lay it at one's feet; and it would repeat this time after time with unerring certainty. Its favourite amusement was to abstract the pens from my desk, to sit beside me while I was writing, and watch with a wise look every stroke I made, and even with its soft, outstretched paw pat my pen as it scribbled on the paper: an attention somewhat distracting! How did this pussy acquire so strange a habit? Was it a sporadic inheritance from the far past ages, when its ancestors in Egypt were employed to hunt, as the cheetah is in India at the present day, before the animal was domesticated? We had another cat, of Spanish descent, a splendid large sleek creature, with black stripes upon its dark grey body, which could do a great many tricks, give a paw, turn head over heels, and die for its country. Alas! it soon suffered the fate of too many domestic pets; and we noticed how a primitive habit came out in this highly educated cat. A day or two before it died it disappeared, and could not be found. At last we discovered it in the bath, where it had hidden itself.

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

INNOCENCE

This seems to be not an uncommon instinct of cats, and is a certain precursor of death. Social animals in a wild state leave the company of their fellows at the approach of death, and seek some solitary spot, in order to escape being torn to pieces, as the ill or wounded creature is apt to be by its fellows, and die in peace.

Cats have shown the extremes of cruelty and devotion to their offspring. We read of a London cat that crawled four times under the stage of a burning theatre to rescue her kittens, and perished with the fifth in her endeavour to bring it to a place of safety. And, on the other hand, we read of a cat drowning its kittens in a water-butt to save herself the trouble of bringing them up. Theophilus Gautier, who was a great lover of cats, had one particular pet, called Éponine, which sat with him at table at dinner. He says of her that she went regularly through all the courses of the meal, from soup to dessert, awaiting her turn to be helped, and behaving all the time with a dignified propriety. There are two mysteries about every cat which puzzle one. Why has it such an extraordinary passion for fish, a diet which seems remote from all its habits; and why, after catching it, does it release and play with a mouse, before devouring it? There is one peculiarity common to all cats. When brought to bay by its enemy the dog, every cat arches its back, hisses forth its scorn and wrath, puffs out its tail and enlarges itself to twice its usual size, so as to make itself as formidable as possible; and when it has succeeded in clambering up a window sill, just above reach of its adversary, how aggravatingly it seems to enjoy the situation, and to look down with quiet contempt upon the frantic leapings and barkings of the dog beneath! The cat has a keener sense of sight than the dog. There is a pretty fable of a cat and dog lying in a dark room, that shows the keenness of the different senses of the two animals. "Listen! I heard a feather drop," said the dog.

Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.

WAITING HIS TURN

"Oh, no," said the cat, "it was a needle: I saw it!"

The cat is an animal of great antiquity. We have numerous evidences of its existence in Egypt at a very remote period. At first it was used for hunting game, having been partially tamed for the purpose. It was only in much later times that the Egyptians of the Upper Nile had gone so far as to domesticate it. Along with the ichneumon, they considered it a sacred animal; and when it died, the members of the bereaved family shaved off their eyebrows, and either burnt its body in some central place of cremation, or else buried it, along with bronze effigies of it, in some great public cemetery, such as that of Bubastes, dedicated to the goddess Pasht, usually represented with a slender female form and a cat's head, having at her feet four crouching kittens. In this great cemetery, containing many acres, the cats were not mummified; but in other cat cemeteries, like that of Beni Hassan, they were embalmed and wrapped round with sacred clothes; and some years ago there was a great discovery of such mummified cats, which were brought to this country and used as fertilisers of the soil.

Although the animal had been reverenced from a very early age, the custom of giving it a sacred burial cannot be traced further back than the Twenty-second Dynasty. Examination of the remains in the cat cemeteries by Professor Virchow showed that they belonged to several native species; but the majority of the bones belonged to the African type, which, according to the most eminent authorities, is the original stock of our domestic cat, and abounds in Ethiopia and the Upper Nile. There can be no doubt that the animal with which we are familiar is of foreign origin, and that we must look for its primitive resort to Egypt. It is quite different from our native wild cat, which used to abound in the rocky fastnesses of Scotland, and is not yet extinct. This latter species is much bulkier, has a larger and bushier tail, and is altogether a much more formidable animal, incapable of being tamed. It has left many traces of itself in the names of localities, and in the traditions and folk-lore of numerous districts. The origin of the great Clan Chattan, the Macphersons, is derived from the totem of this native cat, and its motto is very suitable in regard to such a fierce creature: "Touch not the cat but a glove."

The Egyptian cat came to Europe by way of Cyprus, at a time when its "fallen divinity" in Egypt saved it from Mahometan fanaticism on the one hand and Christian asceticism on the other. What Dick Whittington first brought the domestic cat to our country is altogether unknown. May not the familiar folk-story of the future Lord Mayor of London, as the possessor and distributor of the cat, be a mythological account of spread on the grass, were eagerly watched by hungry, scarecrow cats from the neighbouring village, and with what famishing voracity they pounced upon any crumbs thrown to them. At Shunem particularly, where we lunched in a vineyard, there was the most sketchy cat I ever saw, whose suggestive outlines it was a pleasure to see visibly swelling to a comfortable appearance while we were feasting.

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.) (From "The Book of the Cat.")

"IN A PLAYFUL SORT OF WAY."

the introduction of the breed into England?

An animal so closely associated with domestic life could not fail to occupy a large place in the world's literature. It is a singular circumstance that, though it was so well known, and so reverently worshipped in Egypt at the time that the Israelites sojourned in the land, there is no mention made of it in the Bible. At the present day it is more common in sacred lands even than in our own country; every home having a domestic cat, though it does not seem to fare better than the dog, being left pretty much to its own resources to find food. I cannot recall a single instance of a sleek, well-cared-for cat in Palestine; but I remember well how our open-air luncheons, Except in connection with Egypt, there is hardly any trace of its name found in classical authors; and we have no information that it was domesticated among the ancient Greeks and Romans. It first comes into notice in connection with Mahomet, who had a love for animals and plants quite remarkable in a native of the East. He was always companioned by his cat Muezza, which often exposed him to inconvenience, when working, by its attitude, but whose slumbers he carefully avoided disturbing.

Since his day, the cat has been honourably mentioned in connection with men who have made history. Cardinal Wolsey, while Lord High Chancellor of England, loved to work with a magnificent cat that sat in a cushioned armchair by his side, and seemed to reflect in its grand air his pomp and pride. Richelieu also delighted in caressing his favourite cat; and Micatto, a gift to

(Photo: E. Lander, Ealing, W.)

THE SERAPH.

Chateaubriand from the Pope, often soothed his troubled spirits by its antics. Sainte-Beuve, Baudelaire, and Theophilus Gautier had their literary labours lightened by the presence of a little furry friend, who sat on their desks, roamed at will among their manuscripts, and flopped its ringed tail across their "copy." Montaigne said regarding his cat, "When I play with her, how do I know that she does not make a jest of me? We entertain each other with mutual tricks." Lord Chesterfield found something suitable to his cynical temperament in the association of an animal which maintained its own aloofness, and had no need of human company, while it suffered his blandishments and claimed his intimacy and confidence with a proud disdain. Sir Walter Scott had a much valued cat called Master Hinse at Abbotsford; and on one occasion, when feeling the loneliness of a London inn, he wrote home: "There are no dogs in the hotel where I lodge, but a tolerably conversable cat, who eats a mess of cream with me in the morning." And President Lincoln found frequent relief from the overwhelming cares of state, during the terrible times of the Civil War in America, in the gracious attentions of his pretty little cat, to which he often alluded in his conversations with his friends.

One of the most interesting literary associations of the cat is that with our great English historian, James Anthony Froude. A good many years ago he published in Edinburgh a charming drawing-room book, entitled "The Cat's Pilgrimage," in which we see the philosopher unbending from his dignified chair to gambol with the children on the floor. He adopted the quaint conceit of sending the cat, a philosophical animal, on a voyage of discovery, to find out in its intercourse with other animals what we are here in the world for. Its dialogue with the dog is full of character, but it is not satisfactory to the scientific mind, and it thinks in consequence that the dog is a lazy, careless beast that does not trouble its head about the reasons of things, but accepts whatever turns up. It inquires of the blackbird what one should do to be as happy as this bird seems to be; the answer to which inquiry is simply, "Do your duty." Finally, at the interview between the cat and the owl, the bird of Pallas tells it to "Meditate, meditate," as it does from morning to night, and from night to morning; the subject of its meditation being whether the owl or the egg first came into existence, the probability upon the whole suggested by the more finished organisation of the owl being that the owl first appeared. It is delightful to get this glimpse of the gamesome mood of a strong mind! And who does not remember the weird feeling connected with our familiar pet, which Edgar Allan Poe has used so wonderfully in his story of "The Black Cat"?

The most remarkable association of the cat is with the magic and witchcraft of the dimly imagined Middle Ages. The same stealthy, independent habits, the same clear and yet unfathomable gaze of its sea-green eyes, the same electricity in its fur when rubbed the wrong way, which made it a god in wise old Egypt, made it an uncanny and unholy creature in the dark days of our forefathers, capable of inspiring sentiments of dread and aversion. This old spell of mystery and witchery has survived in the instinctive shrinking from it which some persons manifest, in spite of all assurances to the contrary: a feeling entirely different from the alarm which an unknown dog, barking at their approach, awakens. It cannot be expected that the long entail of superstitious fear should be everywhere and altogether dispelled by the enlightenment of modern science, and by the quite different footing on which the cat is now admitted into fellowship with man. It is more than two hundred years since we have emerged from the grim belief that the cat habitually stole out from its familiar place beside the hearth in the dark to take part, in some lonely trysting-place, in the diabolic rites that were practised at Whitsunday and Hallowe'en. Human beings, often the wife of the house, were said to be transformed into cats on such occasions; and one of the commonest forms which witches habitually assumed was that of this animal, which took a part in all sorcery. A frequent pastime of this cruel age—for cruelty and superstition are only different phases of one feeling—was to throw a holocaust of cats into the fires kindled on St. John's Eve; and it ought never to be forgotten that Louis XIII. of pious memory, with a humanity far beyond his years and beyond his epoch, when a child, interceded with Henry IV. for the preservation of the poor victims that were about to be sacrificed to this senseless terror. A black cat without any spot of white on its fur was supposed to be a witch in disguise, and persecuted as such; and Heine, in his charming "Mountain Idyl," tells us of the little girl who regarded her cat as a supernatural being who on stormy nights left the household fireside to hold impious revelry with the spirits of the dead in some lonely ruin.

Poets have sung almost from time immemorial the praises of the cat, from the pretty gambollings of the innocent kitten—surely one of the most graceful and beautiful objects in creation—to the staid dignity and composure of the most experienced puss, which looks at a string or a ball at its feet, wondering if it had ever seen it before. Wordsworth in his poem on "The Kitten and Falling Leaves" refers with touching simplicity to its want of self-consciousness in its play, "overwealthy in the treasure of its own exceeding pleasure." Heine gives us a graphic picture of the purring cat increasing the cosiness of his fireside, "wrapping his mind in a realm of dreams." And Shelley notices how essential to the feeling of home-enjoyment is the drowsy cat coiled on the hearthstone, in a letter to Peacock, in which he depicts the worship of the Penates as consisting of "the purring of kittens, the singing of kettles, the long talks over the past and dead, the laugh of children, the warm wind of summer filling the quiet house, and the pelting storm of winter struggling in vain for entrance." Some of the most graceful of the poetic tributes evoked by this "cat-cult" are contained in a small but charming anthology gathered by Mrs. Graham R. Thomson, entitled "Concerning Cats," wherein we find a few delightful verses by herself conjoined with dainty selections from the French of Baudelaire, Cowper's graphic fireside sketch of "The Retired Cat," and Calverly's "Sad Memories," recording the sincere grief often caused to many a home and heart by the departure of creatures whose presence while living added so much to the happiness of domestic life.

We might expect that an animal so much petted, whose every feature and movement are full of vivacity and grace, would be a favourite subject of the artist's pencil. Many have attained high eminence in this department of art—such as Burbank, the celebrated English painter of cats; Cornelius Wisseler, the Dutch limner; Delacroix, the French artist, whose sketch-book was full of studies of cats; and Hokusu, the Japanese genius. Madame Henriette Ronner has painted to the very life the irresistible ways of the fascinating animals; and Mr. M. H. Spielmann in an exquisite volume has described in glowing terms, illustrated by numerous lovely examples from her facile pencil, their many claims to our admiration and love. Arthur Thomson exhibited some time ago at the Dutch Gallery, Hanover Square, pictures and studies of cats, which had a wonderful originality, and attracted the attention of many spectators, not much given to sentimentality.

(Photo: E. Lander, Ealing, W.) (From "The Book of the Cat.")

CHAMPION "FULMER ZAIDA."

But perhaps the greatest devotion that was ever drawn forth by the cat was that which Gotfried Mind, who was called the "Katzen-rafael" (the "Cat Raphael"), expended upon his pictures of it. Few of my readers can have heard of this artist, for he lived a very obscure life, and the admirable quality of his work hardly attracted any notice after his death. There is something peculiarly pathetic in his short biography. He was a most notable example of genius depressed, but never extinguished, by unusually unfavourable circumstances. From a short notice of his life, illustrated by ten plates of cat-groups from his pencil, published at Leipsic upwards of seventy years ago, we learn that he was born at Berne in 1768. At school he could not be taught the simplest elements of knowledge; he had great difficulty in writing his own name, and his mind always remained at the lowest grade. But he early developed an extraordinary talent for representing cats, and through his whole life he applied himself to his one task with the most absorbing zeal. With all cats he struck up a most remarkable friendship, which conquered their natural reserve, and made them devoted to him. While painting, a cat always sat on his back or shoulder, and he would keep for hours the most awkward postures so as not to disturb it. Frequently there was a second cat sitting on the table beside him, watching how the work went on; sometimes a kitten or two lay in his lap under the table. With these cats he kept up a playful, loving style of conversation; while if any human being interrupted him at such times he was greeted with frowns and growls. He had the art to seize the general nature of the animal, and in his portraits of their various physiognomies he delineated with the utmost truthfulness the specific character of each. To all his pictures he imparted a peculiar charm by a happy imitation of the soft velvety fur of the cat.

(Photo: E. Landor, Ealing, W.)

"WHO'S THAT?"

The story of "Puss in Boots" is one of the most curious of the variants of folk-stories from the East. It is one of the great moral instructors of the world: its moral being that kindness to animals will not go unrewarded, although that moral is illustrated in the story by what we should call very questionable means! In conclusion, I wish to draw attention to "The Book of the Cat," by Frances Simpson, now publishing in monthly parts by Messrs. Cassell and Co. It contains all that requires to be known about the cat, and is written in a very graceful and graphic way by one who has a most exhaustive and sympathetic knowledge of the whole subject.

AN HONOUR TO HIS NAME.

A Complete Story by Ethel F. Heddle.

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF A MAN
AN HONOUR TO HIS NAME:
LIEUTENANT MALCOLM McNIALL,
OF THE 92ND REGIMENT,
WHO AFTER SERVING HIS COUNTRY IN HOLLAND, PORTUGAL, AND SPAIN, ON THE FIELD OF ALMEDA
GLORIOUSLY FELL,
JUNE 1811.
THIS TABLET IS ERECTED BY HIS WIDOW
EUPHEMIA McNIALL.

CHAPTER I.

"I ALWAYS liked the dear old inscription," Effie said. "It is difficult to read now, but I know it by heart. My grandmother used to tell me that grandfather liked this place better than any on the island. She said he told her his mother used to bring him here and read the inscription to him. Poor grandfather!"

"It is very sweet of you to pity him, Effie," the young man by her side said. "I don't think you owe him much pity! I suppose I'm a bit hard-hearted, but for your sake I can't quite forgive the old reprobate! What? Mayn't I call him that? You see, but for him and his fine on-going, you would be the heiress of half the countryside, and I your humble servant! I always feel as if my father had reft the land from you—even though he did pay your grandfather in very hard cash. And even yet, Effie, it always seems to me as if we were the tenants here, and you the real owner!"

Effie shook her bright head at that, regarding him lovingly. "I, who have not a rood of land anywhere, except my share in the 'Coffin Island,' the McNiall's burial island. Poor old reprobate, as you call him; it is all he has, too!"

"Unless he redeems the seventy thousand pounds to-morrow! Do you know it is the last day? I made my father very angry last night," and young Colin Sinclair laughed half ruefully. "I said I wished the McNiall would turn up after all, with the money in his hand! It is too bad to extinguish the name, Effie—to think of the last of the fine old race buried in a nameless grave!"

The girl's face clouded. Something tugged at her heart as her lover spoke. "Yes," she said, "and he will never hear the message grandmother left for him on her death-bed. She told me I was to tell him—as if she felt sure I would see him. But he must be an old, old man now, and no trace has been heard of him for years. They say he used to go to and fro, from the States to Spain and France, always losing money, always getting into trouble. He fought in the American war and in Spain. He must be a very weary old man. But I always think of him as like the portrait in the hall—the grand head, the reckless, handsome face; no one ever wore the kilt as he did, grandmother used to say. He broke her heart, and squandered poor father's inheritance, but she loved him to the last."

They wandered out of the little grassy chapel then, which stood in the midst of the strange, coffin-shaped island. To Effie McNiall there was no such sacred spot on earth. The last rood of ground left in Scotland to her race, and she was the last of that race. Here the McNialls lay buried; the chiefs and their ladies in the ruined chapel, the clan humbly outside, under the beech-trees and Scotch firs, with little rifts of pine-needles over the green mossy mounds, and the wild masses of the Lochert river rolling in tumbling streams of brown water and creamy foam on either side. She had lived all her life in the village nestling under the foot of the mountains, tending her ailing grandmother—an orphan, and the last of her race. Lady McNiall would not part with her; but for an occasional trip to Edinburgh—where the great lady of the county took her gladly, telling Effie that her forbears were "parcel-tying" while the McNialls served their king with covered heads (a proud privilege no McNiall would forego)—she had scarcely set foot in the great world. But it was out on the purple muir, where she was roving with her splendid yellow collie, that the heir of the Sinclairs saw her, and there and then lost his heart.

"I shall never marry anyone but Effie McNiall," he told his father; and when the old man growled out that she was the penniless last of a reckless and improvident race he was met by a calm obstinacy which baffled all discussion and objection.

Long ago the Sinclairs and the McNialls had fought for centuries, raiding each other's cattle, burning each other's villages, harrying each other's clans. Even the island had been a source of intermittent warfare, for the property of the Sinclairs began at the very edge of the foaming river which swept round either side of the high, wooded island; but the Sinclairs' hour came with the ruin of Sholto McNiall, gambler and spendthrift, the hottest-headed and most violent-tempered man in all the Highlands. For Sholto went to borrow from the enemy of his race, and finally mortgaged the whole of his land to the Sinclairs, and sailed for the States, with fifty of his clan, there to gamble, to quarrel, and, from all accounts, to lose every penny. To-morrow the last day of the pledge expired, and the McNialls' estates passed for ever into the hands of the Sinclairs.

To Effie, alone now in the world, it could not but be a bitter hour. And as Colin Sinclair, senior, held firm still against the marriage, the lovers were to part till Colin had carved his way and made a home for himself.

They left the island after a little. It was October, and the leaves were falling thick and fast, red and yellow and rust-coloured. The river, swollen by the late rains, poured under the bridge from the road in a mighty current of rich peat brown which swept all before it. The sound of the waters almost drowned their voices as Effie gave her lover her hand. He was leaving next day for London. Effie was only to stay to shut up the little empty house, and then go to the situation the kindly Marchioness had found for her. It was farewell to Killeter for years.

They walked down the road together—Effie meant to return later for her farewell to the island; somehow, she wished to see it last of all quite alone—and then Colin went striding off, upright of figure, handsome, gay; quite ready for the tussle with fortune, secure in the knowledge that the love of a fair and sweet woman was worth all the money his father could bestow. He looked back and waved his Scots cap to her. Then a bend in the road hid him from sight.

CHAPTER II.

THE LAST OF THE CLANS.

"THE young leddy had the key. You will find the gate in the wall open. Will you be knowing the way? You pass over the bridge. I would be coming myself, but it iss late, and I am getting old and stiff—yes, and blind too. I am saying to my wife that I am as old as the hills! I feel it. I hef been here, man and boy, for eighty-five years. And I will be buried yonder, on the McNialls' island, before long. There are no McNialls left of the clan. And the old chief is dead, and buried in a foreign land. They are saying that."

"Is he, indeed?"

Old Sandy McNiall, leaning on his stick, did not hear very well, and he was quite unconscious of the inflection in the voice of the bent white figure which stood before him. Also he had almost lost his sight, and he saw very few details of this strange old man's personality.

A white, ivory face; strange, sunken, restless eyes, glittering still with the embers of old fires; high, finely cut features; long, unkempt hair; the mark of pathetic old age and illness in the trembling hands, the sunken cheek, the heaving chest. And then this strange old man raised his voice, speaking closely in the other's ear:

"Is all the old family gone? Every one?"

"All but the lass—the little lass—and she hass neither gold nor land. The old leddy had not a penny but her annuity. Miss Effie McNiall iss a penniless lass. They are saying that young Colin Sinclair would fain marry her, and that the laird iss sending him away and cutting him off with a shilling for that ferry thing! She wass here only yesterday, and 'Alastair,' she wass saying, 'you and I are the last of the clan that will be buried in the island, I think,' she said; 'but we will sleep there very sound, Alastair, with the sound of the Lochert in our ears and the leaves from the dear old trees falling above us.' That wass what she would be saying."

"And so he refused to let him marry her! Refused the last of the McNialls! Well, we are in the hollow of his hand, the hollow of his hand. The chief—did that. The reprobate!"

He walked away very slowly, leaning on his stick. His were slow steps. The strangely bright eyes looked around him like those of a hunted animal. He felt hunted—haunted as if with shadowy beckoning figures. He had roved here, a happy boy. He looked up at the wild jagged outline of the mountains, and knew their every curve and scaur. When he came to the island, he stood on the bridge as if petrified.

The river foamed under his feet, circling over a wide bed of boulders and breaking into little falls before it separated on each side of the island. There was the very pool he fished in as a lad, when he caught his first silver trout. He could lean over on the very stone. Voices called to him—dead voices. His mother came up and took his hand; he could feel again the clasp of her soft fingers. Time rolled back, and gave him a long-gone yesterday.

"Come into the island, Sholto! Do you see the three gates? The centre for the chief, the right hand for his eldest son, the left for the clan! So we pass here, my boy, you and I!"

He heard the words, but walked in, an old, old man, with weak trembling steps, and passed through the proud centre gateway. He looked up and saw the island, the green mossy grass, the ruined chapel; his weary feet led him straight up to Lieutenant Malcolm's monument on the wall. It had been spring when she led him there: he remembered your hope, my boy. Your aim. So to live that honour ever walks with you, and courage and purity!"

"And will they write that for me, too?"

What did she say? The vision ended—broke miserably—grew again. He was here with his wife. He mocked at the story, at the old place, at the inscription. He saw her tightly shut lips, her sad eyes. "You think they'd write the word with a 'dis' before it for me; don't you, Syb? The reprobate! The

"For the moment he thought he was going mad."

the line of pale blue hyacinths, the nodding azure bells—the soft crumpled beech-leaves, the ferns, newly uncurled. Autumn now; wet sodden leaves—a cold, keen air—the hoarse, insistent roar of the river swirling, dashing on either side.

He was standing under the wall, reading the inscription.

"Sacred to the memory—A man—An honour to his name!"

He had forgotten that! And she had said—her voice was in his ear again; he inclined his head to hear.

"What does it mean, mother? 'An honour to his name'?"

"That his life and his death did his name honour—shed a light upon it. That should be black sheep! Ah well! I've no desire to crumble to dust in the old Coffin Island, so it doesn't matter."

And now years—æons of time, it seemed—after, the aching longing to lie here had brought him over oceans, over weary miles, to this very spot.

The Coffin Island! He must lay his bones there. See it before he died. Lieutenant Malcolm's stone, and his mother's and her grave! She must have cursed him before she died. Still—oh, the heart-hunger to see where she lay!

A step beside him—a soft, rather reluctant step. He turned round, and, almost staggering, stood staring up at her. For the moment he thought he was going mad, and that it was his wife! The same winsome face, the same wonderfully bright and gentle expression. Surely the same sunny hair!

"I think I startled you," Effie said gently. "Are you a stranger here?"

"Yes. But I came to see the place. A man I knew abroad told me of it."

Effie's eyes wandered over the piteous rags and patches, the dreadful boots, the trembling hands grasping the stick. "Then you know the history? This is the McNialls' island. I am the last of the race if my grandfather is dead. And they say he is."

"I suppose you hope he is?"

Effie, lapsing into a little reverie, answered as if unconsciously, "Oh no! I have a message for him."

"A message?"

"Yes, from my grandmother."

"What is it? I knew them both."

He was very old. He spoke with a curiously eager ring, a curiously imperative ring. Effie, still as if half absent-minded, answered slowly: "She said to tell my grandfather that there was no such word as despair! She said to tell him that God loved him, and that she loved him! That was all."

It seemed to strike her then that it was curious she should answer him so obediently. She looked up at the broken and dim lettering, and sighed.

"Lieutenant Malcolm was his father! 'An honour to his name.' I sometimes feel——"

"What?"

"Such loving hearts prayed for him, my grandfather must have come to the haven before he died!"

No answer. She looked more closely then, and felt in her pocket. He had not begged, but he seemed so desperately poor and ill. Coming close, she slipped a shilling into his hand. "Will you please take this? It is so late. Have you any place to sleep?" He was looking at the coin strangely. He looked up at her then, an odd smile on his lips. "Thank you. Yes."

"You know someone here?"

"Yes. She sent me a message."

"Will you come back with me now? Back to the village?"

"No. I'll wait a bit, if you don't mind. And I'll hand Alastair McNiall in that key. Good-night, and thank you. Will you shake hands?"

They shook hands. His felt very cold. Effie fancied, though she was not sure, that he murmured something. And then she went away, looking back pitifully at the gate.

"Poor old man! I wonder who it is he knows here?"

* * * * *

The moon came out by-and-by, and the sky cleared. The silver light caught the roaring river, and the jutting boulders, and the pines on the island, and the three gates—for the chief, the heir, and the clan. The letters on the old cracked stone were quite distinct; so were the grassy mounds of the clan's graves.

Inside the chapel Lady McNiall's grave had a fresh wreath of heather and fern. It was close under the wall, in a sheltered nook. Her name, freshly cut, and the date of her death; that was all. The old man, apparently worn out, sank down beside it. By-and-by he pillowed his head on his arms. A smile, curiously contented, was on his waxy face; it was growing somehow oddly rested, oddly quiet. "The smoothing of the hand," which, Gaelic-speaking people will tell you, softly touches every dying face, might have touched him. The night fell. The river rushed on, and ever on; the three patient firs kept watch above him.

He never moved.

The last of the McNialls had come home at last, to the last of his inheritance. He fell asleep above her dead heart.

* * * * *

"Oh, Colin, did you hear? An old man was found dead this morning on the island. A poor weary old man. The doctor says death was due to exposure and heart failure, but that he had no strength left in his body. And I had seen him, and spoken to him!"

Colin, oddly grave, took her hand slowly in his. Should he tell her? Would it grieve her, vex her?

"My darling, I heard. My father was passing this morning, and saw the dead body. He recognised him. He knew the face, and there was a signet ring on his hand. Effie, it was your grandfather!"

She spoke never a word. She clung to him instinctively. Old, poor, desolate, ragged. That weary old man. The proud kilted figure of the picture. The chief of the clan!

"My father seems so softened, so strangely moved," Colin went on; "he is giving orders to have him buried beside Lady McNiall. He has told me, Effie, that he once loved your grandmother, and could never forgive Sir Sholto for winning her. And Effie, he has yielded! He says he only wanted to try my love and yours. He is coming down himself to take you home to-day!"

She listened, as if struck dumb, still. The clouds had lifted; there was to be no waiting, no probation. Looking up, she could see the laird descending stiffly from his carriage and advancing towards her. There was sorrow in his face—remorse, affection, pleading. And Colin, with eager and loving touch, led her on. But all she could think of, very tearfully, very gratefully, was, "I gave him her message!"

XUM

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATIONS AND ANECDOTES.

FOR BIBLE READERS AND TEACHERS.

BASED UPON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MARCH 15TH, 1903.—The Riot at Ephesus.

Passage for reading—Acts xix. 29—40.

POINTS. 1. The Apostle desires to preach Christ.
2. A riotous assembly of idolaters opposes him.
3. The town clerk defends the worship of Diana.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Love of Preaching Christ. The late Rev. Rowland Hill once wrote in a letter, "Old as I am, I am just returned from a missionary ramble; but I feel that I am getting old. Oh that I may work well to the last!" In all his journeys, even when he had reached a period beyond that usually allotted to man, he was disconcerted if he did not find a pulpit ready for him every evening. In one of his letters, fixing his days for preaching on his road to some place, he says: "Ever since my Master has put me into office I have ever esteemed it my duty to remember His admonition, 'As ye go, preach.'" His general answer to invitations to houses on his route was, "I shall be happy to come to you if you can find me a place in which to preach Christ."

Folly of Opposition to Christ. You have heard of the sword-fish. It is a very curious creature, with a long and bony peak or sword projecting in front of its head. It is also very fierce, attacking other fishes that come in its way, and trying to pierce them with its sword. The fish has sometimes been known to dart at a ship in full sail with such violence as to pierce the solid timbers. But what has been the result? The silly fish has been killed outright by the force of its own blow. The ship sails on just as before, but the angry sword-fish falls a victim to its own rage. Even so it is with the folly of those who oppose the cause of Christ. They cannot succeed; and, like the sword-fish, they only work out, sooner or later, their own destruction.

Image of Diana. The temple of Diana at Ephesus was magnificent, but the image of the goddess enshrined within was primitive and rude. It seems to represent Diana as the deity of fountains. The material was wood, a bar of metal was in each hand. The dress was covered with mystic devices, and the small shrine where it stood within the temple was concealed by a curtain in front. Yet, rude as the image was, it was the object of the utmost veneration, and believed to have fallen from the sky, and it was the model on which the images of Diana were formed for worship in other cities. ("Life and Epistles of St. Paul," by Conybeare and Howson.)

MARCH 22ND.—St. Paul's Message to the Ephesians.

Passage for reading—Ephesians ii. 1—10.

POINTS. 1. The world lying in sin.
2. The pardoning love of God.
3. The riches of grace in Christ Jesus.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Ruin of Sin. It is said of some of the heathens in China that to please their gods they put themselves to death by going out on a deep river in a little boat, and with a vessel in their hand filling it with water. By degrees the boat becomes fuller and fuller, sinks to its edge, trembles for an instant, and then goes down with its poor deluded occupants. And this is just what is continually going on with every sinner and with the world at large. Every day, every month, every year, the souls of the ungodly and unbelievers are filling with sin, till at last will follow everlasting ruin upon those who fear not God.

The Forgiveness of Sins. A woman came to her minister one day carrying a bundle of wet sand. "Do you know what this is, sir?" she said. "Yes," was the reply, "it is wet sand." "But do you know what it means?" "I do not know exactly what you mean by it," he answered. "What is it?" "Ah, sir," she said, "that's me; and the multitude of my sins, like the grains of this sand, cannot be numbered. Oh! wretched creature that I am, how can I ever be saved?" "Where did you get the sand?" asked the minister. "At the Beacon." "Go back, then, to the Beacon. Take a spade with you; dig, till you raise a great mound. Pile it up as high as ever you can, and then leave it there. Take your stand by the sea-shore and watch the effect of the waves upon the heap of sand." "Oh, sir!" she exclaimed, "I see what you mean—the blood, the blood, the pardoning blood of Christ, it would wash all my sins away."

The Beginning of Grace. Trace back any river to its source, and you will find its beginning small. A little moisture oozing through the sand or dripping out of some unknown rock, or a gentle gush from some far-away mountain's foot, are the beginnings of many a great river, in whose waters tall ships may anchor and gallant fleets may ride. For the river ever widens and gets deeper till it mingles with the ocean. So is the beginning of a Christian's or a nation's grace. It is first a tiny stream; then it swells into a river, and then a sea. There is life and progress towards ultimate perfection when God finds the beginning of grace in any man.

MARCH 29TH.—The Principles of Missionary Work.

Passage for reading.—St. Matthew xxviii. 16—20.

POINTS. 1. To teach the truth as it is in Christ.
2. To make disciples of all nations.
3. To bring men's lives in conformity with that of Christ.

Preach the Gospel. A missionary in South India writes: "The question is sometimes put to us, 'Are you encouraged in your work?' I do not much like the form of the question, as it but faintly expresses what we feel in regard to our work. Our feeling is, 'Woe will be to us if we do not preach the Gospel to the heathen.' It is the fact of preaching and winning their hearts that makes us so confident that by-and-by they will come to Christ, and will be His. Encouragement! In the last great Indian famine, when we were surrounded by multitudes of poor starving people, many of them too weak to come forward and stretch out a hand to ask for relief, we did not say, 'Have we encouragement to feed these people with bread?' We were too enthusiastic for that. We said, 'We must have bread for these people. They are perishing, and we must give them to eat.' And we must say the very same thing with regard to preaching the Gospel."

Enthusiasm for Missions. A short time before the late Mr. Cox, an American missionary, sailed for Africa he visited the university at Middletown, United States. In conversation with one of the students he said, "If I die in Africa, you must come after me and write my epitaph." To which the other replied, "I will; but what shall I write?" "Let a thousand missionaries die before Africa be given up," was the reply. In this spirit he died, and in this spirit have hundreds of missionaries died in different parts of the world. "Preach the Gospel to every nation" is the Master's command, and it must be obeyed.

The Result of Preaching. A countryman once complained to the minister of his parish that he preached on the same subjects over and over again. He admitted that the lessons taught were of the most serious and important nature, but he said there was not enough variety. "My friend," said the clergyman, "for what purpose do you imagine the precepts are given you?" "That we may obey them, I suppose," said the man. "You are right," was the reply; "and have you, then, learned to practise all the duties which I have already put before you?" The man was obliged to admit that he had not as yet. "When you have," said the minister, "I will either put before you some new duties to attend to or else I will keep silence, for practice is the end of preaching, and when your life entirely conforms to the life of Christ you will need no more sermons."

APRIL 5TH.—St. Paul's Farewell to Ephesus.

Passage for reading—Acts xx. 28-38.

POINTS. THE DUTY OF PASTORS.
1. To feed the Church of God.
2. To remain steadfast in the faith.
3. To work for and support the needy.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Growth in Grace. Young Christians must be looked after like young trees, or they will never bear much fruit. The roots must be seen to and nourished, the tender shoots must be supported. The whole tree must be protected from cold blasts, and watered in dry weather. Then, when the right time comes, blossom may be looked for, and fruit will follow. So with the Church of Christ. Its roots must be firm, its faith strong. The young converts will need much watching, much support against temptation, much watering by prayer, much feeding with the milk of the Word; and then much fruit may be looked for and growth in grace. It will become a good tree of the Lord, and show forth His glory.

Dying in the Faith. As Luther lay dying a friend said to him, "Reverend father, do you die firm in the faith you have taught?" Luther opened his eyes, which were half closed, looked fixedly at his friend, and replied firmly and distinctly, "Yes, I do." He then fell asleep. Soon after, those nearest him saw him grow paler and paler; he became cold, and his breathing was more and more faint. At length he sent forth one deep sigh, and the great reformer was dead.

Care of the Poor. Thomas Willet, one of the old Puritan divines, was a man of remarkable benevolence. He spent the income of his two livings in comforting and entertaining the poor of the parish, often inviting them to feast in his own house. When asked why he did so, his reply was, "Lest Joseph and Mary should want room in the inn, or Jesus Himself should say at last, 'I was a stranger, and ye took Me not in.'"

APRIL 12TH.—The Resurrection of Christ.

Passage for reading—1 Cor. xv. 20-21, 50-58.

POINTS. CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.
1. An earnest of our resurrection.
2. A victory over our death.
3. A pledge of immortality.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Realising the Resurrection. An Abyssinian convert was once brought to England to be educated as a missionary The climate, however, proved fatal to him. He caught cold and became very ill. It was soon seen that he could not live long. He wished to return to Abyssinia to tell his friends what the Lord had done for his soul; yet he was willing to die. "I shall be gone in a short time," he said. When asked where he was going, he replied, "First to the grave; then I shall rise again with a clear understanding, not so dark as it is now. Jesus rose from the dead, and because He lives I shall live also. I shall see the Lord Himself, and know all truths clearly." And then he died.

A Natural Resurrection. All nature teaches the resurrection from death to life. The day dies into the night, and is buried in silence and darkness. The next morning it revives or lives again, opening the grave of darkness and rising from the dead of night. This is daily resurrection. See, too, how the summer dies into winter. The sap lies buried in the ground. The earth is covered with snow or crusted with frost, and becomes a general sepulchre. But when the spring comes all begins to rise. The plants peep out of their graves, revive, and grow. This is the annual resurrection. The corn by which we live is cast upon the earth and buried in the ground that it may corrupt, and being corrupted may live again and multiply. Our bodies are fed by this yearly process, and we continue this present life by a constant succession of resurrections. Thus all things by which we live are repaired by corrupting, are preserved by perishing, and revive by dying.

Resurrection to Eternal Life. Passing by a house the other day, I saw a notice at the gate, "This house to let." "How is this? Is the former tenant dead?" I asked the caretaker. "No, sir," was the reply, "he has moved to a larger house in a better situation." And as we look upon the clay tenement in which some loved Christian friend has dwelt we can say, "He is not dead, but moved into the enduring house in the Better Land, where is eternal life."

BRINGING A LINE ASHORE.

(From the Drawing by S. W. Hunter.)

GIPSIES IN THEIR WINTER QUARTERS.

By D. L. Woolmer.

IT is Sunday afternoon, and the van-dwellers of Battersea are at home to a limited number of privileged friends. November has just come in, and glows with satisfaction at giving its detractors a pleasant surprise. That much maligned month smiles on caravans—red, blue, yellow, and all the colours of the rainbow, not to speak of black decorated with moresque carving and scarlet curtains, and others of the smart wasp-like combination of dark brown and gold. They are grouped with picturesque irregularity, and transform back-yards and patches of waste ground, otherwise during six months of the year as blank and dreary as London's half-hidden and uncared-for open spaces can be, into interesting and artistic scenes.

How many of the ratepayers living around them know of their existence? One ubiquitous charge—whether true or untrue, a fault or a misfortune, an advantage or a disadvantage—is continually brought against Londoners: they may live for years without making the inquiry, "Who is my neighbour?" But it is not given to everyone interested in the Romany tribes to take the gipsies' winter quarters under their personal observation. There are at least eight colonies of van-dwellers in Battersea alone, and to visit one would give by no means a just or fair idea of all. Society on wheels, like every other sphere, has its patricians and plebeians, its upright and religious, its idle and undeserving. But good, bad, or indifferent, the Travellers know what is due to themselves. Strangers who, simply to satisfy idle curiosity, should take it upon themselves to walk into private yards and call without an introduction would probably soon find themselves apologising for the intrusion.

On their visiting list, however, the van-dwellers have admitted Mr. John Dyer, Superintendent of the Ragged School Union, who nine years ago opened a mission specially for them. Anyone visiting them under his escort is secure of a civil and friendly reception. This, at least, was my experience as I accompanied him into some culs-de-sac hidden behind bricks and mortar, and generally enclosed by gates and palings. The first was an L-shaped yard which contained on this occasion about fifteen vans. Just within the entrance two neat little girls were deep in conversation. One with golden curls, a spotless dress of almost the same colour, and a muslin pinafore that might have just come from the hands of the clear-starcher, looked up with a smile of welcome. Such children match the ideal van, brilliant with new paint, polished windows, and white curtains.

"Good afternoon," says the visitor as the mistress of the first van appears at the upper half of the door. "Did you come to the 'Welcome Home'?"

She had received the invitation to the annual entertainment given to the "Travellers" in the Shaftesbury Welcome, Doddington Grove, but, as she imagined that it was for children only, her own little ones had had the enjoyment, but she had missed it; and also missed the gift of a Bible which had been provided for each grown-up guest. This last disappointment would be remedied, and she would know better another time—that is, if she should live until next autumn and nothing unforeseen should happen to change the ordinary course of events. For as regularly as the encampment breaks up in spring, the vandwellers return before winter. The ideal gipsy life on the common may be all that the poets describe it while the summer lasts; but when every blade of grass stiffens into crystallised spikes, or when the hills sleep under a white coverlet, beautiful as the landscape may be, the town offers an escape from the most severe hardships that are an integral part of nomadic life.

"I've been roaming, I've been roaming
Where the meadow dew is sweet,
And I'm coming, and I'm coming
With its pearls upon my feet."

Whether they sing for joy at coming away from the meadows where the pearls are transformed into sharp cutting diamonds, away from the chill October's driving wind and drenching rain, away from the spongy woods to seek the shelter of a forest of bricks and mortar, is more than doubtful. A small child shook her head gravely and decidedly in reply to the question whether she was glad to return to town. Not even the "Welcome Home," when two hundred guests, old and young, availed themselves of the invitation to a meat tea followed by addresses and sacred music, could make up for the freedom of the open country. The wanderer's life has its joys as well as its hardships. Next-door, a long experience of both enabled the mistress to speak with authority on this point.

"I am coming up to shake hands with you, Mammy," said Mr. Dyer, climbing up the steps of the van. "Have you been telling any fortunes lately? You know that you offered to tell mine once."

A face that might have been any old lady's fortune looked over the lower half of the door. It twinkled with gleeful humour as she owned that in past days she had had some fun in this respect. But lately she had not been strong enough even to carry out her basket of combs to sell. Her intelligent countenance changed from gay to grave as she listened and assented to the remark that her own and everyone else's fortune was written in Heaven, and to each one preparation for life in the next world was a solemn concern of the present time.

"'AND SOMETIMES I FEEL VERY TIRED OF IT.'"

"I sometimes lie awake thinking of the world's fortune," she said. "With so much that is terrible happening, it seems to me that a great change must be coming near. Don't you think so?"

She was up in present-day history, and took the news of earthquakes and eruptions of volcanoes to heart. Mammy's dress was a survival, and enhanced the impression, of gipsy traditions. Short silvery curls hung on her neck below the dark green handkerchief tied round her head. Ear-rings with bright red stones, and a necklace of amber beads, completed the effect. She had lived all her life in a van—"And sometimes I feel very tired of it," she added, her dear old face assuming once more its habitual expression of chastened endurance. "I should like to settle down in a little cottage in my native place."

Would any country cottage look so cosy as her own neat little home? Yet the interior that glowed in the ruddy firelight was not sufficiently spick and span to please her; she had not felt equal to setting it thoroughly to rights, and just now she was alone. "I have a very good son," she said, "but he works amongst horses, and is sometimes away for a fortnight at a time. We used to be horse-dealers, but we have come down in the world."

So she and her family probably belonged to a superior class of gipsies called Griengroes, or horse-dealers, whose business to buy ponies in Wales and sell them again in the Eastern Counties or East Midlands used to be well known. Some yards of very slushy walking divided her van from the next group, and the social distinction between them was equally marked. Here rags and squalor were the order of the day. In one corner, some girls with a basin on the ground were making their toilet. A child, under the process of having her shock head reduced to the order of civilisation, profited by the diversion that the entrance of visitors created to escape from the comb and assist in the duties of hostess; but she was captured and again subjugated to the torture. All were equally friendly, and when Mr. Dyer proposed to open a Sunday school in this yard, the mothers warmly encouraged the idea, saying that it would be very good for the children; they found it difficult to send them so far as the school already opened for them.

"'MY MOTHER NEVER SLEPT IN A HOUSE IN HER LIFE.'"

To that school it was now time to repair. The modest centre of the Mission to Van-dwellers is the half of a railway arch. A partition down the middle divides it from a blacksmith's forge. Despite the fact that smoke from the bellows will creep through crevices and contend for the mastery with the whitewash, despite cracks in one wooden wall and peep-holes which young rascals have bored through the other, despite the lack of numerous conveniences generally regarded as essential to any educational establishment, the place attracts overflowing numbers. As long as there is room to spare, children of the neighbouring streets flock in; but a word or sign of objection on their part to sit beside their neighbours of the caravans is met with a reminder that other schools are open to them: this is the only one where the Travellers are secure of a welcome. Rough and restless as these sharp children may be, the inducement to take up lighter labour in a quiet airy building fails to tempt the teachers to forsake them. Some have worked on year after year, almost from the beginning of the mission, and do not leave the railway arch from the opening of the afternoon Sunday school until the close of a magic lantern service for van-dwellers of all ages which is held at 6 o'clock.

But between the two services there is time to visit another colony, larger and more picturesque than the last. Within the entrance of the yard stands a one-storeyed cottage, gay with its setting of beds and window-boxes of yellow chrysanthemums. "You ought to have seen it when the nasturtiums were out," the mistress said. One solitary little orange-coloured flower remains among the clustering leaves. It tells of the glories of summer days that are past, just as here and there in an encampment one rare specimen of a gipsy claiming pure breed is scattered amongst the other van-dwellers. What account do they give of themselves and of the causes that separate them from the rest of the world? They probably know less about their own origin and traditions than poets and scholars who find the derivation of the various names by which they are called a fascinating study, and trace them back by various routes to Rome, Egypt, or farthest Ind.

"Zingara," George Borrow explains, is derived from the Sanscrit, and the name first attracted the attention of historians, early in the fifteenth century, when claimed by immense numbers of immigrants who appeared in Germany. They were of dark complexion, some of nearly negro blackness, and spoke a language of their own. They had come from Lower Egypt, they said, and were doing seven years' penance for the sin of their forefathers, who had refused hospitality to the Babe of Bethlehem when Joseph and Mary escaped with Him from the sword of Herod. The exact inventor of this fable is veiled in mystery. The name of Zingara betrayed the professing penitents, and proved that they hailed from Hindustan. It signifies a man of mixed race. Their characteristics and occupations have stuck with singular fidelity to their descendants. In the fifteenth century, dexterity of fingers and a reputation for telling good or bad luck possessed the women, whilst fiddlery, farriery, and horse-clipping were the favourite professions of the men.

To come back to present-day history, this second colony could boast of most of the idiosyncrasies noticed in the gipsies five hundred years ago. Van-dwellers now, however, perhaps from intermarriage with Gorgios, as they term men of a different race from their own, deserve more than ever the name of Zingara, or mongrel. A very smart, superior man—to all intents and purposes, as far as could be judged from appearances, an Anglo-Saxon, invited me to enter his van, where he was already entertaining two guests, and offered me a seat, cushioned and covered with fresh blue-and-white chintz. A bed which just showed behind muslin curtains looked very inviting, and the glowing firelight might search the corners without discovering any untidiness. He remarked that one advantage that a van possessed over a house was that it could be more easily turned out and cleaned, and he pointed to an arrangement in the roof which admitted of its opening with a hinge so as to obtain plenty of air in hot weather. Here was the ideal home on wheels, apart from the fancy portrait of a gipsy. Not far off, however, was a representative of breeding altogether innocent of house-pride.

MR. DONOVAN, THE OWNER OF THE COTTAGE DESCRIBED AND CHIEF MAN OF THIS YARD.

A dark-complexioned lady, with a broad face and curly black hair growing low on her forehead, sat smoking a pipe on the steps of her van. With a group of acquaintances she was watching some lads playing at bowls. Their green was a patch of broken ground about a quarter the regulation size, and as smooth as a stubble field. The elders of the party entered into conversation. At first the subject was education, in which they were greatly interested. The lady complained of the difficulty of finding a suitable school for her boys; her repeated applications had met with the answer that there was no room for them. These young students had uncommon and trisyllabic names. She called one and introduced him to bear out her assertion that her children were as good and as clean as others. As though to demonstrate his hearty approval of a representative of learning, a pretty little urchin ran into the arms of the superintendent of the Railway Arch Sunday school, whom he recognised, clasped him round the legs, and buried his unkempt head as near to his breast as he could reach. The talk increased in animation when it was casually suggested that the child's mother was not a real gipsy.

"Indeed I am," she declared indignantly, rising to the bait, and she cited proofs positive of her pure blood, including her husband's and her own maiden name, which were the same. "My mother never slept in a house in her life," she added, "and it is not many who could say that."

"Your father slept in a house," remarked a good-looking man somewhat mischievously, as though pride of birth and pedigree must be kept within bounds. She retaliated with an allusion to his own family history, and the chaff and fencing that followed led to voluntary revelations of the need of mission work among the community. Unanimity was restored when the talk turned on the relative advantages of town and country life. Nothing that London could give compensated the gipsy for the open common, with its savoury delicacies of mushrooms and hedgehogs so easily attained. Now, the men were obliged to go as far as Wimbledon to bring back a bag of prickly balls; but, for all that, it was not unusual for them to be killed, roasted, and eaten in this yard.

"I have one roasting at my fire now," a woman said, looking out of a van where she had been a silent listener to the discussion. All agreed that outsiders had no appreciation of the value of hedgehog. Not only was its flesh far richer and more delicate than rabbit, but its fat was a very efficacious cure for deafness.

Gipsy lore and Board school learning, hereditary instincts and acquired conventionalities, primitive diet and the quickly procured tinned provisions—how long can these and many other diverse and contending elements exist together? A glance at the smartest and most aristocratic colony, the one consisting of the Travellers regularly employed by the owner of a fair, is enough to make one hope that the cheerful scene will steadily resist all dissolving agencies, and long break the dreary monotony of the surrounding sordid streets. One last look on a less prosperous community when evening has closed in, veiling squalor that is only too evident by daylight, leaves an impression that the Romany life is all that poets and painters have depicted it. The fantastic habitations with glowing windows, silhouetted against the deep blue sky, assume a deeper sable in contrast to ruby, emerald, and topaz lamps. What if these dots of brilliancy are only prosaic railway signals giving warning of "danger," the need of "caution" or the assurance that "all is right"? Familiarity with them need not breed contempt.

The various three conditions of the railway lines find their parallels in the humankind now lost in the darkness and in the fine effects of Nature's own painting. Here are stern realities of the suffering of a wanderer's life and grand opportunities of doing good. Dirt, ignorance, degradation that might be remedied are too common; vans out of repair with only a tarpaulin to keep the shivering inmates dry are a melancholy spectacle by daylight; perhaps the offer of a prize for the neatest and cleanest home in the colony is just the incentive required to bring many of them up to the standard reached by the minority. Here is native dexterity that weaves baskets or turns out clothes-pegs, and well deserves encouragement; there, a sick Traveller, sleepless for want of warm covering, and longing for a hospital letter. Everywhere there is a call for help to live a holy, righteous, and sober life, for these strangers are apt to be overlooked by the organisations of churches already overburdened with poverty and numbers. Religious work is not lost on van-dwellers. A Traveller's career may be perfectly consistent with that of a disciple of the Master Whose life was spent in going about doing good. One in the winter quarters may prove his practical Christianity by industry in the gasworks, which employs a certain proportion as stokers, another by honest trade with a hawker's basket or a costermonger's barrow. This last calling is the favourite amongst the restless, roving tribe.

"I turned over £2 on one Saturday night," said one industrious rabbit dealer. This was just in the favourable season, and he emptied his truck. What then? It was time to enjoy himself, so he stood upon it and preached to a congregation who would probably have never listened to an exhortation to repentance and righteousness from any other pulpit. The gifts of homely wit and eloquence, possessed in a very large degree by the van-dwellers, will find a vent, and it is well when they are dedicated to God's service. I came upon one of these irrepressible orators standing at a corner, and heard his closing words. His only serious auditors were two constables, who seemed resolved to keep an eye upon him. "Very plausible," the younger interrupted, with all the scorn he could muster, whilst looking round to see the effect of an ultra-polite remark of the coster.

THE SMARTEST AND MOST ARISTOCRATIC COLONY.

"We cannot speak too highly of the vigilance of our police," proceeded the orator, in a tone of lofty patronage. "There they stand, to protect our property," with a graceful flourish which took in at once the dignified representatives of law and order and all his valuable stock, which consisted of about half a dozen rabbit skins on a barrow, "and under their care all is safe." As he glanced around, the twinkle in his eye was irresistible to any other that it could catch, except perhaps to the companions of the bull's-eye.

Such a man as this keeps his wits sharpened by living upon them. How many and various are the methods by which van-dwellers keep body and soul together, it is impossible to say. A very slight experience of them is enough to prove the truth of the hackneyed statement that "One half of the world does not know how the other half lives." Certain it is that the surprises hidden under the surface of life in the great city are far from being exhausted.

THE CHILDREN OF CLOUDLAND.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

OF course it was her fault, from the beginning, although Mrs. Marchmont would sooner have cut off her little finger than have said so to her.

She had come down to stay with the rector and his wife in order to learn English at the lonely little house on the hill which went by the name of Carthell Rectory. Moreover, she was young—very, only about eighteen—and Mrs. Marchmont had thought that a point in her favour at the beginning, because she could help to amuse the children.

Cécile Felersen was very ignorant of the ways of children, having been brought up entirely by a maiden aunt. Consequently, when the small Marchmont son and heir and his sister took her for a playfellow, she found their games and amusements a little hard to understand.

When she had made sufficient progress in the language, she hit upon the happy expedient of telling them stories, and from that day onwards she had no peace. One afternoon, towards the end of March, Cécile and the children made a pilgrimage to some marshy meadows, where the golden daffodils danced in the breeze:

> "Continuous as the stars that shine
> And twinkle on the milky way,
> They stretched in never-ending line."

They had picked enough for the church decorations, they had filled a basket for the old invalid village postmistress, and were going home, when the children called their companion's attention to the artistic shapes of the pink sunset clouds which rose from behind a belt of dark fir-trees on the horizon, outlined against a pale sea-green sky.

"Ah, that!" said Cécile thoughtlessly, "that is the golden Cloudland!"

"Why?" asked little May, with all a child's curiosity.

Cécile laughed. "It is because in my country we believe that the pretty fleecy clouds at sunset are inhabited by good children, who are busy lighting up for the night their little pink candles!" she said.

Little Jack gazed at the clouds as if expecting to see the child inhabitants forthwith, and was bitterly disappointed when they suddenly melted away, and a cold grey pallor overspread the sky instead.

"They are gone," he cried, seizing Cécile's arm.

The girl stooped and kissed the regretful little face.

"They have only blown out their candles and gone to bed, like the good little children they are!" she reminded him. "Come along, or we shall be late blowing out our candles too!"

But later on that evening, when they had both been tucked into their little cots for the night, the children, instead of sleeping, plotted busily for a visit to Cloudland. One afternoon they would slip away from the Rectory, and go to the dark wood, behind which lay the golden Cloudland, just to see the children who lived there. They had no intention of staying; they were merely going to pay a call—as "Mummie" often did, dressed up in her Sunday best. And their last waking thought was how they should circumvent old Nursie in order to get possession of their Sunday clothes!

It so happened that fortune, which proverbially favours the brave, lent a helping hand to the children's scheme. Mr. and Mrs. Marchmont were called away suddenly to go and see an aunt who was dying, and Cécile had an English lesson to prepare for the following day. The children asked the old Nurse if they might go and play outside, meaning, of course, the distant wood, the way to which they knew perfectly well, having driven there with their mother sometimes for picnics in the summer. The Nurse, who was busy mending some stockings, granted her permission without the least hesitation, thinking they were only going in the garden, and knowing that Mrs. Marchmont always trusted them alone there.

But how to get the Sunday clothes? Jack said it was no good asking Nurse, because she would not understand that they did not want to play in them; so they must try and get them out of the big drawer in the cupboard on the landing outside the nursery where they were always kept.

"Hand in hand they slipped out on to the high road."—p. 538.

This they did without being found out, and carried them off in triumph to an old summer arbour at the bottom of the garden, where they quickly changed their overalls and made themselves smart enough to pay calls.

Then, hand in hand, they slipped out on to the high road, and ran as fast as their legs could carry them towards the dark wood, which seemed particularly far off, just because they wanted to get there quickly. But it was some miles, and little May's fat legs carried her with difficulty over the ploughed fields they had to cross sometimes in order to take what Jack called, with the wisdom of his eight years, short cuts; but which seemed very long ones to six-year-old May.

The pink clouds, however, rose gently behind the great belt of trees, and the sight of their goal gave the children fresh courage. There were ever so many good children lighting their pink candles to-night, they decided, because the Cloudland stretched right across and beyond the wood.

The wood, however, when reached, inspired them with awe. It was very dark, and the paths a little disconcerting; moreover, they completely lost sight of the pink candles which had seemed so near only a very short while before entering the wood. Many birds were building in the tree-tops, and their noises sounded uncannily in the children's ears as they trudged bravely on through the darkness. It was really getting very dark now, and May had lost a shoe, which had to be hunted for unsuccessfully. Then they began to feel very hungry, and the good children lived such a long way off that they thought they would put the visit off until another day, and—perhaps—take Cécile with them, in order not to lose their way.

Having come to this decision, Jack, holding May's little hand, turned back, meaning to go home. But the way was puzzling—the darkness grew deeper, and he could not remember which of the many paths he had taken. He was a brave little boy, but he had to confess himself beaten.

"It's no use," he said to his little sister, standing still in the middle of the short grassy path: "I don't know the way, and it's so dark; I think we'd just better wait here until it gets lighter——"

"All the night?" echoed May, shuddering, her baby face puckering itself into a picture of misery. "Shan't we get home to-night, Jackie?"

"We can sit down here and wait," he replied, putting his arm round her and kissing her face, "and perhaps—who knows?—the Cloudland children will lend us some of their candles!"

Cheered by this little forlorn hope, the children sat down on the mossy trunk of a fallen tree, as close together as they could to keep warm. But never a candle did the children of Cloudland bring them, and at last, tired out, they fell asleep and forgot their sorrows in dreams.

When they woke they were conscious of a light in their eyes, and a voice, which they recognised as their father's, saying:

"Thank God, the children!"

Then they were lifted in strong arms, and carried so far that it seemed as though they fell asleep again until "Mummie's" lips were kissing them as if she had never expected to see them again.

"Thank God, Arnulf!" she whispered to her husband, as the two little ones were tucked into their own little cots. And her husband echoed the thanksgiving from the bottom of his heart.

The next day they heard how the children had started off to pay a call on the inhabitants of Cloudland, and Cécile, with tears in her eyes, told Mrs. Marchmont the story she had previously told the children, little dreaming that they would seek to prove the truth of it so soon! And Jackie promised never to pay calls again without first asking father's advice—not even on the children of Cloudland.

E. C. GIDLEY.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE LEAGUE'S CHAIRMAN.

THE National Temperance League during the half-century of its most useful work has been exceptionally fortunate in its Chairmen. The more recent occupants of this office have been Mr. William Isaac Palmer, J.P., of Reading, Mr. T. Marchant Williams, J.P. (the present stipendiary of Swansea), and the Hon. Conrad Dillon, upon whose death Mr. John Young Henderson stepped into the breach. His interest in Temperance work has grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength. Born in 1851, he went out to Japan in 1873, and was instrumental in starting Temperance work in Yokohama. With one or two kindred spirits, Mr. Henderson allied himself with the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, and, as a result of their efforts, the first Temperance Hall in Japan was erected at Yokohama. Upon his return home he established himself in business in the City of London, and has for many years past been prominently identified with the Temperance work of the metropolis. He is a member of the Corporation of the Borough of Wandsworth and Vice-Chairman of the Committee of the Christian Union for Social Service. He is also a member of the Committee of the Army Temperance Association and Chairman of the Surrey Band of Hope Union. In the Temperance work of the Presbyterian Church of England, of which he is a leading elder, he takes the deepest interest, and Mr. Henderson upon several occasions has done much to enlist the hearty co-operation of his co-religionists. He has frequently travelled on the Continent, and in the United States and Canada, and was one of the important deputation sent out by the London Chamber of Commerce in December last on a fraternal visit to the Chamber of New York. As a speaker he is clear, methodical, convincing, and, as becomes a Scotsman, logical. It is an open secret that on more than one occasion Mr. Henderson has been invited to come forward as a candidate for Parliament, and there can be no doubt that his all-round knowledge of affairs would make him an admirable representative for any constituency, while his presence in St. Stephen's would be cordially welcomed by the earnest band of Temperance men who look after the legislative interests of the movement.

(Photo: S. E. Pollard, Streatham, S.W.)

MR. J. Y. HENDERSON.

THE SAME OLD THEME.

"Still harping on my daughter," someone will say, but really believing as I do "that the intelligent use of the Press lies at the basis of all real progress in Temperance work," I cannot help making a quotation from a paper which recently appeared in a popular magazine, on "The Business Side of Literature." The writer says: "Our national drink-bill is now something like £160,000,000 per annum; our national book-bill, including the purchase of school books and text-books, has been reckoned at between £2,000,000, and £3,000,000, which, for a population of forty millions, works out at something less than two shillings a head, as against nearly four pounds a head for liquor." What a text for speakers! How every printer, publisher, bookseller and newsvendor ought to be on the side of the Temperance movement. And yet many of our leading Temperance workers have no knowledge of Temperance literature past or present, and by their apathy are doing their best to ensure that there shall be no Temperance books in the future!

A NEW EFFORT FOR THE U.K.A.

To Mr. William Williams, of Southampton, has been entrusted the herculean task of raising a special fund of one hundred thousand guineas for the United Kingdom Alliance. It says much for his enthusiasm and for his belief in the righteousness of his cause that he has entered upon his great task in the most optimistic frame of mind. If "well begun is half done," Mr. Williams is certainly entitled to shake hands with himself, and although the workers in Southampton, in which town he has been stationed for so many years, regret to part with him, they naturally feel a satisfaction that one who has been so much to them has been thought worthy of being chosen to pioneer an effort which is likely to be of such service to the development of aggressive work throughout the United Kingdom. Mr. Williams's work in Southampton as representative of the United Kingdom Alliance, Chairman of the Band of Hope Union, and a leading Good Templar has brought him into personal communication with every phase of Temperance effort.

(Photo: C. Gould and Co., Southampton.)

MR. W. WILLIAMS, FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

THE FIRST BANK HOLIDAY OF THE YEAR.

What arrangements, if any, are Temperance workers making for Easter Monday? Twenty years ago every properly conducted local Temperance society went in for a Bank Holiday entertainment as a distinct counteractive to the public-house. A thorough revival in this direction is much needed, and it is to be hoped that some of our readers will take the hint and act upon it.

A CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

After the soldiers we must certainly take the sailors; indeed, in strict order the older service should have had first place. We have in these pages more than once commended the noble work of Miss Agnes Weston in the Royal Navy. It is a matter for congratulation that there is now not a single ship in commission in the King's service which does not contain some members of Miss Weston's noble society. In the great school at Greenwich there is the largest Band of Hope in the world, over one thousand lads in training who have voluntarily allied themselves with the Band of Hope. This work has also been fully dealt with in THE QUIVER, so we shall now give one or two testimonies of another kind bearing upon Temperance as it relates to the men "who go down to the sea in ships, and whose business is on the great waters." In a report of the Pennsylvania Temperance Society, so far back as 1831, it is stated: "The brig Globe, Captain Moore, has lately returned from a voyage to the Pacific Ocean. She had on board a crew of ten persons, and was absent nearly eighteen months. She was, during the voyage, in nearly all the climates of the world; had not one sick person on board, and brought the crew back all orderly and obedient. All these advantages Captain Moore attributes, in a great measure, to the absence of spirituous liquors. There was not one drop used in all that time; indeed, there was none on board the vessel." Commodore Goodenough, whose tragic death in the South Seas in 1875 made such a deep impression, was greatly beloved by the men under his command. It was for their sakes that he became a total abstainer. Upon first taking an interest in the Temperance question he was not a teetotaller, but, reflecting upon the matter and examining it in its several bearings, he soon changed his opinions, and came to the conclusion that he could not consistently advise his men to do what he did not do himself. Henceforward he rigidly abstained from the use of all intoxicating liquors. Sympathy with those who were endeavouring to raise and rescue his men in the first place considerably influenced his decision; but he was not long in discovering that his example not only furnished him with an answer to those who affirmed that it was impossible to do without stimulants in hot or cold climates, or after much hard work, but that his own health improved under the cold water treatment, and, as he expressed it at a meeting in Sydney, a few weeks before his death, he was "as much up to hard work, as ready for any enjoyment, any exertion, or exposure (even to passing a night under a tree), as I have ever been in my life, and even more so." An instance of Commodore Goodenough's uncompromising manner of viewing things is thus recorded: "Discussing one day with a friend some of the difficulties of young officers with regard to expenses and extravagance, his companion, a younger man, spoke of being more careful. 'No,' said he, 'it's no use talking about being more careful, and trying to ease a thing off; my principle is, that if I found a thing interfering with my duty to my life, I would cut it off, root and branch, make an end of it at once; that is the only way.'"

SHORT ARROWS.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

(Photo: Russell and Sons, Southsea.)

THE NEW ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY AND MRS. DAVIDSON.

The New Primate.

WE are glad to be able to give our readers this month a recent portrait of the new Archbishop of Canterbury and Mrs. Davidson. The new Primate, Dr. Randall Thomas Davidson, comes of a Scottish family, and was born on April 7, 1848. He graduated from Trinity College, Oxford, and was three years in a curacy at Dartford before he was appointed private secretary and chaplain to Archbishop Tait, whose second daughter, Edith, he married in 1878. For a few months after the death of his father-in-law Dr. Davidson continued to serve his successor as chaplain, but in 1883 he was appointed Dean of Windsor and Domestic Chaplain to her late Majesty, and these offices he held until 1891, when he was appointed Bishop of Rochester. Four years later he was translated to the see of Winchester, and a couple of years ago he was appointed Clerk of the Closet to the King.

"Famous Hymns and their Authors."

A STORY is told of an old North country man who was taken by a friend to a great "revival" meeting. When the service was over and the two were on their way home, the stranger's opinion on what he had heard was asked. "Ah, man," he is said to have replied, "I don't think so much of your preaching, but your ballads are grand!" Some such reflection may well occur to the reader of Mr. Francis A. Jones's "Famous Hymns and their Authors," which has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Differ as we may about the effectiveness of our preachers, our hymns, as a whole, reach a very high standard of excellence.

The proverbial permanence of the written word doubtless helps each generation to keep only the tried and best of the hymns passed on to it by its predecessors. But it is still true that the place of the hymn in the life of British Protestantism can hardly be over-estimated. Mr. Jones has grouped the hymns of which he writes according to their subjects, and has not followed the usual method of writers on this topic in taking up each author's work in its chronological order. Each method has its advantages, but that chosen by Mr. Jones tends somewhat to break the thread of the personal narrative. Apart from this he has very cleverly gathered together the stories of many of our best known and best loved hymns, and he has taken special pains to procure authentic information from, or of, living or recently dead writers. His book is illustrated by many excellent facsimiles of autograph copies of the hymns, and by some interesting portraits. Much has been written on this subject before, but Mr. Jones has succeeded, in an unusual degree, in combining reliable information with a popular presentation of it.

A Row of Peas.

I HAVE been very much struck, says an observer, with the very human behaviour of a row of peas in the garden. It was sowed in March in cold, dry weather. Its youth was hard, slow of growth, and not untried by mice and birds. At last, in spite of all delays and difficulties, it became a very presentable row. It is forty feet long. It has reached about two feet in height. On one side of it galvanised wire frames have been fixed upright in the ground to serve as stakes, very neat, symmetrical, mathematical. On the other, as there were not enough of the wire supports, a row of rough branches of larch was put in. Though the wire supports are on the sunny side of the row, to which the plants would naturally grow, the whole row has bent to the north-west and laid hold of the larch branches. That is, they have accepted the rough but kindly help offered them by the wood, and shrunk away from the regular, admirable, but cold support of the metal. Is there not Nature's hint here of how it is that young people often seem to reject the influence of home and church? Where family life is over-regulated, not very bright, not very affectionate; where the church is conventional and lifeless, is it any wonder that lives eager for brightness, freedom, warmth, bend away from these and accept the offers of less safe and less admirable allies? Is it not well that fathers and mothers should remember that there is often a pleasant enough company in the public-house parlour? Don't let them think that there is no good talk or good fellowship there, or, at least, what their young son might take for such unless he has something better at home.

Pride's Grievances against God.

OF all the modern successors of those who, in the parable, falsely and frivolously excused themselves from the King's marriage feast, the most contemptible, perhaps, are those who seem to try to revenge a fancied slight, on the part of one of His creatures, upon their Creator. The idea sounds blasphemous, but the practice is common. So-and-so has been offended by somebody, or by something, connected with such-and-such a church, and leaves that church for evermore. The rector's wife, being short-sighted, did not bow to Mrs. Jones yesterday in High Street; the Jonesian pew (the sheltered one, out of the draught) must be relinquished next quarter day. How can Miss Smith's Monday sewing class expect to see her, when the curate (who went opposite the very first week he came) has omitted to call? A lady we know, of a lethargic tendency, had deserted a church because the vicar stared straight at her, in the most marked manner, when he ventured to express a disapproval of sitting down during an act of praise, such as the anthem. Only his intimate friends are aware that the vicar, owing to a shooting accident in his youth, has his left eye made of glass. In a country parish, a clergyman was speaking to an old man, who lay dying, and whom he had never seen at church, about his neglect of religion. "I will tell you, sir," said the dying man, "how it was. I used to perform in the band in the gallery at your church. Nineteen years ago, when they restored the church, they knocked down that gallery, and I said I would never go to church again until I was carried there." And the obstinate rustic instrumentalist never did. The pretexts, surely, of these blind victims of self-conceit will have even less colour than the poor excuses of the men of the parable in the Day of Judgment.

No Boots Thrown.

IN her book, "The Yangtze Valley," Mrs. Bishop states that a Chinese servant of hers said that he liked to serve missionaries because he never got boots thrown at his head "in the foreign teachers' houses." The often trifling but always continued troubles of life in the tropics have a tendency to arouse the tempers of people who are not under the sway of "gentle Jesus, meek and mild." The Chinese, with their Eastern repose of manner, think that the racket which Europeans living in the East make with their tempers is a note of barbarism. They soon realise that those who really belong to what they call the "Jesus religion" have a power of self-control of which ordinary heathens, not to say nominal Christians, have no experience.

The Torrey and Alexander Mission: The New Moody and Sankey.

DR. R. A. TORREY and Mr. Charles Alexander, who are following in Moody and Sankey's footsteps as world-wide evangelists, are now in Great Britain. They came to London from Australia by way of India in January, and after conducting a three weeks' mission at Mildmay Conference Hall were bound for Edinburgh and Glasgow, and an evangelistic campaign in Scotland. In the summer, Dr. Torrey, who is the Superintendent of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute at Chicago, will cross the Atlantic to resume his work there, but with his colleague is expected to be in Britain again in October for a vigorous and perhaps prolonged campaign. Dr. Torrey has a fine face, with a firm mouth, and sharp eyes, which can beam with a genial smile. He is forty-six years of age, the son of a New York banker, and was educated at Yale. He studied divinity, and became a Congregational minister. He then studied in Germany, and, returning to America, founded a Congregational church at Minneapolis, also superintending the

DR. R. A. TORREY.

City Missionary Society in that town and organising great evangelistic meetings in theatres and halls. While thus engaged he attracted the notice of the late Mr. D. L. Moody, who invited him to superintend the Chicago Bible Institute. This invitation he accepted, and combined with it the pastorate of Chicago Avenue Church. Being a prodigious worker, he also devoted some time to the organisation of evangelistic missions in great cities. From such work it was but a comparatively easy step to conduct missions in the large towns of other countries, and, receiving an invitation to visit Australia, he went, accompanied by Mr. Charles Alexander, the Sankey of the movement. According to reports, the two evangelists enjoyed most extraordinary popularity, thousands flocking to the meetings, and all the churches co-operating in the mission. Visiting New Zealand, and repeating their experiences in that colony, they then conducted missions in India, also, it is said, with remarkable success. Mr. Charles Alexander, who is, like Dr. Torrey, an American, is younger than his colleague; he is tall and somewhat thin, and possesses a fine baritone voice. He not only sings himself, but can make his audiences sing also. People cannot help singing, remarks the Southern Cross, when Mr. Alexander smiles, waves his arms, and shouts, "Sa-a-y, sing it, will you? Don't sing 'That will be Glory for Me' as if you were at a funeral! Shine up your faces, and let's see you sing it again." And so, having shone up faces in the southern hemisphere, he has now come on the same errand to the Old Country.

Some New Books.

"My Life Work" is the simple title under which Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., gives to the world his autobiography, published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. He has been a strenuous worker in good causes through good report and evil, and no fear of ridicule or scorn has seemed to prevent him raising his voice in protest against abuse or wrong. Many who have heard him speak, or who have shared his aims and hopes, will be glad to possess this simple but interesting record of Mr. Smith's life-story. Our recent article on "Bunyan's Christian in Art," has brought us a copy of a new edition of "The Pilgrim's Progress," issued from the Astolat Press, Guildford. Tastefully bound, beautifully printed, and sympathetically illustrated, this is an admirable edition of the immortal work for library use.—Archdeacon Wilberforce, the Speaker's chaplain, publishes a second series of sermons preached, for the most part, in Westminster Abbey, under the title of "Feeling After Him." The thoughtful little volume is issued by Mr. Elliot Stock.—The life of Chundra Lela is well told by Mrs. Ada Lee under the title of "An Indian Priestess," and is published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, with an introduction by Lord Kinnaird. It is an interesting record of a Hindu lady's search after truth and of the steps by which at length she found it. We have also received from Mr. C. H. Stockwell a volume of bright short stories by our contributor, Mrs. A. J. Home, to which, from the first of its contents, she gives the title "My Prize Translation."

"EVERYBODY SING!"

(A portrait of Mr. Charles Alexander, especially drawn from life for The Quiver.)

Be Courteous.

Two colliery villages, in the northern midlands, stand a short mile apart. A clergyman, who took temporary duty in one of them, remarked on the extraordinary contrast in the manners of the two sets of inhabitants. In the village not under his care he was treated, as he walked down the street, with absolute neglect, and even, now and again, with a mild sort of rudeness. In his own village the roughest collier, whether a stranger or not, always touched his hat as he passed. There was nothing sycophantic about the greetings, no "toadying to the parson"; the salutations savoured more of the friendly than the respectful. When the Vicar, on his return, was asked the meaning of this curious difference, he answered: "The reason for the civility which has surprised you, is simply this. Four years ago, the manners of my village of A. were exactly like these of yonder village of B. When I came, I made a point of invariably taking off my hat to the roughest collier. The change took time, but the result is what you see to-day. I am sorry to say that many of these men are but rarely seen at church or chapel; but I have at least aroused in them the latent instincts of gentlemen; and I hope that, during my next four years, courtesy may lead to yet higher virtues."

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from December 29th, 1902, up to and including January 29th, 1903. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For THE QUIVER Waifs' Fund: M. T. F., Stuttgart, £1; J. L., £1; Beattie, Clifton. 10s. 6d.; "A Friend," 7s.; Miss Emma Bastin, Exmouth. 5s. 1d.; L. R., Newcastle, 5s.; C. B. X., Kirby, 5s.; A Mother, 3s.; Miss Elizabeth Anne, 2s. 6d.; F. M., Hull, 2s.; E. J., 1s.; "A Constant Reader," Mortlake, 1s.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: "An Irish Girl," 10s. 6d.; E. T., Bramley, Leeds, 5s. The following amounts have been sent direct: W. E. £10; "Alpha," £1; M. E. B., 15s., and useful clothing; E. H., Plymouth, 5s.; Hatfield, 5s.; "A Friend," 3s., 2s. 6d.; A. W., Cambridge, 2s.; "Eunice," 1s.

For The Waifs' and Strays' Society: Collected by Mrs. J. S., Bromley, 7s.

For The Mission to Lepers in India: "Two Readers of THE QUIVER," Jersey, 5s.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES OF LESSONS.

QUESTIONS.

49. What was the chief object of worship at Ephesus?

50. What are we to understand by "the prince of the power of the air," of which St. Paul speaks in his epistle to the Ephesians?

51. What does St. Paul say is God's great gift to man?

52. In what way did the chief priests try to hide the fact of our Lord's resurrection?

53. What declaration of His divinity did Jesus make to His eleven apostles before His ascension.

54. What great work did Jesus give His apostles to do?

55. In what way did St. Paul foretell that imprisonment which ended in his death?

56. How long did St. Paul reside at Ephesus?

57. Quote passage which seems to show that while at Ephesus St. Paul maintained himself by working as a tentmaker.

58. What remarkable statement made by our Lord does St. Paul quote in his address at Miletus?

59. In what way does St. Paul urge Christians to be diligent in their work for God?

60. What statement does St. Paul make as to the suddenness of our Lord's second coming?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 448.

37. The difficulty concerning the eating of meat offered in sacrifice to idols (1 Cor. viii. 4).

38. It was the custom, after an animal was killed and the blood offered to an idol, to sell the flesh in the marketplace, and the question naturally arose, Was it right for Christians to purchase such meat? (1 Cor. viii. 7-9).

39. To avoid any and every occasion of giving offence to others by the laxity of our own conduct (1 Cor. viii. 10-13).

40. Love towards God and towards our fellow-man (1 Cor. xiii. 1-4; St. Matt. v. 23-25).

41. Unselfishness (1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5).

42. By the difference between the knowledge of a child and that of a man (1 Cor. xiii. 9-12).

43. Apollos, a Jew born at Alexandria in Egypt, where was a very influential Jewish settlement (Acts xviii. 24-26).

44. Twelve men, who seem to have been converted to Christianity by Apollos and baptised by him unto the baptism of John the Baptist (Acts xix. 2-7).

45. It was one of the seven churches of Asia to which the Revelation of St. John was sent, but it is now scarcely in existence, Ephesus itself being in ruins (Acts xix. 1; Rev. ii. 1-7).

46. After many evil spirits had been cast out by St. Paul, the seven sons of one Sceva, a Jewish priest, attempted to cast out an evil spirit, but the man in whom the evil spirit was attacked them so furiously that they fled out of the house naked and wounded (Acts xix. 13-17).

47. Yes. Josephus tells us the practice was common, and was handed down from Solomon; and both our Lord and St. Paul refer to it (St. Matt. xii. 27; Acts xix. 13, 19; Josephus, "Ant." viii. 5).

48. Demetrius, a wealthy silversmith, got up a great demonstration against St. Paul to prevent him preaching (Acts xix. 24-28).

UNIV. OF MICH.

XUM

THE FIRST EASTER MORN.

FROM A PAINTING FOR "THE QUIVER" BY W. H. MARGETSON.

XUM

XUM

EASTER TEXTS
1. Corinthians XV. 20
for E. W. F.
"Newness of Life"
Rom. vi 4
Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more: death hath no more dominion over him: .... Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace. Rom. vi 9, 14.
I Know that my Redeemer
"Ye shall live also"
11 am 1 Cor. XV. 21
7 pm St Mark XVI. 3

SOME EASTER TEXTS.

With Autograph Easter Texts from Canon W. Hay M. H. Aitken; Professor J. S. Banks, President of the Wesleyan Conference; the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., Brighton; the Dean of Canterbury; the Bishop of Carlisle; the Bishop of Derry and Raphoe; the Rev. A. H. Drysdale, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England; the Bishop of Durham; Prebendary H. E. Fox; Canon Hensley Henson; the Rev. Robert Howie, D.D., Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland; the Dean of Norwich; the Rev. J. Watson, D.D. ("Ian Maclaren"); Prebendary H. W. Webb-Peploe; the Dean of Westminster; the Dean of Windsor; the Rev. J. R. Wood, Chairman of the Baptist Union.

"Athens kept her Parthenon,
Egypt had her Sphinx of stone;—
Gaunt stood Golgotha, alone!

"Then, through Asian cities wide,
Full of Greek and Roman pride,
Went the Man they crucified!

"Nineteen hundred years have sped,
Heralds of the morning red,
Crying, 'Risen is the dead!'"

DEAS CROMARTY.

FROM the mists of those immemorial ages when the Sphinx first asked her unanswerable riddle across the grey reaches of the desert, and the records of those younger centuries, when the greatest of all the Greeks, before his martyr's draught of hemlock, "doubted men's doubts away" beneath the sunny skies of Attica, the one stupendous question, "Are we indeed immortal? Are we really to live again?" has been the question of supreme importance to the human race. Though the world, by its wisdom, never knew God, it would be ungenerous to assert that some glimmerings of the mightiest truth of revelation were not apprehended by the higher and more spiritual heathen minds of antiquity. Plato, of whom a Christian Father could say that he "touched the very gates of truth," did his best to establish philosophically the doctrine of a future life: but such teaching never widely influenced his countrymen. The Roman Cicero sadly confessed that bright and sanguine anticipations as to what might happen after death were only shadows after all, while Seneca declared that immortality, however desirable, had been rather promised than proved by great men. Nor, outside the circle of light cast by the Gospel of Christ, are the resources of human speculation one whit more convincing to-day. We should be hard put to it to cull "Some Easter Texts" out of current modern philosophies or popular scientific manuals. Science has taught us much during twenty centuries, but, with regard to this most crucial of all enigmas, she is still as veritable a sphinx as old Egypt ever knew.

It is for the consolation and instruction of those who believe that the only clue to the eternal secret was found in the unsealing of Joseph's rock-hewn sepulchre on the morning of the first Easter Day, that seventeen prominent preachers, representing various shades of Christian thought, have obligingly sent us the verses of Holy Scripture upon which they founded their discourses last Easter Sunday. We shall be glad to see how these accredited heralds of the Glad Tidings, who bear the only authentic message of immortality for their fellowmen, deal with that theme which the Rev. A. H. Drysdale (Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England) has plainly set forth in his text, "Jesus and the Resurrection." It is convenient to group those who have been good enough to help us, rather by subject than by personality; the reader will have no difficulty in picking out the particular verse or name which may be mentioned.

Directly we analyse the texts, there emerge results of special interest in the case of instructors so widely different. Out of eighteen texts there are only two which do not deal straightly and specifically with the Easter subject. The exceptions are easily explained. Dr. Chadwick, Bishop of Derry, who chooses the words "This is My body," no doubt desired to emphasise that Easter reception of the Lord's Supper upon the duty of which the English (and Irish) Prayer-book lays peculiar stress. "The Bishop of Derry is one of those men whom a bishopric improves," an admirer remarked to us the other day. Prebendary Fox may be assumed to have been pleading for that Church Missionary Society to which he is able gratuitously to devote his energies—"Even so send I you——" The first disciples were commissioned by their Risen Master to be witnesses of His resurrection.

The Bishop of Durham's topic also stands a little apart, as forming a subsidiary picture. All who are acquainted with Bishop Handley Moule's method of preaching will understand how, in his quiet, even voice, dwelling, in his homely and affectionate way, upon vital lessons, he would expound the narrative of the walk to Emmaus as it is set down in the precision of the Revised Version.

We next notice that five texts are selected from the famous fifteenth chapter of that first Corinthian letter so familiar from its use in the Burial Service, and that no less than eleven texts are taken from the writings of St. Paul. This preponderance again reminds us how the central purpose of the Apostle's teaching is contained in the words which the Rev. A. H. Drysdale quotes from the historian of the Acts.

Ethically, the seventeen texts which have been sent us (counting only one of Prebendary Webb-Peploe's) will fall into three divisions.

I. Six preachers fix as their root idea the plain fact of the Resurrection. They are wise, for, as Dr. Arnold of Rugby said, if historical evidence can prove any fact at all, it has proved this. Futile, as we saw, were the best efforts of Pagan philosophy to win popular acceptance of a simple truth for which twelve honest men were willing to live and to die. "The Lord is risen indeed," quotes the Bishop of Carlisle, that gentle and genial prelate in whom his clergy find a genuine father in God. The Rev. J. R. Wood uses the Revised Version: "But now hath Christ been raised from the dead." Baptists love and admire this dignified, cultured, and kindly President of their Union. They delight in his sermons, quiet in delivery, richly devotional in tone. They tell stories about him—grave sometimes, as when they relate how, in his youth, he brought one of his own brothers definitely to God by a sermon preached in his father's pulpit; or playful, as when they assert he is so methodical in his habits that the neighbourhood sets its clocks by the walk, always the same, which he takes daily after breakfast.

II. Seven preachers (the Dean of Westminster's text comprehends I. and II.) choose those portions of Scripture which lay stress upon the efficacy and actuality of the resurrection life within the believer's soul. They are thus pressing home to Christian hearts and consciences a phenomenon as unique as the miracle upon which it was founded. The virtues that blossomed in the lives of those early followers of the Saviour, who knew (to quote Dean Lefroy's text) "the power of His resurrection," were unknown through Pagan centuries. An absolutely new standard of character was evolved for all who accepted the gift of eternal life which the Lord had promised, and who were filled with His supernatural strength. This Easter summons to "newness of life" (we can imagine how it would be sounded forth from the lips of an impassioned missioner like Canon Hay Aitken) is given in many tones. "Ye shall live also," says Dean Eliot, of whom our one homiletical memory is his dexterously weaving into an unwritten sermon a local detail which we heard submitted to him just before he went into church. "Sin shall not have dominion over you" proclaims the official who guards the honoured ashes of the highest and holiest among the Anglo-Saxon race. "Seek the things that are above, where Christ is," is the Pauline admonition offered, from the Revised Version, by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton. If he be the destined successor of Dr. Parker, he will at least accomplish an aspiration which we heard that orator make some years ago from the City Temple pulpit, that the man who should come after him might preach no garbled Gospel. Readers familiar with Dr. John Watson's "Mind of the Master" may fancy that his somewhat difficult text would lead him into a dissertation on the ideals of conduct suggested by the Risen Life. Dr. Howie, who took for the Acts XVII 18 He preached Jesus & the Resurrection

A. H. Drysdale
I Cor 15-20 But now hath Christ been raised from the dead:
J R Wood
John 12.32 And I if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me.
Robert Norrie
"If ye then be risen with Christ seek the things that are above where Christ is." Colossians 3.1.
R J Campbell
I Cor XV. 14
J S Banks
II Corinthians V 16
John Walsh
"Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not vain in the Lord"
H. Hanley Stanton
St. John. XX. 21.
A. E. Fox
"Behold two of them were going that same day to a village called Emmaus which was threescore furlongs from Jerusalem" Luke 24 13
Hanley Dunelm.

subject of his inaugural address last year, as Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland, the necessity of a revival in the Church, and the blessings that would flow from it, shadows forth, in the majestic pronouncement from St. John's Gospel, the sole motive force of every real revival—"All men unto Me."

III. It remains for Professor Banks and Canon Hensley Henson to indicate by their texts the practical outcome in every-day work and conversation of a stable faith in the Resurrection. The President of the Wesleyan Conference states the negative side, the awful alternative, "If Christ be not risen——," and the selection strikes one as likely to be the keynote of a calmly reasoned, incisive, logical sermon, after the manner of the studious and reserved author of "A Manual of Christian Doctrine." During the long years of his labour as a missionary in Mysore, Professor Banks, who is one of our most trustworthy authorities on Hindu religion, had the opportunity of observing the uselessness of all forms of his pet aversion, Pantheism, as substitutes for Christianity. From that conclusion of the great Funeral Chapter, Canon Henson would have us learn what an incentive it is to human constancy and endeavour, if we are sure that we, and aught that is good in what we have done, are to endure eternally. The compilers of the Burial Service did well to dismiss mourners, about to commit the bodies of their loved ones to the dust, with certainties so divine and exhilarating lingering upon their ears. "Belle immortalité!" scornfully exclaimed the Napoleon whom men called great, when a connoisseur told him that a canvas of the "immortal" Raffaelle might still last for some four or five hundred years. The Canon's text sums up, for us poor frail and wayward mortals, the inestimable practical benefits of Christ's Resurrection: "Be ye stedfast, unmoveable . . . forasmuch as ye know——"

There is one passage of St. Paul, the choice of one preacher, which, though its proper place would be in the first of our three divisions, we have designedly kept till last. The simplest, the most obvious, perhaps the most musical and memorable of all Easter texts, is appropriated by Dean Farrar: "The first fruits of them that slept." Visitors to afternoon Evensong at Canterbury Cathedral, on week-days of last summer and autumn, would be grieved to notice under what physical disabilities the great Dean bravely read the lessons, and we know by how heroic an effort he uttered a few words of benediction over Archbishop Temple's grave. Friends of The Quiver, and of the House from which The Quiver emanates, will recall the treasures they have owed, for more than thirty years, to Dean Farrar's indefatigable pen. "The mere penmanship of Farrar's enormous books and innumerable articles," said a fellow-Canon of Westminster, now deceased, "would be a task for any ordinary man's lifetime!" We shall pray that God may yet restore to the Dean some measure of the vigour of old days; but we are conscious that, whatever his extremity of bodily weakness, his swan-song would always be a testimony to the reality of the Eternal Strength.

Being the History of the Adventures of Three Englishmen in Spain at the time of the Great Armada. Written by Rupert Hamstead, second son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, situated near Barnet in the County of Hertford, and now first set before the public by

JOSEPH HOCKING,

Author of "Lest We Forget," "The Purple Robe," "All Men Are Liars," "Mistress Nancy Molesworth," Etc. Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XV.

In the year 1587, the year before the coming of the Great Armada to English shores, Rupert Hamstead, son of Sir Richard Hamstead, of Hamstead Manor, near Barnet town, having returned wounded from the wars, and having spent some time at his father's house, hears, through John Trenoweth, of Cornwall, that an old friend of his mother's is in the power of the Inquisitors of Spain. Being also desirous of finding out the Spanish plots concerning England, he determines to go to Spain with Mawgan Killigrew, of Cornwall, and John Trenoweth, in order to rescue the unfortunate lady, and to discover Spanish secrets. He therefore starts for Cornwall with John Trenoweth, and on his journey falls into the hands of Jesuit spies. Rupert Hamstead and John Trenoweth are accused by their fellow-travellers as Jesuit spies, but afterwards discover that they themselves are agents of Father Parsons. They at length reach Cornwall, where they are met by Mawgan Killigrew. Here they also come into contact with two Spaniards, whose behaviour is so suspicious that they decide to start for Spain secretly and without delay. The Englishmen leave England, and on first seeing the Spanish hills enter into a solemn covenant concerning their mission. They afterwards fall in with some Spanish gipsies, the young queen of whom greatly impresses Killigrew. She afterwards rescues them from Spanish officials, and gives them directions how to reach Toledo. After some little difficulty they enter the city. Here they hear the Archbishop's sermon, in which it is announced that heretics are to be punished by death. Here also Rupert Hamstead sees Isabella de Valencia, and presently all three take part in a terrible scene at the Circo Romano. Here John Trenoweth recognises his sweetheart, and endeavours to rescue her from her enemies. His two companions go to his assistance, with the result that all three are made prisoners. In the dungeon they are visited by Señor Toledo, an old enemy and rival of Rupert Hamstead's father.

CHAPTER XVI.

HOW I FIRST SAW FATHER PARSONS.

A MINUTE later the priest returned, and by his side was a tall form, clothed in a long mantle, her face and head covered with black lace. Mawgan Killigrew and I looked towards them with eagerness, but John Trenoweth seemed to take but little heed. Evidently he was thinking of the woman he loved, and of the way she had been saved from the flames.

"The Señorita de Valencia hath come to add her entreaties to mine," he said.

We remained in silence, waiting for her to speak, but she spoke not, neither did she move, although I thought she watched us through the lace which covered her face.

"I saw the señorita's mother to-day," I said. "She appeared to have suffered much for her faith. I wonder if her daughter's face in aught resembles her mother's?"

Still she did not speak, neither did she remove her veil, at the which I wondered, for I knew she would not have come to us, had she not something of importance to say.

"The señorita hath never seen England," I went on, "never visited her mother's old home. It is very beautiful there. During the summer the whole country-side is covered with a wondrous green, and the birds sing gaily. The river Fal is as clear as crystal, not like the muddy Tagus. Surely God was bountiful of His gift when He created that part of the world where the señorita's forefathers lived! Sir John Tremayne is an old man, but so good, so kind! If his daughter were to return, his days might be lengthened into many years, and his sun would go down in a clear sky."

This I said because I wished to make her feel more at ease, and because I wanted to make her think kindly of the land and people that she has been taught to hate. Still she did not speak, but stood before us as immovable as a statue.

"It is no use trying to hide from the señorita that we have come to save her mother," I went on. "We would save her body from torture, and her soul from thraldom."

"What do you know about the soul," she said, "you who deny our Church, and set your heart against the truth?"

She spoke like one in anger. Her voice quivered with emotion, and I thought I saw her tremble.

"We believe in the truth that maketh free," I replied. "We have learnt that the Gospel of Christ is not to be spread with rack and fire; and we are beginning to learn that God would have no man coerced into faith."

"I did not come here to hear this," she replied, "but to help you to save your lives."

"We are not anxious to save our lives in the way which hath been suggested."

At this she threw back her veil, and revealed her face to us, and then I knew that we had seen each other before. This was she whom I had seen in the great cathedral, when the Archbishop was proclaiming the fact that the power of the Inquisition was to be again manifested in order to bring heretics to repentance. The light was dim, and I could not see her face plainly, but I thought she looked pale and anxious. There were dark rings round her eyes too, as though she had suffered from sleeplessness. Otherwise she was the same haughty, beautiful woman I had seen a few days before. I saw now why she was different from the other Spanish women, why she was more tall and stately, why her face was not large and fleshy like theirs, why her form was not given to stoutness. She had English blood in her veins, and while she suggested the land of her birth she also made one think of the home from which I had come.

"You do not seem to realise, señors, that you are in the power of the Spaniards," she said.

"Our bodies may be for the present," I replied, "but neither King Philip nor the Pope hath power over our souls," I replied.

"You say that because you are in darkness, señor, because the light of the Gospel hath been taken away from you."

"Nay, rather, it hath been brought to us," I made answer, "and because it hath given us liberty; but doubtless the Señorita de Valencia desires rather to speak of other things than of religion."

"Yes, I would save my mother," she replied.

We all waited in silence, Mawgan Killigrew watching her face like a man who would remember every feature.

"I may not profess to you what I do not feel," she said presently. "For you three I care not a straw."

At this Mawgan and I bowed profoundly, but John Trenoweth seemed to pay no heed to her words.

"For what are you?" she went on. "You are heretics who are worse than heathen. Had you never known the light of the Gospel, you might be worthy of pity, but, having had the light, you have chosen darkness. Therefore is your offence unpardonable."

"Then why trouble us?" I asked bluntly, for the words nettled me.

"Because I love my mother, and because I would save her," she replied.

We waited in silence for her to proceed.

"Oh, you English are a noble race!" she cried, like one in great anger—"so noble, so wise! You talk of chivalry, and of devotion to womanhood. You come to Spain on a mad-brained journey, thinking to take a Spanish lady from her people, and yet you will not do a little thing—a little thing!"

"Not when that little thing is an act of cowardice—aye, and worse!"

"And why, señors? If you were to do this, I might perchance save her from—— But what is the use? Your countrywoman is in torture, and yet you will not do this little thing! Money, money! What is it? Yet it might save her body, if it would not save her soul! But you care not, you care not!"

"If the señorita loved her mother," I replied, "she would herself have saved her from pain; she would have planned to take her to a land of liberty. She would remember that some of the best blood of England runs in her own veins, and have spared herself nothing to take her back to the home of her fathers!"

"Aye, and doomed her soul to a worse punishment. For myself I care not. As soon as my work is done I shall give my life to religion. I shall go to a convent and give my life to prayer, and holy thoughts; but when money can save my mother from torture, when it can give her time to repent—— Ah! but what would you? You are English."

"And doth your mother desire this, señorita?"

"My mother is still under the influence of the dark night of heresy," she replied.

"Your mother is the daughter of Sir John Tremayne," I replied. "She is the child of a man who hath never done a base deed, and because of this she would rather suffer and die than that the home of her fathers should become the property of those who have tortured her and dragged her to the stake. She is an Englishwoman, and not a Spaniard."

Her eyes fairly blazed as she looked at me.

"But for my mother I should rejoice that—that—— But why need I trouble? Every acre of English land will soon be in the hands of the faithful Spaniard. It is his right. He hath been faithful to the Church, and God will reward him!"

"If you believe that, why trouble about this letter?" I made answer. "Ah! but the señorita knows that the Spaniard can never take English lands. She hath the blood of the Tremaynes in her veins, and she knows that the Spanish swine will be driven into the sea, even as those others were driven in the days of our Lord."

"Then, even although it will save my mother from torture and death, you will not write this letter?" she cried angrily.

"Aye, we will do it on one condition," I replied.

"What is that?" she asked eagerly.

"That it be remembered that we ask naught for ourselves, and that, in return, your Archbishop will swear by the Mass that Señora de Valencia and her serving-woman, Esther Truscott, shall forthwith, and without further harm, be sent to their own country."

"And if not?"

"Then I shall have proof that this is but a means to get English money into the hands of the Church," I replied.

"The señors ask nothing for themselves!" she said mockingly.

"No," I replied. "They have never asked favour of a Spaniard yet, neither will they."

"The Lord hath saved us, and the Lord will save us again," interposed John Trenoweth.

"You care naught for the sufferings of an English lady, then? You will allow her to be tortured—aye, dragged to the stake—and will not even do this to save her?"

"If we did care naught, it would be no wonder, especially when her daughter, who might have saved her, plays into the hands of the Jesuits," I replied.

At this she laughed a bitter, mocking laugh, and, as I thought, made ready to leave us. And this, I saw, made Mawgan Killigrew angry, for he came towards her, his eyes ablaze.

"Aye, we do care!" he cried; "and because we do care we have come hither."

Then she laughed again. "But when you come you will do nothing," she cried. "You behave like ploughboys, and think that by loud words and foolish deeds you can save her."

"There you lie, señorita," he replied. "Aye, I use the word freely—you lie. And to prove it I will do this. Let your Spanish fiends cease persecuting poor weak women, and give their attention to men. If they have a spark of manhood in them, let them set the women at liberty, and we will take their places. Aye, let them put me into the señora's dungeon, but for the sake of God let the women go free. Do you hear, master priest? I offer myself in the lady's place, trusting to God and my own right arm for the future."

"The señor is safe in making such an offer," replied the señorita. "Had he been at liberty, he would not so freely make such an offer; but he is already in the Spaniards' power. And he need not fear! He will surely receive the punishments of God!"

"You are unworthy to talk about the punishments of God, Isabella de Valencia," I said angrily. "Had you a spark of womanhood in your nature, you would scorn every Spaniard, and hate their cursed ways! But you, what do you? Knowing that your mother and poor Esther Truscott have suffered torments for their faith, you yet aid and abet those who ply thumbscrew and rack. You kiss the hand that would light the faggots."

At this I thought she would have struck me, for, in truth, all her control seemed gone; but she mastered herself presently, and spoke quietly again.

"Very well, Señor Hamstead," she replied; "I have offered you liberty, and——"

"Aye, offered it," I laughed mockingly.

"I have heard that Englishmen know not how to respect a woman," she said scornfully; "now I know it."

"Those who will consent to a mother's tortures are no longer worthy the name of woman," I replied, for she had aroused me to a great passion. "She who for many a long day hath been content to lie on a soft bed, while her mother hath been suffering the torments of hell, is not a woman at all. Had she been a woman, she would have denounced those who made her suffer, and taken her place by her mother's side. But leave us, señorita, for we be weary of such talk. And bethink of this, too: we will even yet set your mother free, in spite of your unfaithfulness."

"Well spoken, Master Hamstead," said John Trenoweth. "By the mercy of God, we will set her free, for the Lord is our shield on our right hand. He also is our sure defence."

At this the señorita left us alone again, I being ill pleased with the words I had spoken, and yet rejoicing that she knew what was in my heart. And after that no one spoke to us for two days, save the gaoler who brought us our food three times a day. During this time we talked of many things, and, moreover, we debated warily as to a way of escape. In truth, we came to the conclusion that Mawgan Killigrew had not spoken falsely when he said it was possible for us to make our way out of our prison. It is true we knew not what would meet us when we got into the open air, but the getting there was not impossible. For this we found: the grating which let both light and air into our prison was not so securely placed but that we could remove it, impossible as this might seem to those who guarded us. But we did not deem it wise, for more than one reason. First, we were told by the gaoler that he had been informed that Señora de Valencia and Esther Truscott were to have fourteen days for instruction and repentance, before being again put to the torture, and that because of the King's letter they were to be well fed and housed during that time. Moreover, I did not see how we could help them by escaping. For I knew that the moment we got out of prison a hullabaloo would be created, so that our only safety would lie outside Toledo walls, even if we could get there. Therefore, as we had come to Toledo, not to fly from it, but to fulfil our purposes, we judged that we were better off where we were. And this was not all. We believed that we should be visited again, and perchance learn many useful things. Besides—and this may seem like foolishness—but John Trenoweth pleaded hard that we should stay there. It was the will of God, he said, and if we were patient He would as surely deliver us as He delivered Daniel from the lions' den.

"'They have never asked favour of a Spaniard yet, neither will they.'"

Although I believed we could have escaped, therefore, we stayed quietly in prison, asking what questions we dared of the gaoler, and talking over many plans which we hoped to carry out in the future.

At the end of two days we were visited by three men I had never seen before, neither did I know their estate or authority, for they were covered by long cloaks which concealed whatever gay attire they might have worn, neither did they speak many words, as will be seen. I judged, however, that they were of good substance, because the gaolers paid them marked reverence, and they carried themselves as men used to command.

"Which of you is Señor Ruperto Hamstead?" one asked in Spanish.

"My name is Rupert Hamstead," I replied. "What would you, señors?"

"Follow," said one curtly.

"Whom, and whither?" I asked.

"That you will know soon," he replied. "At present it is for you to obey."

"And my friends?"

"They remain."

"Go, and God be with you!" said Mawgan Killigrew, when I told him what had been said. "We trust you, and we will stand by what you shall say or do."

I therefore followed without further parley, and soon I discovered that this same Alcazar under which we had been immured was, indeed, full of prisons. We walked along gloomy passages, to the right and left of which were, as I judged, many dark cells, where, as I believed, many people were lying at that moment. For once or twice I heard moans and, as I thought, the clanking of chains. Whereupon I could not help wondering that we had been treated with so much kindness, seeing that we had had light, and air, and wholesome food, besides being allowed to remain together.

Presently we began climbing some steps, and ere long I found myself in a large room where was, as I thought, dazzling light, and much display in the way of costly furniture. But to this I paid but little heed, for I saw in the room more than one face that set my heart beating hard.

One was that of the Señorita Valencia, looking very proud and very beautiful, although I thought her face showed signs of suffering, at the which I somewhat repented the hard words I had spoken. I also saw some ecclesiastics, who, as I believed, had taken part in the ghastly procession wherein Sir John Tremayne's daughter, together with Esther Truscott, had walked. I judged, moreover, that they were of high degree; and this made me wonder all the more, for I reflected that I was but a younger son, and therefore would not, according to Spanish ideas, be worthy of such high consideration. But it was not even the face of Señorita de Valencia which held my eyes. It was rather that of a man, who sat at a place of honour, and who looked at me as though he would read my soul. For I saw at a glance that he was no ordinary man, and, although his apparel was plainer than that of the others, all seemed to pay homage to him.

And this was no wonder, for at first glance I saw that he was a man who commanded obedience. He was a born ruler, if ever man was, but he ruled by fear and not by love. His face was very pale—in truth, his skin was like parchment—and although he could have been but little over forty he showed signs of age. He wore on his head the biretta which we in England had learnt to associate with the Jesuit priests, while from high up around his neck to his feet his form was covered with a long black robe. The blackness of this robe was unrelieved in colour, save by a loose white collar which encircled his neck, and which formed itself into points by his chin, and a rich dark brown fur tippet which partly covered the white neck-cloth, and hung down over his chest. This attire, however, simple as it was, seemed to accentuate the power of the man, and to reveal his face with more clearness. His hair, which was iron-grey, was almost hidden by his biretta, nothing but a short, closely cut fringe being seen. This arrangement, however, revealed his broad, much-lined forehead. His eyes were very large and very dark. They were not round, I remember, but almond-shaped, and he used them in such a way that the skin of his forehead just above them was dragged into great furrows. His nose was long and large, and on his cheeks at each side of the nostrils were deep marks, which made me regard him rather as a man of sixty than of about forty-five. His mouth was plainly to be seen, for, although he wore a beard, it was trimmed very closely to his face—so closely that the parchment-like skin could be seen plainly.

On the whole, it was one of the most striking, yet one of the most forbidding, faces I had ever seen. Every feature seemed to say to me, "We belong to a man who is clever beyond words, who possesses a thousand secrets and formulates a thousand plans, but we also belong to a man cruel as death, and selfish as Judas himself."

He fixed his dark eyes upon me, and looked, I should think, for nearly a minute without speaking. Not an eyelid quivered, while his lips were immovable, save that I once thought I saw them relapse into a scornful smile.

"Rupert Hamstead?"

"Yes."

"From near Barnet, situate not far from London town?"

"Yes," I replied again, my eyes fastened on his, as though he held me by a charm.

"I, too, am an Englishman."

I was silent, for I knew not what to say.

"I, too, am an Englishman," he repeated. "Perchance you may have heard my name."

"It is possible," I said quietly and steadily, for I was desirous that he should not fancy that fear was in my heart.

"You have heard it. It is Robert Parsons."

My heart gave a great leap, and I could scarce refrain from a cry, for now I knew I was face to face with the great Jesuit, whom even Queen Elizabeth feared.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE ARGUMENT OF FATHER PARSONS.

"CAN you speak the truth, Rupert Hamstead?"

"I always do," I replied.

"Ah!" and he seemed to regard me with increased interest. "When it suits your purpose," he added presently; "but when a lie bringeth the greater profit, what then, young man?"

"I hold my peace," I replied.

"You know you have put your head into the lion's mouth."

"No, I do not know."

"But you have—and a calf's head at that."

At this I did not reply, although I felt my anger rising.

"You and your friends came to Spain for two things, Master Hamstead. First, to steal away from mercy and justice two Englishwomen; second, to play the spy. Do I not speak the truth?" he continued, for I made no answer to his words.

"When a lie may bring the greater profit I hold my peace," I replied.

"What now, sirrah!" he cried angrily. "Remember you are not in England."

"It would be difficult to forget," I replied.

"And I will tell you something else," he replied. "You will never see England again, unless you obey my will. What think you of that?"

"I think more than I shall say," I replied, for now I was face to face with Father Parsons he rather angered me than made me fear.

I thought for a moment that his own anger was getting the better of him; but he repressed hot words, and went on more quietly.

"I told you that I, too, am an Englishman," he went on. "Once, indeed, like you, I was in the gall of bitterness, and denied the faith. Now I forswear my country; do you know why?"

A pert answer was upon my lips, but I held my peace, for I saw I should do no good by giving way to wrath.

"I forswear my country because she hath departed from the true faith. She, like the swine, hath returned to her wallow, and hath accepted an evil she-wolf as her ruler. Because of this the Lord is angry with her, and He hath given Spain, His chosen and faithful people, the mandate to go forth, and drive out the heretic English, even as the Israelites drove the Philistines of olden time. For why hath He given Spain the victory on every hand? Why doth the blood of other peoples become as water when they meet the armies of the Lord? It is because He hath chosen the Spaniards for His peculiar people, and because they, having the one true faith, must triumph everywhere."

My heart grew hot with vexation, but I said not a word. And this, I believe, was because I wondered much what was in his mind. For of this I was sure: he would not have had me brought to him, neither would he speak to me in such a way, did he not desire something at my hands.

"Your father is of the true faith, Master Hamstead?"

"He doth not accept the Reformed religion," I replied.

"And yet he continueth to serve—well, we will be kind, and call her what she hath no right to be called—the English Queen?"

"He is not a traitor to his country," I replied.

"But to his God he is."

"There you lie, Master Parsons," I said, for I could ill brook evil words being spoken of my father.

At this he laughed. But there was no true merriment of heart in it. It was rather the expression of grim amusement.

"Well, perchance you are right," he said, after a moment's thought. "He is still of the true faith, and therefore wishes the true faith to be triumphant. He will rejoice when the servants of the Lord have driven out the uncircumcised Philistines, and delivered the land into the hands of the faithful."

To this I made answer that, although my father stood by the old faith, he was still an Englishman, even as were many others belonging to the Catholic families. After this he asked me many questions, the purport of some of which was plain, but many others were a mystery to me. Sometimes he aroused me to anger, and again he made me laugh at the ignorance I thought he displayed. But now I know that he had a purpose in his mysterious questions, for, in spite of myself, I was led to tell him all I knew concerning the condition of my country, the which he doubtless desired me to do. It is true the Spaniards boasted that they knew of all that took place in England through their own agents. But this, I believe, was false. As all the world knows, all priests who had received their ordination out of England were in 1585 forbidden entrance to English ports, and, although they doubtless set the law at defiance, they were much hindered in their endeavours to gain information.

I, on the other hand, had been in a position favourable to learning all that took place. I had sailed with those great heroes who had shaken even the Spaniard's confidence in himself, and, added to this, I had, during the period when I was confined to Hamstead Manor, on account of my wound, learned many things from my father concerning the general condition of our land.

And all this Father Parsons squeezed from me just as a man might squeeze the juice from an orange, the which he repeated to those who were around him.

At the end of this part of our interview I was therefore in an ill-humour with myself, and determined to be more on my guard. Not that I had gained nothing by our conversation; for, although I do not believe he thought I learned aught, I discovered many things. One was that Father Parsons was in constant communication with the Pope, and that it needed all his powers to persuade him to promise money to Philip in support of the great armada which he proposed sending. Moreover, I discovered that the Pope was not so confident of the success of King Philip's enterprise as the Spaniards desired him to be, and could only be persuaded to offer support on the condition that he should receive much gain in money when the English power was destroyed. I learned, moreover, that the Jesuits were King Philip's constant advisers, and that he, in spite of much need of money, had granted large sums to them. But this was not all. I found out that the Jesuits were poor, and were constantly plotting to add to their treasury; that, in truth, they were in sore straits, so sore that they had, much to their pain, been obliged to abandon work they had begun.

These things I learnt, not through so many definite sayings, but because, although I was far from wise in my answer to Father Parsons' questions, I nevertheless played a game of see-saw with many of them. Besides, sometimes Father Parsons and those with him got to talking among themselves, and they, perchance forgetting or not knowing that I knew something of their tongue, let out things which they, I am sure, desired to keep quiet.

I presently saw, however, that information concerning the feeling in England was not their chief desire, for presently Father Parsons harked back upon the subject concerning which Señor Toledo had visited me, and concerning which I had been first led to speak to the Señorita de Valencia. And here again I discovered that it was well known to them that Sir John Tremayne was not only the richest man in Cornwall, richer even than the Boscawens, the Edgecumbes, the Molesworths, or the Trevanions, but was one of the richest men in England, and that, should he dower his daughter with his possessions, the Jesuits could make terms with one who could fill their coffers, and enable them to carry on the work so dear to their hearts. It soon became clear to me, moreover, that those trickeries of Church law concerning which John Trenoweth had spoken when first he came to Barnet, and through which the Jesuits hoped to gain Sir John Tremayne's wealth, had come to naught, and they had been led to use what other means might come to their hands.

The coming of Mawgan Killigrew and myself was therefore much to their minds, and, seeing we had, by what may seem a foolhardy deed, placed ourselves in their power, they deemed us a valuable and, at the same time, an easy means whereby they might accomplish their purposes.

The truth of these conclusions came to me partly while I was in the presence of the men who had brought me hither, and more fully afterwards when, in silence, I mused over what had taken place.

I found that dealing with Father Parsons was far more difficult than with Señor Toledo, or, for that matter, with the Señorita de Valencia. For not only had he a specious way of putting things, but by his very presence he made it hard to disobey him. Indeed, at one time I thought I should have promised to write the letter he desired. Not for my own sake, but for that of the two Englishwomen who lay at the mercy of the Spaniard. For Father Parsons promised so many things, and with so many wily words, that it seemed to me that I was the veriest churl not to obey his will.

"Look you," he said, "you are young, Master Hamstead; but, although young, you have a wise head. What you say will not be according to the will of that thick-headed Cornishman, for you are a wiser man than he, and a stronger. What will you gain by refusing longer? This! I tell you, you will be put to torture, and at a word from me you fall under the ban of the Inquisition. Think of it, young man, for the tools thereof be not pleasant to the flesh, and I would fain save you from them. The faggot is not the worse part of a heretic's doom; it is that which precedes the faggot. Oh! you be brave: I know that right well. So, for that matter, be your companions. But why should you die? Verily, it will go to my heart to see a brother Englishman die. Then what good will it do? Will you save the Englishwomen? Nay, rather you will anger the Church, and cause their sufferings to be greater. Ah! and you, an Englishman, cannot stand by and see them suffer their doom, as, by the Mass, you will have to do, before suffering your own. I tell you there is no escape. You have seen Toledo: you know how the city is guarded. Hitherto you have been treated kindly; but this is because of my will; but continue to refuse, and I tell you the very devils may pity you. On the other hand, obey. Write the letter as I shall dictate, and what happens? Why should you not denounce your heresy, and—well—ah! I need not say what. There be maidens in Spain, fair and rich: you have seen, and you know. Why may not Master Hamstead, and Master Killigrew too, for that matter, live here in the sunshine, instead of under the dark English skies? Now choose, Master Hamstead, and save your countrywomen as well as yourself."

"'Thank God, she is but partly English; otherwise, I would deny my country.'"—p. 558.

All this he said in a far more pleasing and telling way than I can make it out on paper, said it too while his curiously shaped eyes were fixing me just as a serpent fixes a helpless bird, while his voice so affected me that I could scarcely judge of the issues aright.

It was at this time I was on the point of promising him, even although I should curse myself to my dying day for doing so, and I believe he would have mastered me, had I not at that moment turned and saw the granddaughter of Sir John Tremayne. Then the power of Father Parsons was destroyed, and, instead of promising, I felt I would rather die a thousand deaths than do so. For the sight of her angered me beyond the telling. It came to me in the twinkling of an eye that this inhuman maid was in league with her mother's enemies. That, even while they had tortured not only her, but Esther Truscott, she had aided Father Parsons and Señor Toledo in heating the pincers, and seeing to the screws of the torturing instruments. Aye, I remembered how she had told me of her intention to go away into a nunnery even while her mother was left in the hands of the persecutors. I saw, too, that what I had been asked to do was not to aid the Señora de Valencia, but to give the Jesuits her father's money. I remembered that they had given me no sufficient promise that her sufferings should cease, or that her liberty should be restored, even although her father might dower her with all his possessions. And the Señorita knew this. All the time Father Parsons had been seeking to play with me as a spider plays with a fly she had watched and listened, and aided.

"She cannot be a woman, she must be of the devil," I thought. "Did she possess a woman's feelings, had she but the spark of the feeling which a daughter should feel for a mother, she would place herself on her mother's side. She would toil unceasingly, she would undermine the power of these priests, and set her free. But, instead, she aideth and abetteth them. She will consent to her mother's torture, even while she sees her grandfather's estates come into the hands of the Jesuits."

Although the fires of anger burned hot within me, I did not cry, nor rave. Rather I seemed like one who had grown cold, and I remember well saying to Father Parsons:

"And supposing Sir John Tremayne dowered his daughter, would she be able to keep it? To whom would it go eventually?"

"Ah!" said Father Parsons, with a smile, "naturally, we care for the children of the Church. It is because the granddaughter of Sir John Tremayne is robbed that we are anxious to do her justice. If you write this letter, and Sir John is wise, his wealth will fall into the natural course, and become the property of the señorita."

Then I bethought me that she had told me she would go into a nunnery, the which made me still more determined not to yield an inch.

"And now the business is concluded," said Father Parsons. "Master Hamstead is a wise young man, and will do our will. I will dictate such a letter as will lead Sir John to do his family justice, and in the meantime both he and his friends shall be better housed."

"Nay, Master Parsons, the business is not finished," I made answer.

"What, sirrah, you dare to disobey!" he cried in anger.

"I would rather put my hand in the fire and watch it while it burned than I would take a pen to write such a letter. And this, too, I say for Mawgan Killigrew." This I said not loudly, but with enough voice for him to hear plainly.

"By the Mass, and it shall burn too!" he cried, his eyes gleaming like coals of fire.

"Think you I will become a cat's-paw to her!" I cried, pointing to the señorita. "Thank God, she is but partly English; otherwise, I would deny my country. What! Play into the hands of a creature who will stand by and see her mother robbed and burned, and who smileth upon her murderers! Did I, my father would curse the day I was born, and my mother, who was snatched from the fires on the day that Queen Mary died, would sorrow that she had not died for her faith, rather than a son of hers should live to do so base a thing!"

"Stop his mouth!" cried Parsons. "Gag him! Away with him to the dungeons!"

"Aye, that is ever your argument," I cried, for now I no more feared Father Parsons than Master Latimer feared Bishop Bonner.

"You claimed just now that we were of the same country. It is a lie, master priest. You be but a son of perdition, and do but carry on your father's trade. As for you," I cried, turning to the maid, "did I not know what a Spaniard is, I could not have believed that one in whose veins one drop of English blood flowed could have sunk so low as you. The sluts who live by robbing the dead bodies—aye, even the offals of London streets—have more right to the name of woman than you!"

As I said this Father Parsons looked at me open-mouthed, while others, not knowing the language which I spoke, gazed at me in apparent wonder, for I know my voice was hoarse with passion, and every bit of me trembled as though I had a shaking fever. But no sooner had I finished than I almost repented, even against my judgment, for such a look came on the señorita's face as I never saw on a woman before. Ghastly terror came into her eyes, her cheeks became as pale as polished bone, while she fairly gasped for breath.

At the sight of this I say I almost repented me, for I bethought me that, after all, she was a woman, and trained to hate those was professed her mother's faith. I remembered, too, that He Whom I called my Saviour prayed even when on the cross that those who murdered Him might be forgiven. Besides, even as I watched her, I heard a mocking laugh, and, turning, I saw Señor Toledo, his eyes all aglow with evil pleasure, even as though he saw me torn by instruments of torture.

But the Señorita de Valencia spoke no word, neither uttered a cry, and before I well knew what happened next I found myself dragged out of the room, to be presently placed in a stinking dungeon.

It was here that, for the first time since I had come to Spain, despair filled my heart. While I had been with Mawgan Killigrew and John Trenoweth, and while I could see a ray of sunlight, I was brave and cheerful. But now I was alone, neither did one ray of light pierce the darkness of the place. The smell of it, too, was nauseous beyond words, while as I sat alone I heard noisome and, as it seemed to me, pestilential creatures crawl around. More than once creatures as large as rats crawled over me, and when I tried to catch them and throw them away the things bit me, and caused me much pain.

How long I was here I know not even to this day; for I had no means of marking the time, but I know that it seemed eternity to me. Then it was that I realised something of what I had been told concerning the darkness of hell, and had I not been supported by the thought that I had in no way betrayed my conscience, neither had I been faithless to the Gospel, I verily believe I should have gone mad.

After I had been there for a great length of time, tortured by insects, and made sick by the smell of the dark hole, filled with noisome creatures as it was, the pangs of hunger got hold of me, and the dread thought came to me that I was doomed to die of starvation, or perchance, when I was too weak to defend myself, be eaten alive by the rats which swarmed everywhere. Not once did I sleep, although my eyeballs ached for the want of it, neither did I have one moment's peace.

After a time a gaoler appeared, carrying a light and bringing some food, and so starved was I that I snatched it from him and gnawed at the coarse meat as though it were a dainty fit for a king's table. All the same, it was corrupt, evil-smelling stuff, not fit to give to a dog. When I had eaten, the man watching me all the time, I asked him where I was.

"Still under the Alcazar," he replied.

"And my friends, where be they?" I asked.

